An Advertisement to the Reader concerning this large and exact Table, much wanted and desired in the first and second, and now annexed to the third Impression of this Book.

How well it is observed that Humane Industry cannot begin and finish any thing at one and the same time, this famous Book may be an instance; whose first Edition was but the Monogram and rude draught to a more exact Composure; the second adding much Matter and Method to the first, and now the third adding Matter, Method, and a most Exact and full Table of both to the second; containing all the Provinces, Kingdoms, States, Principalities, Continents, Isles, Promontories, Isthmuses, Seas, Rivers, Havens, Mart Towns, Cities, Strong Holds, with their Longitudes, Latitudes, Scituations, Plantations, Inhabitants, Ancient and Modern Names, and the Book and Page where they are satisfactorily discoursed of.

A Table (that notwithstanding every Methodical Book such as this is, is its own Index; every Great Memory, like that of Cesar, carrieth a Table of all Books in his Brain, and every hopeful Student makes his own Table to all Classical Authors) that carrieth with it its own Commendation; 1 To those that have not time to read Books but Indexes. 2 To those that have not patience to go through the whole body, and yet curiosity to observe the Remarkable parts of Geographie. 3 To those that would recollect what they have forgotten of their reading. 4 To those that upon any emergent occasion would see the Scituation, Rivers, Havens, Strong Holds, Garrisons, Longitudes, Latitudes, Commodities, Products, Curiosities, Inhabitants, Genius, Condition, and History of any place in the World. 5 To those that read any Ancient or Modern Histories, or other Authors, and would be satisfied in the Scene of the actions they read of, and the scituation of the places there mentioned. 6 To those that aiming at exactness this way, would compare all the Ancient and Modern Geographers. And 7 to all the Perusers of this Book that complained of the intolerable defects of former Tables and Indexes; of which number the learned Compiler of this Table, who drew it up for his own satisfaction, and publisheth it for the Publick, is one who wisheth others as much benefit in the easie way of perusing it, as he had in the more toilsome way of Collecting it.

The Matter added to this Impression is much; the Errors corrected, more; and all under the Authors own hand not long before he died, putting to it (as he said truly to his Friend that was with him in the perusal of it) his last hand: which I the rather mention, because there is an Impression crept out this very Year 1666. without any of these Additions and Corrections before mentioned, against the Authors last Will, (whose Relict and Widow is at this time in Law with the bold Man that durst print it) wishing so well to Learning, that no such imperfect, and uncorrected Impression should impose upon ingenuous Gentlemen, that wants both the Authors Corrections and Additions, and this Excellent Personages Table.

To the READER,

The AUTHOR rendreth this Account of his Undertaking and Performance in the following Work.

It is a great complaint with many, that they want time, either to undertake great matters, or to accomplish those they have undertaken: Whereas it is more truly affirmed by Seneca, that we do not so much want, as waste it. Non parum temporis habemus, sed multum perdimus, as that Author hath it. We trifle out too much of our precious time, as he well observeth, Aut male agendo, aut nihil agendo, aut aliud agendo; either in doing ill, or nothing, or else things impertinent: and then cry out, that we want things convenient to perform those duties, which are expected from us, in our several places. Nor have we only time enough to spend, but some time to spare; some privacies and retreats from business, some breathing fits from the affairs of our Vocations: and even of them, those times of leisure and recess, we are to render an Account in Cato's judgement, Opti reddendam rationem judicabat. Cato, as we read in Tullie. In which Account, as all men generally are concerned, so am I interested therein as much as any. For being by the unhappiness of my Destiny, or the infelicity of the times, deprived of my preferments, and divested of my Ministerial Function, (as to the ordinary and publique exercise thereof) I cannot choose but say I have leisure enough; the opportunity of spending more idle hours (if I were so minded) than I ever expected or desired. And though perhaps I could have spent those times of leisure, which the change of my affairs hath given me, with greater benefit to my self, and more to the advantage of my private fortunes: yet that of Cato did so over ballance me, that I was willing to do somewhat which might witness to ensuing times, how I had passed away those hours, and employed that leisure. And when I was considering of some particulars within the compass of my power, and answerable to that small stock of Books which I had recruited, (mine own being taken from me and disposed of, contrary unto publick Order) I was requested by some friends of no common quality, to review my Geographie; to make it more complete and useful to an English Reader: My vacancy from business, used by them as an Argument to induce me to it. A motion looked on, when first made, with neglect enough, my desuetude from those younger Studies, my great want of Books, the sad complexion of the times, and the unhandson entertainment which my endeavours for the publick had lately met with, seeming sufficient to dissuade me from the undertaking. Little encouragement, God wot, to write Books for others, when I could not be permitted to enjoy my own; or to employ my self in order to a publick service, when not alone my private fortunes, but the publick Patrimony of the Church was destroyed and dissipated. But afterwards being pressed unto it by some Members of Parliament, whom I found loth to be denied, and by some others of great rank, but such different Interesses, that I wondered how they could all center upon the same Proposal: I thought it at the last a more Christian duty to satisfy the honest desires of so many men, than to sacrifice any longer to my own privacy and retiredness, to which I had intended to devote my self. So I resolved to venture on it, though well I saw that my condition in so doing might be resembled unto that of the Israelites in the Land of Egypt: of whom the Task-masters did expect the full tale of Bricks, and yet denied them their accustomed allowance of Straw and Stubble. My case in this not much unlike to that of the Duke of Alva; Who being under the displeasure of the King of Spain in quality of a prisoner, without the least assurance of recovering the Kings favour, or his own liberty, and yet employed in that Conjunction, for the conquest of Portugal, was wont to say, That he was sent to conquer Kingdoms with his Fetters on.

And here I cannot but remember a pretty accident which befel me in the month of January, An. 1640. at what time it had been my ill fortune to suffer under some misapprehensions which had been entertain'd against me, and to be brought before the Committee for the Courts of Justice, on the complaint of Mr. Pygme, then newly return'd from his confinement, and in great credit with the Vulgar. Heard by them, I confess, I was, with a great deal of ingenuous patience, but most despitely reviled and persecuted with excessive both noise and violence, by such as thronged about the doors of that Committee, to expect the issue: it being as natural to many weak and inconsiderate men, as it is to Dogs, to bark at those they do not know, and to accompany each other in those kinds of clamors. And though I had the happiness to come off clear, without any censure, and to recover by degrees, amongst knowing men, that estimation which before had been much endangered: yet such as took up matters upon trust and hear-say, looked on me as a person forfeited, and marked out for ruin. Amongst others, I was then encountered in my passage from Westminster to White-hall, by a tall big Gentleman, who thrusting me rudely from the Wall, and looking over his shoulder on me in a scornful manner, said in an hoarse voice these words, Geographie is better then Divinity; and so passed along. Whether his meaning were, that I was a better Geographer than Divine; or that Geographie had been a Study of more credit and advantage to me in the eyes of men, than Divinity was like to prove, I am not able to determine. But sure I am, I have since thought very often of it, and that the thought thereof had its influence on me, in drawing me to look back on those younger studies, in which I was resolved to have dealt no more: and thereto, in the Preface to my Microcosm, had obliged my self.

And it is possible enough, that in respect of that general promise, I may lie under the censure of inconstancy and breach of Covenant, in that I had solemnly declared in the aforesaid Preface, that the Reader should not fear any further enlargements, which might make him repent his (then) present Markers; that it had received my last hand, and that from thenceforth, I would look upon it as a Stranger only. But it was meant withal, and expressed accordingly, unless it were for the amending of such Errors, of which by the strength of mine own judgement, or any ingenuous information, I should be convicted. And Errors I must needs say, I have found so many on this last perusal, and those not only verbal, but material too; as did not only free me from that Obligation, but did oblige me to a further Review thereof. For being written in an age, on which the pride of youth and self-opinion might have some predominancies, I thought it freer from mistakes than I since have found it: And those mistakes, by running through eight Editions (six of them without my perusal or super-vision) so increased and multiplied, that I could no longer call it mine, or look upon it with any tolerable degree of patience. So that in case the importunity of friends had not enforced me, in a manner, upon this Employment, the necessity of consulting my own fame, and leaving the Work far behind me to succeeding times, would have persuaded me in the end to do somewhat in it. Which though the last, was not the least of those inducements which inclined me to the undertaking of this present Work.

Having thus plainly and ingenuously laid down the reasons which did induce, though not encourage me, unto this performance: it is now fit I should declare what I have done in it, and what the Reader may expect from so great enlargements. And first the Reader is to know, that my design originally, was only to look over the former Book, to give it a Review, to purge it of the Errors which it had contracted, and not so much to make a new Book, as correct the old. But when I had more seriously considered of it, I found sufficient reason to change that purpose, to make it new both in form and matter, and to present it to the world with all those advantages which a new Book might carry with it. The greater pains I took about it, the greater I conceived would the benefit be which might from thence redound to those who should please to read it: And I would willingly so far comply with all expectations, that the short Taper of my life should give light to others in the consuming of it self. Non nobis solum nati sumus, may well become a Christians mouth, though an Heathen spake it. But if all expectations be not satisfied in the complements of the work, as I fear they will not, I desire it may not be ascribed unto any neglect or fault of mine, but to the wants and difficulties which I was to struggle with. Books I had few to help my self with of mine own; nor live I near so rich a Clergie (most of the Benefices of these parts being poor and mean) as to supply my self from them with such commodities. The greatest helps I had was from Oxford Library, which though but nine or ten miles off from my present dwelling, yet the charge and trouble of the journey, with the loss of time, made my visits to that place less frequent, and consequently the Neighbourhood thereof less useful to me, than the generality of the design might well comport with. So that when all things are considered as they ought to be, it rather may be wondered at by an equal Reader, how I could come to write so much, with so little helps, upon a subject of such a large and diffused variety, than that in any part thereof I have writ too little. And to say truth, the work so prospered in my hand, and swelled so much much above my thought and expectation, that I hope I may with modesty enough use those words of Jacob, Voluntas Dei fuit, ut cito occurreret mihi quod volebam; The Lord God brought it to me, as the English reads it.

In the pursuance of this Work, as I have taken on my self the parts of an Historian and Geographer; so have I not forgotten that I am an English-man, and which is somewhat more, a Church-man. As an English-man I have been mindful upon all occasions to commit to memory the noble actions of my Country; exploited both by Sea and Land, in most parts of the World, and represented on the same Theaters, upon which they were acted. And herein I have followed the example of the great Annalist, Baronius; Who pretending in that great and laborious Work, a sincere History of the Church, and no more than so; yet tells the Pope in his Epistle, that he principally did intend the same, pro Sacrarum Traditionum Antiquitate, & Auctoritate Romanæ Ecclesiæ; to manifest therein the Antiquity of such Traditions, and for defence of that Authority and Power, which at this day are taught and exercised in the Church of Rome. And so much I may also say of my self in this performance, though without any by-design to abuse the Reader, that though the History and Choregraphy of the World be my principal business, yet I have apprehended every modest occasion, of recording the heroic Acts of my native Soil, and filing on the Registers of perpetual Fame the Gallantry and brave achievements of the People of England; Exemplified in their many victories and signal services in Italy, France, Spain, Scotland, Belgium, in Palestine, Cyprus, Africa and America, and indeed where not? Nor have I pretermitted their great zeal and piety in converting to the Faith so many of the German and Northern Nations; Franconians, Thuringians, Hassians, Saxons, Danes, Frisons; as also amongst the Scots and Picts, together with those of Lithuania and the people of Norway: by that means more enlarging Christs Kingdom than they did their own. And as I have been zealous to record the Actions, so have I been as careful to assert the Rights of the English Nation: inherent personally in their Kings, by way of publick interests in the Subject also; as the whole body doth partake of that sense and motion, which is originally in the Head. And of this kind I reckon the true stating of the Title of the Kings of England to the Crown of France, demonstrating the Vassalage of the Kingdom of Scotland to the Crown of England; vouching the legal Interests of the English Nation, in right of the first Discovery or Primer Seizure, to Essoiland, Terra Cartierialis, New-found-Land, Novum Belgium, Guiana, the Countries near the Cape of good Hope, several of the Indian Islands, and some other places, against all Pretenders: insinuating the precedence of the English Kings before those of Spain: their Sovereignty and Dominion in the British Ocean, with the great benefit which might from thence arise unto us, invaded and almost ingrossed by the Hanse and Hollanders. And yet there is another thing which speaks me more an Englishman, than all these together; which I shall fall on soon enough, and indeed too soon, the sadnesses of the subject being well considered.

Next, as a Church-man, I have taken more especial notice of the ancient and present face of Christianity, in all parts of the World; the planting and Government of Churches, the Heterodoxies and opinions of those several Sects into which it now doth stand dismembred. By which it will appear most clearly amongst other things, that the Doctrine and Government of the Church were of equal standing; that this Government was no other than that of Bishops, and that wherefoever Christianity did find any admittance, Episcopacy was admitted also as a part thereof: the Gospel being in most places first preached by Bishops, or growing to esteem and strength under their Authority. And it is found on these Recherches, that as Episcopacy was co-eval with the Church it self: so the Subordination of Bishops to their several Primates, and the Coordination of those Primates among themselves in the common Government thereof, was of such antiquity (as being settled and confirmed in St. Cyprians time, who flourished in the year 250.) that it is hard to trace the beginnings of it. Debere Episcopos in commune Ecclesiam regere, is a noted Maxime in St. Hierome; but practically true in the Communicatorie and Formate, of the elder Ages: Which happy course had it been preserved, Episcopacy had been so far from being made a stirrup for Antichrist to mount into his Throne, as the Smectymniuses falsely charge it; that it had served rather as a Martingal to have kept him down from lifting up his head too high above the rest of his Brethren. And that this course was not preserved, came not intentionally from the Popes (for that by Antichrist they mean the Popes of Rome, is a thing past question) but from the Inundations of the barbarous Nations: though I confess the Popes were apt enough to make the best advantage of those various Accidents, which the distresses of the Church did present unto them. For by the overflowing of the barbarous Nations, Christianity was either quite extinguished, or the authority of the Primates trodden under foot; or that intelligence and commerce which had been anciently amongst them, interdicted on good reasons of State, by such Heathen or Mahometan Princes, under whom they lived. And then, how easie was it for the Pope in the new planting of the Gospel in these Western parts, (done either by his Ministers, or by his encouragement) to give unto the Bishops of his own appointing such a limited power, as might make them more and more obnoxious unto his commands, and afterwards to lessen their Authority, as he saw occasion, by granting large Exemptions to Monasteries, Convents and Cathedrals; with Jurisdiction over the Parochial Churches which belonged unto them? So that it is most evident in the course of Story, that the Popes never came unto their height, nor could obtrude their Superstitions and Novations on the Church of CHRIST; till they had weakened, by degrees, the Episcopal power. Followed in that design, though on different ends, by Wicliff, and some others in the Ages since; who have driven on their private projects under the colour and pretence of a Reformation. Episcopacy as it was co-eval with the Church of CHRIST, so was it the best and strongest Buttress in that sacred building. The weakening or subverting of which Primitive Order, did either prostitute the Church to the lust and tyranny of that proud Usurper, or expose the Patrimony thereof unto spoyl and rapine; or finally subject it to the Anarchy and licentiousness of Heterodoxies and confused Opinions. But I fear I have digressed too far in this speculation.

As a Geographer, I have been punctual and exact, in giving unto every Province its peculiar bounds, in laying out their several Land-marks, tracing the course of most of the principal Rivers, and setting forth the situation and estate of the chiefest Towns; and did once think of beautifying the Work with as many Maps as the several States and Kingdoms which are here described. But upon further consideration, how much it would increase the Book both in bulk and price, and consequently make it of less publick use than I did intend it; I laid by those thoughts, and rested satisfied with the adding of four Maps for the four parts of the World: by which the Reader may discern how each Countrey lies unto the other, though he find not each particular Province, and much less all the Towns and Cities which are here expressed; and on the other side may meet with many Towns of inferior note which are here omitted. And herein I have took some pains in searching out the first Inhabitants of each several Country, as far as I could see by the light of Letters, or go by probable conjectures, in finding out the place of such ancient Cities as are now decayed, not easily visible in their ruins; and adding to such Cities as are now in being (if of any Antiquity) their Original names. A thing as necessary to the understanding of the Histories of those elder times, as the knowledge of the present names is to the more delightful reading of our modern Stories. And though I have not pretermitted any Town of note, fit to be specified & insisted on in a work of this nature; yet would I not have the Reader look for such a punctual enumeration and description of them, as he may meet withal in those who have written the Cherography of some Country only; or think himself unsatisfied in his expectation, if he find not here the situation and affairs of each Town of War, or the Quartering place of every Company or Troop of Soldiers, which are presented to him in the Weekly News-books. In all Countries there are many places which either by the advantage of their situation, or some present exigency of affairs, are fortified and made Towns of War; or otherwise remarkable for some signal battel, in these late bustles and commotions of the Christian World; of which no notice hath been taken in former times, and consequently not within the compass of this Discourse: and yet perhaps may grow as famous and considerable in the times to come as many of the mightier Cities now decayed & ruined. He that shall think the work imperfect (though I confess it to be nothings but imperfections) for some deficiencies in this kind, may be likened to the Country-Fellow in Aristophanes, (if my memory fail not) who picked a great quarrel with the Map, because he could not find where his own Farm stood. And such a Country-customer I did meet with once a servant of my elder Brothers, sent by him with some Horses to Oxen, to bring me and a friend of mine unto his house. Who having lost his way as we passed through the Forrest of Whitchwood, and not able to recover any beaten Track, did very earnestly intreat me to lead the way, till I had brought him past the Woods to the open Fields. Which when I had refused to do, as I had good reason, alleading that I never had been there before, and therefore that I could not tell which way to lead him: That's strange, said he, I have heard my old Master your Father say, that you made a Book of all the World, and cannot you find your way out of the Wood? Which being spoken out of an honest simplicity, not out of any pretence to wit, or the least thought of putting a blunt jest upon me, occasioned a great deal of merriment for a long time after; but I hope to meet with no such Readers. The greatness of the bulk, and consequently of the price, makes me somewhat confident that none but men of judgment and understanding will peruse these Papers: and such as they will look for no more more particulars, than the nature of a general Discourse will fitly bear. Perfection and exactness is to be expected in each kind of Science, as is observed by Aristotle in his second Book of his Ethicks, ἡ ἐν τῷ ἀποδύσει τῷ πρῶτῳ ἐν τῷ ἀποδύσει, as far forth as the condition of the Argument may be capable of it. And so much if I have attained unto, it is all which can with reason be expected from me. To look for more were as improper and absurd (in the words of Aristotle) as for an Artist to expect Tropes of Rhetorick from a Mathematician, or Demonstrations from an Orator.

Lastly, as an Historian, I have traced the affairs of each several Country from the first Inhabitants thereof, (such as the Latines call Aborigines, and the Greeks Ἀυτοχθόνες) till these later times. Which that I might be sure to do on a good foundation, I have took more than common care, to settle all the first Adventurers (after the proud attempt at Babel) in their right Plantations: and that too in the way of an Introduction, that I might the better know where I was to find them, and to go on with their Affairs with the less disturbance. The rest of their Occurrences I have summed into so short an Abstract, as may be useful to the learned in the way of a Remembrancer; to the less knowing man, in the way of a Tutor; Brevity in this kind, I have much endeavoured; but so as to avoid all obscurity also. Nor have I only kept my self to the story of Kingdoms, or the greater Signeries, Estates, or Nations, which are or have been of the greatest consideration in the sway of the world: but looked on the Estates of such Dukes, Earls, and inferior Princes, as in their times have had the Government of those parts which gave Title to them; whose actions and successions are distinctly specified, and all such alterations noted, as have hapned either in the ruine of such Estates, or the translating of them from one House to another. The Catalogues and Successions of which royal and illustrious Families, I have drawn down unto the year 1648. towards the expiring of which year, I began to set my self upon this employment. And there I fix as on the top of some dreadful Precipice, which one can neither venture down without danger, nor look down without horror. Some things there are of such a nature, that either to speak of them, or to hold our peace is alike unsafe. In such a case it is best to keep at a distance. For though truth be the best Mistress which a man can serve, (Magis amica Veritas, said the great Philosopher;) yet it is well observed withal, that if a man follow her too close at the heels, she may chance to kick out his teeth for his labour.

In this regard, as also out of that compassionate affection which a true Englishman ought to bear his native Country, although in my approaches towards these present times, I have took notice in some other places of such battles, sieges, and successes in the chances of War, as have hapned in these later days: I have forbore to take the least notice of those Tragedies of blood and death which have been lately acted on the Stage of England. I cannot but with grief confess, that I might find variety of this kind enough, in the late Wars amongst our selves: in which there have been more pitched fields, more strong pieces taken, more notable traverses of State, and exploits of war, than all the world can parallel in an equal time. But I have too much English bowels to please my self in the recital, or to look back on those unfortunate Adventures, which I should rather choose to cover with the Ass of Oblivion, or bury in the grave of perpetual silence. How gladly I could have recorded these exploits of war, had they been exercised on a subject more proper for them; my willingness to take notice upon all occasions, of the actions and achievements of the English Nation, will bear witness for me. But the employing of that valour against our selves, as if not to be conquered but by one another, strikes such horror in me, that I cannot think thereof without much afflictment, nor intimate thus much of it without great reluctances. I fear it may be said too truly of our late embroylements, as the Historian of the Civil Wars betwixt Caesar and Pompey; Causa hujus Belli eadem qua omnium, nimia felicitas; that they were principally occasioned by a surfeit of too much felicity. But if we were grown weary of our own prosperities; and that prayer and passage in the publick Liturgy (Give peace in our time O Lord) did not relish with us: how happy had it been if we had found some other field to have tried our valour in? and made some foreign Country that Aceldama, which so fatally was made at home? The dishonour which we suffered in the Isle of Re, when bear thence ingloriously by the French; the forcible and long detention of the Palatinate by the power of the Spaniards; the barbarous butchery at Amoy-na; and the bearing up of the Spanish Fleet within the protection of our Castles, by those of Holland; the insolencies of the Scots, and the rebellions of the Irish, might well have stirred some indignation in an English breast. And had we fought upon those scores, or on none but them, our victories had deserved the honour of a solemn triumph; denied by the old Roman Laws to a Civil War: But our infelicity (as it seems) was like that of Rome, in following those unnatural wars with such animosities; when the unrevengeed death of Crassus, the blood of so many thousand of their slaughtered Citizens, and the shameful loss of so many of the Roman Ensigns, should rather have invited them to the conquest of the Parthian Empire. Of which thus feelingly the Poet;

Cumque superba foret Babylon spolianda Trophaeis, Bella geri placuit, nullos habitura Triumphos.

And when proud Babylon should have been constrain'd
To give us back our Ensigns lately gain'd;
We rather chose such Quarrels to pursue,
For which no Triumph could be justly due.

But such is the condition and vicissitude of humane affairs, that there is nothing permanent, and much less of certainty. The greatest Monarchies of the world, the Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, Roman, have all had their periods, nothing remaining of them now but the name and memory. And what is now become of those mighty Cities of the East, Ninive, Babylon, Ecbatana, Susa, with the rest mentioned in the Scriptures, and in Classical Authors? are not their very ruins now become invisible? Where are the puissant Families of the Achamenides of Persia, the Seleucidae of Syria, the Pharaohs and Ptolomies of Egypt, the Cæsars of Italy, the Merovingians and Carolingians of the Realm of France, and the Plantagenets of England? are they not all extinct and gone, not to be found but by the benefit of story, and some ancient monuments? And if it be so, as it is, with the greatest Monarchies, the most mighty Cities of the world, we must not think that smaller Kingdoms and Estates can either be so evenly ballanced, or so surely founded, as not to be obnoxious also to the same vicissitudes. And being that saying of Opiatus is most undoubtedly true, Ecclesia est in Republica, that the Church is but a part of the Common-wealth, we must not hope to find it in a better posture than the Civil State in which it is, and under the protection whereof it subsists and flourisheth. The Church must needs miscarry in the ruin of the Civil State, and may miscarry many times, although the Civil State receive no such alterations. Compared for this reason to the Moon by the ancient Fathers, who had observed her in her prime, in her Increase and her Full; and finally, had not only seen her in the Wane also, but sometimes too under some horrible Eclipses. Which various condition of the Militant Church, the Scriptures and succeeding Stories have set forth so fully, that there need no better nor no clearer demonstrations of it. The Ark of God taken by the Philistines, the Temple destroyed by the Chaldeans, and profaned by the Syrians, the Apostasy of ten Tribes at once from the Law of their God, and the extermination of the other two in a short time after, abundantly declare the frail condition and estate of the Jewish Church. And find we not the same for the Christian also, in the removing of the Candlestick from the Asian Churches; and making them, together with those of Greece and Egypt, and all the flourishing Churches in the East and South, to languish and decay remedilessly under the merciless incroachments of the Turks and Saracens? He must be more than blind that sees not, more savage than those merciless men that grieves not at their sad condition: but a dead member, at the most of Christ's mystical Body, who feels not in himself the sufferings of those wretched Christians.

If now we look into the causes of that desolation which hath hapned in the Civil State of those mighty Empires; to what can we impute it but their crying sins? the pride of the Babylonians, the effeminacy of the Persians, the luxury of the Greeks: and such an aggregation of vices amongst the Romans (or western Christians) before the breaking in of the barbarous Nations, that they were grown a scandal unto Christianity. In nobis passitur Christus opprobrium, in nobis passitur lex Christiana maledictum, as the devout Salvian then complained. Thus also in reference to the Church, did not the Idolatries of the ten Tribes hasten in the Assyrians? the shedding of the blood of so many Prophets by the other two, as much accelerate the coming in of the Chaldeans first, and the Romans afterwards? Do we not find the Arianism of the Eastern Churches to usher in the inundation of the Saracens; the Donatism of the South to have set open a wide Door to let in the Vandals? Did not the Saxons follow on the heels of Pelagianism, as soon almost as entertained amongst the Britans? If so, as most undoubtedly it was in the days of old, why should we think but that the Superstitions and Corruptions of the Church of Rome, the sacrilege and faction of the Churches of the Reformation, shall at the last receive the like Retribution? Or that the Divine Justice is so fast asleep that our sins must cry as loud as the Priests of Baal did unto their god, before it be awakened by us? Assuredly we are no less sinners than any of those on whom the Tower of the Divine vengeance hath so heavily fallen, whose blood the Pilates of all Ages have mingled with their solemn and religious sacrifices: and therefore have no cause to hope, but that unless we do repent, we shall likewise perish.

To the Reader.

The serious consideration of all these particulars hath made those alterations both in Church and State, which have hapned here amongst our selves, the less strange unto me. For is there any of these things, whereof it may be said, Ecce hoc est novum, Behold this is new? Eccl. 1. 10. Have they not been already in the times before us? Do we not find it positively affirmed by the wisest man that ever was, That which hath been is now, and that which is to be hath already been; Nihil enim novum est sub sole, for there is no new thing under the Sun, Eccl. 3. 15. & 1. 11. And though I cannot tell what effect the reading of this following Book may produce in others, yet I can warrantably say thus much of my self, that the observation of the fall of so many great and puissant Empires, the Extirpation of so many mighty and renowned Families, the desolation of so many flourishing Christian Churches, as the composing of this Book did present me with, (though formerly no strangers to me in the course of my Studies) did more conduce to the full humbling of my soul under the mighty hand of God than either the sense of my own own misfortunes or any other moral consideration which had come before me. And I could wish the Reader may receive so much benefit by it (besides the profit and delight which Books of this nature carry with them) that the mighty man may learn hereby not to glory in his greatest strength, nor the wise to glory in his wisdom, or in the cunning carrying on of his great designs. Let the great Leaders of these times in the Art of War, consider the sad ends of Joab the General of David's Forces, & of Belisarius the Commander of Justinian's Armies: whereof the one was slain ingloriously at the Horns of the Altar, after all his services; the other forced to beg his bread at the Gates of the Temple. Let the great Masters of Wit and State-craft have before their eyes, the unsuccessful ends of Achitophel, the Oracle of the times he lived in; and of Cæsar Borgias, propoed by Machiavel for the pattern of a Politick Prince: of which, the one laid violent hands upon himself, because his Counsel was not followed; the other after the default of all his projects, and a long imprisonment to boot, forced to flee his Country, and slain obscurely in an Ambush. Let all men lay unto their hearts the ebbs and floods, those alternations and vicissitudes, to which all humane power is subject; the slippery foundations of that might and greatness, which is not laid upon the Principles of Justice, and regulated by the Maxims of Christian Piety; and that even those which have dominion over others, have a God too above themselves, to whom they are to render an account of all their Actions. Not such a God as that of Lewis the 11th of France; of whom it is reported that he wore a Leaden Medal in his Bonnet in the form of a Crucifix: which, when he had caused any man to be killed whom he feared or hated, he would take into his hands and kiss it, desiring it to pardon him that one murder more, & it should be the last which he would commit. Such mockeries as these may be well put on a Leaden god; but the God of Heaven and Earth will not be so mocked: who being totus oculus, and totum lumen, as the Father calleth him, can easily discern our intents and purposes, notwithstanding those disguises which are put upon them; and see the nakedness of sin in its ugliest shape, though apparelled with the Fig-leaves of the best pretences, which the self-deceiving wit of man can patch up together. God is the same God now as in former times, Primus ad extremum similis sibi, Yesterday, and to day, and the same for ever; and will not put up those affronts which the impieties of men do afflict him with: though in regard of his great patience and long-suffering, they may flatter their poor souls, and say, Tush, God doth not see it.

Lastly, I am to tell the Reader, that I have now no other Patron then himself, to whom to dedicate this Work, and from whom to receive protection and encouragement in it. The time was when I might have said with Seneca, Unus mihi erat pro Populo, that one man was to me in stead of all men: the Powers of all the People being virtually united in him. But now, as the case stands, I must be fain to invert those words, Populus mihi est pro uno, the Body of the Nation is to me, in this respect, as the Head before. Unto them therefore I present it, and that not improperly: A General survey of all the World, the Government, Affairs, and Successes of it requiring a more general Patron than particular Tractates. But because all the People in the Body Collective have not abilities to read, and much less to judge; and that many of those who can do both, may neither have the list nor leisure to peruse these Papers: I look on the Nobility, Clergy, Gentry, as their Representatives in this kind; to whose favourable and ingenuous acceptance I submit the same. Which if I can attain unto it, it is all I aim at. And it will be no small comfort to me in the midst of so many sorrows as are round about me, that I have been useful to the publick, or added any thing by my Studies unto the honour and content of the English Nation: whose peace and happiness is heartily commended to Almighty God, by

THY first prest-grapes did yield approved Wine,
Such as did praise it self; yet to indear
Our Approbation, thou dost here refine
Those former Fruits; and for our better Chear
Present'st us with a pure and stronger Vine:
Lest else some curious tast might it disfast.
If so, what needs my second Bush? 'Tis Wast.

Yet well thy choice Minerva merits this,
This Ivie-Garland, everlasting green;
Which like the Muses cup proportion'd is,
Whereout thou drink'st, wherein their Liquors beem.
Nor wouldst thou scape the lash of Nemesis,
If with Diogenes thou shouldst refuse,
To let the thirsty drink therehence. 'Twere News.

Thy Book's an Ark which all the World contains,
And well may bear a short Encomion.
'Tis slender meed, yet who such pay disdains?
Good Wine may have a Bush, thought is need none.
Nor let these lines of mine seem partial strains.
Thy Work ingenious is; and Vertues brood
Like it, increaseth with due praise. 'Tis Good.

Much pains it cost, much cost, And labour more;
Fames breath is dear, 'tis hard to purchase Praise;

And Honours journey lies not in plain water.

Must with elaborate Quill climb up; and such Thy tender Genius beaſteth thee. 'Tis Much.

Too much indeed it were, but that in part
The Guerdon of well-doing is the doing.

Which yet deserves that in this Forward going,
Thy Fortunes may even-balance thy Desires.

To Worth, unto her Favourites. 'Tis True.

The Earth thy Ground-plot is, Geographi'd;
Kings sometimes are thy subjects peopling it.

A GENERAL INTRODUCTION to the following Work:

Containing the Creation of the World by Almighty God, and the Plantation of the same by the Sons of men; the necessary use of History and Geography, as well for understanding the Affairs of the Ages past, as for converse and correspondence with the Nations present; together with a brief view of some General Præcognita which necessarily are required unto the Knowledge of each.

WIT great both Piety and Prudence did the Apostles in their Summary of the Christian Faith joyn our Belief in God the Father Almighty, with that clause or Article of making or Creating the Heaven and Earth. For as the name of Father doth imply a making (Is not he thy Father which hath made thee? saith the Prophet Moses, Deut. 32. v. 6.) to who but an Almighty Father could by his meer Word, without any preexistent Matter, create that goodly Edifice of Heaven and Earth, which we behold with so much wonder and applause? A work to full of wonder to the ancient Gentiles, that some of them made the World a God. Via illum (i.e. Deum) mundum vocare? non falleris; as it is in Seneca: others more rationally conceiving God to be the Soul of the World, as giving animation or beginning to it. And though they erred, as well in making the World a God, as God to be the Soul of the World, yet might they very well have said as one since hath done, That the World is nothing else but God unfolded and manifested in the Creature. Nil aliud mundus universus quam Deus explicatus, as Cusanus a late Cardinal hath it. For certainly the special motives which did induce God unto this great work, were a desire and purpose to manifest his Power, to exercise his Providence, and declare his Goodness. Not that God needed to have made the World in regard of himself; for the World we know was made in the beginning of time, but God is infinite and eternal before all times: but that it seemed good to him to create it last, as a thing most conducive to his praise and glory; the Heavens declaring the glory of God, and the Earth shewing his handy-work, saith the Royal Psalmist. Some measuring the God of Heaven by their own affections, and finding nothing so agreeable to their own dispositions as to be in company, conceive that God being at last weary of his own solitude, did create the World, that he might have the company of the Angels in Heaven, and make a start into the Earth (when he saw occasion) to recreate himself with the sons of men. Qua beata esse solitudo queat? What happiness (saith Hortensius) can there be in solitude? To which Lactantius, Lib. 1. cap. 7. not being furnished with a better, doth return this Answer; That God cannot be said to be alone; habet enim Ministros quos vocamus Nuntios, as having the society of the Angels. But then Lactantius must suppose that the Angels were co-eternal with God himself, (which were to make all Gods, and no God at all;) or else his Answer is no Answer, as to that Objection. How much more appositely might he have thus replied unto Hortensius, That the supreme contentment possible to Almighty God is by reflecting on himself, and in himself contemplating his own infinite glories: which being co-eternal with himself, even from all Eternity, he needed no more company before the World was made, than he hath done since. Lactantius being himself a man of a very great reading, (though indeed a better Humanitarian than Divine) could not but know those sweet delights which a man habited in Learning takes in Contemplation, and the good society he hath of his own dear thoughts, when he is most retired from the sight of men. And if the wise Gentle could affirm so sadly, numquam minus solus quam cum solus esset, that he was never less alone than when he was by himself, what need can any rational man suppose in Almighty God, of having more company than himself, to delight himself in? If this suffice not for an answer to that needless question,

What God did before he made the World; let him take that of Augustine on the like occasion: who being troubled with the like curious and impertinent Caption, is said to have returned this Answer; fabricasse inferus curiosis, that he made Hell for all such troublesome and idle Questionists. Which resolution of that Father is by Sabinus, a late Dutch Poet, moulded into this handsome Epigram.

*Dum Christum Libycis Pater Augustinus in oris
Afferit, & peragis munus in ade summi;
Dum miranda refert populo primordia mundi,
Esse docens verbo cuncta creata Dei;
Impius assurgit, verbisq; procaecibus, Ater,
Ergo Opifex verum quid faciebat, ait,
Aut quibus intentus fellebas tempora curis,
Mundus adhuc nondum cum fabricatus erat?
Praeful ad hac Libycus, fabricavit tartara, dixit,
His quos servari talia mente juvat.*

Which may be Englished in these words:

When reverend Austin did in Africk preach,
And in Gods House the ruder people reach,
As he the Worlds Creation prov'd and taught
That God made all things by his Word, of nought:
A sawcy Swain upstarting needs would know,
How God before that did his time bestow;
And what to spend his thoughts upon, he had,
When neither Heaven, nor Earth, nor Seas were made:
To which the Father tartly thus; He then Made Hell for thee, and such audacious men.

But not to spend more time in answering so vain a caption, suffice it us to know, that it pleased God at last, when it seemed best unto his infinite and eternal Wisdom, to create the World, and all things visible and invisible in the same contained. A time it had, in which it first began to be, which before was not; This Moses calls Principium a beginning simply. In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth, in the first words of the Book of Genesis: which is all one as if he had said, the Heaven and Earth had a beginning; or that this unformed Mass or Chaos which he entitleth there by the name of heaven and earth, was the beginning or first draught of those several things which after were created in their proper times; that is to say, the first in order of time, because made before them, not in order of causality, as the causes of them. Caelum & terra in principio, i. e. ante omnia facta sunt, saith Simon Potius in his Scholies on S. Johns Gospel. So that whether we do expound those words, that the Heaven and Earth had a beginning; or that Moses by these words did mean, that out of that matter which he calls Heaven and Earth, as out of the beginning, or first matter, all things were created, it comes all to one: because it is thereby acknowledged that the first matter was created by Almighty God, and therefore of necessity to have a beginning. And to this truth we have not only the authority and consent of Scripture, but of the greatest part of the old Philosophers; guided thereto by this impossibility in nature, that any visible work, whether it be natural or artificial, should either give it self a being, or have that being which it hath from no cause precedent. For from that Principle Tully argueth very rightly in his most excellent Book de Natura Deorum, that as a man coming into a goodly house, in which he found nothing but Rats and Mice, could not conceive that either the house had built it self, or had no other maker but those Rats and Mice which were nested in it; so neither can it be imagined, that either this World should be eternal, of a self-existence; or was composed by any natural Agent of what sort soever. And this is that which is more briefly and expressly said by the Apostle, viz. that every house is built by some man, but he that built all things is God, Heb. 3. v. 4. It is true, that Aristotle being a very great enquirer into the works of Nature, conceived the World to be eternal; and yet not always constant unto that opinion. But then it is as true withall, that there was something else that inclined him to it, than a meer admiration of the works of Nature. Democritus and some others had been of opinion, that the World was made in the beginning, fortuitis atomorum concursibus, by the accidental union or conjunction of those several parcels, of which the Universe consisted; and that man himself was but voluntaria elementorum concretio, a voluntary mixture of all the elements, as Aminius hath observed out of their writings. To which absurd opinion (as it was no better) though it found a general imbracement amongst many of the old Philosophers, when Aristotle knew not how to submit his most exquisite judgement; and yet was destitute of such further light, as might more fully have instructed him in its true Original: he rather chose to grant the world to be eternal, than to be made of such ridiculous, and unsound, though eternal Atoms. Et maluit hanc pulchram mundi faciem ab aeterno esse, quam aliquando ex aeterna deformitate emersisse. Valesius in his Book de Sacra Philosophia so pleads the case in his behalf; and I thank him for it: who am (I must confess) a great friend of Aristoteles, whom some account for the Praefator of our Saviour Christ in rebus naturalibus, as John the Baptist was in divinis.

Nor doth the Scripture and the light of Reason tell us only this, that the whole World had a beginning; but by the help of Scripture, and the works of some learned men, we are able to point out the time when it did begin; or to compute how many years it is precisely from the first beginning, without any notable difference in the calculation. For though it be most truly said, Cittius inter Horologias quam Chronologias, that Clocks may sooner be agreed than Chronologers, yet most Chronologers in this point come so near one another, that the difference is scarce observable. From the beginning of the World to the Birth of Christ, in the account of Beroaldus, are 3928 years; 3945 in the computation of the Genevians; 3960 in the esteem of Luther; and 3963 in the calculation of Metanichon: between whom and Beroaldus (being the least and the greatest) there is but 35 years difference, which in so long a course of time can be no great matter. Now if unto the calculation made by Beroaldus, which I conceive to be the truest, we add 1648 since the Birth of Christ, the total of the time since the worlds creation, will be 5576 years, neither more nor less. A thing which I the rather have insisted on, because that from this Epoche or Era of the Worlds creation, we shall compute the times of such Kings and Princes, as reigned and flourished in the world before the Incarnation of our Lord and Saviour.

It being then resolved as a thing undoubted, that God made the World, and that he made it in such time as himself pleased; let us next look upon the matter and the method which it pleased the Divine Majesty to make use of in this wondrous work.

First, for the matter, out of which all things were created, I take it, as before was said, to be that which Moses in the first words of Genesis calls the Heaven and the Earth, because they were so in potentia; but after telleth us more explicitly, that that which he calleth Earth, was inanis & vacua, without form and void; and that which he calleth Heaven was but an overcast of darkness, or tenebrae super faciem Abyssi, as the vulgar reads it. Of which Chaos or confused Mass we thus read in Ovid, who questionless had herein consulted with the works of Moses, being before his time communicated to the learned Gentiles:

*Ante mare & terras & quod tegit omnia Caelum,
Unus erat toto natura vulnus in Orbe,
Quem dixere Chaos, rudis indigestaq; moles,
Nec quicquam nisi pondus iners, congestaq; eodem

Which I shall English from G. Sandys with some little change.

Before the Earth, the Sea, and Heaven were framed,
One face had Nature, which they Chaos named;
An indigested lump, a barren load,
Where jarring seeds of things ill-joyn'd abode.
No Sun as yet with light the world adorns,
Nor new Moon had repair'd her waning horns;
Nor hung the self poiz'd Earth in thin Air plac'd,
Nor had the Ocean the vast shores embrac'd.
Earth, Sea, and Air, all mixt; the Earth untable,
The Air was dark, the Sea unnavigable.
No certain form to any one assign'd;
This that relits; for in one body joyn'd
The cold and heat, the dry and humid fight,
The soft and hard, the heavy with the light.

Out of this Chaos or first matter, did God raise the World, according to those several parts and lineaments which we see it in, not as out of any pre-existent matter which was made before, and had not God for the Author or first Maker of it; but as the first preparatory matter which himself had made, including in the same potentially both the form and matter of the whole Creation, except the Soul of man only, which God breathed into him. And therefore it is truly said, that God made all things out of nothing; not out of nothing as the matter out of which it was made, for then that nothing must be something; but as the terminus a quo, in giving them a real and corporal being which before they had not, and did then first begin to have by the meer force and efficacy of his powerful Word. And though it be a Maxim in the Schools of Philosophy, Ex nihilo nil fit, that nothing can be made of nothing; that every thing which hath a being doth require some matter, which must be pre-existent to it; yet this must either be condemned for erroneous Doctrine in the Chair of Divinity, or else be limited and restrained to Natural agents, which cannot go beyond the sphere of their own activity. Invisible and supernatural Agents are not tied to Rules, no nor in the production of the works of Nature; though Nature constituted and established in a certain course, work every thing by line and measure as a certain Rule. And so it was with God in the Worlds Creation; he did not only make the world, but he made it out of nothing, by his Word alone: Dixit & facta sunt, he spake the word and they were made, saith the royal Psalmist, Psal. 33. v. 9. There went no greater pains nor matter to the whole Creation, but a Dixit Deus: And this not only said by Moses, but by David too, Verbo Domini firmati sunt Caeli, & Spiritu oris ejus omnis virtus eorum, v. 6. i. e. by the Word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the hosts thereof by the breath of his mouth. In which it is to be observed, that though the Creation of the World be generally ascribed to God the Father, yet both the Son and the Holy Ghost had their parts therein; Verbo Domini, by the Word of the Lord were the Heavens made, saith the Prophet David: In the beginning was the Word; all things were made by him, and without him was nothing made, saith S. John the Apostle. The Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, saith Moses in the book of the Law: Et spiritus oris ejus, and by the breath (or Spirit) of his mouth were all the Hosts of Heaven created, faith David in the Book of Psalms; Made by his Word, and yet not made together in one instant of time. In the first day he laid the foundation and no more; in the five next he raised the building: and this he did, to teach us men deliberation, in our words and actions; and to set forth withall unto us both his Power and Wisdom. His Power he manifested in the Method of the whole Creation, in that he did produce what effects he pleased, without the help of natural causes: as giving Light unto the World before he had created either Sun or Moon; making the Earth fruitful, and to bring forth plants, without the influence or motion of the Heavenly bodies. And for his Wisdom he expressed it in as high a degree, in that he did not create the very Beasts of the field before he had provided them of fodder and sufficient herbage; nor made Man after his own Image, before he had finished all the rest of his works, fitted his House, and furnished it with all things necessary both for life and pleasures.

But all things being fitted and prepared for him, at last comes Man into the world; and he doth make his entrance with a greater pomp than any of the rest of the Creatures which were before him. They came in with no other Ceremony, than a Dixit Deus; but in the workmanship of Man, there was a Consultation held by the blessed Trinity. It is there, Faciamus Hominem, let us make Man; each Person contributing somewhat (as it were) to his composition. For God the Father as the chief Workman, or principal Agent, gave him form and feature; in which he did imprint his own heavenly Image. The Son who is the living and eternal Word, gave him voice or speech, that so he might be able to set forth Gods praises. The Holy Ghost, the Lord and giver of life, (as the Nicens Fathers truly call him) breathing into his nostrils the breath of life, whereby he became a living Spirit. In this one Creature did God shew the excellency of his power and wisdom, in printing on him his own Image, and giving him Dominion over all the works of his hands; which Image of God they look for in a very wrong place, who hope to finde it in mans Body, though of a gallant composition, and erected structure. The Heathen Oratour was able in this point to inform some erroneous Christians, Ad Divinam imaginem proprius accedit humana virtus quam figura, Man doth approach more near to the Image of God, in the endowments of his Minde, than in the structure of his Body, as divinely Cicero. And as for that Dominion which God gave him over the works of his hands, the Patent is at large laid down in the first of Genesis. For God no sooner said, Faciamus Hominem, let us make Man after our own Image, but presently he adds this Charter of Supreme Authority, And let him have dominion over the Fish of the Sea, and over the Fowls of the Air, and over the Cattel, and over all the Earth. A more particular explication of those several points, wherein that Image and this Power do consist especially, I shall not take upon me or endeavour now; as being not of this place and purpose: Which only is to shew, that as man in the very act of his Creation participated more of the Divine Image, than all other Creatures; so was he by Gods special grant endow'd with a larger power, than any of the rest could pretend unto. Man, though made lower than the Angels, is in this above them; that all the Creatures of the World were made to be his servants, and to attend upon his pleasure. And yet this great and mighty Prince, this general Lord of all the World, and the Creatures in it (setting aside the dignity of his first Creation) doth come into the world in a worse condition, than any of the Creatures which were made to serve him: naked, and impotent, and speechless, without use of reason; neither of power to help himself, or ask help of others. Whereof Lactantius in my minde gives a very good reason, who telleth us, that God sends man into the world, nudum & inermem, naked, and weak, and undefenced against all violences and dangers; whereas all Creatures else, munita indumentis naturalibus & armata sunt, are naturally both armed and clothed, and able to relieve themselves. And this he doth unto this end, that man being naturally destitute of those outward helps, might make use of his inward faculties of judgment, wit and understanding, in furnishing himself with that which he wants by nature. For hereunto the first original of all Manufactures and mechanick Arts is to be referred, as is most plain and evident from the Book of God; in which we see, that presently upon the procreation of Mankind, Abel betook himself unto keeping sheep, and Cain to husbandry; Jubal to handle the Harp, Organ, and such Musical Instruments; and Tubal-Cain to work upon Brasse and Iron, two metals very necessary to most kinde of Trades. The like may be supposed in all other Mysteries and Arts of living, though there be no express mention of them in those early dayes; except it be the Art of Building, or the Carpenters Trade, which no question is as old as any, as by the building of Cain's City, and Noah's Ark is most clearly evidenced. God made the World, and fitted it with all things necessary for the life of man, leaving man to provide himself of such Additions, as rather serve for comforts and conveniencies in the way of his living, than the necessities of his life.

Here then we have the works of God, and the works of men to be considered in pursuit of our present Argument. The works of God, in shadowing the Earth with Trees and Forests, interlacing it with Chrystal Streams, and capacious Rivers; enriching it with fruitful and delicious Vales, adorning it with lofty Mountains, and stocking both the Hills and Vales with all sorts of Cattel. But nothing more sets forth the Power and Wisdom of Almighty God, as it relates to these particulars, than that most admirable intermixture of Want with Plenty, whereby he hath united all the parts of the World in a continual Traffique and Commerce with one another: some Countreys being destitute of those Commodities, with which others abound; and being plentiful in those, which the others want. Inasmuch that as in the Body of man, that Microcosm, or little World, the Head cannot say that it hath no need of the Foot, nor the Foot of the Hand, nor other members of the rest: so neither in the Body of the World, can Europe say to Asia, or Spain to England, I have no need of your Commodities; or am not wanting in those things, whereof thou boastest an abundance. Something there is in every Countrey, which may be spared to supply the defect of others; and are accordingly vented in the way of Merchandize: Of which, thus Du-Bartas in his Colonies.

Hence come our Sugars from Canary Isles.
From Candie, Currans, Muscadels, and Oyls.
From the Moluccoes, Spices; Balsamum
From Egypt; Odours from Arabia come.
From India, Gums, rich Drugs and Ivory.
From Syria, Mummie; black, red Ebony
From burning Chus; from Peru, Pearls and Gold;
From Russia Furs, to keep the rich from cold.
From Florence, Silks; from Spain, Fruit, Saffron, Sacks;
From Denmark, Amber, Cordage, Firs, and Flax.
From France and Flanders, Linnen, Wood, and Wine;
From Holland, Hops; Horse from the banks of Rhine.
From England Woolle, All lands, as God distributeth,
To the Worlds treasure pay their sundry tributes.

This, as Du-Bartas speaks of the present times, so questionless the same, or the like Commerce held good in the first Ages of the Worlds Creation; God furnishing all Countreys from the first beginning with some Staple-commodities, for the benefit of themselves and others; for the maintaining of that intercourse between Nation and Nation, which makes them link the closer in the bonds of Amity. And to this end also serve those several Manufactures wherewith some Countreys do abound in respect of others; but looked on in the present Book as the works of men. And of this kinde also are the several Politie and forms of Government. For though all Magistracy in it self be from God originally, and that the Monarchical form comes nearest to the Government used by God himself: yet being that some Politie are merely but humane inventions, all Government or Magistracy is called an Ordinance of man in holy Scripture, 1 Pet. ii. v. 13. But those particular Works of men which are the most considerable part of our present subject, are Castles, Towns, and Cities of most eminent note; which thrive and prosper in the World, according as they do partake of those Conveniencies, which conduce most to their Magnificence and Greatness. Of these Boterus gives us many (relation being had to the time he lived in) but of those many we shall touch upon the principal only; passing by those of lesser note, as pleasantness of Site, fruitfulness of Soyl, salubrity of Air, and such like obvious Observations. First then, there is required to the Magnificence and Splendour of Cities, a Navigable River, or some such easie passage by Sea, which will bring thither a continual concourse and trade of Merchants; as at Venice, London, Amsterdam. Secondly, some Staple-Manufactures or Commodities, which will draw the like resort of Merchants, though the conveniency of Sea or Rivers invite them not; as in Nuremberg in Germany, a dry Town, but mightily Traded. Thirdly, the Palace of the Prince; For ubi Imperator, ibi Roma, where the Court is, there will be a continual confluence of Nobles, Gentry, Merchants, and all sorts of Trades: And by this means Madrid, not long since a poor beggerly Village, is grown the most populous City in all Spain. Fourthly, the Residence of the Nobility, beautifieth a City with stately and magnificent Buildings; which makes the Cities of Italy so much excell ours in England, their Nobles dwelling in the Cities, and ours for the most part in their Countrey-houses. Fifthly, the Seats, or Tribunals of Justice, on which both Advocates and Clients are to give attendance; as in the Parliamentary Cities in France, and Spires in Germany. Sixthly, Universities and Schools of Learning, to which the Youth from all parts are to make resort; which hath been long the chief cause of the flourishing of Oxford, Cambridge, Bononia in Italy, and other Cities of good note beyond the Seas. Seventhly, Immunity from Tolls and Taxes; most men being most desirous to inhabit there, where their Incomer will be greatest, their Priviledges largest, and their Disbursements least: So Naples, Florence, Venice, having been desolated by Plagues, were again sodainly re-peopled, by granting large Immunities to all comers-in. And last of all, the opinion of Sanctity, either for the Reliques of Saints, or some noted Shrines, or the residence of some Famous man, or the Seat of Religion, is not the least Adamant which draws people to it, to the great enriching of some Cities: And of this, Rome it self can give us two most pregnant evidences: the one in reference to the Popes, and these latter times, that famous Town not otherwise subsisting now, than by the constant residence of the Popes and Cardinals; whose absence while the Papal Sea was kept at Avignon, had made it over-grown with Briars and Brambles, and buried it almost in its own sad ruins. The other, in the person of Titus Livius the Historian, to see which man, there came so many from the Coasts of France and Spain, that S. Hierome elegantly saith, Quos ad sui contemplationem Roma non traxerat, unius huius hominis fama perduxit; qui jam urbem tantam ingressi, aliud extra Urbem quaerent.

Such are the causes of the Greatness and Magnificence of Cities, when they are once built; none of all which might possibly be looked at by the first builders of Cities, I mean by Cain before the Flood, and by Nimrod after it; who aimed more at the love of Empire, and self-preservation, than at the general good of Mankind, or the particular wealth of those amongst whom they lived. Of Cain it is affirmed expressly in the Book of God, That being possessed with this fear, that every one that found him would lay hands upon him and slay him, in revenge of the blood of Abel; He builded a City and called it by the name of his son Enoch. Gen. 4. 17. Builded a City? For what reason? To fortifie and secure himself against all revenge; as the Text doth intimate; or thereby to oppress his Neighbours, as Josephus witnesseth. Neither was this the only City of the first Ages, though none but this be mentioned in the Book of God. That which the Scripture saith of Jubal, that he was the Father of such as dwell in Tents, and of such as have Cattel; that is to say, he was the first of those which lived upon Pasturage, and followed their Cattel up and down with their moveable Tents, not having any certain home or habitations, as the wilde Arabs now, and the ancient Nomades: is proof sufficient, that the residue of all Mankind lived a more civil kinde of life in their Towns and Villages. And if Pomponius Mela be of any credit (as in these things, I think he is) he will inform us, that the City of Joppa was built before the Flood; that the King thereof was named Cepha; and that his name, and the name of his brother Phineas, together with the Grounds and Principles of their Religion, were found graven upon certain Altars of stone. But whether this be so, or not, certain it is, that as well Canaan in the West, whereon Joppa stood, as the Land of Nod on the East side of Paradise, where Cain built his City, were peopled long before the Flood: and so were most of the other parts of the World besides. And if well peopled in all, or most parts thereof, no doubt but they had Villages and Towns, Towns and Cities too, as well for necessary habitation, as for strength and safety. Now that the World was thoroughly peopled before the Flood, seems clear to me by that great and universal Deluge, which God was pleased to bring upon the Face of all the earth: For what need all the Earth be buried in that Sea of waters, if all the Earth had not been peopled, and all the people, of it guilty of oppression, in the sight of God? Besides, it is expressly said in the holy Scripture, that in the time of Abraham, who lived about 350 years after the Flood, in the largest account, and not 300 in the shortest; there were Kings of Egypt, and of the Philistines, Kings of the Canaanites, of Shinar, Ellasar, Ellan, and of the Nations, who questionless had their Lands well peopled: that both Chaldeas, and Mesopotamia, in the time of Abraham, had their several Cities; as Ur in the one, and Haran, or Charan in the other; and that Damascus the chief City of Syria was then founded also: Not to say any thing of the building of Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh in the land of Shinar (or Babylonia) nor of the building of Ninive, Resen, Rehoboth, and Chalab in the land of Assyria, mention whereof is made in the 10. of Genesis. And it is found in good and credible Authors, that Ninus the third Assyrian Monarch (who lived before the birth of Abraham) having subdued the Kings of Media and Armenia, invaded Bactria with an Army of 1700000 Foot, and 200000 Horse, and 10000 armed Chariots; and was encountered by Zoroaster the King thereof with an Army of four hundred thousand. The credibility whereof, if it were disputed, might be affirmed by the like numerous Army brought by Xerxes against the Greeks, though in times long after following. And if we will give credit unto Diodorus Siculus, who voucheth Ctesias for his Author, Semiramis the Wife of Ninus invaded India with an Army of three Millions of men, and upwards; and yet was over-marched, and slain by an Indian King. If then within the space of 400 years, we finde the Eastern parts to be so well planted, so many Kings possessed of their Regal Thrones, and many of them able to impress such infinite Armies; why may we not conclude, that in the course of 1656 years (for so long it was from the Creation to the Flood) the whole World was inhabited and planted in all parts thereof; especially considering the long lives of men, amounting to 800, or 900 years, and consequently the long time they had to apply themselves to the act of Generation. And though I have no certain ground for it in the Book of God, yet I am apt enough to be of Mercators opinion; who placing the 16 Dynasties of the Kings of Egypt (where Eusebius begins to calculate the Egyptian times) at the first planting of that Country by the Sons of Noah; reckoneth the former fifteen to have been before the Flood, and to reach very near the times of the first Creation. That Misraim the Son of Ham was possessed of Egypt within two hundred years after the Flood, is a truth undoubted. Nor see I any cause to doubt, but that in the like space of time from the first Creation, it might be planted also by the Sons of Adam: considering, as we ought to do, that in the Infancy of the World, when the bodies of men were most perfect, and of greatest vigour, they observed no degree of Kindred or Consanguinity; nor tied themselves so strictly to one woman, as they should have done. And for the names of all the Kings of those several Dynasties, either they might be left engraven upon Pillars, such as that of Seth; or upon Altars of stone, as in those of Joppa; or Misraim might have them by tradition from the hands of Noah; and so deliver them by tale unto his posterity: the Egyptians being generally very good Heralds, and standing very much on their own Antiquity. And if this may be said of Egypt (as for my part I see no reason but it may) then may the like be said of all Countreys else, that they had their several Kings and Rulers, and set forms of Government: The Fathers of Families in those times, having the command and sovereignty over all that descended of them. Nor make I any question of it, but they had several Languages and forms of Speech, at least as to the Dialect and pronunciation; although the Radicals of the Language might remain the same. But being there are no Reminders of this first Plantation, (unless we will give credit to some Jewish Fables, who tell us of some Giants who saved themselves upon Mount Sin; or that of Nicholas Damascenus, who speaks of some that saved themselves on an high Hill called Baris, in some part of Armenia) I shall the less insist upon it. Nor had I stood so long upon these first Ages, which Moses passeth over with so short a Narrative; but that it is affirmed by Petrus, a right learned Hebrew, that neither Egypt nor Assyria, nor the rest of the World was planted and inhabited before the Flood; and that upon no stronger reason, for ought I can finde, but that it is affirmed in the last words of the tenth of Genesis, That, by these (that is to say, by the posterity of the Sons of Noah) were the Nations divided in the Earth after the Flood. Out of which words he thus concludeth, Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium; By which it doth appear (saith he) that in the times before the Flood was no such division.

*Tis

'Tis true, that this division of the world by the Sons of Noah, hath the best evidence in Scripture; because there is expresse Text for it, which is not for the first Plantations. But looking on the great increase of mankind before the Flood, that saying of Berosus will prove tantamount to a Text of Scripture, Ad comparandas novas sedes necessitatem compulisse, that they were driven by necessity to seek new dwellings; the necessity of providing victuals for themselves and their families, being as strong a motive unto such dispersals, as the Confusion of Tongues was afterwards. The difference is, that that which such necessity would have done in long tract of time, the confusion of Tongues did in an instant: not only making those proud Builders to give over the finishing of the Tower which they had begun; but to unite themselves with such, whose language came most near to that which themselves were Masters of. It was high time, no question, to delist from this proud attempt, when the Labourer understood not what the Workman called for, but brought him things quite contrary to his expectation. But because some Plantations had no reference to the Confusion of Tongues, but were made before it, or on the sending out of such Colonies as were nearest to the place where the Ark did rest; I think it not amiss to resolve that question touching the resting of the Ark; on which the Plantations of the East have so great dependence. All that the Scripture telleth us of it, is, that the Ark reited on the Mountains of Ararat; but where those Mountains are, that it telleth us not. I know Josephus, and some other, of more eminent note, (but such as ground themselves upon his authority) affirm those Mountains of Ararat to be the hills of Armenia. Which they do chiefly on these Reasons: First, because Armenia is called Ararat in the Book of God, as it is confessedly; and secondly, because of an old Tradition, countenanced by Berosus, and some others of the ancient Writers cited by Josephus, affirming, that on the Gordian Mountains in Armenia major, some of the Reliques of the Ark were remaining in their times, and used as a preservative against Inchantments. Which notwithstanding I incline rather to the opinion of Gorgopius Becanus, (who amongst many strange whimsies broached some notable truths) by whom the Ark is said to rest on the top of Mount Caucasus in the Confines of Tartary, Persia, and India. His Arguments are many, but I look on two as of greatest consequence: the first whereof is grounded upon evident reason; the second on plain Text of Scripture. That which is grounded upon reason, is the exceeding populousity of those Eastern Countreys, into which none of those by whom the world was planted after the Confusion of Languages, are yet reported to have travelled with their several Colonies, by any who have took most pains in this discovery. Those infinite numbers which Strabon (one (and but one of many) of the Kings of the Indians brought into the field against Semiramis; and the vast Army of Zoroaster the King of Bactria, conducted out of that one Province against Ninus; are proof enough, that those Countreys were of an elder Plantation, than to be a second or third Casting of some other Swarm settled in Persia, or Assyria, after the Confusion. For Ninus, who was the Husband of Semiramis, was but the Grandchild of Nimrod; and I must needs look upon it, as a thing impossible, that those vast Armies which Semiramis was able to raise: out of all her Dominions, should be encountered by one King with an equal force, and that of his own Subjects only; If that one King, and those his Subjects had been some late Colony of those new Plantations, and not possessed of a Country peopled and inhabited before that Confusion. Nor was it but upon some good ground, that the Scythians (who inhabited on the North of Mount Caucasus) were generally esteemed the most ancient Nation in the World; and carried it away from the Egyptians, Phrygians, and all other Competitors with this publick Verdict, Scytharum gens semper antiquissima: which ground could be no other, but the neighbourhood of the Ark unto them (though perhaps that ground long since forgotten, was not stood upon) and the dwelling of Noah and his children near the place of the Ark, till numbers, and necessity compelled them to enlarge their Borders. And in the enlarging of their Borders, I shall make no question, but that such parts as lay nearest, were peopled and possessed before those which lay furthest off; according to the method of Plantations in all Ages since. This, though it be to me a convincing Argument; yet it falls short of that which comes from the Text it self, both in authority and weight; where it is said of the Heads of those several Families which afterwards joyned together in the building of Babel, that, As they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar; and there they abode, Gen. 11. v. 2. If then they came from the East to the Land of Shinar; as the Text saith plainly that they did; it might well be that they came from those parts of Asia, on the South of Caucasus, which lie East of Shinar, though somewhat bending to the North; impossible they should come from the Gordian Mountains in the greater Armenia (supposed to be the Hills which the Ark did rest on) which lie not only full North of Shinar, but many degrees unto the West. For Babylonia; or Shinar, is situate in the Latitude of 35, and the Longitude of 79, and 80: the Latitude of the Gordian Mountains in 41, and their Longitude in 75. By which account those Mountains are 6 Degrees more Northwards; and 5 Degrees more Westwards than the Land of Shinar: by no means to be reckoned on the East of that Valley, except we make Moses (whose hand God guided in his Books) to speak God knows what; or in plain terms, to speak plain non-sense. And though this Scripture be so clear; that it needs no Commentary, yet the perplexities I finde amongst those of the other opinion, in shifting out of the authority of so plain a Text; do add in my conceit some moment and weight unto it. For some will have the Mountains of Ararat to be indeed on the North of the Land of Shinar, but with some bending towards the East; which were it true, as nothing is more cruelly false, Moses had never told us that they came from the East; but from some Countreys of the North, which lay toward the East. Others will have a double progress of the Heads of those several Families: First, from the Mountains of Ararat; or the Plains of Armenia, to the Fields of Assyria, and Susiana; And secondly, from thence to the Land of Shinar. But of this first journey, there is ne gryn quidem, not so much as any one syllable in all the Scripture; besides the needlessness of making them go so far about, and to cross over the great Rivers Euphrates and and Tigris; whereas they had a shorter, and an easier passage. Capellus, singular by himself, quarrelleth with the Translation (received without dispute by all other Critics) and will not have the Hebrew Kedem, to be rendred East, but to signifie that Region, whatsoever it was, which was inhabited by Kedem the son of Ismael, of whom we finde mention, Gen. 25. 15. But then besides his quarrel with all other Translations, he supposeth a former progress from the Mountains of Ararat to that land of Kedem; and consequently falleth into a part of the Error before refuted. Bochartus finding (if not fancying) that the Assyrians called all those parts of their Empire beyond Tigris, the Eastern, and those on this side of it, the Western; would thence conclude, that these Heads may be said by Moses to have come from the East, because they came from one of the Eastern Provinces of the Assyrian Empire. Every way faulty in this point: For besides that the greatest part of Armenia lieth on the North of Tygris, and the least part of it on the West, and therefore not within the compass of the Eastern Provinces; and that Bochartus hath not proved (nor indeed can prove) that this division was in use in the time of Moses; we may as rationally conclude, and with less absurdity, that the first Inhabitants of Britain, might have been said by Ammianus Marcellinus, or any Writer of that time, to come out of the West (though he well knew they came from Gaul, which is plainly East of it) because Gaul in his time was a Province of the West parts of the Empire.

Having thus fortified our opinion both with Scripture and Reason, the Arguments produced against us will be easily answered. For though Armenia be granted to be the Countrey of Ararat; yet the Mountains of Ararat may extend beyond the Countrey. That mighty Ridge of Mountains which beginning in Asia the less, run as far as India (by the Ancients commonly called Mount Taurus) might very well be called by Moses the Mountains of Ararat, because that was the first Countrey of the greater Asia by which they passed; and where they were of greater note than they had been formerly. Just as the Adriatick Sea took that name from Adria, then the chief Port of it, though it washed many Shores besides: Or as some Hills with us are called Malvern Hills, because they are highest near that Village, though they extend themselves into other Lordships. And as for the Authority of Tradition, and the Testimony of humane Writers, which (as before was said) are brought in for an help, touching some Reliques of the Ark to be seen on the Gordian Mountains; I look upon it as an Argument of no weight at all. For first Berosus (followed herein by all the rest) reports it only on the ground of uncertain hear-say; which is a weak staff for so heavy a cause to rely upon. Secondly, to balance the authority of Berosus (if of any credit in this case) we have the testimony and authority of Portius Cato, as ancient almost as he, affirming positively, in Scythia Saga renatum esse mortale genus, that Mankind was repaired in that part of Scythia which after was possessed by the Sacani: And they, we know, dwelt in those parts of Scythia which lay next to Bactria, a Province of the Persian Empire, and not far from the branches of Mount Caucasus. And Thirdly, unto one Tradition to oppose another; those of Mount Caucasus do aver, that a large Vineyard in Margiana, near the foot of that Mountain, was of Noah's Plantation; Of which we shall speak more when we come to Tartary.

It is now time I should go forwards with the Builders of Babel, and their wide dispersions; for whom it was high time to comfort themselves with such as they could understand; the necessity of discourse and conference on that fatal Accident, making them lay aside their old acquaintances, and joyn themselves to others of their own new Language. I know that many learned men, according to the number of names laid down in the tenth of Gen. being 70, have made so many Languages to have been spoken upon that Confusion: And that of those, 26 being the Posterity of Sem, dispersed themselves about Asia the greater, 30 others of the loyns of Cham, peopled Africk, Arabia, and Syria; and that the 14 which remain, being the issue of Japhet, withdrew themselves towards Europe, and the lesser Asia. But this, as to the number of Languages, I take to be but a vein conceit; though many, more improbable, have passed for current. It being plain, that Canaan and his Sons, eleven in all, had but one Language amongst them, which was the Hebrew, or the Language of the Land of Canaan. And as for Jokan and his Sons, being 13 in number, considering that he was the younger brother of Phaleg, in whose time this Confusion hapned; it is most probable, and avowed for a certain truth, that either none of them were born, or if they were, yet they were all of them too young to have an hand in the design for the building of the Tower of Babel; and consequently could not be within the curse of confounded Languages. So, here is near a third part of the 70 to be taken off; as possibly might all the Sons of Misraim be, if it were worth the while to insist upon it. This then I take but for a fancy. And as for that, of the dispersion into the said three parts of the (then) known World, I take it to be true enough in long tract of time; but false enough, if understood of any present separation of the Sons of Noah into parts so far remote and distant from one another. For what needed any such remote Plantations be, as long as they had room enough to live one near another, and so enjoy that civil intercourse, and mutual society which the nature of Mankind doth most delight in? And therefore I conceive it to be far more probable, that they who met together for the building of Babel, joyning themselves to men of the same Language with them, did first set down upon the places near the Valley of Shinar: and from thence propagated and dispersed themselves into further Countreys, as either the necessity of providing of Victuals; or seeking better and more fruitful habitations for themselves and theirs; or the desire of being out of the reach of some potent Neighbours, whose yoke they found too heavy for their necks to bear; did enforce them to it. And being so settled to their mindes, the addition of a few more years brought the like necessity of sending Colonies further off, as they grew more or less populous in their generations: It being in Plantations of Men, as in that of Bees, amongst whom one Swarm sends out another, that begets a Casting, till the whole ground or Garden grow too small to hold them. For thus (to seek no further for an instance of it) the Gauls first planted Britain, the Britains Ireland, the Irish Scotland, and the the Iles. Thus the Helvetians finding their old dwellings both too barren to sustain, and too narrow to contain their multitudes, angustos se fines habere arbitantes, as in Cassius Commmentaries, intended to plant themselves in Gaul. And thus the Syrians and Phenicians flying the dreadful sword of Josiah the son of Nun, sought them out dwellings further off from the present danger, whereof we shall speak more in its proper place. On the like motives and inducements did the first people after the Flood, distribute and disperse themselves into several parts, as their posterities have done since, and will do to the end of the World, in all probability: Giving their own names, or some names of their own imposing, upon the Countreys planted or discovered by them. And though the length, and confusing nature of time, hath either changed or worn out the names imposed by the first Adventurers, I mean the first Planters after the Flood: yet all the Footsteps of Antiquity are not so defaced, but that some Nations and Cities have preserved the memory of their first Founders and true Parents. In the discovery whereof, as Josephus in his Book of Jewish Antiquities did first lead the way, and gave good light to those who have travelled in it: So a more notable proficiency hath been made therein by Junius in his Notes on the tenth of Genesis, Sir Walter Raleigh in his excellent History, and lately by Bochartus a French Writer in his Book called Geographia Sacra. Out of whose learned labours, and some Animadversions of mine own, I shall here say somewhat concerning the Plantation of the world by the Sons of Noah; leaving the more exact and punctual description of it unto the History of those several Lands and Countreys which were planted by them.

First therefore to begin with the posterity of Sem, as those who fixed themselves in Asia, without wandering further, we finde Sem to have had five sons, that is to say, Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram, of whom there is no issue on Record in holy Scripture, but only of Arphaxad and Aram; and of these two there are but four Sons given to Aram, viz. Uz, Hul, Geiber, and Mesoch, and but one to Arphaxad, which was Selah. To Selah was born Heber; to Heber, Phaleg, the Ancestor of Abraham, and Joktan the father of those thirteen sons, whose names we shall rehearse hereafter, if occasion be. From Elam who is first named, did descend the Elamites, a people bordering on the Medes, and therefore oft-times joyned together in the Scriptures, as, Go up, O Elam; beseege, O Media, Es. 21. v. 2. And all the Kings of Elam, all the Kings of the Medes, Jer. 25. v. 25. And in the second of the Acts, Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, march in rank and file, as being Nations bordering upon one another. The principal City of this people was called Elymais, mention whereof is made in the second of Maccab. cap. 6. v. 2. sufficiently famous for the rich and magnificent Temple which was there consecrated to Diana. A City seated on the banks of the River Euleus, and neighbouring close to Susiana, which therefore is sometimes included in the name of Elam, as Dan. 8. v. 2. I mas (saith he) in the Palace of Susa, in the Province of Elam; where Elam is not taken for the Province of the Elamites only, but as it gave denomination unto all those Nations whom they after mastered. The second son of Sem is Assur, of whom there is no question made amongst the Learned, but that he was the Father of the Assyrians, called Assyres in some old Greek Writers: Not of the whole people of that great and unwieldy Empire, who sometimes generally pass by the name of Assyrians; but of the people of Assyria strictly and properly so called, as it denotes the Countrey about Ninive (the Regal City of that Empire) which after was called Adiabene. Iuxta hunc circutum Adiabene, Assyria priscis temporibus vocata, as in Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. 33. Arphaxad comes next after Assur, and him Josephus makes to be the Father of the Chaldeans, called anciently Arphaxadei, if he tell us true. But others tell us, and that more probably perhaps, that he planted in that part the Assyria which was first called Arphaxitis, afterwards Arrapachitis; by which name it occurth in the Tables of Ptolemy. Lud the fourth son is generally said to be the Father of the Lydians, a people of Asia the less, the names of Lud, and Lydi (or Adia, as the Gracians call them) being much alike. And it is possible enough that some of the posterity of this Lud might afterwards settle in those parts, and call the Countrey by the name of Lud their common Ancestor; as the posterity of Abraham took unto themselves the name of Hebreus from Heber, one of the Progenitors of their Father Abraham. But that Lud should in person go so far from the rest of the sons of Sem, I cannot easily imagine. For Aram the first and last (as they stand in order of the Text) sets himself down close by his Brethren in the Land of Syria, which in the Hebrew is called Aram, and from thence the name of Arameans was given to the Inhabitants of it. Of which, and of the several Provinces which were hence denominated, we shall hereafter speak more fully, when we come to Syria. Only take now this testimony and acknowledgment from the pen of Strabo, Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipsi Syri Aramensis & Arameos vocant. Those (saith he) which we now call Syrians, do call themselves Arameans, or Arameniens. In, and about the same parts, did the four sons of Aram set themselves and their Families; Uz in that part of Syria which is called Syria Damascena, or Aram Damascen: the building of the great City of Damascus being generally ascribed unto him: and the Land of Uz, bordering South upon Damascus, taking denomination from him. The like did Hul, or Chul, the next son of Aram, whom both Josephus and St. Hieron settle in Armenia, or Aramenia, as in Strabo: And that not improbably, considering that there is a Region in Armenia, which Stephanus calls Cholobetene; and divers Cities in that tract, which still preserve the Radicals of Hul, or Chul, as Cholus, Cholnata, Cholimna, Colsa, and Colana, whereof mention is made in the Tables of Ptolemy. For Geiber, the third son of Aram, it is not yet agreed on where to finde his dwelling. Josephus, contrary to all reason, placeth him in Bactria; and Mercer with as little, in Caria, a Province of the lesser Asia, and Acanthia of Greece. Junius sets him down in the Province of Cassitis, and Selenis, near his Father Aram, where Ptolemy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation called by Pliny Gindareni: Bochartus on the banks of the River Centris, which divides Armenia from the Carduchi, as it is in Xenophon. Which River, if it were called originally Getri, as he conjectureth it might be, the contro-verſie were at an end. But being that we finde in Protony, a City of Albania (which bordereth on Armenia) called Getara, and a River of the ſame Countrey called Getras; I ſee no cauſe why we ſhould ſeek further for the ſear of Getar; though the Greek Copies (more ſubject to corruption in the times of ignorance, than the Latin were) in ſtead of Getara read Gagara. But if this be too far to ſet him, we ſhall finde Mas or Meſch, the laſt Son, planted nearer hand, even in the Northern parts of Syria, towards Meſopotamia, near the Hill called Maſius: at the foot whereof there is a people, which Stephanus calls Maſieni; and thereabouts a River, which in Xenophon is named Maſca. Both which do evidently declare from what root they come.

Come we next to the ſecond branch of the houſe of Sem, derived from Arphaxad; whom we left ſetled in the Region of Arrapachitis, in, or near Aſſyria. Not far from which in Suſiana, a Province of the Perſian Empire, there is a City of chief note called Sela; mention of which is made both in Protonies Tables; and the 23 Book of Ammianus Marcellinus. Adde unto this the authority of Eufſtathius Antiochenus, who briefly thus, Sela de Suſanidis. The People of Suſiana came from Sela. But this, as I conceive, muſt be underſtood only of that part of this people, which lived in and about the City of Sela, and not of the whole Nation of the Suſians, or Suſani; which borrowed their denomination from another root. To Sela was born Heber, from whom the people of the Hebrai, or Hebreues do derive their name. And to him Phaleg his firſt-born, who in all probability gave name to the Town called Phalga, ſituate on the River Euphrates, not far from Seleucia: Mention whereof is made by Stephanus in his Book of Urbiſus, and by Protonie in his Geography; where it is placed right on the banks of Euphrates, where the River Chaboras mingles waters with it; but there corruptly called Pharga, in ſtead of Phalga.

But the great increaſe of Sem's poſterity came by Joktan, the ſecond Son of Eber, the Father of no fewer than thirteen Sons, whoſe names are on record in the tenth of Geneſis, where it is ſaid, that their dwelling was from Meſha, as thou goeſt to Sephar, a Mount in the Eaſt. And here I muſt crave leave to differ from Bochartus, who hath thronged Joktan and his Sons into a little corner of Arabia Felix, where I can finde no room for them, and leſs reaſon to place them. For being that Chus the ſon of Cham, and the Chiefs of his poſterity, eight in number, were planted in Arabia, as himſelf confeſſeth, it muſt needs be, that they had ſpread themſelves over all the Countrey before any of the ſons of Joktan were of age ſufficient to be the Fathers of Families, and lead Colonies thither. Joktan is credibly ſuppoſed not to have been born when ſuch of Noah's poſterity as are mentioned Gen. 10. diſperſed themſelves into new Plantations; but it is evident from the Text, that none of his children were then born, if their Father were. And this Bochartus doth acknowledge in two ſeveral places. Firſt, granting that neither Phaleg, nor Joktan were preſent at the building of Babel, multo minus Joktanis filii poſt aliquot annos geniti; much leſs the ſons of Joktan begot many years after; Lib. 1. cap. 16. And ſecondly, affirming that Joktan and his children came not within the curſe of Confounded Languages, quia nondum erant geniti, becauſe then unborn, Cap. 15. Hereupon I conclude it to be very improbable that Joktan and his children ſhould finde room in the beſt parts of Arabia Felix, which Chus and his poſterity had inhabited ſo long before. And as it is improbable that the ſons of Chus would plant themſelves in the worſt part of the Countrey for ſo many Ages; and leave the beſt and richeſt of it for ſome new Adventurers: So it is impoſſible that the ſons of Joktan ſhould either be removed ſo far from the reſt of the houſe of Arphaxad, who were all planted on the Eaſt of the River Tygris, as was before ſhewed; or that they ſhould be able, had they been ſo minded, to break through the whole Countreys of the Aſſyrians, Chuſites, and other Nations, to come unto the utmoſt corners of Arabia Felix. He that believes they did, or could, muſt have a ſtronger Faith than mine; but it ſhall never conduce any thing to his juſtification. Nor am I moved at all at that which ſeems to me to be his weightieſt Argument, namely, that the Arabians, particularly Joſeph Ben Abdallatif, and Mahomet Ben Jacob, two of their chief Writers affirm, that Joktan was the Founder of their Tongue and Nation; no more than I am moved to think that the Saracens are derived from Sara the Wife, and not from Hagar the Concubine and ſervant of Abraham; becauſe that people ſo report it for their greater glory.

And for the ſeveral Nations of Arabia Felix, whoſe original he aſcribes to the ſons of Joktan, I ſee ſo many tranſpoſitions of Syllables, alterations even of Radical Letters, ſuch and ſo many wreſted Originations, as by the like liberty of making quilibet ex quolibet, it were no difficult matter to finde place for them in any Countrey whatever. For how extorted and unnatural are the derivations of the Alumacota from Almodad, of the Manita from Abimail, of the Jobaria from Jobab? How impoſſible is it that Jarech ſhould give name to the Iſle which Protonie calleth Niſos Agathus, Inſula Teracum, or Accipitrum, as the Latine hath it, that is to ſay, the Iſle of Hawks, from the abundance of Hawks which were thereinbred: There being another Iſland of the ſame name near unto Sardinia (ſo called for the ſelf ſame reaſon) and a Town called Jerax in Hammoniacia a Region of Egypt, to which Jarech might as well lay claim (if that would carry it) as to this Teracum, or Accipitrum, in the Gulf of Arabia? How improbable that Ophir ſhould give name to Myſephre, a poor Iſle of the Red Sea, Obal to Sinns Avalites in Aethiopia, on the other ſide of that Gulf? Or that Diela muſt be fixed in Arabia, for no other reaſon, but becauſe the word ſignifieth a Palm-tree, of which that Countrey yields good plenty; as if ſome other Countreys did not yield as much? Theſe and ſome other reaſons hereafter following have made me bold to differ from that learned man in this particular, whoſe induſtry and abilities I do otherwiſe honour; and rather to look for Joktan and his ſons in the Eaſt part of the World, where the Scriptures place them; than in the South (with reference to the Wilderneſs, or Land of Madian, in one of which the Book of Geneſis was written) where Bochartus placeth them. Yet ſo far I muſt muſt yield to that learned man, that ſome of the Deſcendants of Joktan in long tract of time, moved with the rarities of the place, might come from India, and plant themſelves upon the Sea-coaſts of Arabia Felix; as the Arabians at this day, moved with the wealth and trade of India, have poſſeſſed themſelves of many of the Ports and pieces on the Shores thereof.

Now the Text telleth us of the Sons of Joktan, that their dwelling was from Meſha, as thou goeſt to Sephar, a Mount of the Eaſt; ſo that by theſe two boundaries, Meſha and Sephar, their habitation muſt be found. I know Bochartus would have Meſha to be Muſa, a noted Port-town on the South-weſt of Arabia Felix; and Sephar to be the City of Sephar in the South-Eaſt of that Countrey; that City giving name to ſome Mount adjoining. But being they both lie directly South of the place in which Meſis wrote, I cannot ſee how this poſition can agree with the word of Scripture; and therefore we muſt look for both in ſome other place. And firſt to find out Meſha, we need go no further than Bochartus himſelf, who maketh Meſh, the laſt of the Sons of Aram, the Son of Sem (according to the general opinion of moſt writers elſe) to be planted in the Mountainous tracts of Meſopotamia, from him called Mons Maſius; more of which before. And then for Sephar, which the Text calleth a Mount of the Eaſt; if it be the Southern part of Mount Imani, by Protonie named Bitiga, by the Moderns Gatay, extending from Mount Caucasus to the Cape Comari in the higher India, as Poſſellus a right learned man doth conceive it to be; We have without more difficulty found out the dwellings of the ſons of Joktan, according to the bounds laid down in holy Scripture. But for fear this may not ſatisfie, for want of ſome Seconds to Poſtellus (if Truth needs a Second) we have Siphare a City of Aria, directly Eaſt from Mons Maſius, or the dwellings of Meſh; both in the Eaſt parts of the World, with reference unto the place in which Moſes writ: Mons Maſius being placed by Protonie in the 74 degree of Longitude, and the 37 of Latitude; and Siphare 36 degrees more toward the Eaſt, but with no more than two degrees of Latitude ſuper-added to it. And this agreeth to the poſition assigned to the ſons of Joktan, by Joſephus, Eufſebius, and S. Hierome; the emendation of Bochartus coming in to help. It is affirmed by Joſephus that the Joktanites poſſeſſed all that Tract, and Kophen a River of India, together with ſuch parts of Syria as did border near it. Theſe words being borrowed from Joſephus both by Eufſebius and S. Hierome; the firſt inſtead of Syria reads Seria, and the other Seria, but neither rightly: there being no ſuch place in the world as Seria; and Syria and Seria (or the Countrey of the Seris) lying too far off to border on Cophenus a River of India. Bochartus therefore helps them out, conceiving (I think right enough) that for Syria we ſhould there read Aria; and withall granting, as he may, that Aria in the largeſt latitude and extent thereof, comprehending Paropamiſus and Arachofia, extendeth as far Eaſtward as the River Cophenus. So that we have found out a dwelling for the Sons of Joktan, betwixt Mons Maſius and Siphare, a Town of Aria: which probably might give name to ſome Mount adjoining, as Sephar by Bochartus is ſuppoſed to do ſome of the Arabian hills bordering near unto it. And as theſe ſituations do agree exactly with the meaning of thoſe ancient Writers; ſo is it alſo very ſutable to the other Plantations of the Sons of Arphaxad. For this I look on as a matter out of all diſpute, that Phaleg and Joktan being both too young to go upon any new Adventures, when ſo many of the reſidue of Noah's poſterity removed toward Shinar; kept themſelves under the tuition of their Grandfather Noah; or at leaſt wandered not from the Plantation of their Father Arphaxad: till Joktan's Sons being grown to be Fathers of Families, were forced to caſt about for new habitations. And when neceſſity compelled them to ſeek new ſeats, I would fain know why they ſhould think of making themſelves a way to Arabia Felix, through Countreys peopled and poſſeſſed a long time before; when they had Elbow-room enough on the Eaſt of Tygris, and the unpeopled Countreys of ſome parts of India lay ſo near at hand.

Nor want we as good evidence and as little forced for ſome of their Plantations in the Eaſtern parts, as Bochartus hath fancied for them in Arabia: For Almodad might probably be the Founder of Almodena, the Metropolis of Meſopotamia, not far from Meſha or Mons Maſius the Weſtern Boundary: and Jarech of the Nation of the Arachofians inhabiting near Siphare the Eaſtern limit, assigned unto the Sons of Joktan. With what an eaſie change might Obal or Chubal be ſuppoſed to be the Father of the Cabolites of Paropamiſus? Hadoram of the Orites an Indian people near unto the other? But theſe North-eaſtern parts being peopled, or not very pleaſant, how many of the Sons of Joktan ſhall we finde in the Southern parts of India? Bochartus himſelf confeſſeth that the Land of Ophir (another of the Sons of Joktan) was a part of India, but whether Sumatra, Taprobane, or Aurea Cherſoneſus, I diſpute not here. Like evidence there is for Saba, remembrances of whoſe name are found in Sabalalla one of the mouths of the River Indus, Sabana, a City of the Golden Cherſoneſe, a River in the ſame Tract named Sabannus, and a City called Saba: beſides the whole Nation of the Sabai mentioned by Dionyſius in his Periegeſis. And though ſome late Criticks read it Siba in ſtead of Sabai, (as that there was an Indian Nation called Siba, is confeſſed on all ſides;) yet ſeeing Eufſtathius findes the Saba in this Countrey alſo, I cannot ſee but that there ſhould be room enough in India for both people to dwell in. For Abimail another of the Sons of Joktan we finde more evident footſteps of him in the Mali or Malli an Indian people, in Maleta and Muliba two Towns of India, in Malau an Indian Mountain, and finally in Malai Colon a Promontory of Aurea Cherſoneſus, than in the Manita of Bochartus. For if Abimail ſignifie the Father of the Mali, as he ſaith it doth; he was more like to be the Father of the Mali, commonly and literally ſo called, whom we finde in India; than that we ſhould be forced to look for them in the Manita, or look for the Manita in the houſe of Abimail. If Diela muſt be planted in Arabia Felix for no better reaſon, than becauſe the word ſignifieth a Palm, whereof there is plenty in that Countrey; I doubt not but to finde as many Palm-trees to plant by amongst the the Indians, as Bochartus doth among the Arabians. And finally, if Chatriamie, or Chatriamitis an Arabian Region, have such resemblance to the name of Chatsarmaveth, as to take that Appellation from him, as Bochartus telleth us it did: we may conclude with equal, if not better reason, that the Chadramatita and Indim people, seated upon the mouth of the River Indus, upon whose streams some of the residue, of his Brethren had their habitations, had their first Original from that Chatsarmaveth. For Havilah or Chavilah the Ancients generally set him in the Indies also, not far from Saba and Ophir: two of his Brethren: to whose authority I submit, because I finde a Province in the Golden Chersonese, called the Kingdom of Asa, and thought to be so called from this very man. And I conceive the like also of the rest of the Joktanites, whose habitations might be found in India, or near Mes and Se-phar, if one would take that liberty of Criticizing, altering and transposing letters, as Bochartus doth, only to fix them in a place where they never were. Suffice it that this short Essay may inform the Reader; that Bochartus was too confident a lover of his own opinion, where he affirms, Nec locum alium Se-phar nemine, nec ulla posterorum Joktan in Aria aut India vestigia jam superesse; that is to say, that there is no such place as Se-phur, nor any track or footstep of the Sons of Joktan to be found in Aria, or the Indies. The contrary whereof is so clearly evidenced.

These were the Generations and Dispersions of the Sons of Sem, contracted in a narrower compass than either the Posterity of Cham or Japhet: of whom the first, besides the great footing which he had in Asia, did possess all Africa, and the other, besides his share in the greater Asia, filled almost all the lesser Asia, and the whole Continent of Europe with the Isles thereof, with his fruitful Proge-ny. And first beginning with Cham, we finde him the Father of four sons, that is to say, Cush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan; of which only Phut the third son hath no issue assigned him. To Cush the eldest Son were born Seba and Havilah, and Sabtah, Nimrod, Sabtecha, and Raamah, who was the Father of Sheba and Deban. And unto Mizraim the second Son were born Ludim, and Amamim, Lehabim, Naphubim, Pathrusim, Cophthorim, and Casluhim, who was the Father of Philistim. Of Canaan and his issue we shall speak hereafter: In the mean time we will dispose of these first branches of the stock of Cham, beginning first with Cush the eldest, and so descending to the rest of this first Line. And first for Cush, though it be generally said both by the Greek and Jewish Writers, that he was the Father of the Ethiopians in the heart of Africa; yet upon better search he is found to have gone no further than Arabia, possessing himself of a good part of that which is called Petrea, and some part of Arabia Felix. For whereas Zippora the wife of Moser, was daughter unto Jethro the Priest or Prince of Medians, Exod. 2. v. 16, &c. and yet is called an Ethiopian woman, in the 12. of Num. v. 1. it must needs be, that by Ethiopian in the last place, must be meant an Arabian: for Median doubtless was a City of Arabia near unto the Red Sea, as is apparent by Josephus for the Jewes, Ptolomy for the Gracians, and S. Hierome for the Latine Writers. But we shall canvass this more thoroughly in its proper place: the strength of reason serving for a supplement of that one defect, which is, that there is no remainder of the name of Cush in any of the Cities, Promontories, Hills or Rivers of all that Countrey, by which his plant- ing there might be made more evident. Seba, the eldest Son of Cush, sets himself down on the shores of the Red Sea, as near his Father as he could; becoming the Original of the great and wealthy Nation of the Sabaeans: the so much celebrated City of Saba, memorable for abundance of the best Frankincense, being their Metropolis or head City. A Nation seated in the most Southern part of this Peninsule, sub- ject in Salomon's time to that famous Lady called in the old Testament from her Countrey, the Queen of Sheba; and in the new Testament from the situation of it, the Queen of the South: the holy Spirit in both places giving her an ample and remarkable testimony.

For Havilah or Chavilah the second of the Sons of Cush, most probable it is that he possessed him- self of that part of Arabia, which lay nearest unto Babylonia, and that he gave name to that Land of Havilah, which the River Pison is said to encompass, Gen. 2. v. 21. Some footsteps of his name remain in the Chaulotei of Eratostrates, the Chaulasii of Festus Avienus, but more plainly in the Chavelei of Pliny; being all three but one people, though thus diversly named; and all of them planted towards the Persian Gulf, and so to Babylon. On the same shore of the Persian Gulf, we are to look for Sabta the third son of Cush, where Ptolomy informs us of a City called Saphia, and of an Island in the same Gulf called Saphia also. From whence in probability some of this people might pass over into Persia, on the other side of the Gulf, and there give name to the Sabtei which by the transposition of the letter T. are by Ptolomy called the Stabai. That Nimrod the fourth Son of Cush did first plant him- self in Babylonia, the Scripture is so plain and positive, that nothing need be added to it. Of Sabtecha the fifth son, I confess I can finde no track in any of the ancient Authors. For why we should admit of so great a change, as first, of B. into M, and then, of T. into D. (which could not easily be done by very careless Transcribers) and so finde Stabecan in Samidace, a City or Countrey of the Carmanians on the Persian side of the Gulf, I can see no reason: And therefore rather chuse to mingle him and his Posterity with the son of Sabta, and the children of his brother Regma, all planted on the same shore of the Persian Gulf. For that Regma (our English Bibles call him Raama) was settled on the banks of the Bay Persia, hath so good authority, that there is no dispute to be made of that: Pto- lomy placing there the City of Regma (Regama it is called in the Latine Translation) by which name it occurreth in Stephanus also in his Book De Urbibus, καὶ Πύλαι αὐτῆς τῶν Περσῶν πόλιν. And Regma, on the Persian Gulf, as his words there are. And not far thence we are to look for his son Sheba; both being joyned together in the Book of God; and both there said to bulie and employ themselves in the Trade of Merchandizing; The Merchants of Shebah and Raamah (saith the Text) they were thy Merchants; they occupied in thy Fairs with chief of all Spices, and with all precious Stones, and Gold, Ezek. 27. v. 22. So that the Nations of the Sabaeans, though descended descended at the first from several parents, inhabited the lower parts of Arabia Felix from one Sea to the other; as evidently appeareth by those words of Pliny; where he informeth us most truly, that the Sabaens, an Arabian people, well known for their abundance of Frankincense, ad utraque maria porrectis gentibus habitare, had spread themselves over all the Countrey, even from the Red Sea to the Gulf of Persia. Finally, in the same track we find Deban the other son of Regma, and the last of all the sons of Cush: there being on the mouth of the Persian Gulf (but on the Arabian coast there- of) not only a City, but a Province called by the name of Deban, which both Ortelius, and some other late Geographers do take notice of. And more than so, the Prophet Ezekiel joyns him with his brother Sheba, and makes them both to follow the same trade of Merchandize; The men of Deban were thy Merchants, chap. 27. 15. Sheba, and Deban, and the Merchants of Tarshish, cap. 38. 13. They brought thee horns of Ivory, and Ebony, saith the Prophet in the former Text.

The head of the next house of the race of Cham, was Misraim, the second son, of whom it is generally affirmed, that leaving his elder brother Cush and his posterity, in the rich and delectable Countreys of Arabia Felix, and the next parts to Babylonia, or the land of Shinar, he went with his own sons and his brother Phut, into Africa, and there planted Egypt. Of this there is no question amongst the Learned, though all the tracks and footsteps of Misraim be quite worn out: unless any thing of it were preserved in the word Mesori, by which the Egyptians antiently called the first Month in the year; or in that of Mesre, by which name the Arabians call Egypt, to this day: But being Egypt is called Misraim in the Hebrew Bibles, that only is sufficient without further evidence. And therefore leaving him in Egypt, let us look after his son Ludim, whom he sent to people Ethiopia, the next Countrey to him. For that this Ludim, was the Father of those Ethiopians, many good reasons are alleged. First, from the Texts of Esaiah, chap. 66. 19. and Jer. 46. 9. where Lud is said to be very skillfull in drawing the Bow; which agrees punctually with the Character given unto the Ethiopians by Strabo, Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus, and others of the antient Writers. Secondly, from the joyning of the children or people of Ludim with those of Phul, in the place of Esaiah before cited: which Phul may very probably be the City which the Gracians call Phile, situate not far from Syene, on the very borders of Ethiopia, and antiently inhabited both by the Ethiopians and Egyptians, as Strabo, and some others of the Antients witness. Thirdly, from the conjunction of the children of Lud or Ludim, with those of Cush, on the Gulf of Arabia, and those of Phut, or Lybians, on the other side of Mount Atlas, both next neighbours to them; as in Ezek. 30. ver. 5, and that of Jer. above mentioned; (where our English very strangely rendereth Ludim by the name Lydians) which dwell too far off both from Chush and Phut, to be joyned together in one action. But of this, more than enough already, the Arguments being so strong, and so most demonstrative. I go on therefore to the next; only observing by the way, that the Ethiopians mentioned in the Texts of our English Bibles, are not these of Africa, but the Chusites of Arabia Felix; our Translators always rendring Chus by Ethiopia. The Anamim, who come next, I know not where to find, or in what place to look for them, unless they were the same with the Anantes of Solinus, and the Hammantes of Pliny, a people seated on the sea-side near the greater Syris, to which the neighbourhood of the Lehabim may give some countenance; who seem to be the same with the people of Lybia, a Province seated betwixt Egypt and Cyrenaea, and were called Lybiegyptii by the old Geographers, to dis- ference them from the inhabitants of the greater Lybia, whereof more hereafter. For the Naphubim, I am also at a loss, unless we find them somewhere in Cyrenaea; and that some remnant of the name be in Apuchianum, which occurs in Ptolome. But for the Pathrusim, I think no question need be made, but that they were the people of that province of Egypt, which in divers places of the Scrip- ture is called Pathros, as Esa. 11. 11. Jer. 44. 1. Ezek. 29. 14, and seems to be that part of Egypt, which is called Thebais, where Ptolome placeth Pathyrus, an In-land Town not far from Thebe. (And Patharis the Greek, or Septuagint term that, which in the Hebrew is called Pathros.)

Hitherto we have found the Nations which descended from the sons of Misraim, in Egypt, and the Countreys adjoining to it. And there, or thereabouts, we are to look for Cophthorim, and Casluhim, the two sons remaining. I know there hath been great pains taken to find the Casluhim in Colchia, and the Cophthorim in Cappadocia, or Pontus, not far from Trabezond; where notwithstanding there is no track of the names remaining. But this being so far off from Egypt, in, and near which both Misraim himself, and all the rest of his sons were planted; I can by no means yield to it, though to content such learned men as would fain have it so, I think it possible enough that some of the Egypti- ans in succeeding times, moved with the fame of that great wealth which Colchis was supposed to yield to some Adventurers; might leave their native soyl to inhabit there. And therefore I think rather, with the learned Junius, that the Casluhim were first planted in the Region of Cassotis (not far from Damiata, a chief town of Egypt) which retains somewhat of the name; and so doth Coptus, an old City of Egypt, of the name of Cophthorim. Or if it did not, as it doth, why the name of Cophth, which at this day is given to the Christians of Egypt, may not be thought to have its first rise from Cophthorim, rather than that they are so called quasi Egypthii, corruptly for Egyptii, I must needs say I am not satisfied. Besides, it being clear in Scripture, that the Casluhim and Cophthorim dwelt near to- gether, and that the Philistims are said to descend from Casluhim; if Casluhim should go for Colchis, and Cophthorim for Cappadocia, we must first carry them I know not how far off from the rest of their Brethren, against the method of all Plantations; and then bring the Philistims back again from Col- chis, to find a dwelling on the borders of the land of Egypt, from whence their Ancestors and Allies were so far remote. Whereas by setting these two Nations amongst the rest of their Brethren, the journey of the Philistims unto Canaan, and settling themselves in the possessions of the Avim (a Canaan- itish nitish people) whom they had subdued, Deut. 2. 25. is both easie and natural. But before we follow these Philistines further in their new Plantation amongst the Canaanites, we will first see what became of Phut, the third son of Cham. And if we guide our selves in this Labyrinth by the clew of Antiquity, we shall find him settled West of his Brother Misraim, and so to the Atlantick Ocean, the Lake of Tritonis parting their dominions. Some Relicks of the name there were in the time of Josephus, who telleth us of a River of Mauritania, which in his time retained the name of Phut: Plinie makes mention of it, also Ptolome takes notice of a River in those parts called Phutib, which comes very near it. And so doth Isidore, Origin. l. 2. But St. Hierome in my mind puts it out of doubt, whose words I shall put down, and so leave Africa; Phut Lybia, aque et Mauritanie fluvius usque ad praesens Phut dicitur, omnique circa cum Africa cuius rei multi Scriptores tam Graeci quam Latini testes sunt. Where we have not only a River, but a Province of the name of Phut; and many antient Writers both Greek and Latin called to witness to it.

And now we should proceed to Canaan and his sons (eleven in all) being the fourth and last branch of the house of Cham. But being they all kept together in or near the land of Canaan, we shall find him there; or meet with them in such Plantations and Colonies as they sent abroad, under the title of Phenicians. And therefore go we next to Japhet, whose Tents God promised to enlarge, as indeed he did; spreading his branches over Europe, the lesser Asia, and a great part of the greater also. To him were born seven sons in all, that is to say, Gomer and Magog, Madai and Javan, Tubal, Mesech, and Thyras: Of which, the Issue of two only are upon record, viz. Aschenaz, Riphat, and Togarma, the sons of Gomer; Elisha, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dedanim, the sons of Javan. And first for Gomer and his sons, the first possessed themselves of convenient dwellings in the greater, and the lesser Asia. Gomer himself first planting in the mountainous places of Albania, where the Mountains called Cimmerini long retained his name; and after changing that unpleasant, and unfruitful dwellings for the Plains of Phrygia, in which the City Cimmeris, in the dayes of Plinie, did preserve his memory. For that the posterity and people of Gomer, called at first Gomerians, came to take the name of Cimmerians, as of Cimbri afterwards, is generally agreed upon amongst the Learned. Now then, as Gomer fixt himself in the Greater Phrygia, so did his eldest son Aschenaz in Phrygia minor, and the Country of Troas, spreading himself along upon the Hellspont, and those Greekish Seas, as far as Bithynia. In all which places there were left some memory of this Plantation. For in Bithynia there is a Bay called Sinus Ascanius, together with a River, and a Lake of the same name also. And in the lesser Phrygia, and the Country of Troas, there was both a City and a Province adjoining, antiently known by the name of Ascania; and the Ascania Insula also on the coast thereof. Nor is it any thing unlikely, but that in honour of this Aschenaz, the Kings and great men of those parts, took the name of Ascanius. Of which name, besides Ascanius the son of Aeneas, we find a King mentioned in the second of Homer's Iliads, which came unto the aid of Priamus at the siege of Troy. In the same quarters of the World we find Riphat also, the founder of the Riphei, a people dwelling in the East parts of Bithynia, and spreading also over Paphlagonia: In both which Provinces there are some remnants of his name to be found amongst the Antients. For besides that Josephus saith expressly, that the Paphlagonians antiently were called Riphei; there is mention in Apollonius Argonauticks of the River Rhebans, which rising in Bithynia, emptieth it self into the Pontus Euxinus, near to Paphlagonia, of which River Plinie also doth inform us: and Stephanus doth not only acquaint us with the River it self, but tells us also of a Region on the same name, and of a people thereabouts, which are called Rhebati. Nor need we look much further to find out the seat of Togarma the third son of Gomer, whom the Prophet Ezekiel not only joyneth with his Father as two neighbouring Nations, but makes both of them to lie Northwards of Judea; Gomer and all his bands, the house of Togarma in the North quarters and all his bands, cap. 38. 6. So that they do not guess amiss, who place Togarma and his Progeny in Cappadocia: a Country not only bordering near to the Plantations of Gomer, and lying on the north of the land of Canaan, but very well stocked with an excellent breed of Mules and Horses, as Strabo testifieth in the 11 Book of his Geography; with which commodities they traded at the Fairs of Tyre, as the same Prophet tells us of them, chap. 27. 14. But for a more evident proof of this, that Togarma dwelling must be found in Cappadocia; we must first know that the Greek Translators call him generally by the name of Torgama; and then, that antiently there was a people in Cappadocia and Galatia, whom Strabo calleth Trocmi, and Tully, Trogmi; by Stephanus they are named Trocmeni, and Trogmades in the Council of Chalcedon, in which Cyrillus Bishop of the Trogmades (Κυρίλλος Τρογμάδων) is often mentioned.

Having thus done with Gomer, and the sons of Gomer, we will next pursue the rest of the sons of Japhet, except Javan only, whom with his four sons we will keep together. And the next son of Japhet is Magog, concerning whom there hath been much dispute and difference amongst our Antiquaries some making him the Father of the Scythians, and some of the Goths, and others finally of the Tartars; all of them thinking that such terrible names as Gog and Magog, could not belong to any but such terrible Nations. And possible enough it is, that some of his posterity in succeeding times, finding their own seats too narrow for them, might remove further Northwards, and be the founders of some Scythian and Tartarian Nations; but that Magog himself in his first Plantation, should wander so far out of the way from the rest of his brethren, when he had elbow-room enough amongst them, I cannot easily imagine. When therefore I find a Region in Stephanus called Gogarcus, betwixt Iberia and Colchis; and read in Plinie, that the City of Carlo-Syria, which the Grecians call Hierapolis, was by the Syrians themselves called Magog: I shall not trouble my self to look for Magog any where else, than in those Countreys where they have left such evident Land-marks to discern themselves by.

But

But this we shall the better see by looking out the dwellings of his two brethren, Mesech and Tubal, who being joyned together with Gog and Magog, Ezek cap. 38. 2. and 39. 1. are very unlike to have their dwellings far asunder: or that they could concur in any publick Action against the Jews, according to the scope and purpose of the holy Prophet. Now it is probable (if not more) that Mesech, whom the Antients named Mosch, seated himself on the North and North-East of Syria, in the confines of Colchis and Armenia, and so unto the Caspian, or Hyrcanian Sea. For all along that tract runs a ridge of Hills; which Plinie, Ptolome, and Pomponius Mela call Montes Moschidi, determining Colchis from Armenia; and both from Iberia; and most like to be the dwelling of Mesech or Mosch, and to take denomination from him. And this I am the rather induced to think, because Tubal, whom the Scriptures generally joyn together with Mesech, is by most Writers said to have settled himself in Iberia, the next Province to it. Josephus also telling us, that antiently the Iberi were called Thobelli, though called Iberians afterwards on some new occasion. And hereunto the constant tradition of the Spaniards gives some good authority, who boast of their descent from Tubal: which can no otherwise be granted, then as they were a Colony of these Iberians, from whence the Continent of Spain was once called Iberia; and where one of the principal Rivers is still called Iberus. For Madai, the third Son of Japhet, it is most plain by the authority of Scripture (were there no proof else) that he was the Father of the Medes; who in the book of Daniel, and that of Hester, are represented to us by no other name than that of Madai.

Thus having took a view of those who fixt themselves in either, or in both the Asias; let us look on Thyras, Javan, and the sonnes of Javan, who not contented with their dwellings in the lesser Asia, filled all Europe by degrees with their numerous progenies. And first beginning with Javan as the Elder brother, most Authors make him the Original of those Greek Nations which pass under the general names of Iones; and there is very good ground for the assertion, considering that the Greek Translators of the Bible in stead of Javan, read Iovan, and that all those who elsewhere ordinarily are called Iones, are by Homer, one of the antientest of the Greeks, named Iavoni. Now Javan and Ivan sound so like each other, that one may very well conclude, that they were the same. A name not only proper to the Athenians, and their Colonies, (though probable enough first belonging to them of Attica) but comprehending the Baotians and Achaens also; yea, and extending also into Macedonia, as appears Dan. 8. 21. where Alexander the Great, in the Hebrew is called King of Javan, which we English Grecia. Nor do we much disjoyn Javan from the rest of that stock, by carrying him cross the Seas into another part of the World; for he might go along with Gomer in his second Plantation; And leaving him well settled in the greater Phrygia, and his son Askenaz in the lesser; might then with very little trouble (and no improbability at all) pass over the Hellspont, and plant himself in Attica, called at first Ionia, saith Plutarch in the life of Theseus. Or if any one notwithstanding conceive this for too great a leap, and will rather think with Hecataeus, that the Iones came out of Asia into Greece (as Strabo cites him to that purpose) I shall not much contend against that opinion; so it be also granted on the other side, that Javan, not having room enough on the shores of Asia, passed over into Greece, as a land unoccupied. With Javan went Elisha his eldest son, the Father of the Eliens, or Elians, on the Asian side, as Josephus hath it; and the founder of Elis in Peloponnesus, and planter of the Grecian Isles, which by the Prophet Ezekiel, 27. 7. are called the Isles of Elisha. And it agrees exceeding well with the Isles of Greece, which by the Prophet is affirmed of the Isles of Elisha; namely, that the inhabitants thereof did trade to Tyre with Blew and Purple: in which some of the Grecian Isles were such excellent Artizans, that Carparchus had the name of Porphyri, and Cithera was called Porphyriana; only from the abundance of Purple, which they had amongst them. Not to say any thing of Cos, Nisyros, and Gyarus, and some other of the Cyclades, renowned in good Authors for that commodity.

A shorter journey, but withall a far shorter Territory fell to the lot of Tarshish the second son; whom Javan when he travelled further upon new discoveries, left settled in Cilicia, a Province of the lesser Asia; where either he, or some of his Posterity, in honour of him, built the City of Tarsus, the principal City of that Province. For that Tarshish in those early dayes should go into Spain, and there build Tartessus, I take to be a strange (if not idle) Romance; that Town being built by the Phenicians, many ages after, without relation unto Tarshish, or his memory either. What Voyages or Plantations those of Cilicia or Tarsh made in times succeeding, as I nowhere finde, so it is not material to my present purpose; which principally is to settle the sons of Noah in their first habitations. On therefore unto Cittim the third son of Javan, whom Josephus settleth first in the Isle of Cyprus, where he finds a City called Cittium, the birth-place of Zeno the Stoick, thence surnamed Knidus. Josephus is herein followed by St. Hierome in his Notes on Genesis, in whose time (as Plinie telleth us in his comment on Ezekiel) the Town of Cittium was still standing; so do Eusebii in his Hexameron, and divers others. The Author of the Book of Maccabees sets him further off, giving the name of Cittim unto Macedonia. After that (saith the Author) Alexander the son of Philip, went forth of the land of Cherthim, and slew Darius King of the Perians and Medes, cap. 1. v. 1. And after in the 8. Chapter of the same Book, verse 5. Perseus King of Macedon is called King of the Cittians. But this doth no way contradict that of his first planting in Cyprus, where it is very probable that he made his dwelling for a time, by reason of the neighbourhood of his brother Tarshish (Cilicia and the City of Tarsus lying near unto it;) But finding in time that Island to be either too barren, or too small for his people; and that the other parts both of Greece and Asia were taken up already by the first Adventurers, he might finally fix himself, or some of his posterity, in Macedonia, as a spare place which no body could lay claim unto. That either he or any of his sons planted first in Italia, which I see Bochartus would fain have, were against the method of Plantations; and he must give them wings to fly that conveyeth them thither, when as yet Mankind was not taught the use of shipping, or not accustomed at least to make long voyages. But that in course of time, as the World grew fuller, and that Greece was not able to contain its multitudes, some of the race of Cittim might pass over into Italy, the passage thither from some of the Ports of Greece being short and easie, I am apt enough to believe, and in its proper place shall declare my self for it. Nor can I otherwise agree with him, as concerning Dodanim, whom against all right and reason he hath placed in Gaul; making the River Rhodanus, one of the principal of that Countrey, to be named of him; whom the Greeks, mistaking the letter D for that of R (as indeed the letters are so like, that one may very easily be mistook for the other) most commonly prefer unto us by the name of Rhodanim. Admitting which, it is more proper, in my mind, to settle Rhodanim for a while in the Isle of Rhodes, lying so near the dwellings of his other brethren; till wanting room for the increase of his posterity in so small an Island, he might coast along the shores of Peloponnesus, and fix himself finally in Epirus by his brother Elisha; where in the Province of the Molossians, we shall find a City called Dodona, without any such mistake or change of letters, as before is mentioned. For that the three furthest parts of Europe in respect of Asia, should be planted all at once by these sons of Javan, is so incredible an imagination, that he must have a very strong fancy, or be of very light belief, which can entertain it. Finally as for Thyras the last son of Japhet, having accompanied his brother Javan to the shores of Asia, and seeing him passed over the seas to Greece, he took the opportunity of the next strait or Fretum (since called Thracius Bosphorus) and fixed himself in Thrace, which Country he gave name unto, as most Writers testify. Nor want there such apparent footsteps of the name of Thyras, besides the name of Thracia (as some spell the word) which may add good authority to this general testimony; there being both a River and an Haven-town not far from Bizantium, which Pliny, Ptolomy, and Mela call Athyras; a River and Town called Tyras in the Province of Moesia, bordering next to Thrace, whereof most of all the old Geographers have taken notice; and finally the Thracians calling their God Mars, by the name of Thyras. Not to say any thing of Teremus, Therops, and some others of the Kings of Thrace; whose names come very near unto that of Thyras, as the first founder of their Nation.

Thus have we seen the several Generations and Dispersions of the Sons of Noah, so far forth as their names are registred in holy Scripture: these being the Heads and Leaders of those several Tribes which joyned together in the project of the building of Babel, and afterwards dispersed themselves, as before was shewn. But that no more than these (I mean Heads of Families) descended in so long a time from the loyns of Noah; that they should have towards the new peopling of the world, in an hundred years (for so long it must be at least from the Flood to the building of Babel) no more than sixteen sons in all; and ten of those sixteen go childless also to the grave, is not a thing to be imagined. Nor is it to be thought, that all the people which were born since the Flood till then, could meet together at one place as by inspiration; or being met, would joyn together in a work of so little profit; or that if Noah or Sem had been there amongst them, they would not have dissuaded them from that foolish enterprise. And therefore I should rather be of their opinion, which think that Noah fixed himself in those parts, which lay nearest to the place where the Ark took land: and having planted as far Eastward as he thought convenient, sent out the surplusage of his people under the Conduct of one or more of these Undertakers; directing them perhaps to the land of Shinaar, where himself had dwelt before the Flood. Where being come, and destitute of graver and more sober counsels, they fell upon that vain attempt which became their ruine; and made them scatter and disperse themselves into so many Companies. For in my mind Sir Walt. Raleigh pleads the point exceeding strongly, that it must needs be that Noah was settled in the East, and had well peopled all those parts which lay nearest to him, before he sent his Troop abroad upon new discoveries. For being it is expressly said in holy Scripture, that as they went from the East, they found a plain in the Land of Shinaar; it must needs follow without controverlie, that they came from the East Countreys into Shinaar or Babylonia, and not from any part of Armenia (as the Vulgar opinion is) which lay North thereof. Now that the Countreys whence they came were not left utterly desolate upon this remove, but very sufficiently provided both of men and Cities, appeareth by those huge Armies which Zoroaster the King of Bactria, and Stanrobates a King of the Indians, were able to bring into the field. Of whom the first being invaded by Ninus the Assyrian Monarch, encountered him with an Army of 400000. fighting men; the other on the like occasion out-vied Semiramis for numbers: and yet her Army did consist, as we read in Diodorus Siculus, of three millions and a half of men, besides 10000. armed Waggons; whereof if we believe but the third part, it may serve to prove that the East must needs be planted before this Expedition towards Babylonia. For considering that Ninus the husband of Semiramis was but the third in descent from Nimrod, (that is to say, the son of Belus, the son of Nimrod) it had been a most impossible thing that such a vast increase should be made only out of Colonies in so short a time, as needs must be between the planting of the Countreys before specified, and these two great actions, unless God raised them out of stones, or by some such miracle, to abate the pride of these Usurpers over other Nations. Without a miracle of this nature (which I conceive no wise man would expect to find) it is I say, a thing impossible that Stanrobates should exceed Semiramis in number of men, as Diodorus saith he did; he being but a Casting of a second Swarm, and the great Commanders of that part of the world from whence he came upon a second or a third Plantation. Add unto this, that those who have recorded the Acts of Alexander the great, assure us that he found more Cities, and sumptuosities in that little Kingdom of Perus, which lay side by side to the East of the River Indus, than in all his other travells and undertakings: And this may serve in stead of a further evidence, that the East Countreys were not planted after this dispersion, but built, and peopled, and reduced under forms of Government, as soon as any in the World. Nor know I else where to find either Noah himself, or Sem and Japhet, unless they staid behind with their Father Noah, or were disposed of by themselves in their several quarters: there being none of those, though most diligent men, who have writ of the Plantations of the World upon this dispersion, that either speak of any Nations planted by them, or of their settling in the Colonies of any one of their descendants. Which is to me a very strong Argument that they came not with the rest to the Plains of Shinaar, but tarried still in those habitations wherein God had placed them.

Against this I can see but two Objections of any moment; one from the Text, the other from an old Tradition amongst the Jews. That from the Text is gathered from those words of Mose, where having made his Catalogue of the Families of the Sons of Noah, he adds, And by these were the Nations divided in the Earth after the Flood, Gen. 10. v. ult. But these words, as I take it, do relate only unto that division which was made upon occasion of the confusion of Languages, when they were forced to give over their works, and for themselves into several Companies; and not to such Plantations as were made before: who being all of one tongue, though in divers dwellings, could not be looked upon as several and divided Nations. For the Tradition of the Jews, 'tis this, that from the beginning of the world to the building of Babel, that language which in after-times was called the Hebrew, was the common language of Mankind; and that it did continue uncorrupt in the house of Eber, (whence it had the name) because he joyned not with the rest in that proud and ungodly undertaking. Hence it may possibly be objected, that if there were any others of the off-spring of Noah, which came not with the rest to the Plains of Shinaar, and consequently had no hand in that vain attempt, they could not come within the curse of confounded Languages, but must needs speak the Hebrew Tongue, as well as those descended of the loyns of Eber. But against this Tradition, and the consequences of it, there are some things to be objected. For first it is but a Tradition, and therefore of no sure foundation to build upon. And secondly it is such a Tradition as holds no good coherence with the truth of Story; it being a most clear and demonstrative truth, that the Hebrew Tongue was not the Language which Abraham brought with him out of Chaldea and Mesopotamia, but that which he found spoken in the land of Canaan at his coming thither, to which both he and his Posterity did conform themselves. Or had it been the Language of Eber, as they say it was, (but most undoubtedly was not) yet, thirdly, had this been a privilege conferred on Eber, that he and his Posterity should speak the Original Language without alteration or corruption, it must have been extended to all those of the house of Jokan which descended from him; as also to the house of Luban in Padan Aram, and to the Moabites and the Ammonites as the seed of Lut; and finally to the Ismaelites and Idumians, descended of Abraham and Esau; and not be limited and confined only to the house of Jacob. Either all these must be partakers of so great a privilege, because their Father Eber had obtained it for himself and his; or else it was not such a privilege, or given so universally and incommunicably to the house of Eber, as they say it was. So the Tradition falls to ground as to this particular. And then admitting it for true, that those who staid behinde with Noah spake the same Language which was common to the Fathers before the Flood, (be it the Hebrew, or what else soever it was) I see no reason to the contrary, but that it might in time be branched into several Languages or Dialects of the same one Language, by the commerce and intercourse which they had with Nations of a different speech; as well as those of Judah in so short a time as the Captivity of Babylon, had lost the purity of that Language which they so much brag of; and could not understand their own Bibles at their coming home, but by an Interpreter. Of which see Nehem. c. 8. v. 7, 8.

But to proceed: On this dispersion of the Families of the sons of Noah, it came to pass, that though they all descended from one common Root, yet by the situations of their several dwellings, they came to be of several tempers and affections; in which they were so different from one another, that it might seem they had been made at first out of several Principles, and not at all derived from one common Parent. Of which thus Dn Barias.

O see how full of wonders strange is Nature,
Sith in each Climate, not alone in stature,
Strength, colour, hair; but that men differ do
Both in their humors, and their manners too.
The Northern man is fair, the Southern foul;
That's white, this black, that smiles, and this doth scowl.
Th' ones blithe and frolick, th' other dull and froward;
Th' ones full of courage, th' other a fearfull coward, &c.

The ground or reason of which difference is to be attributed to the different tempers of those Countries in which they live, and to the different influences of the Heavenly Bodies on those several Countries, which do continue still the same, though many times the Countries do shift and change their old inhabitants. Hinc illa ab antiquo vitia, & patria sorte durante, quae totas in historia gentes antecendentem aut notant, saith a Modern, but judicious Author. Two or three evidences of this truth will make it clear and evident to a practical judgement, which otherwise might appear obscure in the search of causes. Florus hath told us of the Gauls, Primum eorum impetum esse majorem quam virorum, secundum minorem quam faminarum. Which is the same which Rob. Dallington hath told us of the Modern French, That he begins an action like thunder, and ends it in a smother. Us sunt Gallorum subitua ingenia, ingenia, saith Cæsar of the ancient Gauls: and I believe the present French are altogether as rash and barebraind, as the other were. Gallia facunda Confidit was part of the Character of the Gauls in the time of Juvenal; and it is told us of the French by some late Observers, that there are commonly more Law-trials amongst them in one year, than have been in England since the Conquest. And yet the old Gauls in a manner are wholly rooted out of the Country, the severall Nations of Franks, Burgundians, Britons, Normans, and Goths being in possession of their severall dwellings. Thus also it is said by Tacitus of the ancient Germani, Dum barbarie continetur potando, nihil oporitur; that it was no disgrace to any, to spend the whole day and night in drinking: and more than so, De jungendis affinitatibus, de bello denique & pace in curiosis conspectibus, that they consulted over their Cups of their weighty business. Since which time through all Germany hath shifted almost all her old inhabitants, and taken in new Colonies of Swedes, Italians, Thuringians, Danish, Saxons, Huns, Saxons, and other Nations; yet still those ill customs are as much in use amongst them, as ever formerly. To go a little further off; the old Philosophers Apocbar & scellus of the ancient Grecians, that at the beginning of their Feasts they used little Koblets, and Drinks in honour of them, and greater towards the end, when they were almost drunken to which custom still remains amongst them, as G. Sandys observeth, notwithstanding the great length of time; and all the other changes of State and people, which have happened since. I shall not speak here of the effeminateness of the Africans, or the cruelty or implacableness of the African Nations, being as great now as in any of the former times, notwithstanding the great and numerous Plantations on the Greeks, Romans, Vandals, Saracens, Turks, and Tartars, successively, and respectively, in these severall Countreys. And therefore I conclude this point in these words of Burley, Hæret itaque in omni gente vis quedam inconcessa, qua hominibus pro conditione terrarum in quibus nasci contigerit sua fata dividit.

Nor is this all the consequence of this dispersion of the Families of the sonnes of Noah; the separation of their persons producing, first, an alteration of affections; and that engendering natural animosities; which seconded by their severall interesses and Reasons of State, hath left almost no people without some such enemy which doth particularly and perversely cross them in all their Counsels. Concerning which, take here the Observation of that notable Statesman and Historian, Philip de Comines; which though it be with reference to the Meridian of his own time only, yet it may be accommodated generally to all States and Ages, "In rebus humanis ita comparaturum est; ut nullus ferat se populum quem non amulus aliquis exerceat &c. It is (saith he) so ordered in the State of humane affairs; that there is almost no Nation without a more particular Enemy. The English hate enemies to the French, the Scots to the English; the Portuguese have the like inveterate hatred against the Spaniards. The Princes of Italy enjoy great possessions without any good title; but are continually opposed by the more potent Cities of Venice, Florence, Genoa, and Lucca. The Arrogant Kings of Naples, have found perpetual Enemies of the Dukes of Anjou; as have the Dukes of Milaine, of the house of Orleans. The Princes of Italy, and the Florentines, have a stitch at Venice; as the States of Genoa, and Sienna, have against the Florentines. In Germany the animosities have been great and of long continuance, between the houses of Austria, and Buraria; the hatred grown beyond all hopes of reconciliation which is between the Switzers, and the Austrian Family. The Dukes of Cleves, and Gulick, are always upon ill terms with their neighbours of Golderland: and in the North, the Cities on the Baltick Seas have their continual quarrels with the Kings of Denmark. Nor are the enmities any thing less, if they be not greater, which are discernible amongst the people of Asia and Africa, than those that are above remembred. So far and to this purpose saith that notable and judicious Writer.

The consideration of which points, if there were no other, were of it self sufficient to shew the necessary use of History and Geography, as well for the understanding the affairs of the Ages past, as for commerce and correspondency with the Nations present. For had no Histories been written in the former times, in what dull ignorance had we lived of all those occurrences which do so much concern the wholestate of Mankind, and are our principall directors in life and action? in which respect the Orator most truly calleth it, Magistram vite. For upon the credit of this History, the examples of our Ancestors, the grounds of civil prudence, and the fames of men do most especially depend. And certainly to draw back the mind to the contemplation of matters long ago passed; to search out with diligence, and to deliver with faith, freedom, and the life of expression, such things as are found out on a diligent search; to represent unto our eyes the changes of times, the characters of Persons, the uncertainties of Counsels, and the Conveyances of Actions, the subtilties of Pretensions, and the secrets of State; must of necessity be a work of as publique use, as it is of great both pains and judgement. Besides, it gives a kind of eternity to all such men, who by their Counsels or Achievements have deserved nobly of those Kingdoms, and Common-wealths, wherein they lived. And thereupon the Orator doth not only call it Magistram vite, but Lucem veritatis, Testem temporis, Nuntium vestrae, & Vite memoriam. According to which character, I find these Verses set before a Chronicle of some Kings of England (more worth than all the Book besides;)

For though in these dayes Miracles be fled,
Yet this skull of good Histories be fed,
They call back time that's past, and give life to the dead.

Nor want there other motives to endear unto us the use of History, besides the light it gives unto all the remarkable Actions of preceding times; and the eternity (if I may say so) which it conferreth on

on the Actions themselves, by the preservation of their names from the ruines of time, and the pit of Oblivion. For first, it stirreth men to Vertue, and deters them from Vice, by shewing forth the glorious memories of vertuous men, and the ill favour which is left behind men of ungodly life; and especially keeps persons of most eminent place from letting loose the reins unto all licentiousness, by representing this to their consideration, that all their actions shall be laid open one day to the view of the Vulgar. Secondly, it hath been a principal Conservator of most Arts and Sciences, by keeping on Record the Dictates and Opinions of so many of the old Philosophers; out of which a perfect body of Philosophy, and others of the Liberal Arts hath been collected and digested. Thirdly, it is the best School-master in the Art of War and teacher of Stratagems; and in that respect affordeth more punctual directions, than can be otherwise obtained; and with all this best Assistant to the Statesman or Politician, who from hence draw their Observations and Conclusions; and become thereby serviceable to their Prince and Country, though never travelled more than amongst their Books. So Achilles in his study, and Dionysius in his Orators Gownd endangered more the enemies of their severall Countreys, than the Athenians, or Syraculans, did by dint of sword. And last of all, besides these civil benefits and considerations, and the great help which it affords in the way of discipline, there is no particular branch of Knowledge more useful for the rude and perfect understanding of Holy Scripture, than that of Ecclesiastical and Profane History; or which gives clearer light to many dark passages thereof, especially in the Propheticall writings of either Testament. This, as it shewes the necessary use and benefit which redounds from History, so doth it serve to stir in that commendation which belongs to the study of Geography also; without some knowledge wherein, the study of History is neither so pleasant, nor so profitable; as a judicious Reader would desire to have it. 'Tis true, Geography without History hath life and motion, but very unstable and at random; but History without Geography, like dead carcasses, hath neither life, nor motion at all, or moves at least but slowly on the understanding. For what delight or satisfaction can any man receive from the reading of Story, without the know somewhat of the places, and the conditions of the people, which are therein mentioned? In which regard Ammianus Marcellinus the Historian, hath deserved very well of all his Readers; premising to the Actions of every Countrey, some brief description of the place, and chief Towns therein. For though the greatness of the Action doth ennoble and adorn the place; yet it is the knowledge of the place, which adds delight and satisfaction unto the reading of the Story, which conveys it to us. History therefore and Geography, like the two Lovers of Marcellus which Philosophers call Euphrates and Pollux, if joyned together, crown our reading with delight and profit; if parted, threaten both with a certain shipwreck; and are like two Sisters dearly loving, not without pity (I had almost said impiety) to be kept asunder. So as that which Sir Philip Sidney said of Argalus and Parthenia,

Her being was in him alone,
And she not being, he was none;

may be as justly said of History and Geography, as of those two Lovers. And yet this is not all the benefit which redounds from the study of Geography, which is exceeding useful to the reading of the Holy Scriptures, as in discovering the situation of Paradise, the bounds and borders of those Countreys which are therein mentioned; especially with relation to the travels of the Plantarachs, Prophets, Evangelists, and Apostles; yea of Christ himself; not otherwise to be comprehended and understood, but by the help of Geographical Tables and descriptions. Besides this, it is useful to most sorts of men, as to Astronomers, who are hereby informed of the different appearances of Stars in several Countreys; their several influences and aspects, their rising and setting, according to different Horizons. Secondly, to Physicians, who are hereby acquainted with the different temper of mens bodies, according to the Climes they live in; the nature and growth of many Simple and Medicinal Druggs, whereof every Countrey under Heaven hath some more natural and proper to it self, than to any others. Thirdly, to States-men, who from hence draw their knowledge of the nature and disposition of those people with whom they are to negotiate; the bounds and borders both of their own Kingdoms, and the Neighbouring Countreys, with the extent of their respective Dominions by Sea and Land; without the exact knowledge of which, there would be a perpetual Seminary of wars and discord. Fourthly, to Merchants, Mariners, and Souldiers, the several Professors of which kinds of life, finde nothing more necessary for them in their several callings, than a competent knowledge in Geography, which presents to them many notable advantages, both for their profit and contentment. Finally, by the study of Geography, a man that hath not opportunity nor means of travelling, may with as much benefit, but far less danger and expence, acquaint himself with the particular descriptions of Kingdoms, Provinces, Cities, Towns and Castles, with all things considerable in the same, together with the customs, manners, and dispositions of all Forain Nations; and that too in as full a manner, as if he had survey'd the one, and observed the other, by a personal visit of the places represented to him.

Such is the necessary use which men of ingenious Studies, and Professions, do and may make of History and Geography, in the course of their callings and employments. And there are some things also necessary to the knowledge of each, that we may study them with the greater benefit and contentment. To History it is only requisite that it be defined, distinguished from such writings as do seem to challenge the name of History; and that somewhat be premised of those several Epoques, from which all people do begin their computations. But to Geography it is needful not only that we do define it, but that we explicate those Terms, or second Notions, which are not obvious to the under-

As concerning the situation of Islands, whether commodious or not, this is my judgement. I finde in Machiavel, that for a City whose people covet no Empire but their own Towns, a barren place is better than a fruitful; because in such seats they are compelled to work and labour, by which they are freed from idleness, and by consequence from riotousness: But for a City whose inhabitants desire to enlarge their confines, a fertile place was rather to be chosen than a sterile, as being more able to nourish multitudes of people. The like I say of Islands. If a Prince desire rather to keep than augment his Dominions, no place fitter for his abode than an Island; as being by it self and nature sufficiently defensible. But if a King be minded to add continually to his Empire, an Island is no fit seat for him; because partly by the uncertainty of Winds and Seas, partly by the longfomness of the waies, he is not so well able to supply and keep such forces as he hath on the Continent. An example hereof is England, which hath even to admiration repelled the most puissant Monarch of Europe; but for the causes above mentioned, cannot shew any of her winnings on the firm land, though she hath attempted and achieved as many glorious exploits, as any Country in the World.

Peninsula, quasi pene Insula, is a tract of land, which being almost encompassed round by water, is joyned to the firm land by some little Isthmus; as Peloponnesus, Taurica, and Peruana. Isthmus is that narrow neck of land, which joyneth the Peninsula to the Continent; as the Straights of Dariene in America, and of Corinth in Greece.

Promontorium, is a high mountain which shooteth it self into the Sea, the outmost end of which is called a Foreland, or Cape; as the Cape of Good Hope in Africk, Cape Comari in India, &c.

The Imaginary parts of the Earth are such which not being at all in the Earth, must yet be supposed to be so, for the better teaching and learning this Science; and are certain Circles going about the Earth, answerable to them in Heaven, in name.

These Circles are either the $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \text{Greater,} \\ \text{Lesser,} \end{array} \right.$ in both which there are 360 Degrees, which in the greater Circles are greater then those in the lesser; and every Degree in the greater is 60 miles.

The Equator is a great Circle going round about the Terrestrial Globe from East to West. It passeth through Habassia, Sumatra, Gulana, &c. The use of it is to shew the Latitude of any Town, Promontory, &c. Now the Latitude is the distance of a place South or North from the Equator, or middle of the World; and must be measured on the Globe by the Degrees in the Meridian.

The Meridian is a great Circle rounding the earth from Pole to Pole. There are many Meridians, according to the divers places in which a man liveth; but the chief and first Meridian passeth through the Island St. Michael, one of the Azores. The use of it is to shew the Longitude of any place. Now the Longitude of a City, Cape, &c. is the Distance of it East and West from the first Meridian, and is usually measured on the Globe by the Degrees of the Equator.

The Horizon is a great Circle, designing so great a space of the earth, as a quick sight can ken in an open field. The use of it is to discern the divers risings and settings of the Stars.

The Tropick of Cancer (so called of the celestial sign Cancer) is distant from the Equinoctial 23. Degrees Northward, and passeth through Barbary, India, China, and Nova Hispania.

The Tropick of Capricorn, equally distant from the Equator Southward, passeth through Ethiopia inferior, and the midst of Peruana. And this is to be observed in these Tropicks, that when the Sun is in the Tropick of Cancer, our dayes are at the longest; and when he is gone back to the Tropick of Capricorn, the dayes are at the shortest. The first they call the Summer, the last they call the Winter Solstice; the first happening on, or about St. Barnabys day in June; the last on, or about St. Lucies day in December.

The Arctic Circle (so called for that it is correspondent to the Constellation in Heaven called the Bear, in Greek Arctos) is distant from the Tropick of Cancer 45 Degrees, and passeth through Norway, Muscovy, Tartary, &c.

The Antarctic (so called because opposite to the other) is as much distant from the Tropick of Capricorn, and passeth through Terra Australis Incognita. The use of these four Circles is to describe the Zones.

The

The Zones are spaces of earth included betwixt two of the lesser nominate Circles. They are in number five, one over-hot, two over-cold, and two temperate.

The over-hot, or Turrid Zone, is betwixt the two Tropicks, continually scorched with the presence of the Sun.

The two over-cold, or Frigid Zones, are situate between the two Polar Circles, and the very Poles, continually wanting the neighbourhood of the Sun.

The two temperate Zones, are betwixt the Tropick of Cancer, and the Arctic; and 'twixt the Tropick of Capricorn, and the Antarctic Circles; enjoying an indifferency between heat and cold; so that the parts next the Turrid Zone are the hotter, and the parts next the Frigid Zone are the colder.

These five Zones are disposed according to the order of the Zones in heaven; of which thus Ovid Metamorph. l.

Utque duae dextra calum, totidemq; sinistra
Parte secant Zonae, quinta est ardentior illis;
Sic omnis inclusum numero distinxit eodem
Cura dei, totidemq; plaga tellure premuntur.
Quarum quae media est, non est habitabilis astra;
Nix tegit alta duas: totidem inter utramq; locavit,
Temperiemq; dedit, mista cum Frigore Flamma.

And as two Zones do cut the Heavens right-side,
And likewise other two the left divide,
The midst in heat excelling all the rest;
Even so it seem'd to the Creator best,
That this our World should so divided be,
That with the Heavens in Zones it might agree.
The midst in heat; the outwardmost excell
In Snow and Ice, scarce fit for men to dwell.
Betwixt these two extremes, two more are fixt,
Where heat with cold indifferently is mixt.

Parallels, called also Aequidistants, circle the Earth from East to West, and are commonly ten Degrees asunder: Such are the Parallels which are set down in our Maps and Globes. But there are another sort of Parallels, two of which go to a Climate. These are called Artificial Parallels, because they shew the difference of the Artificial daies; and are of an unequal breadth, as we shall see in the Table following. The use of these lesser Parallels is to shew the Climates.

Now a Climate, or Climata, is a space of the Earth contained betwixt three Parallels, the middlemost whereof divideth it into two equal parts; serving for setting out the length and shortness of the dayes in every Countrey. For under the Equator the dayes are of the just length of 12 hours; but afterwards they increase the length of half an hour for every Climate, till they come to the length of 24 hours, without night at all; which length attained, they increase no more by hours, but by weeks and moneths, till they come to the length of half a year. So that we are to reckon 24 Climes Northward, and as many Southward: Those Northward known by the proper name of the place or City over which the middle Parallel of the Climate doth pass; as Dia Mauros, Dia Syenes, &c. Those on the South by the same names, with the condition of Anti, as Anti-Dia-Syenes, Anti-Dia-Mauros, &c. 'Tis true, the ancient Cosmographers made but seven Climes in all; at the most but nine; Nor needed they to add more, as the cause stood with them; the extent of the habitable World towards each of the Poles, not being so fully known to them, as it is to us.

And here, because those Climes are not of equal breadth or extent of Latitude, but grow narrower and narrower towards each Pole; in which regard it impossible to describe them under any Rule; I have thought fit to add this ensuing Table, partly framed out of the Commentaries of Clavius on the works of John de Sacro Bosco, and partly out of Hues his Book, Of the use of the Globes. The whole divided into 7 Columns. In the first whereof is shewed what Climes are inhabited by the Amphibiscii, Periscii, and Heteroscii, which termes we shall anon expound; in the second is set down the number of the Climes themselves; In the third the number of the Parallels; In the fourth the length of the dayes in Summer; In the fifth the distance of every Climate and Parallel from the Equator; in the seventh the name of the Town or place, through which the middlemost of the three Parallels doth pass in this manner following.

Here

And first Oceanus, the Ocean, is that general Collection of all waters, which encompasseth the Earth on every side. A point which Ovid hath determined right enough, but laugh't at by Herodotus in the former times; who counted it a grosse absurdity for any man to relate or write, that the Earth was round, or encompassed about with the main Ocean. But modern Navigations have found that to be true, which he held ridiculous; and which the most learned in those times knew rather by conjecture, than by demonstration. Nor were those Ages so acquainted with those ebbs and flowings of the Ocean, and all those other Seas and Rivers which have intercourse with it, as the meanest Sailor at the present. The natural causes of the which seeming so full of difficulty to the best of the Antients, Experience hath taught us to ascribe wholly to the Moon; at whose Full and Prime the Tides are ever highest, and the Sea most furious. For as soon as the Moon cometh forth from under our Horizon, the Sea beginneth to swell, and floweth towards the East, (as it were to wait upon her, or bear her company) till she come unto the height of our Meridian: after which till her setting or Western fall, the Sea abateth or decreaseth; which we call the Ebb. And when the passeth out of our Horizon towards the Antipodes, the Ocean begins to swell till the height of Midnight, and coming towards our Hemisphere doth again abate. In brief, from the New Moon, till the first quarter the Sea decreaseth, from the first quarter to the full it is said to spring: from the full to the last quarter it is said to nepe; and from the last quarter to the prime it springs again. As for the uncertainty of the Tides, varying every day, it is not so perplexed and intricate, but that they which live on the Banks or Shores thereof, know well when to look for it; the next day's Tide coming for the most part, one hour to minutes after the time it hapned on the day fore-going.

2. Mare, the Sea, is a part of the main Ocean, to which we cannot come but through some Fretum or Straight; as Mare Mediterraneum. And it takes name, First, either from the adjacent shore, as Mare Adriaticum, from the City of Adria; Mare Tyrrhenum, from the Coast of Tuscanie; Or, Secondly, from the first Discoverer, as Mare Magellanicum, from Magellanus, who first found it; Or, Thirdly, from some remarkable Accident, as Mare Icarium, from the drowning of Icarus, the son of Dadalus.

3. Fretum, a Straight is a part of the Ocean, penned within narrow bounds, and opening a way into some Sea, or out of some Sea into the Ocean; as the Straight of Hellespont, Gibraltar, Fretum Davies, &c.

Sinus, a Creek or Bay, is a Sea contained within a crooked or circling shore, wherewith it is almost environed; as Sinus Persicus, Corinthiacus, &c. and this is sometimes called a Gulf, as the Gulf of Lepanto.

5. Lacus, a Lake, is a great body or collection of waters, which hath no visible intercourse with the Sea, or influx into it; as the Lake of Thrasymene in Italy, the Lacus Asphaltites, or the Dead Sea in the Land of Canaan. And of this kinde properly is the Mare Caspium, though by reason of the greatness of it, it is called a Sea.

6. Flumina, or Fluvium, is a watercourse continually running, whereby it differeth from Stagnum, or a standing Pool, issuing from some Spring or Lake, and emptying it self into some part of the Sea or some other great River; the mouth or out-let of which is called Ofium: Tiberinag; longe Ofia, as the Poet hath it. These are conceived in the Earth, and derive both their birth and continual sustentance from the Air; which piercing the open chinks or Chasms of the Earth, and congealed by the extreme cold of that Element, dissolves into water (as we see the Air in winter-nights to be melted into a pearly dew, sticking on our glasse-windows): and being grown to some quantity, will (like Animal in the Alpes) either finde a way, or make a way, to vent its superfluity. Which beginning is seconded by the Ocean, which running through the hidden passages of the Earth, joyneth it self with this aerial vapour, and continueth the begun current. This Sea-water (though in it self of a salt and brackish favour, yet) passing through divers windings and turnings of the Earth, is deprived of all unpleasantness; and by how much the spring-heads of Rivers are remote from the Sea, by so much usually are their waters affected with a delightful relish. Rivers having thus entred themselves into a good course, are never without the assistance of neighbouring springs and waters; by whose addition they augment their streams, till they dischannel, themselves into the Sea. Now there is of Rivers a treble use. First, that out of them drink may be afforded to man and beast; Secondly, that running through the Earth, as blood through the body, by interlacing it, and sometimes overwhelming it, it might make the Earth able to produce those fruits which are necessary for the life of man. The last use of Rivers, is, easiness and speediness of conduct; and hereto are required four conditions. First the depth, because deep waters sustain the bigger burdens, and on them navigation is more safe. Secondly, pleasantness, whereby the passage is easie both with the stream and against it: whereas in Rivers of a violent current, or such as fall down by great locks or Cataracts, the sayling or rowing up the water is as dangerous, as laborious. Thirdly, the thickness of the water; for by how much the more slimy and gross a water is, by so much can it carry the heavier burdens. So Tiber, a River of more fame than depth, or breadth, is better for navigation, by reason of its fatness, than the pure and thin waters of the large and excellent River Nilus. Fourthly, the broadness of the channel, that ships and other vessels may conveniently winde and turn, and give way to each other. Some of the old Philosophers reputed this conduct so dangerous, that one of them being asked whether he thought the living or the dead were the greater number, would not declare himself, because he knew not in which rank to place such as were at Sea. And Cato Major thought that men never committed greater folly in their lives, than in venturing to go by water, when they might have gone by land. I am none of that Sect; yet I cannot but hold with him that said, Dulcissima est ambulatio prope aquas, navigatio iuxta terram.

The chief Rivers of Europe, are Danubius and the Rhene; of Africa, Nilus, and Niger; of Asia, Ganges, Ganges, and Euphrates; of America, Orenoque, and Maragnan. Of which and others, more in its proper place.

Thus have we gone over these particulars both of Earth and Water, which are considerable in Geographie, and come within the compass of those Annexaries of each, which Ptolomy calleth ἡ κορυφαία: And having so done, may discover where the difference lieth between Geographie and Chorographie, which to some men, not rightly looking into the nature of both, seem to be the same. For howsoever a Chorographer doth describe a Countrey by the bounds, rivers, hills, and most notable Cities; yet it is still but the description of some place or Countrey, and not of the whole Earth universally, which is the proper work of a Geographer. So that Chorographie differeth from Geographie as a part from the whole: that being as Ptolomy doth very handsomely express it, like the painting of an eye or an ear, or some other member; this, as the picturing of the head, or whole body of Man. But Geographie in its full latitude comprehendeth not Chorographie only, but Topographie and Hydrographie also. Of these the last is the delineation of the Sea by its several names, Ports, Promontories, Creeks and other affections; as also of great Lakes and Rivers: which is most necessary for the use of Mariners, and is best done by Petrus de Medina, Peter Nonnius in his Regule Artis Navigandi, and Johannes Amigatus in his Speculum Nauticum; the chief writers in the Art of Pilots.

2. Topographie is the description of some particular place or City; of which kind was the Book of Stephanus de Asia, or Urbibus, among the Antients; and the Theatrum Urbium written by Brutius in their later times; Stow's Book of the Survey of London, the French Antiquities de Paris, and such as these. And of this kinde is the description of the Vale of Tempe, in the greater Ortelius; and those of the Elysian fields, the gardens of Alcinous, and the Hesperides in the antient Poets.

3. Chorographie (as before was said) is the exact description of some Kingdome, Countrey, or particular Province of the same; unless this last may fall more properly under the notion of Topographie. Of this kinde the description of the several estates of Greece written by Pausanias, is of most use and reputation of all the Antients: as that of Camden Clarenceux, for the Isle of Britain; of Lewis Guicciardine, for the Low-Countreys; Leander for Italy, &c. are amongst the Moderns.

4. Geographie, finally is an aggregate of all these together, borrowing from Hydrographie the description of Seas and Waters; from Topographie, that of Towns, Cities, and particular places; and from Chorographie, the delineations of Regions, Provinces, and Kingdomes, which brought into a body, make up that Portraiture or Picture of the whole Earth, and every considerable part thereof, in writing; which, according to Ptolomies definition before mentioned, is properly and truly called Geographie. In the advancement of which studies, those which have took most pains, with the greatest benefit to Posterity, are the said Ptolomie, Plinie, and Strabo for the elder times; Mercator, Maginus, and Ortelius, for the later Ages. Of which the two first lived in the times of Antonius Pius, the Roman Emperour, Anno Chr. 141. or thereabouts; the other in the reign of Tiberius Cesar, the unworthy Successor of Augustus: the three last flourishing in the daies of our Fathers, about some 80. years ago.

Thus have I briefly summed up those general Præcognita, which I conceive are necessary to the knowledge and understanding as well of Historie as of Geographie. Out of which two compounded and intermixt, ariseth that universal Comprehension of Natural and Civil story, which by a proper and distinct name may be termed Cosmographie. And this may well be reckoned amongst mixed stories; for it hath from Natural History or Geographie, the Regions themselves, together with their Sites, and several Commodities; from Civil History, Habitations, Governments, and Manners; and from the Mathematicks, the Climates and Configurations of the Heavens, under which the Coasts and Quarters of the World do lie. Of the Utility and excellency of which study I need say no more, than what hath been already spoken of the several parts, whereof this is only the Result: desiring pardon of the Reader, that I have Christened these imperfect and unworthy Papers by so noble a name; which I desire they may deserve, though I fear they will not. However I will give the venture, and make as speedy and as profitable a discovery, as the times enable me, of the whole World, and the most observable things therein; according to the best light which the reading of Histories and Geographical discourses hath supplied me with; beseeching him who made the World, and ordereth all the Governments and Affairs thereof as to him seems best, to bless me in the undertaking; and furnish me with fit Abilities both of strength and judgment to go through with it. Ipse enim est qui operatur in nobis & velle & perficere; as the Scripture hath it: And so on in God's name.

OF THE WORLD,

EUROPE.

Of the Creation of the World by Almighty God, and the Plantations of the same by the sons of Men, sufficient hath been spoken already. We are to look upon it now, as perfected and peopled in all parts thereof, but all those parts united into one Compositum; called therefore by the Grecians, Τὸ Πᾶν, & Τὸ Ὀν, because the Summa totalis, and general comprehension of all things existent. In which respect called by the Latins Universum, a name of multitude, but of a multitude united, (Universi qui in uno loco versantur, say the old Grammarians.) The great body of the World, like the body of Man, though it have many parts and members, is but one body only. A body of so perfect and exact a form, of so compleat a Symmetrie in respect of the particular parts, and all those parts so beautified and adorned by the God of Nature; that from the elegance and beauties of it, it was called Kosmos by the Grecians, and Mundus by the Latins; both names declaring the Composure of it to be full of Ornament; and all those Ornaments conducting mankind to the knowledge of God. For (as the Christian Advocate reasoneth very strongly,) As he which comes into an house, and seeth all things in it ordered in a beautiful and comely order; utrisque præstare crederet Dominum, &c. must needs conceive, both that the house had some wife Lord and Master who had so contrived it, and that such Lord and Master of it was of more worth and excellency than the house and furniture: So (saith he) whosoever doth observe the most eminent beauties of the Heaven and Earth, must needs conceive there is some great and more glorious power who did first create it; disposing of all things therein in such excellent manner.

This contemplation, together with the notions of a Deity, which naturally are ingrafted in the soul of man; hath trained up all men in the practise of some Religion, though few (comparatively) so happy as to be practised in the true. For though the knowledge and worship of the true God, by reason of some accessions in America, and the Indies, be more generally diffused than in former times; yet is the least part of the World possessed by them who make profession of that Worship. For dividing the whole World into 30 parts, it hath been found by such as have laboured in this search, that 19 of them are inhabited by Idolaters, who either know no God at all, or worship stocks and stones for Gods, even the work of mens hands. Of the 11 parts which are remaining, six are possessed by Jews, Turks, and Saracens; who though they have the knowledge of the God that made them, yet abnegating, not worshipping the Lord that bought them, they have no part or portion in the true Religion. Then for the five which are behind, two are conceived to be of the Greek Communion, the other three being being divided betwixt those of the Church of Rome; and such as otherwise differing in some opinions, pass generally by the name of Protestant, or reformed Churches. Which as it sheweth how small a portion of the World is possessed by Christians, who only (though not all of them) have reason to pretend to the true Religion: So doth it shew (I note this only by the way) how falsely those of Rome make Multitude of Professors to be a sign of the True Church; and then conceive themselves to be such a multitude, as corresponds unto that sign. Faulty alike both in the Position and the Application. For if the multitude of Professors be a sign of the Church, the true Church should be found rather amongst the Heathens or Mahometans, than amongst the Christians: or if they do restrain their meaning (as I hope they do) to those who make profession of the Christian faith; those of the Greek Communion, possessing two whole parts of five, will be found more numerous than the members of the Church of Rome, though possibly of less esteem in the eye of the World. So infinitely vain was that Brag of Bellarmino (though otherwise more modest than the rest of the Jesuits) affirming positively and expressly, Romanam Ecclesiam universum plane orbem possidere; i. e. That the Church of Rome is fully of as large a latitude as the World it self. This I have noted by the way, intending to take a more special notice of the state of Religion in the several Provinces of the World, to which now I hasten; premising first this scheme of those several parts, into which it doth now stand divided.

The World is divided into two parts;
 { Unknown, or not fully discovered; and is divided commonly into Borealis and Australis: the last taking up the whole Southern Continent; the other lying on the North of Europe and America; whereof we shall say somewhat at the end of this Work.
 { Known, either { Anciently, as Europe, Asia, Africa.
 { Lately, as America.

Europe is joyned to Asia, by that space of earth which is between the heads of Tanais and Daunia; Asia is joyned to Africa, by the Egyptian Isthmus; America is divided (as most conjecture) from all of them. Europe is separated from Asia, by a line drawn from the Bay of St. Nicolas, to the head of Tanais, from thence by that River it self all the length of his course; then by Palus Meotis, the Eufrates Sea, the Thracian Bosphorus, the Propontis, the Hellepont, and the Aegean. Asia is parted from Africa by the Red-Sea, or Gulf of Arabia: and Africa from Europe by the Mediterranean. Africa is greater than Europe, Asia than Africa, America than Asia.

They which have entertained a fancy of resembling every Countrey to things more obvious to the sight and understanding, have likened Europe to a Dragon; the head of which they make to be Spain; the two wings Italy, and Denmark. In like manner they have been curiously impertinent, in resembling France, to a Lozenge or Rhomboides; Belgium to a Lyon; Britain, to an Ax; Ireland, to an EGge; Peloponnesus, to a Plantane leaf; Spain, to an Oxe hide spread on the ground; Italy (which indeed holds best proportion) to a mans Leg; with divers the like Phantasies of a capricious brain; these Countreys no more resembling them, than pictures made when painting was in her infancy, under which they were fain to write, This is a Lion, and this is a Whale, for fear the spectators might have taken one for a Cock, and the other for a Car.

EUROPE, though the least (as being in length but 2800, in breadth but 1200 miles) is yet of most renown amongst us. First, because of the temperature of the Air, and fertility of the soyl; Secondly, from the study of Arts, both ingenious and mechanical; Thirdly, because of the Roman and Greek Monarchies: Fourthly, from the purity and sincerity of the Christian Faith; Fifthly, because we dwell in it, and to first place it.

EUROPE is generally said to be so called from Europa, the daughter of Agenor, King of the Phenicians, brought thence by Jupiter (as the Poets feign) in the shape of a Bull; or as some Histories say, by a Cretan Captain named Taurus: as others, in a ship whose beak had the portraiture of a Bull upon it. But why the bringing of that Lady into the Isle of Crete, should give denomination to the whole Continent of Europe, whereof that Island is so inconsiderable and so small a part, I must confess I see no reason. Goropius Becanus, who holds the high Dutch to be the primitive language, which was spoke in Paradise, and loves to fetch all names from thence; not thinking it convenient, that Europe being first inhabited by Gomerians or Cimbrians, should be beholding to the Grecians for its name: will have it called Europe, quasi Ver-hop, by the transposition of the two last letters; Ver signifying excellent, and Hop a multitude (whence we use to say, as thick as Hops) because Europe contains a multitude of excellent people. And on the other side, Bochartus, a French Writer, loving as much to bring all names from the Phenician or Punic tongue, will have it called Europe from Ur-appa, which signifieth in that language, a beautiful Countenance; because the Europeans much excell'd the Africans in whiteness of skin, and clearness of complexion. But in my minde Herodotus hath best determined of the controversy, who telleth us plainly, Ἐὐρώπη ἡ ἡμετέρα γῆ, ὅτι οὕτως ἦν ὁ δῆμιος, &c. That it is utterly unknown, both whence it had the name of Europe, and who first called it so. And yet considering there is a Province in Thrace called Europe, (whereof more hereafter) why might not the Asiaticks give the name of Europe to this part of the World, according to the name of that Province which lay nearest to them; as the Romans did the name of Africa to the other part of the World, after the name of that particular Province or part thereof, which they first brought under their obedience? Or

Or as the Europeans gave the name of Asia, to the greatest of the three known parts of the World; which properly and originally belonged unto Asia Minor (as it since was called;) or rather to those parts thereof which lay next to Greece; as shall be shewn hereafter in convenient place.

The first inhabitants of Europe, as hath been shewn in part already, and shall be shewn more fully in its proper place, where the sons of Japhet; amongst whom, as the Scripture telleth us, the Isles of the Gentiles were divided, Gen. 10. v. 5. which includes all the Continent of Europe and the Isles adjoining. For besides that it is compassed about with the Cyclades and other Isles in the Seas of Greece, together with the Isles of Candia, Sicilie, Sardinia, Corsica, the Isles of Britain and Zealand, with their young ones adjacent; Europe it self was formerly taken for an Island, as being invironed round with water, saving where it is joyned on the North-East to Asia the great, which very few of the Ancients were acquainted with. And what are the great Countreys of Anatolia, Greece, Spain, and Italy, all which did fall to the posterity of Japhet, but so many Peninsula's or Demy-Islands invironed almost round with one Sea or other? Nor was the name and memory of Japhet so much forgotten by the Children rained it a long time in their Lapetus, whom they make to be the son of Colum and Terra, and the father of the wife Promethews, whom Ovid therefore calleth Janus Lapetus, in the first Book of his Metamorphosis. So that we see how punctually the first part of Gods blessing was fulfilled upon him; which was, that he would enlarge the borders of Japhet, Gen. 9. 27. The second part thereof, that he should dwell in the Tents of Sem, though it was long before it came to the accomplishment, yet it came at last; and that both in the literal and mystical sense. First in the literal, when the posterity of Japhet, both Greeks and Romans, made themselves Masters of Judea, or the Land of Canaan, and the Eastern parts, promised to and possessed by the seed of Sem: Next in the mystical, when God was pleased to break down the partition-wall, and to incorporate the Gentiles of the house of Japhet, into the body of the Church; which for a long time was restrained to the Line of Sem.

Europe may be considered as it stands divided into the Continent and the Islands: the Continent lying all together; the Islands as they are dispersed in the Greek, Aegean, Cretan and Ionian Seas, the Adriatick and the Mediterranean, and in the British and Northern Ocean. But in this work we shall discover them, and discourse of them in this following order, dividing Europe into 1. Italy, 2. the Alpes, 3. France, 4. Spain, 5. Britain, 6. Belgium, 7. Germany, 8. Denmark, 9. Swethland, 10. Russia, 11. Poland, 12. Hungary, 13. Slavonia, 14. Dacia, and 15. Greece; and speaking of the several Islands, as they relate to some or other of these greater Countreys.

In all which Countreys and Islands belonging to them, besides the Latine Tongue which is now rather Scholastic, than National; and besides the Italian, French, and Spanish, being but as so many corruptions of the Latine: and besides the English which is a Compound of Dutch, Latine, and French; there are in all 14 Mother-Tongues, which owe nothing at all to the Roman; that is to say, 1. Irish, spoken in Ireland, and the West of Scotland, 2. British, or Welsh, in Wales, and some parts of Cornwall; 3. Cantabrian, or Basquish, in Biscay, about the Pyrenean Hills, and near to the Cantabrian Ocean, 4. Arabick, in the Mountains of Granada, called Apuxarras; 5. Finnick, in Finland and Lapland, Provinces of the Crown of Sweden: 6. Dutch, (though with different Dialects) in Germany, Belgium, Denmark, Norway, Swethland; 7. Cauchian, which the East Friezlanders (or Canchi) speak amongst themselves, though to strangers they speak the Common Dutch; 8. Slavonish, in Slavonia, Poland, Hungary, and almost all the parts of the Turkish Empire; 9. Ilyrian, on the East side of Istria, and the Isle of Veggia: 10. Greek, in most Provinces and Isles of Greece, by the Greeks themselves; 11. Hungarian, and 12. Epirotique, in the mountainous places of those Countreys. 13. Jazygian, on the North-side of Hungary, betwixt Danubius and Tibiscus, and 14. Tartarian, in the Taurica Chersonesus, and other European parts of that barbarous people. And this shall serve for Europe in the general notion. Descend we now to the particular Kingdoms, Regions, and Islands of it; beginning first of all with Italie, contrary to the usage of most Geographers; who commonly begin with Spain, or Ireland, as being the furthest Countreys Westward, and consequently nearest to the first Meridian, from whence the Longitude was reckoned. Which we shall do by reason of that great influence which the Romans had in most parts of Europe, and many parts of the World besides, in matters as well Civil as Ecclesiastical, which much depended on the power of that Empire formerly, and on the usurpations of that Church in the later days.

Italy was anciently divided, as most Countreys else, into Tribes and Nations, as the Latines, Sabines, Tuscanes, Samnites, Campani, Picentini, Piceni, Ligures, Tarentini, Lucani, and others of inferior note; whom we shall meet with in the description of those several States into which it doth now stand divided. But all those Nations being severally vanquished by the Roman puissance; and made up into one body, whereof Rome was the head; it pleased Augustus to divide it into eleven Regions, as before was said, that is to say, Liguria, Hetruria, Lutium, Campania, Umbria, Samnium, the Picenum, Gallia, Italia Transpadana, Ventia, and Histria. In the time of the Emperour Antoninus, the Provinces of Italy were increased to sixteen, the bounds of the former Regions being somewhat altered; and the three Isles of Sicily, Corfica, and Sardinia, with the two Rhatia's; first and second, added to the number. But this distribution also received some change in the time of Constantine the Great, who altering both the names and bounds of the former Provinces, and adding one more to them, made seventeen in all, that is to say, 1. Tuscia and Umbria, 2. Picenum Subarbitarium, 3. Campania, 4. Apulia and Calabria, 5. Valeria, 6. Samnium, 7. Lucania and the Bruttii, 8. Sicily, 9. Corfica, and 10. Sardinia, which made up the prefecture of the City of Rome: 11. Flaminia and Picenum Annonarium, 12. Ventia, 13. Emilia, 14. Liguria, 15. Alpes Cottia, 16. Rhatia prima, and 17. Rhatia secunda, which made up the Diocese of Italy, properly and especially so called, whereof Milain was first the Metropolitan City, Aquileia afterwards.

The Language heretofore was divers, according to the several Provinces and people of it. In Apulia, they used the Messapian tongue; in that which is now called Calabria, they spake the Greek; in Hetruria, they used the Tuscan; and the Latin in Lutium: which last so altered in short time, by reason of the commerce they had with the conquered Nations, that the Articles of the Peace made between the Romans and Carthaginians, at the expulsion of the Tarquins, could not be understood (as Polybius saith) by the best Antiquaries of his time. And yet the time between the making of those Articles, and the time of Polybius, who was contemporary with Scipio Africanus, passed not above 300 years. That the Latin tongue was afterwards at any time spoke generally in all parts of the Roman Empire, or of Italy it self, as I see some hold, I can by no means be persuaded; it being by special favour granted to the Cumans, dwelling but an hundred miles from the walls of Rome, that they should use the Roman Language: which had been a meer mockery, and no mark of favour at all, if the Italian people dwelling out of Lutium had used it formerly. And yet this hapned not above 140 years before the times of the Emperours, at what time the Romans were Lords of Italy, Sicily, Sardinia, Corfica, and great part of Spain. It's true, the Latin tongue insucceeding times came to be understood in most parts of Italy, by reason of the Roman Colonies which were planted amongst them (being in all no fewer than 150) and their continual resort to Rome on their several businesses: it being a great point of the Roman State, not only to have their Laws written, and judgement pronounced by the Prætors for the several Provinces, in the Latin only; but to give audience in the open Senate to none who came thither from the subject Nations, save only in the Latin tongue, their own proper language. Yet for all this, it never grew to such extent as to be the Language of the whole Empire, no nor of Italy it self, no more than the English tongue is natural or national to the Welsh, or Irish, though it be generally understood (for the very same reasons) by all of the better sort both in Wales and Ireland. In which regard I am not of their opinion, who think that the Italian (as the French, and Spanish) are nothing but corruptions of the Latin tongues, occasioned by the innovations of the barbarous Nations: But rather that the Latin words which occur therein, proceeded from that weak impression which the Latin tongue had made amongst them, whilst they were under the obedience of that puissant Empire; and that the Italian tongue, as it is now spoken, could not receive so great a change from the barbarous Nations, none of which carryed long amongst them, but the Goths, and Lombards; nor they so long (the Lombards not at all in the Eastern parts) as to be either the occasions or authors of the alteration. So that the present language of Italy is a compound, made up especially of Latin and the old Italian: some notions of the Lombard being mixt with it in the North, and West, some of the Gothish, in the midst, about Rome it self; and not a little of the Greek, in the East of Naples.

And as the Language, so the Religion of the Countrey hath received some change. The Christian Faith was first preached in Rome it self, and in Rome first preached by Saint Peter who came thither in or about the beginning of the Empire of Claudius. The two Apostles Peter and Paul, are generally said by the ancient Writers, to be the first who preached the Gospel in that City. A doctus Apostolus Petrus & Paulus, Roma fundata & constituta est Ecclesia, saith the old Father Irenæus, Lib. 4. cap. 3. To one of these the first preaching of the Gospel there is to be referred; both being Bishops of that City: That is to say, St. Peter of the Churches of the Circumcision; St. Paul of those which consisted specially of the Gentiles. Now that the Gospel was preached there before Paul's coming, is evident by his Epistle written to the Romans, at Cenchrea the Port Town of Corinth, six years at least before his being brought to Rome; in which he testifieth that their Faith was famous over all the World; and therefore could not count him who had never been there, for the planter of it: And as St. Peter was the first Preacher of the Gospel at Rome, so sent he his Disciples to promulgate it in most parts of Italy. The Roman Martyrologies reckon up eight Bishops of St. Peter's making, for so many of the principal Cities of this Countrey: that is to say, Epaphroditus (not he whom St. Paul speaks of in his Epistle to the Philippians) for Terracina, of old called Antur, Hermagoras for Aquileia, Paulinus for Luca, Apollinaris for Ravenna, Marcus for Atina, Prodocimus for Padua, Marcianus for Syracuse, and Pancratius for Tancomenium in the Isle of Sicily. But whether St. Peter planted it, or St. Paul watered it, certain I am that GOD only gave it the increase. It could not else have prospered under such a Tyranny, as many, if not most of the Roman Emperours did earnestly endeavour to suppress it with. But Sanguis Martyrum semina Ecclesie; the watering of it with the blood of so many Martyrs, made it grow the faster. And this small grain of Mustard-seed waxed to great a Tree, as over-shadowed all the Provinces of that mighty Empire; and did not only stand it out against all Tempests, but in conclusion did suppress that Superstition and Idolatry, for whose sake all those Princes till the time of Constantine, did, more or less, labour to destroy it. How much it hath receded since those times from its primitive purity, and how it did degenerate into Worldly pomp, and Secular policy, by the design and arts of those who boast themselves to be Successors to that great Apostle, shall be a little touched at in the story of the Roman Papacy. Suffice it in this place to say, that all the people of this Countrey, partly in reference to the Pope, partly for fear of the Inquisition, and partly by being kept in ignorance of the Protestant Doctrine (of which they are taught to believe many monstrous things) are all of the Religion of the Church of Rome.

But though the Fountains of the waters of Eternal life, have either been stopped, or else corrupted by the Popes of Rome; the Rivers which do water this most flourishing Garden, still preserve their beds, and run unmixed and uncorrupted in the same channels, as before they did. And of these Italy hath as many as any one Countrey, but none of any long course, by reason that all parts of it are so near some Sea; most of which rising from the Alps, or the Apennine Hills, by melting of the Snows in Winter, and casualty of Land-floods at other times of the year, do often over-flow the Countrey, and for the most part leave an ill Air behind them. Those of chief note are, 1. The River Po, or Padus (the Greeks call it Eridanus) into which Phæton is said to have been drenched when he fell from Heaven. It riseth in the Alps, runneth through Lombardy, which it divideth into Cispadanum and Transpadanum; and having taken in 30 lesser streams, falls with seven mouths into the Adriatick Sea, not far from Venice. 2. Rubicon, now called Pissatello, anciently the North-bound of Italy; Hic fluvius quondam Italia finis, as it is in Pliny. It runneth into the Adriatick Sea not far from Rimini, or Ariminum, now the Port-town to Ravenna, the Haven of Ravenna being long since choaked; but of this River more in another place. 3. Arno, which riseth in the Apennine falleth into the Tuscan Sea, and anciently divided Italy on that side from the Cisalpin Galls; on the banks hereof standeth the fair City of Florence. 4. Ticinus, which gave name to the City of Pavia, called of old Ticinum; it riseth in the Alps, and emptieth it self into the Lake called Lacus Verbanus. 5. Liris, now called Gargilis, stained with the blood of French and Spaniards, in their quarrels for the Realm of Naples; and no less unfortunately memorable for the drowning of Peter de Medici. 6. Cnique fuit rerum promissa potentia, Tibris;

And Tiber, unto which was given
The power of all things under Heaven.

It riseth from the Apennine Hills, not far from Aretium (now Arezzo) a Town of Tuscany (which it parted from the Roman Lutium, and the Land of the Sabines) and gliding gently near Cita de Castello, Perugia, and the old Oriculum, passeth by Rome, and falleth into the Tuscan, or lower Sea, at Offida. Here is also, 7. The Lake of Thracymene, near which Annibal defeated Flaminius the Consul and his whole Army, opening thereby his passage to the gates of Rome: and 8. The famous River of Metaurus, where the Romans overcame Asdrubal the Brother of Annibal; and thereby made a way to the ruine of Carthage. Others of less note shall be mentioned in their proper places.

As for the Mountains of this Countrey, those of most note are the Alps, and the Apennine, of which the residue in a manner are but spurs and branches. Of these the Alps being also appertaining to France and Germany, or rather containing many large and entire Provinces which belong to neither, deserves a Treatise by it self. The Apennine, being proper only to this Countrey, but so that it relates to many and particular Provinces of it, shall be spoken of here. A ledge of Hills which take beginning near Savona, a Town of the Commonwealth and Country of Genoa, situate on the Mediterranean, and fetching a little compass Northwards, extend to the furthest part of Italy, dividing it almost in the very midst: that part thereof which lyeth towards the Tyrrhenian, or Tuscan Sea, being called Cisapennina; Transapennina, that which lay towards the Adriatick. Passing in one entire body as far as Ascoli, a Town of Marca Anconitana (a Province belonging to the Pope) where they are at the highest; it is there parted into two horns or branches, whereof one runs out to the mount of Gargano, and so unto the Land of Otranto; the other spreadeth it self as far as Calabria, those being the most Eastern Provinces of this noble Continent. Called the Apennine, as some say, a Penna, by which word the Latins used to signify the top or summit of an Hill; by reason of the height and sharp points thereof: as others say, quasi Alpes Penina, because first overcome by Annibal and his Carthaginians, whom the Roman Writers call by the name of Pæni. The Inhabitants hereof, by Virgil named Apenninicolæ; but otherwise reducible to some of the neighbouring Provinces. Of this large Mountain most of the Hills of Italy from Savona Eastwards, are but the excursions; which being of less note, shall be spoken of as they lye before us in the way.

To proceed now to so much of the History of Italy as concerns the generals; we are to know that the first Inhabitants of it (not to say any thing of the fictions of Fryer Annus under the name of Be-rofus, who will needs have Noah himself come hither shortly after the Flood) were doubtless of the race of Cittim or Kittim the fourth son of Javan, one of the sons of Japhet. Who being planted by their Father in that part of Greece, which was since called Macedon, and after spreading themselves further

The Kings of Rome.

- A. M.
 3213. 1 Romulus, the Founder of Rome; he made peace with Tatius King of the Sabines, coming against him to revenge the ravishment of their women; incorporating him and his into his new City, and by that means adding thereto a fair and goodly Territory, 37.
 3251. 2 Numa, the first Author of the Roman Ceremonies, 43.
 3294. 3 Tullus Hostilius, who enlarged the borders of Rome by the Conquest of Alba, the mother City of the Latins, and vanquished the Fidenates, 32.
 3326. 4 Anicius Marcius, who built Ostia on the mouth of Tiber, to be an Haven to the City, 24.
 3350. 5 Tarquinius Priscus, who subdued many of the Tuscan Nations, increased the number of the Tribes and Senators, and added the triumphal ornaments, 38.
 3388. 6 Servius Tullus, who first caused the people to be enrolled, and brought into cenſe, 44.
 3432. 7 Tarquinius Superbus, son to the former Tarquinius. He vanquished the Gabii, and took the Towns of Ardea, Otriculum, and Suessa Pameſia: but for his own insolent behaviour, and a Rape committed on Lucretia the Wife of Collatine by his son Sexsus, he and his whole Race were driven out of the Town, Anno Mundi. 3457. V. C. 268.

After this, the Romans loathing the name of King, caused two Officers to be chosen out of the Patricii, or chief Citizens, to whom they gave the name of Consuls, à consulendo, from counselling of, and consulting the good of the Commonwealth, ut consulerent se suis civibus meminerint, saith the Historian, their name being a Memento of their charge or duty. And in this office they resolved to have always two; and those but only for a year, Ne vel solitudine vel morâ potestas corrumpatur. And though some had the fortune to be Consuls two or three years together, yet every new year they were anew chosen, and so their Offices reckoned as several; neither do we find any to have been elected for less than a year, unless upon the death or deposition of a former; until the Civil Wars. But then, cum belli civilis premia festinari ceperunt, when the services done in the Civil Wars required a quicker turn in requital, the Consulship was given only for some part of the year, and ordinarily for two Months: the first Consuls being named Ordinarii, in whose names the writings made for the whole year were dated; the other Minores, or Honorarii, which only served to make up a number. For so ambitious were the Romans of this honour, that when Maximus died in the last day of his Consulship, Caninius Rebilus petitioned Cæsar, for that part of the day that remained: whence that so memorated Jest of Tully, Oviganthem Consulens, qui toto consulatus sui tempore somnum oculis non vidit! And when Cecina was by the Senate degraded from this honour on the day in which he was to have resigned it, one Rosticus Regulus obtained the Office from Vitellius for the day remaining: but as the Historian noteth, magno cum irrisu accipientia, tribuentisque. Now as the Romans did thus exceed the first number of Consuls, so sometimes fell they short of it. The first that was sole Consul was Pompey, in the beginning of the Civil Wars, viz. A.V.C. 403. The next, one Varanes, A.C. 410. This Office, from the first Institution to the final period of it, continued at the least in name (for the Emperours had of long time assumed the Power and Prerogatives appertaining to it) the space of 1084 years, though not without many intermissions of the name and Title, by the several interpolings of the Decemviri, the Dictators, and the Consular Tribunes, of which more anon. The last Consul was one Basilus, in the time of Justinian, A. Ch. 542. The two first, Collatinus the husband of Lucretia, and Junius Brutus, by whose intigation the people had took Arms against the house of the Tarquins. A man so zealous in defence of the common liberty, so resolutely bent to make good what he had begun, and so extremely opposite to the Royal Race, that he not only caused Collatine to resign his Office within the year, because he was of the blood of the Tarquins, but executed his own sons for holding correspondence and intelligence with them. But though the Government were changed, the old design was followed, which the Kings had laid for the enlarging of their Empire; but followed with so slow a pace, by reason of their factions and divisions, that it was full 500 years before they could be Masters of Italy. A matter not unworthy of our consideration, that the Italians should hold out so long a time against the puissance of the Romans; when in less then half that time ensuing, they did possess themselves of almost all Europe, and many goodly Kingdoms and Provinces both in Asia and Africa. So difficult a thing it was (as is said by Florus) dare caput Italie, to contract the many limbs of Italy into one body, and unite them under one head.

But to proceed, after Italy was fully conquered by them, they fell upon the Carthaginians, as their nearest neighbours; whose overthrow in the end of the first Punic war, A.V.C. 512. gave them the full possession of Sicily, (except the State of Syracusa) and the Isle of Sardinia. After that being molested in their Trade by the Ithyrian Pirates, and finding them countenanced therein by the Queen of that Nation, they made a fortunate War against her, and brought that puissant people to become their Tributaries, A.V.C. 525. The second Carthaginian War, managed by Annibal in the bowels of Italy, had almost put a period to the glories of their Commonwealth. But that being also ended to their advantage by the conquest of Spain, they quarrelled Philip King of Macedon, who had aided Annibal, compelled him to accept of peace on their own terms, and after oured his son Perseus of all his Dominions, making Macedon a Province of Rome, and all the rest of Greece but their Tenants at will. Nor was it long before they picked a quarrel with Antiochus the great King of Syria; made him abandon his possession of the Lesser Asia; and finally prevailed so successfully in all their actions, that there was neither King nor Commonwealth that could stand in their way, until the State being burthened with its too much greatness, began to totter of it self.

Two

Two things there were, which much conduced to the advancement of the Romans to their power and greatness, besides the Providence of God which had so disposed it: which were the great encouragements which they gave their Souldiers, and the Triumphant manner of reception which they used to bestow upon their Generals when they returned home with honour and victory. For when any of their Generals did so return, he was permitted to enter sitting on a glorious Chariot, the spoils which he had got in war being carried before, the prisoners he had taken following bound at the heels of his chariot; his Souldiers compassing him about with their several Crowns, according to the quality of their well-deservings; and all the Fathers of the City, attended by the Priests and principal Ladies going out to meet him. The first beginning of which custome is ascribed to Romulus, who in the War with Acron King of the Ceninenſes made against him in revenge of the rape committed by the Romans on the Sabine women, seeing his people give ground, called for help to Jupiter, and vowed if he overcame King Acron, to offer up his armour to him. Acron being vanquished, the Conquerer cutteth down a fair young Oak and hangeth on it all the armour of the vanquished King: then girding his Gown close unto him, and putting on his head a Garland of Lawrel, he laid the Oak upon his shoulders and marched towards the City, his Army following, and singing an Epinicion, or song of victory. To this we must refer the original and beginning of Triumphs. But nihil est inventum & perfectum eodem tempore, as the saying is. Tarquinius Priscus long after Romulus, added hereunto the purple Robe, and the triumphal Chariot drawn with four horses. The other pomps came afterwards, as they grew both in power and pride. Now of these Triumphs there were two sorts; the Greater, which was properly called a Triumph; and the Lesser, vulgarly called the Ovation, which differed from one another in many circumstances. For, 1. The Triumph made his entrance in a Royal Chariot, and was met by the Senators in their Robes; but the Ovator made his entrance on foot, and was met only by the Knights and Gentlemen of Rome. 2. The Triumph had a Lawrel Crown, and entred with a noise of Drums and Trumpets; but the Ovator had only a Garland of Fir, with Flutes and Haultboyes playing before him. 3. The Triumph was attyred in a Garment of State, which they called Vestis Trabeata; but the Ovator in a plain purple Gown only. 4. In a Triumph the Souldiers cried out, Io Triumph; but in an Ovation they ingeminated only O, O, O, from the often doubling of which word, it had (as some think) the name of an Ovation. 5. And lastly, the Triumph used to sacrifice a certain number of Oxen; but the Ovator a Sheep only, from whence the name is properly to be derived.

Now there were three cases in which the Conquerer was to be content with this lesser Triumph. 1. If the number of the enemies whom he slew in battel exceeded not 5000 men; or that he had not so much overcome them by force, as by perswasion or subtilty. 2. If the War had been slight, cursory, or not lawfully managed: And 3. If it were against an Ignoble Enemy. And of this last we have a fair instance in P. Rupilius, who having got the victory in the Servile war, (a victory of great importance to the State of Rome) was yet content with an Ovation; ne Triumphi dignitatem Servili inscriptione violaret, as it is in Florus. As for the greater Triumphs they were indeed very full of magnificence; the pomp whereof, who list to see, may find it in the Triumph of Paulus Aemilius described by Plutarch; though by that which hath before been said, we may conjecture somewhat at the glories of it.

And yet this honour was not always vouchsafed to those who had best deserved it, there being many wayes whereby it might be forfeited or denied in a factious State, and jealous of the over-greatness of the men of War. For, 1. Sometimes it was denied a victorious General, by the strength of a contrary Faction; and so Pompey denied Mællus the honour of a Triumph for the conquest of Crete. 2. Sometimes the Conquerer himself is willing to decline it, for fear of envy: And so Marcellus in Plutarch, after his conquest of Sicily, having triumphed twice before, refused that honour, his reason was, et edior & exet & deia & deia, for fear his third Triumph might become a matter of envy. 3. Sometimes the Souldiers having been ill paid, or otherwise not well treated by their Commanders, opposed them in their suit for it: and this was the case of Paulus Aemilius, who questionless had merited this honour, for not dividing amongst them the Spoils of Greece, as he once had promised, if Servilius and others of the Senate, making it their own case, had not itckled hard for him with the Souldiers. 4. It was sometimes denied, because the General had born no publick Office in the Commonwealth: for so in Livy, when Lentulus coming Proconsul out of Spain required a Triumph, the Fathers answered, that he had indeed done things worthy of that honour, but that they had no precedent for it, ut qui neque Consul, neque Dictator, neque Prætor res gessisset Triumpharet. 5. Sometimes the Generals themselves omitted it for the furtherance of some of their other purposes: And so Cæsar coming towards Rome a Victor, at the same time the Consuls were to be chosen, laid aside his demand of the Triumph to sue for the Consulship; it being the custome that such as demanded the Triumph should abide without the City, and such as sued for the Consulship must of necessity be within. 6. Sometimes it was denied, when the War had been undertaken without the Command of the Senate: in which respect the Triumph was denied unto Mællus on the conquest of Galatia by him, to the great enlargement of their Empire, quia causum Belli Senatus non approbavit, because he had no Commission from the Senate for it. 7. There was no Triumph granted if the War had been Civil, because in all such Wars whosoever was Conquerour, the Commonwealth was a loser by it. And therefore Pompey and Mællus having vanquished Sertorius and his Party in Spain, would have it called a Foreign, not a Civil War, because they would not lose their Triumph. Externum magis id bellum quam Civile videri voluerunt, ut triumpharent. 8. If the Victory had not been obtained without great loss on the Romans side; in which regard Valerius after his conquest of the Galls was denied this honour, quia magis dolor civibus amissis, quam gaudium fusi hostibus prevalevit, saith Alexander ab Alexandro. 9. And lastly, the Triumph was denied a General, if the service had not been performed in his own Province: And so we find that when Livius and Nero, being Consuls, had vanquished Adrubal, Livius only had the Triumph, though Nero was the man that had won the day; because the field was fought in the Province of Livius, to which Nero came but as an Accessory, or assistant to him.

And these are all, or at the least the principal causes of hindering or omitting this great honour, indeed the greatest that the Free-State could be capable of. But after when the Common-wealth was changed into a Monarchy, it began to be laid aside for altogether, as too great for Subjects; and was first purposely neglected by Vispanius Agrippa, the Establisher of Augustus in the Roman Empire, who when he had a Triumph decreed unto him, for quenching certain Rebellions in Africa, and his quiet settling of that Country; to give Posterity an example, refused to accept it. And this example being (as it were) a rule to others, occasioned that this custom was in short time quite laid aside; and that no man under the degree of an Emperour triumphed solemnly; all others from thenceforth, being content with the Triumphal Ornaments, ut vultus tantis divitiis natus, in the words of Dion. And though Bellisarius having subdued the Kingdom of the Vandals in Africa, is said (600 years after the death of Agrippa) to have had the honour of a Triumph; yet in propriety of speech, it was nothing but an honourable presenting of himself and his prisoners before the Emperour; and was so far from the magnificence of a Roman Triumph, that it wanted many of the solemnities used in an Ovation. Nor did the Emperours themselves much affect this honour, either because too popular, or too chargeable, or that they thought it was beneath the Imperial Majesty; the last (as I remember) that made use thereof to set forth his glories, being Valerius Probus, after his victories over the Germans, and the Blemys, a people of Africa, in or about the year 284 of our Saviours birth.

In the next place look we on the encouragements and rewards of the Common Souldiers: For besides the setting out of Lands and dwellings for the poorer sort, in which they might rest themselves when they were past service; and besides the large donatives which the General in his Triumph did bestow upon them; they had their mural Crown for him that first scaled the Walls, a naval Crown for him that first boarded the Enemies ships, a Camp Crown, or Corona Castrensis, for him that had forced a way into the Tents or Camp of the Enemy; a City Crown, or Corona Civica, for him that had preserved the life of a Roman Citizen. Not to say any thing of those Chains and Bracelets which Souldiers of inferior merit were adorned withal. By which encouragements, and the good conduct of their Counsels in the Senate, the Roman affairs succeeded so prosperously, and their Dominions were enlarged so immensly, that never any Common-wealth had so large a growth.

And yet the greatness of this state is neither totally, nor only to be attributed to the Consular Government. For though the Walls of this great building were raised by the Consuls, yet the foundation of the same was laid by the Kings, and the roof thereof laid on by the Emperours. Nay, be it spoken to the honour of Monarchical Government, whensoever any great and imminent danger did seem to threaten them, they were fain to lay aside their confidence in the rule of their Consuls, and betake themselves to the Command of one Sovereign Officer, whom they called Dictator. Of which, and other the changes hapning in the State of Rome, take this short abstract from Corn. Tacitus. "Urbeni Romanæ a principio Reges habuere, &c. The City of Rome was in the beginning governed by Kings. Liberty and the Consulship L. Brutus brought in. The Dictators were chose but for a time: The Decemviri passed not two years, neither had the Consular authority of the Tribunes of the Souldiers any long continuance, nor Cinna nor Syllas dominion. Pompey and Crassus quickly yielded to Cæsars forces; Lepidus and Antony to Augustus. So Tacitus in brief of these publick changes: Of which, as to the Decemviri, which were instituted only on a particular occasion for the reforming of the Laws by those of Athens; and the Military Tribunes of Consular Authority ordained to divert common people from seeking after the Consulship; I shall here say nothing. But as for the Dictators, being Officers of a Supreme power, and such as made way for the Emperours in the close of all; I shall enlarge a little further. They were called Dictators à Dictando, because they prescribed what they pleased unto the people; which they were bound to execute and not dispute. Hence that memorable jest of Julius Cæsar, who being told that Sylla had resigned his Dictatorship, though by decree of Senate made perpetual to him; returned this Answer, that Sylla was an unlearned man, dicere nesciit, and therefore knew not how to dicere, or to play the Dictator. They were also called Populi Magistris, or the peoples Masters, because from them lay no appeal unto the people (as did from all the rest of the Roman Magistrates) during the whole time of their Command, which ordinarily continued for six months; yet so, that if they did in the mean time settle the affairs of the Common-wealth, they resigned it sooner; if the necessities of the State required a longer continuance in it, they were chosen again. The names of as many of them as I have met withal, I have here subjoyned, together with the services they did the Publick in the time of their Office.

The Dictators of Rome.

- A.V.C.
- 253. 1 Titus Lartius, chosen upon occasion of a general War made by the Latines upon Rome; the first that ever had this Office.
 - 257. 2 Aulus Posthumius, chosen to pursue that War, which he ended with the slaughter of 30000 of the Latins.

 - 318. 4 Emilius Mamercus, overcame the Veientes and the Fidenates, and was thrice in eleven years called unto this Office.

- 338. 5 Pub. Servilius, who finally vanquished the Fidenates and the Lavicans.
- 354. 6 Enrius Camillus, who finally destroyed the City of the Petr, and being chosen a second time, A.V.C. 562. preserved his Country from the Galls: thrice chosen after this upon new occasions.
- 375. 7 Tit. Quinctius Cincinnatus, chosen in the War against the Latins.
- 385. 8 L. Manlius, elected in the time of a grievous pestilence, to find a way for the appealing of the gods.
- 396. 9 C. Sulpitius.
- 418. 10 Martius Rutilius, the first Dictator chosen out of the Commons.
- 11 L. Papyrius subdued the Samnites.

- 13 Emilius, who also overcame the Samnites.
- 14 Lentulus, who triumphed also over the Samnites.
- 451. 15 I. Bubulcius, who finally subdued the Æqui and the Volsi.
- 16 Corn. Rufinus.
- 467. 17 Q. Hortensius, chosen for appealing a difference betwixt the Senate and the Commons, who had fortified himself in Janiculus, one of the Hills whereon Rome stood.
- 505. 18 Cl. Glizius forced to resign his office to
- 19 Atilius Colatinus, the first that exercised his office out of Italy: he was chosen in the first Punic War.
- 536. 20 Fabius Maximus, chosen in the War against Annibal.
- 537. 21 M. Junius, chosen upon the great defeat which the Roman Forces had at the battle of Canna.
- 545. 22 L. Manlius Torquatus, chosen upon the death of Marcellus the Consul slain by Annibal.
- 672. 23 L. Syllas, (descended from that Corn. Rufinus, who had been formerly in this Office) having by force of Arms suppressed the Faction of Marcius and Cinna, made himself Master of the City, and caused himself to be chosen Perpetual Dictator, after the Office had been intermitted, for the space of 127 years: which Office having exercised with a great deal of cruelty, he resigned with as great a confidence.
- 707. 24 C. Julius Cæsar, descended from Iulus the son of Ascanius, who was the second King of the Trojan race, having conquered Britain, and added all Gaul Transalpine to the Roman Empire; and finding himself unworthily requited by the Faction of Pompey, passed with his Army after him into Greece; and having vanquished him in the fields of Pharsalia, and made himself absolutely Master of the Roman Empire; took to himself the supreme Government thereof, under the title of Dictator; which having managed for the space of five years, he was murdered in the Senate house by Brutus and Cassius.

Before the time of these perpetual Dictators, the Romans having some enemies or other that opposed the progress of their fortunes, had not the leisure to contend with one another in a publick way; or if they did, their differences and seditions were soon composed. But being grown so great as to fear no Enemy; and the Estate to vast, that it was grown too mighty for a popular Government; then they began to practise on the peoples patience, and to project the sharing of the Empire amongst the great ones. Concerning which, take here this short Epitome, which I find in Tacitus. "Rebus modicis equalitas facile habebatur, &c. While (saith he) our Dominions were but small, Equality was easily maintained among us. But after we have subdued the World, and destroyed all Kings and Cities that stood in our way, or might work our annoyance; when we had leisure to seek after Wealth without peril; there arose hot contentions betwixt the Nobility and Commons. Sometimes the factious Tribunes carried it away, sometimes the Consuls had the better: and in the City and common Forum, some little skirmishes (the beginning of our Civil Wars) were sometimes seen. Afterwards C. Marius one of the meanest of the Commonalty, and L. Syllas the most cruel of all the Nobility, by force of Arms overthrowing the Free-State reduced all to an absolute Government. To them succeeded Cn. Pompeius a little closer in his projects, but nothing better minded to the Common-wealth: Et nunquam posset nisi de Principatu quæstium, and never after that was any other point debated, than who should get the Sovereignty unto himself. So Tacitus, and he stateth it rightly. For after Pompey had revived the controversy, and had found Cæsar a better Disputant than himself; Augustus Antony, and Lepidus (on the death of Cæsar) made good the Argument, attracting all power unto themselves by the name of Triumviri: till Augustus having out-witted Lepidus, and vanquished M. Antony at the battle of Actium, became sole Sovereign of the State, by the name of Prince; Et cuncta bellis civilibus fessa, nomine Principis sub imperium accepit, as that Author hath it.

But touching those great alterations in the State of Rome, the contentions for the chief command, and the Reduction of it to a Monarchy by Augustus Cæsar, I published a Discourse in the year 1631. (but written many years before) under the title of AUGUSTUS, or an Essay of those means and Counsels whereby the Common-wealth of Rome was altered, and reduced to a Monarchy. Which being but short, so pertinent to the Present business, and so well entertained when it came abroad; I hope it will not be improper or unprofitable to subjoin it here. The Reader may either peruse it, or prater-mint it, as his phantasie guides him. And here it followeth in these words:

They

Antony answer, though it shew but a delay, was in effect a denial; insinuated into the acquaintance of Cicero, then potent among the Senators, and a capital Enemy of Antony; by whose means the Lords of the Senate began to cast great affection towards him. Next in a solemn Oration to the People, he let them know, how he intended to have distributed his Fathers wealth among them; and how Antony did unjustly detain it from them both. Certainly there is not any thing prevaileth sooner with the ignoble many than hope of gain. No sooner had he finished his speech, and given away that to them, which he thought impossible to get for himself, but all was in a tumult. None was so sparing of his words, but he had some curse in store for Antony: every one vowing the destruction of that man, whom they supposed to deprive them of AUGUSTUS Donative.

7. In this hurly burly Antony quits the Town, and is by the general voyce of both Houses declared an Enemy to the State. An Army is given to Hircius and Pansa, then Consuls: AUGUSTUS, aged but 18. years, being proclaimed Imperator, and made head of the League against the common Foe. AUGUSTUS, as he loved not to absent from a necessary war, so he always used to reserve himself from the dangers of it; and therefore he committed the whole enterprise unto the Consuls: well knowing that though the Officers and Souldiers took most pains to get the Victory, yet would the honour of it be referred to him, as Imperator; Whereas, if any thing fell out to the Army not well, his being a Non-agent in the business, would bring his honour off without stain. The Consuls therefore proceeded in the War against Antony: who seeing little possibility of prevailing, resolved to sell the loss of his own liberty and his Souldiers lives, at a dear rate. And indeed the fortune of the day was so equally shared, that as the Consuls might boast of the vanquishment of Antony, so Antony might triumph in the death of the Consuls.

AUGUSTUS had now as much as he could desire, more than he expected; a victorious Army at his service. He therefore applies himself so to them, that giving that among them which he had in present; and promising them greater favours, according as his fortune and their valour should advance him, he bound them unto him in an eternal bond of allegiance, and made them the first step by which he ascended the Royalty. The Lords of the Senate hearing of the young mans fortune, thought it best to strangle these hopes even in their Cradles; and to that end, decree the honour of overcoming Antony, not to belong to AUGUSTUS, but to Decius Brutus; for whose defence (being besieged by Antony in Antina) their Army had been levied. Nor did they think this frost of unexpected unkindness, sufficient to nip the blossome of his hopes; but they denied him the Consulship. These harsh proceedings compelled AUGUSTUS (his honour now lying at stake) to enter Rome as Conquerour, and force the Fathers to grant him his desires. Having thus gotten what for the time he aimed at; he generally shewed himself grateful to all, and particularly to some of the Souldiers, paying them what was behind by promise, and openly protesting that without their aid he durst not have adventured into the Capitol. So by keeping his day with the Military men, and shewing his noble and generous nature in a thankful commemoration of their service; he added stronger bonds to such as were already his own, and won many dayly to his side, which before were either neutrals, or adverse parties.

8. Antony in the mean time was not idle; but knowing that Lepidus was beyond the Mountains with a puissant Army, he posted thither, and so far prevailed with the Souldiers, that he was admitted into the Camp; where the General entertained him with all expressions of love and welcome. Antony perceiving the facile nature of Lepidus, soon perswaded him to lead his forces into Italy; promising him no less than the Lordship of the World, if he durst but shew his face to the Romans. AUGUSTUS having continual news of this combination, and fearing much the provokes of Antony, now strengthened; conceived no course so fitting and convenient to his ends, as to joyn friendship, and to enter into confederacy with them. And this he did, not for any good will to either; but because being destitute of means to resist them, and also to revenge the death of his Father Julius, which he much laboured; he might with their forces oppress Cassius and M. Brutus, and as occasion fell out, deal with them being severed. This League was solemnly confirmed by a bloody Proscription immediately following. Wherein to be revenged on their enemies, they betrayed their friends. A lamentable and ruthless time, good and bad, rich and poor, being alike subject to the slaughter. Now was the time of Julius Cæsars Government thought to be the Golden Age; and every one began to curse Brutus and Cassius as the Authors of these present miseries; whom they but lately honoured as the Restorers of the Common liberty. Nay the very Kings were deemed tolerable, and such as lived in their dayes, happy. The poor Romans had not changed the Tyranny, but the Tyrants: Yea, they had three for one into the bargain. Such is the condition of us men, that we know not our own happiness in the fruition, but the want. Two of these Triumvirs glutted themselves with blood, taking pride in hearing the lamentable cries and groans of the People. Augustus on the contrary, shewed himself much grieved at this barbarous cruelty; so that his consent seemed rather forced then voluntary. But this Proscription, though in it self cruel and tyrannical, produced some good and profitable effects in the Republick. For when by this Proscription and the ensuing Civil War, the stoutest of the Nobles and Commons were made away, few being left which durst endeavour to recover the old Liberty; Augustus did the more easily establish his Monarchy, and restore peace to the City. Moreover the prosecution of this cruelty so incensed the people against Antony and Lepidus, that Augustus, whom most held excusable, found them always his fast friends, if not for love to him, yet in spite to them.

9. But to proceed; Antony and Augustus leaving the guard of the City to Lepidus, with joyned forces march against Brutus and Cassius, both overthrown by Antony; whom AUGUSTUS did therefore put upon that service, as well to diminish Antony's forces, as to keep his own entire. As for him-himself, either he in policy suffered himself to be driven out of the field by Brutus, to make Antony more work; or else indeed durst not abide the Battell. Such end had Brutus and Cassius, two men whom fortune seemed to be in love with on the sudden; and did as suddenly forsake them. Brutus the more accomplished man; Cassius the more expert Souldier. I pass over AUGUSTUS Wars in Italy, Antony in Asia, the discontents between them; and their reconciliation by the means of Octavia, sister to the one, and wife to the other Emperor. As also how joyning forces together to oppress Sexsus; then Lording it over the Sea, and proud with the conquest of Sicily; they received him into the Consulship, and joyned the Island of Sardinia to his other conquests. To recompence which kindness, Sexsus invited the two Generals aboard his Admiral Galley; and after a bountiful entertainment, returned them safe to their Camps. I scarce have ever heard of so great an over-sight among so many able Politicians. And much I marvel with my self, upon what confidence AUGUSTUS and Antony durst so far trust their persons to a reconciled Enemy: or oh what reason Sexsus having both of them in his power, would let slip so slightly that advantage, greater than which was never offered to a discontented and ambitious person. This I am sure of, that he afterward repented it; and could have wished that he had hearkened to the voice of Menas his old servant, who had perswaded him to make his best of that opportunity. The Kings of France and Arragon, of old Enemies made new Friends, had the like interview at Savona: which that notable Historiographer and States-man Guicciardini describeth with much wonder and commendation. Yet in the like case, have many, and as I think worthily condemned Lewis the 11. of France, and Charles of Burgundie, the Arch-politicians of those dayes; in that Lewis at Peronne put himself into the hands of Charles his Enemy, who also after a short restraint, dismissed him.

10. These solemn expressions of amity between the three Generals being thus ended, and Antony gone for Egypt, AUGUSTUS then began to contrive his establishment in the State, though with the ruine of his Colleague. He beginneth first with Sexsus, having by gifts and promises drawn Maximus unto his side; who by reason of his inwardness with his Master, knew most of his designs. By the directions of this Menas, and the assistance of Lepidus, he quickly overthrew Sexsus; who flying death in Europe by the hand of AUGUSTUS, found it in Asia; by the command of Antony. After this victory, AUGUSTUS, either having or pretending a quarrel against Lepidus, entred into his Camp, seizeth his person, and depriving him of all honours, confineth him to Rome. A man that half against his will, stumbling upon the Government, had beyond any desert of his, enjoyed ten years continuance of Empire and prosperity. An action of a very high nature, and such as AUGUSTUS durst not have ventured on, if Antony had been in Italy. He therefore advisably removed him out of his way, before he would attempt the same. It hath been ever a chief Maxim in Court-policy, to remove that out of the way, under pretence of some honourable charge, whom we intend either to cast from his present honours, or else to make less potent with Prince and People. For which cause also AUGUSTUS perswaded Antony's absence from the City, to bring him at the last into disrepute and contempt. For well he knew that his dorage on Cleopatra, could not but draw him into many inconveniences; neither could his neglecting the State, to riot with his Leumann, be other than distasteful to the Lords and People. Next, he commanded his sister Octavia to leave her husband Antony's house; yet privately he perswaded her to live there still, and bring up his children; that so the Romans, seeing her noble demeanour and love to her husband, might the more heartily detest him; who so ignobly and unkindly had rejected her. To add more fuel to this flame of hatred, he readeth Antony's Will unto the people, in which many of the Roman Provinces were bequeathed to Cleopatra's children, and other things ordained to the common prejudice. Antony likewise preferred many Bills against AUGUSTUS, as that he had deposed Lepidus from the Triumvirate; that he had divided Italy amongst his own Souldiers only; that he had not restored the ships borrowed to make War against Sexsus.

11. These discontents seconded with an ambitious hope of prevailing, made them both resolute to refer all to the decision of a Battell. Antony had a Fleet consisting of 500 ships, high built, and trimmed up rather for a Triumph than a Fight. His Land Forces consisted of 160000 Foot, and 12000 Horse. AUGUSTUS had the like number of Horsemen, 80000 Foot, and 250 good Men of War, snug and close, built more for use then ostentation. The Rendezvous is Actium, a place seeming to be marked out for notable designs: here being fought also in our Fathers dayes, that famous battell, wherein the Venetians gave the World to understand, that the Turk Forces by Sea were not invincible. Antony was on the Offensive side, and therefore much doubted whether it were better to give the Onset by Sea or by Land. Cleopatra, whose words were Oracles, perswaded him to the Sea-fight; not that she thought it more safe, but that if Antony lost the day, she might with more facility escape: To this resolution, when most of the Captains had for fear agreed; one of the old Souldiers thus bluntly gainesaid it. "What a miserable security art thou possessed with, most noble Emperor? Where is that ancient fore-sight wherewith thou hast formerly prevented all disasters, and turned the Enemies devices on their own heads? Consider with thy self, most noble General, what uncertain friends the Wind and Sea are? To how fickle an Element thou dost trust thy fortunes? Let the Egyptians and Phœnicians, old Mermaids, born and nurt up in the Sea, follow this kind of Warfare. But let us thy true Roman spirits trie our valour on the firm Land, and there fight for thy Empire and our own Lives. Perhaps thou dost mistrust our faith; Look here, Antony, (with that he opened his bosome) and thou shalt see many an honourable scar got in thy service. We are now too old to learn new Treasons: Alter therefore thy resolution, and to please a woman cast not away so many of thy faithful Followers." Certainly the irresistible powers of Heaven when they decree a mans destruction; destruction, overthrow those Counsels by which he should escape it. Antony turneth a deaf ear to this Souldiers wholesome advice, and borrowing from Cleopatra two or three kisses (as if from the Fountain of her lips he had derived all his courage) without any more ceremony prepareth himself unto the battel.

12. AUGUSTUS on the other side, seeing a necessity of a Sea-fight, was yet in this comforted, that his Vessels were more useful and better manned, though fewer than his Enemies: that his men to him were faithful, and by reason of their many Victories, in good heart: From Antony were daily revolted some Kings and Captains of note, to the great encouragement of the one side, and disheartning of the other. The whole charge of the War he committed to M. Vipsanius Agrippa; who failing in no duty of a good Captain, took from his Gallies whatsoever might be impediments to the valiant, or shelter for the cowardly; all that was cumbersome to his own men, or advantageous to the Enemy. Things thus ordered, and the battels ready to joyn, Augustus Caesar standing where he might see and be seen of all, is said to make this or the like Oration. "Fellows and Companions in Arms, I suppose it needeth to hearten you, which never were acquainted with fear; or bid you overcome, which never yet knew what it was not to vanquish. Conquest hath alwayes sat upon the edges of your swords, and victory been written in your foreheads. Be not now backward to add this one to your other Triumphs. When after the death of my Father Julius of famous memory, I first dealt in matters of War, I rather found than made you good Souldiers. And during this twelve year service under me, neither have you been wanting in the duty of faithful followers; nor (I hope) of a vigilant and grateful Leader. Sure I am, I expressed my self as far as I could, and more I would, had I been able. Let not the number, nor the greatness of the adverse Gallies any wayes affright you. The hugeness of their Bulks maketh them unapt for employment; and the multitude, one clogging and hindring the others, may as much further our Victory as theirs. They exceed us in multitudes of Men, we them in number of Souldiers. The meaning of the word Pilot is unknown among them. And for their Mariners, the best of them are but Carriers, Reapers, and Harrow-men, raked out of the field; the rest the excrement of common Prisons, wherewith their Vessels are loaded, not manned. The General is indeed a fit Captain for such a selected Company. It is the same Antony whom you once drove out of the Field, before Mutina. I verily persuade my self, that neither he dares think of recovering, or you of losing your former glories. It is the same Antony, who being shamefully chased out of Parthia; onely in that he was not vanquished, proclaimed himself Victor. It is the same Antony, who intended to make Rome subject to the Egyptians; and to distribute the Provinces purchased with the blood and vertue of our Ancestors, amongst Israel and her fellow Chamber-maids. Nay indeed, it is not Antony at all, but the shadow only of that substance, which now is hid in Cleopatra's Cabbins. Courage then brave men of Arms; be, as you have still been, Conquerours. To speak more, were to detain you from Victory. Only this, Call to mind your ancient valour. Remember that I am Caesar, you Romans."

13. This Speech animated the new Souldiers, and confirmed the old; so that with a general acclamation they gave the assault. Death, wounds, and blows, dished in divers fashions, and served in by several men, were the best delicacies prepared for these unwelcome visitants. Cleopatra beholding the Battel, and doubting the success, through the thickest of Antony's Fleet, made away with the 60. Gallies appointed for her Guard. This disorder made the breach, at which the Victory entred. Antony seeing her flight, left his Squadron also; and being taken into her Galley, hoysed sail for Egypt: Herein playing the part of a cowardly Souldier, whilst each of his Souldiers executed the Office of a courageous General. For they so absolutely persisted in the fight, that AUGUSTUS was fain to offer them mercy sooner then they would demand it, and divers times before they would accept it. At last they all swore Allegiance unto him. The Victory being thus gotten, AUGUSTUS (no loser of advantages) speedeth into Egypt, which he reduceth into the form of a Province; making the People pay for fine, twenty millions of Gold. By receiving this money, he so weakened them that they had no ability to raise an after-war; and by distributing part of it among his Souldiers, he confirmed them in obedience. As for Antony, he seeing his fortunes desperate, redeemed the honour lost in his life, by a noble and heroic death. And Cleopatra ended her life not long after also. A Woman more well-favoured, than fair; well-spoken, rather than either. Antony's Courtiers had seen many Ladies more lovely, none more prevailing; men being chained to her by the ears, rather than the eyes.

14. I willingly omit AUGUSTUS entry into Rome; as also the state and magnificence of his Triumph. His Victory he used so justly, that none felt the fury of the War, but such as were slain in the Battel. To assure himself of Antony's adherents, was his first care: to which end he burnt in the Common Forum, the Coffers of Antony, unopened; wherein all his Letters from his friends in Rome had been inclosed: well-knowing that as long as any thought themselves suspected Adversaries, they would never shew themselves true Friends. To the Senators and Magistrates he made sumptuous feasts; to the Common People he exhibited magnificent and pleasing Stage-plays; and with all variety of pleasure, banished from both, as well sorrow for the old Persecution, as fear of a new. But this was only as a preparation to his main design. There were two men most dear unto him, and privie to his Counsels, Mecenas and Agrippa; which in the object of their love, differed only in this, Mecenas was a lover of AUGUSTUS, Agrippa of the Emperour. Mecenas was of the rank of Knights, a man of good and bad parts equally compounded. When his business required care, vigilant and circumspect; at leisure time, excessively riotous. Agrippa was the first of his house; a man alike fit for Camp and Counsel; one neither careless of a good name, nor covetous of a great.

For

Augustus.

For although he only was the man which vanquished Sextus, and Antony; yet well skilled in the humours of Princes, he gave Augustus the honour of all his Conquests; making the vertue, not the reward, the end of his actions. So by doing nobly, and speaking modestly of it, he was without envy, but not without glory. With these two AUGUSTUS withdrew into a private Cloister; and then brake unto them in this sort. He made first unto them a long discourse of the Civil Wars; Then added, "That having by his fortune, and the valour of his Souldiers, put an end to the troubles; he was unresolved what to doe; Whether to resign the Empire to the People; or retain it still in his own hands: That in a business of such importance, he durst not rely altogether on his own wisdom; That he had made them his Judges, as men that could speak soundly, and durst speak freely: That he knew them to have more care of his honour, than profit; but of the Common-wealth, more than both: That his Counsels, which course soever he took, would not be by them eliminated. He therefore intreated them to consider what was to be done, and to give up their opinions in it."

15. Agrippa after a short silence thus began. "I know, thou canst not but marvel, O Caesar, that I who under thine Empire, am sure to be beyond precedent exalted; should persuade thee to live private. But I esteem more thy honour, than my profit; the publick good, than my particular preferment. And yet perhaps my Counsel shall be as profitable, if not as plausible as the contrary. I know thee to be no way delighted with lies and flattery; and will therefore deal with thee freely and plainly. Thou hast indeed put a period to the Civil Wars; but to what end, unless thou dost restore unto the Common-wealth that Liberty for which the Wars were raised? What benefit can the people reap from thy Victory, if thou dost use it only as an instrument, for their greater bondage? Dost thou think that the Romans having so many hundred years maintained their Liberty, will now be willing to forgo it? No, Caesar, no; Flatter not thy self with these hopes. Marius the younger, and Sertorius, were quickly cut off, when their ends were once known; and Julius thy Father of happy memory, did not long live, after his actions seemed to bring the Common Liberty in hazard. And shall we think that there is no true Roman spirit surviving? No Brutus living to attempt the like against thee? Believe me Caesar, believe me, it is far better not to meddle with the Empire at all, than to be forced to abandon it. But say Divine Providence will so protect thee, that thou mayest out-live such practices; shalt thou also not out-live thy glories? This present age perchance will not censure thine actions, because it dares not: But Posterity, free from all respects of love or hatred, cannot but call them into question, and brand thy enterprise with Ambition, and perhaps Tyranny. If thy deligins prosper, they will judge thee to have risen unjustly; if otherwise, to have fallen deservedly. How much better then were it, now when thine honour is without blemish, and thy reputation untainted, to resign thy authority. Indeed when Sextus lorded it over the Sea, and Antony over Egypt, it might have been thought want of spirit, to have deposed thy self from the Government. But now to do it, when thou art without Rival in the Empire; now, when thou art sole Commander of the Worlds Forces; now when the People and Senate lie prostrate at the feet of thy mercy; were to strike dumb detraction, and to make future Ages admire thy Temper. Thou art at this present the joy and comfort of the World; there is wanting to thee neither Wealth nor Fame. Here then fix thy foot. For go but one step beyond this Non ultra, and thou wilt run into a boundless Ocean of perils, which have no end, but the end of thy life and reputation."

16. "Not so, excellent Agrippa, replied Mecenas. I never heard good Pilot finde fault with Sea-room; or of more vessels cast away in the Ocean, than in the Straights, and narrow passages. Our Republick is a Ship fraught with divers Nations. She hath been long tossed on the waves of Civil dissensions, long driven up and down with the Wind of ambition; and there is now no place so fit for her safety, as the unlimited Ocean of one mans power. This Empire at first rising, seemed hot to require a Monarch; but it is now grown too unwieldy, to be without one. Take then upon thee, O Caesar, this Empire; or to say better, do not forsake it. I should never thus advise thee, did I conceive any possible inconveniences. The Senate doth allow thee a competent guard of valiant and faithful Souldiers; whom then shouldst thou fear? Nay, ill may I prosper, if I see any cause of fear, were thy Guard cashiered. Enemies thou hast none. For such as were, are either already slain by thy valour, or made thy fast friends, by thy bounty and clemency. To omit Marius and Sertorius, I will a little touch at thy Father Julius. He too good a Souldier to be a Statist, was too heady and violent in establishing his Government. Nor could he cunningly temporize, and suffer the people insensibly, and by degrees, to drop into bondage; but oppress them all at once. Again, he committed a great Solecism in State, when discharging his Guard, he fought to retain that Empire by fair means, which he had gotten by violence. I know thee, O Caesar, to be of a more wary and cunning behaviour. Learn also to work out thine own safety, by Pompey's misfortunes. He after the finishing of the Pontick War, at Brundisium, disbanded his Army; and thereby merited to be accounted an honest and moderate man. Certainly, he shewed himself in the course of this action, rather virtuous than fortunate or politicke. For presently he began to be contemned, and by his improvident weakening of himself, made an open passage to his own ruine. I commend his modesty, more than his brain; neither did he himself, on better considerations, approve his own doings; and therefore he resolved, had he been Victor in Pharsalia, never to have committed the like oversight. So it is, and so it will fall out with thee, O Caesar, if in this action thou propose him to be thy pattern. It is not safe, Agrippa saith, to take the Empire; less safe it is to refuse it."

Augustus.

"A sated and innative vice it is in man, never to endure that any not above our own rank should over-top us. Rome's second founder Camilus; Scipio, that scourge of Carthage, were disgraced; and M. Cæcilianus banished by our Ancestors: only because their worth had lifted them above the ordinary pitch of Subjects. Do not thou hope to fare better than thy Predecessors. Heretofore, perchance, thou mightest have sought the Empire, to satisfy thy ambition. The Empire must now be thy refuge and Asylum. Credit me, the Lords of the Senate, after so many years of Obedience, know not how to Govern; neither canst thou having so long been a Governor, learn Obedience. True it is, that in matters of domestical business, a man may stop and desist where he will: But in the getting of an Empire, there is no mean between the death of an Enemy and the life of a Prince. Thou hast already gone too far to retire. Now thou must resolve to be Cæsar or nothing. To say more were superfluous. Thine own discretion will suggest unto thee better Arguments. Only this, I know that thou hast in thee too much Julius, not to be an Emperor.

17. AUGUSTUS seemed to incline to this latter opinion, whether moved with Mecenas Orations, especially his instance in Pompey; or that he was before resolved to follow that course, is uncertain. Howsoever, seeming with great attention to observe their speeches, and gathering their several reasons and motives together; he made this reply. "A most hard thing it is, for a divided mind to make a well-joyn'd Answer. Divided I am, and troubled between your two opinions; loth to follow either, since in so doing I must offend one. Yet since there is a necessity of Resolution, I intend, though I like well of thy advice, Agrippa; to follow thine, Mecenas. In doing which, I am but an instrument of the Destinies, to put their wills in execution. Often have I heard my Father Octavius report, how Nigidius, famous for his skill in Judiciary Astrology, told him once in open Senate, "That he had begotten an Emperor for the Romans. As also, how M. Cicero, so renowned for Wit and Eloquence, dreamed, that he saw Jupiter place me on the top of the Capitol, with a Whip in mine hand. Certainly, if the Powers of Heaven promise me so great an Empire; I will not be wanting to my self; but will add by my industry, to their influence. To further my designs, I do desire you, nay I conjure you both, that as you have been ever ready in your Counsels; so you would not now be backward in any necessary assistance. This said, they presently enter into a new conference, how to manage a business of this weight; what Senators to acquaint with their intent; how to dispose of the Army, not yet cashiered: with what Plummet it were best to found the minds of the common people, and to oblige all forts unto him. This Consultation ended, AUGUSTUS continued his affability to the People, and respect to the Nobles. An opportunity he had to express himself to both. There was at that time a Famine, which shrewdly raged among the Commons. To the poorer sort, he distributed Corn, gratis; to others at a mean price. Riches and honours he communicated to both forts; the better to wipe out of their memories, the ancient freedoms. Such parts of the City as were destroyed by casualty of fire, ruined by length of time, or defaced during the Civil Wars, he re-edified. Houses of Common-Assemblies he repaired; Temples, consecrated to the gods, he spared no cost to adorn and beautify. And finally, to freely diffused his bounty, that there was no part or member of the City which had not some taste of it. Next, he dismissed his Souldiers, assigning them Lands and habitations in divers parts of Italy: That so the People might conceive his Resignation to be real; and yet, if need were, his forces might be quickly re-assembled. Nor were Agrippa and Mecenas wanting for their parts, to promote the cause: but carefully acquainted some of the Senate with it, who stood well affected to them; and cunningly prepared others, who had stood indifferent.

18. The foundation thus laid, and the Senate sate, AUGUSTUS rose from his seat, and spake to this, or the like effect. "When I consider with my self the infinite extent of the Roman Empire; I protest I stand at a maze: marvelling how such, as heretofore have raised combustions in the State, durst undertake the sole administration of it. What Nation in the World hath not either begged their Peace at our Gates; or felt the fury of our Wars at their own? What Countreys have we not harried with Fire and Sword; making the rising and setting of the Sun the bounds of our Dominions? It must questionless proceed from an over-weening conceit in them, of their own abilities; who thought themselves so fit to undergo that burden, which none but the immortal gods can carry. Of my self I will not say much. Only, I hope I may say with modesty, that I am not inferior to Cinna, nor it may be to Sylla: Yet have I found in my self, by late experience, how unable I was to manage the affairs of State, even then when I had two Conditors. There is no Atlas of strength sufficient, to bear up this Heaven; No Star of influence sufficient, to animate this Sphere; No one form of virtue sufficient, to actuate this matter. Neither indeed is it fit, that the Republick which ought to be immortal, should depend only on the life and welfare of one man. There never was, since the beginning of time, a City replenished with greater store of worthy and able men, either to consult or execute. Never was there seen so grave and discreet a Consistory; Never so many of both sorts, so fit to govern. I have by your Directions, and the Valour of your Souldiers, put an end to all homebred quarrels. I have been your instrument to reduce Peace internal and external, to your City; and desire now no other Guerdon, or recompense for any former services, than a quiet and a private life; free from all such dangers and inconveniences, as are inseparably annexed to the Sovereignty. Now therefore, and may my action be auspicious and fortunate to my Countrey, do I resign my authority; committing my self, and the Common-wealth into the hands of the Senate and People of Rome.

19. This Oration ended, there followed a soft and silent buzzing in the house. Some supposed this speech speech not to have so much truth, as art and cunning: yet smothered their conceits for fear of after-claps. Others were creatures of his own making; and they hoping to rise in the fall of their Countrey, would not hear of a Resignation. Some few of the wiser sort thought it not expedient, to put the Reins again into the hands of the Multitude. The rest out of a sluggish and phlegmatick Constitution, chose rather the present estate with security, than to strive to recover the old with danger. All therefore with a joyn't consent proclaim him sole Emperor; and solemnly entreat him to save the Common-wealth, otherwise running to inevitable ruine. He for a while, as vainly denied to accept the Government, as they vainly persisted to desire him. At last, wearied with the clamours of all in general, and importunity of some in particular; he by little and little yielded to their requests, taking upon him the Empire for ten years, with this Proviso; that if before that time expired, he could fully settle and order the present State, he would give up his charge. This he gave out, not with a purpose of performance; (for at the end of every Decennium he renewed his Lease of the Government;) But that the people seeing so high a possibility of regaining their Liberties, might not practise against him. Whereas, had he for term of life received the supreme Authority, he had no doubt hastned his own overthrow. For well he knew, that not the Title of Dictator, but the Epithete Perpetual, was the destruction of CÆSAR: And yet a great respect was had also in the choice of the Title. The name of King he refused, as being odious unto the Citizens. Neither would he be called Romulus, though he much desired it; lest they should suppose that he did affect the Tyranny. When the people called him Dictator, he rent his Garments; desiring them to discharge him of a name so hated; and being once called Lord, (Domini) he forbade also that Title by publick Edict. Princeps Senatus was the only Title he admitted: well knowing, that the like glorious attributes were heaped on his Father Julius by them which least loved him, only to this end, that growing more and more into hatred, he might the sooner be dispatched. Nor was he ignorant that the Common people led more by appearances, than truth; discerned names more plainly than executions: and that the only course to make greatness stand firmly, was to receive extraordinary power under a Title not offensive. The name also of AUGUSTUS conferred upon him by the Senate, (as if there had been something in him more than mortal) he refused not; as a Title expressing more dignity and reverence than authority. And having pleased himself in the choice of his Title, he next proceeded to the establishment of his power, which he thus pursued.

20. When first at the hands of the Lords of the Senate, he had for ten years received the Government; there was appointed unto him two Cohorts of Praetorian Souldiers for the guard of his person; to whom the Senate allowed the double wages of a Legionary souldier, to make them the more vigilant and heedful in their charge. Over these he appointed two Prefects or Governors, (Captains of the Guard we may best term them.) To commit the charge to one only, might breed danger; to more, confusion. Agrippina, to settle Nero in the Empire, prevailed with Claudius, to make Burrus, whom she had at her devotion, the sole Captain: and Nymphidius, fallen from his hopes of setting Galba besides the quishon; desired the command of the Guard, as the next step to Sovereignty. In choice of these Captains, he observed two Rules. First, he ever chose them, ex ordine Equestris, not Senatorial; lest that so high a dignity joyned to so high a birth, might startle their resolutions to some designs against his quiet. Secondly, he made choice of two such, as were of contrary humours, and somewhat at odds; that so the ill intents of the one (if they should harbour any) might be thwarted and revealed by the other; and both, in a noble emulation, should contend to be most forward in his service. The next course which he took for his own security, was a law he made to curb the wills and attempts of the great ones. For whereas it had been formerly unlawful to question a Bondman, in matters concerning the life and death of his Lord; AUGUSTUS passed an Act, that all such Bondmen should be first sold to him, or the Common-wealth. By means whereof he kept the Lords, before presuming on the secrecies of their slaves, from all close and private Conspiracies against him. Having thus strengthened his person, he assumed to himself the Imperial, Censorial, and Tribunitian authority, together with the Sacerdotal dignity. As Emperor and General of the Men of War, he could press Souldiers, raise Taxes, proclaim Wars, make Peace; yea, and put to death the very best and stoutest of the Senators. As Censor, it was in his power to reform corrupt manners, enquire after mens carriages, to take in and put out of the Senate whom he listed; to place and displace the people from a more honourable Tribe, to a less honourable. Yet would he not be called Censor, as a name too inferior; but accepted the Prerogatives of it; after the surrendry of Manlius, and his associate; two men so unfit for that Magistracy, that they could object no crime to old or young, of which themselves were not guilty. The Tribunitian authority enabled him to hinder any thing attempted against his liking. It preserved his person from all contumely and injury; giving him power to punish, as an execrable person, (yea, and without any formality of the Law) whosoever had offended him either in word or deed. As for the Pontifical Dignity, it made him a little more revered, not more potent. Only it added to his title the title of Pontifex Maximus, or Chief Bishop; and made him of authority amongst the Priests, and in sacred matters, things that concerned Religion. The light of Reason taught him, that it was convenient for him, being a Prince, to have command on all his people; He had been else but half a Monarch, such as some Princes are with us; who quit their Clergy to be governed by a Foreign Head.

21. These several Prerogatives annexed together, seemed not yet sufficient; and therefore he so cunningly dealt with the Senators, that they gave him a general Exemption from the Coactive power of the Law. Which once obtained, he seriously bends his thoughts to settle the Common-wealth; and so to settle it, that by uniting all parties, and giving satisfaction to all Interests, it might not be obnoxious to such frequent and tumultuous alterations, as it had been formerly. But herein, when he Augustus. had consulted the ancient Platforms, he found no small difficulty. The Form described by Plato, shewed rather how a City ought to be governed, than how it may be. Aristotle, though bred in the Free States of Greece, was a friend to Monarchy; but his discourses dark, and speculative, and not easily reduced to practice. Solon afforded the People too much Authority, the Nobles too little, the King none. The old Carthaginian Legislator attributed too much to Riches, too little to Virtue. The Persian Law-makers indulged the King too much, to the Subject nothing. And on the other side, Lycurgus in his modelling of the State of Sparta, ascribed too little to the King, and too much to the Senate. Zaleucus was rather the Author of some particular Lawes, than the Framers of a Commonwealth. Phœbus, and Hippadamus, as unimitable altogether as Plato. Seeing therefore that none of the old Patterns did come home to his purpose; and withall considering with himself, that the unmixt Forms of Rule were not equally ballanced, and by consequence subject unto change: he resolved to frame his Commonwealth out of the perfections of the three good Forms, their imperfection being rejected, reserving to himself the Supreme Majesty, to the Senate eminent Authority, to the People convenient Liberty, all in a just and fit proportion. And to say truth, he did so mix the Sovereignty of one, with the Liberty of all; that both the Lords and People, without fear of bondage or sedition, enjoyed their accustomed Freedoms. The Consuls and Nobles of the City assembled as formerly they used; matters of State they handled by themselves; Ambassadors of foreign Nations they heard, and dispatched. The Commons assembled in the Comitia, to enact Lawes and elect Magistrates, as in the free Commonwealth. Yet so that nothing was done without the consent and privy of the Prince, who for the most part, nominated the successive Magistrate, leaving the confirmation of him to the people. So that the change, as he contrived it, was not violent and at once, but by degrees, and by the silent approbation of both Estates, as seeming to consist more in the alteration of the Magistrate, than of the Lawes.

22. But (to proceed more particularly) the first care he took, was to confirm Religion in the same State in which he found it. I mean Religion, as the Romans used the word, for those particular, though Idolatrous Forms of Worship, which to their several gods had been used among them. This, though he might have changed, as the Pontifex Maximus, or chief Bishop of the City; yet very wisely he forbore it. It is not safe for Princes that are seated in a long descent of Government, to be too active, in such changes: But it is dangerous to attempt it in a green State, and in an Empire not well quieted, and inured to bondage. Men are more sensible of the smallest alterations in the Church, than greater changes in the State, and raise more frequent broils about it. The Romans specially were exceeding tender in this point. The ancient Ædiles formerly received it into their charge, that they permitted no external either gods or Ceremonies, to be introduced into the City. And by Æmilius it was enacted for a Law, That none should offer sacrifice in any publick place, after a new and Foreign fashion. Excellent therefore was the counsel which Mæcenas gave him, when he first undertook the Empire, viz. "That he should follow constantly the Religion which he found established, and compell others also to do the like. For Foreign and strange Rites (saith he) will offend the people, work many inconvenience alterations in the Civil State; yea and most likely will occasion many both seditions and conspiracies. Words which he spake not to the air, but to a Prince exceeding apprehensive of the best advice. Nor did AUGUSTUS ever shew himself more careful in any one Art of Empire, than he did in this. That which Mæcenas noted, we finde true in these later Ages; in times more skillful of obedience, than the most quiet hour of AUGUSTUS Government. No one thing more hath caused so frequent and so general Rebellions in the States of Christendome, than alterations of this nature. I cannot therefore but commend it, as a pious resolution in a late mighty Monarch: Better some few corruptions should be suffered in a Church, than still a Change.

23. Religion thus established, in the next place the welfare of the whole Empire consisted chiefly in reforming of the City; from which, as from the heart, life was conveyed to all the Provinces abroad. And in the City the corruption was most apparent in the Senate it self. With them therefore he begetteth, well knowing that crimes in men of eminent place end not in themselves; but by degrees become diffused among their Clients and Followers. Now in the Senate were many and deservetless men, who had been taken into it during the Civil Wars; as they could court the People, and humour such as were most potent. Of these he expelled none by his own power; but making a speech to them in the Senate, of the ancient order and present confusion of the house, he first exhorted them to look back on their former lives, and to judge of their own abilities and merits, for so honourable a room. Then he desired some of them to pick out such among them, as were in disposition fawning, and in life faulty, but loth to conceive so ill of their own actions; which they did accordingly. Yet as it often happeneth, that the great Thief leadeth the less to the Gallies; and as Commynes observeth, that after the Battel of Monliherry, Offices were taken from many for flying away, and conferred on such as ran ten miles beyond them: So remained many in the Senate, neither less vicious, nor less violent; only more potent to maintain their doings, than some others whom they had removed. AUGUSTUS therefore joyning to him Agrippa, proceedeth to a new review: And certainly it much concerned him in the settling of his affairs, that none should have a voice in that famous Council, but such as were of able judgements, honest repute, and well-affected to his Service and the Commonwealth. An enterprise which he esteemed so dangerous, that he permitted entrance to no Senator till he were searched: himself wearing a Brigandine under his Gown; and being environed with ten of the most courageous and best beloved of the whole company. Such as he found in either kinde inexcusable, he discharged from their attendance; electing such in their places, which were either ennobled for their wisdom, of noted moderation, or otherwise strong in their de-

Augustus. dependants. Yet so that greatness of Revenue was esteemed neither a fit Patronage for any, if they were offensive; nor a just cause to challenge interest in the house. Such of them as were rich rather in the gifts of the minde, than those of fortune, he relieved with honourable Penions: and finally he bestirred himself so resolutely, that all confessed that they had need of such a wife Physician, to cure that dull Consumption, whereinto the Commonwealth was fallen.

24. In other things he seldom did proceed against them as of himself; but when that any of them had conspired his ruine, he referred them to the judgement of their fellowes. And this he did partly to reserve unto the Court the ancient Prerogative; partly not to be Judge and party in his own cause: but principally following the example of his Father Julius, who counterfeiting a wretched contempt of his adversaries, used when he was least suspected, under-hand, and by publick Officers, to work their destruction. Many also of them whom the Senate had condemned, he would freely pardon: Conceiving truly, that the questioning of men of high calling, would produce as much terror, though it argued not so much rigour as the punishment. Yet if extremity of law was used towards some few, it was to settle quietness in the whole; and as it were a particular blood-letting for the general health. Those who had followed the factions of Brutus and Antony, he forgave freely. And not so only, but by manifesting his words by his deeds, and adding trusts and honours to his pardons; he made his Chair of State more settled, and immoveable. So Cæsar by erecting the slain and broken Images of Pompey, made his own statues stand more firmly. But the chief Act by which he bridled the Nobles, was an Edict by him promulgated, forbidding any of them, his leave not granted, to travel out of Italie. For well he knew, that an Empire unsettled, and Provinces not quieted; the preference and authority of men of that rank, might raise greater troubles, than could be easily suppressed. Examples he wanted not, that especially of Cato; who after the overthrow of Pompey, stirred such a War against Cæsar in Africa, that he never bought Victory at a dearer rate. Yet not altogether to imprison them, he licensed them at their pleasure, to visit Sicilia, and Gaul Narbonnoise, Provinces close to the Continent of Italie, altogether unfurnished for Wars; and indeed such, as by reason of the variety of pleasures in them used, were more likely to weaken their mindes, than to arm their bodies.

25. Now to give the Senate some sweet meat to their fowre sawce; he as much honoured and revered that Order, as ever it was in the Free-State: submitting himself to their Judgements, and appearing of his own accord, at most of their dayes of Session. Out of those he chose 15 alterable every half year, to be of his Privy Council; but then changing them for others: that so all of them might participate that honour; and yet none of them be acquainted with too many of his secrets. At his entrance into the Senate, he used courteously to salute the Lords; and so likewise at his departure. He knew full well that it was noted for great pride in his Father Julius, so much to sleight the Lords of that House, as he always did: never making to them any obeysance, no not then, when they came to tell him what honours were decreed unto him. This Reformation of the great Ones, soon made the lower sort more careful; both to observe good order, and to learn obedience. Yet did not AUGUSTUS refer all to President, but somewhat to Precept. The Roman Knights he enforced to yield an account of their lives; a course full of health and wisdom: Idleness being the root of all private vices, and publick disorders. To the Commons in their Comitia and other meetings, he prescribed Lawes and Orders as himself listed. The old authority of the Tribunes, dashed in the Dictatorship of Sylla, he would not restore. He suffered them to intercede for the People, but not to prefer or hinder any Bill, to the advancement or the prejudice of their Estate. Without this curb, the Common sort would never have suffered him to sit fast in the Saddle. For had the people had their Tribunes, and had the Tribunes had their ancient dignity and power, which they had usurped; there had been little or no hope of altering the form of Government. So different are the ends of the Common-people, especially if nuzled in a factious Liberty, from the designs of Sovereign Princes.

26. The City thus reformed in the principal errors and defects of it; he again exhibiteth unto them divers pleasures; as shewes of Fencers, Stage-plays, Combats of wilde beasts, publick Dancings, with variety of other delightful spectacles. And this as well to breed in them a good conceit of the change; as fearing lest their cogitations, for want of other objects, would fix themselves upon his actions, and the old freedoms. And therefore when some of his more severe and rigid Counsellors advised him to interdict all such publick pastimes, alleging, that the meetings of the people at those sports, and in so great numbers might at last end in some great tumult and sedition to the endangering of his person, and destruction of his whole Estate; it was thus over-ruled by Mæcenas (his most trusty Favourite) Ex-pedit tibi, O Cæsar, plebem sic occupatam esse, that it best agreed with his affairs, to have the minds of the people taken up with these sports and pastimes, by which being sweetened and appeased, they were the less sensible of the yoke he had put upon them. But as for Horse-races, Tilts, and Tournaments, as he gladly cherished them, so he permitted them only to the Inhabitants of Rome: That so that City being the Seat-Town of his Empire, might be stored with good Horses, and expert Riders. Such of the Commons as were behinde hand, he relieved: and when that many of them had made him Heir to their goods; he well knowing that no good Father did appoint to his Heir any Prince but a Tyrant, presently restored to the Children of the deceased the whole Patrimony. An action truly worthy of AUGUSTUS; as true a Guardian of Orphans, as a Father of his Countrey. Such Princes as gape covetously after other mens possessions, seldom enjoy the benefit of their own. The Treasures of Kings are then greatest, not when their own Coffers are full only, but their Subjects rich. Yet one thing more he seemed to leave unto the people, which they thought most pleasing; Liberty of Speech.

Augustus. Wherein sometimes they were so licentious, that they spared not Agrippa himself; so potent with the Emperor. But he, good man, never using the Princes favour to the prejudice of any, seemed not to mark their taunts and slanders; whether with greater moderation or wisdom, I cannot tell. Neither did AUGUSTUS scape their foolish Pasquils and infamous Libels. All which he winked at, knowing that contumelies of that nature slighted and contemned, soon vanish of themselves; but if repined and stormed at, seem to be acknowledged. A temper which he learnt of his Father Julius, who was perfect at it. And certainly it was a notable point of wisdom in both of them. It is the misery of the best Princes, even when they do well to be ill spoken of. And therefore many times such follies are with more policy dissembled than observed, by the greatest Kings.

27. As for this Lavishness of the tongue, it is a humour that springeth for the most part, rather from a delight in prating, than any malice of the heart: and they which use it are more troublesome than dangerous. Julius feared not the fat men, but the lean and spare. And so AUGUSTUS thought, that not men liberal of speech, but silent, close, and sparing of their words, were most likely to raise tumults. Moreover, as long as the Common People retained this Liberty of speech, they were the less sensible of the loss of Liberty in State. Whereas in the days of Domitian, when not only they were prohibited to commune together, but even their secret sighs and tears were registered, then began they to look back with a serious eye on the old and Common Liberty. Neglect is the best remedy for this Talking vein. When the humour is spent, the People will cease on their own accords: till then, no forces can compell them. Tacitus taxeth Vitellius of great folly, for hoping by force to hinder the continual reports of Vespasians revolt; that being the only way to increase, not diminish the rumour. And as much he extolleth (I will not say how fitly) the Reign of Prince Nerva; wherein it was lawful for the subject to think what he would, and speak what he thought.

28. These courses though he took to rectifie the Senate, and content the people, yet he stayed not here. There were too many of both sorts, dangerous and unquiet spirits, who stomached his proceedings; and under pretence of the ancient Liberty, were apt to any bold attempt, and sudden alteration. These as he winked at for the present, so he employed them (as occasion served) in his foreign Wars. Wherein he followed the example of his Father Julius, who when his Souldiers had displeased him, in their Mutinies and Tumults, would lead them presently unto some desperate and dangerous service: So weakening both his Foes which lay next unto him, and punishing those Souldiers which had disobeyed him. For though AUGUSTUS had thrice shut the Temple of Janus, and cherished Peace, no Emperor more, of so large a Territory: yet when he saw his times, and that mens mindes were active, and their thoughts disquieted; he could find presently occasion for some new employment. In this a Body Politick may be compared most fitly to the Body Natural. When we are full of blood, and our spirits boyling, there is not any Physick better then Phlebotomy. But if a vein be broken in us, and we bleed inwardly, our estate commonly is dangerous, and almost incurable. So Princes, when their people are tumultuous and apt to mischief; or that their thoughts are working, and hearkning after action: do commonly employ them in some service far from home; that there they may both vent their Anger, and employ their Courage. For let them stay at home to confirm their practices, and grow at last into a Faction; the State will suffer in it, if it be not ruined. We cannot have a fairer instance of this truth, than the proceeding of our fifth Henry, and the times next following: Whose foreign Wars kept us all quiet here at home, wasted those humours, and consumed those fiery spirits; which afterwards, the wars being ended, inflamed the Kingdom.

29. But his main work was to content the Souldiers, and to make them sure. Some of which he dispersed as before I said, all about Italy, in 32 Colonies; as well for the defence of the Countrey, as for their more speedy reassembly, if need should require. Abroad amongst the Provinces were maintained upon the common charge 23 Legions with their aids; besides 10000 of his Guard, and those which were appointed for the bridling and safety of the City. As to all of them, he shewed an excellent thankfulness for their faithful services; so in particular to Agrippa, and to one other, whose name the Histories of that Age have not remembered. This latter had valiantly behaved himself at the battel of Actium: and being summoned to appear before the Lords of the Senate, in a matter which concerned his life, cried to AUGUSTUS for succour; who assigned him an Advocate. The poor fellow not contented with this favour, baring his breast, and shewing him the marks of many wounds; These (quoth he) have I received AUGUSTUS in thy service, never supplying my place by a Deputy. Which said, the Emperor descending to the Bar, pleaded the Souldiers cause, and won it. Never did Sovereign Prince, or any that command in Chief, lose any thing by being bountiful of favours to their men of War. For this act quickly spreading it self over all the Provinces, did so indeed him to the Military men, that they all thought their services well recompensed, in his graciousness to that one man. And now were they so far given over to him, that the honours conferred on Agrippa, could not increase their love; well it might their admiration. Agrippa was of a mean and common Parentage. But supplying the defects of his Birth, with the perfections of his Mind; he became very potent with AUGUSTUS; who not only made him Consul, but his companion in the Tribunitian authority, and Provoost of the City. So many titles were now heaped on him, that Mecenas perswaded the Prince, to give him his Daughter Julia to Wife: affirming it impossible for Agrippa to live safe, considering how open new Creatures lie to the attempts of malicious men, unless he were ingrafted into the Royal Stem of the Cæsars. On which cause questionless, for the stronger establishment of his new Honours; Sejanus afterwards attempted, but not with the like success, the like match with Livia, Tiberius Daughter-in-Law.

30. The Senate, People, and Men of War, thus severally reduced to a Mediocrity of power and content; the Augustus. the next labour is to alter the old, and establish a new Government of the City it self. To effect which, he dashed all former Laws, by which the Allies and Confederates of the State were made free Denizens of the Town. That he conceived to be a way to draw the whole Empire into one City; and by the monstrous growth and increase of that, to make poor the rest. Therefore this privilege he communicated unto a few only: partly that in the times of dearth, the City might not so much feel the want of sustenance; and partly that so ancient an honour might not be disesteemed; but principally lest Rome replenished with so huge a multitude of stirring and unruly spirits, should grow too headstrong to be governed in due order. The greatest and most populous Cities, as they are prone unto faction and sedition; so is the danger greatest, both in it self, and the example, if they should revolt. This provident course notwithstanding, there were in Rome men more than enough; and among them not a few male-contented and murmurers at the present state, such as contemned the Consul, and hated the Prince. To keep these in compass, AUGUSTUS (it being impossible for him to be still resident at Rome, and dangerous to be absent) constituted a Provoost of the City for the most part chosen out of the Senators: assigning him a strength of 6000 men, called Milites Urbani, or the City-souldiers. To him he gave absolute and Royal authority, both in the Town and Territory neer adjoining, during his own absence. To him were appeals brought from the other Magistrates; and finally to his Tribunal were referred all causes of importance, not in Rome only, but the greatest part of Italy. Mestalla was the first Provoost, but proof being had of his insufficiency, the charge was committed to Agrippa: who did not only settle and confirm the City, but did the best he could to free the adjoining parts of Italy from Thieves and Robbers; and stopped the courses of many other troublers of the present State. And yet he could not with that power either so speedily, or so thoroughly reform all those mischiefs; which in the late unsettled times were become predominant, as he did desire.

31. It is recorded that in the Civil wars of Marius and Sylla, one Pontius Telesinus of the Marian Faction, told his General, that he did well to scour the Countrey; but Italy would never want Wolves as long as Rome was so fit a Forrest, and so neer to retire unto. The like might have been spoken to Agrippa; That he did well to clear the common Rodes and Passages, but Italy would never want Thieves, whilst Rome was so good a place of Refuge. For though he did, as far as humane industry could extend, endeavour a general Reformation both within the City and without; yet neither could he remedy, nor foresee all mischiefs. Still were there many, and those great disorders committed in the night season; when as no eye, but that to which no darkness is an obstacle, could discern the Male-factors. For in the first Proscription, many men used to walk the streets well weaponed; pretending only their own safety, but indeed it was to make their best advantage of such men, as they met either in unfrequented Lanes and Passages, or travelling as their occasions did direct them, in the Night. To repress therefore the foul insolencies of these Sword-men, AUGUSTUS did ordain a Watch, consisting of 7000 Free-men, their Captain being a Gentleman of Rome. In the day time, the Guard of the Town was committed to the Provoost, and his City Souldiers; These Vigils resting in their standing Camps. In the night season, one part took their stations in the most suspicious places of the City; another, in perpetual motion traversed the streets: the rest lying in the Corps de Garde, to relieve their Companions. By which means he not only remedied the present disorders, but preserved the City from danger of Fire also: Yea and secured himself from all Night-rumults, which carry with them (though but small) more terror and affrightment, than greater Commotions in the day. Never till now were the common people Masters of their own, both Lives and Substance. And now was travel in the Night, as safe, though not so pleasant, as at Noon.

32. The People and City thus settled, his next study is to keep the Provinces in a liking of the Change. But little Rhetorique needed to win their liking, who had long desired the present form of Government: mistrusting the Peoples Regiment, by reason of Noblemens factions, covetousness of Magistrates, the Laws affording no security, being swayed hither and thither by ambition and corruption. These Provinces when he first took the Government, he thus divided. Asia, Africa, Numidia, Beticæ, Narbonensis, Sicilia, Corsica, Sardinia, all Greece, Crete, Cyprus, Pontus, and Bithynia, being quiet and peaceable Provinces, of known and faithful obedience, he assigned unto the Senate. But the new conquered Regions, such as had not digested their loss of liberty, with whom any Rebellion or War was to be feared; he retained under his own command. Such were Tarracensis, Lusitanica, Lugdunensis, Germania, Belgica, Aquitania, Syria, Silicia, Egypt, Dalmatia, Mysia, Pannonia, &c. And this he did, as he gave out, to sustain the danger himself alone, leaving unto the Senate all the sweets of ease: but the truth was, to keep them without Arms, himself always strong and in a readiness. The notable effects of which Counsell did not discover themselves only, by the establishment of the Empire in his own person during life, and the continuance of it in the house of the Cæsars (though men of most prodigious Vices) after his decease: but in some of the Ages following also. For when the Family of the Cæsars was extinct in Nero, the Imperial Provinces being so strong, and perceiving the Consular so weak; assumed to themselves the creating, and establishing of the following Princes. Thus Galba was made Emperor by the Spanish and French Legions, Vitellius by the German, Vespasian by the Syrian and Pannonian: The Consular Provinces never stirring, either to prevent their attempts, or to revenge them. And when they adventured once to advance Gordian to the Throne, all they could do, was but to betray the poor old man and all his Family to a tragick end. And yet he did not so appropriate those Provinces to the Senate, but that they also (as well as those which he reserved unto himself) were specified particularly in his private Register. In which (the better to manage the affairs of the Empire) he had set down what Tributes every of them payed, what Presents they sent.

Augustus. sent in, what Customs in them were levied. That book also comprehended the wealth of the public Treasury, and necessary charge issuing out of it: What number of Citizens and Allies there were in Arms; what strength there was by Sea: with all other circumstances, the extent, strength, riches, and particulars of his estate. Williams of Normandy did the like at his first entrance into England, when he composed that Censal Roll of all this Kingdom, which we call Dooms-day Book, or the Roll of Winton; according unto which, Taxations were imposed, and Aids exacted. The greatest Princes have not thought it a disparagement to be good Husbands; to know the riches of their Crowns, and have an eye to their Intrado.

33. Britain was left out of this Bead-Roll, either because from hence there neither was much hope of profit, nor much fear of hurt; or else because being more desirous to keep than enlarge the Monarchy, he thought it most expedient to confine it within the bounds appointed by Nature. Danubius on the North, Mount Atlas on the South, Euphrates on the East, and the main Ocean on the West, did both bound his Empire and defend it. Some Kingdoms have their limits laid out by Nature, and those which have adventured to extend them further have found it fatal. The Persians seldom did attempt to stretch their Territory beyond Oxus, but they miscarried in the action. And what was that poor River, if compared unto the Ocean? Many who loved allion, or expected preferment by the Wars, incited him unto the conquest and plantation of these Countreys. Affirming, "That the barbarous people were naturally bad Neighbours; and though for the present not very strong, nor well skilled in Arms, yet might a weak Enemy in time gather great strength. That he ought to pursue the War for his Father Julius sake, who first shewed that Island to the Romans: that it yielded both refuge and supply to Malecontents of Gaul, and Enemies in Germany: That he would lose the benefit of a wealthy Countrey, stored with all manner of provision; and the command of a valiant Nation, born (as it were) unto the Wars. That it was an Apostasie from honour, to lie still, and add nothing to the conquest of his Ancestors: That he was in all equity bound as far as in him was, to reduce to Civility from Barbarism, so many proper and able men. But to these motives he replied, "That he had already refused to wage War with the Parthians, a more dangerous neighbour, and far worse enemy than the Britains: That he had waite and desert ground enough in his own Dominions, for many a large Plantation, when he saw it needful: That he had constantly refused, though with great facility he might, to conquer any more of the barbarous Nations: That as in the Natural body, a surfeit is more dangerous than fasting; so in the Body Politick, too much is more troublesome than too little: That the Roman Monarchy had already exceeded the Persian, and Macedonian; and to extend it further, was the next way to make it totter and fall by its own weight. That he had learned in the Fable not to lose the substance by catching at the shadow. And finally, "that many puissant Nations lay in and about Britany, against whom Garrisons must be kept; and he feared the Revenues would not quit the Cost. And so the enterprize of Britain was quite laid aside.

34. For the assurance of the Provinces already conquered, he dispersed into them 23 Legions, with their Aids; whose pay only, besides provision of Corn, and Officers wages, amounting to five Millions and an half of our English pounds, and somewhat more, were so duly paid unto the Armies, that we read seldom in the Histories of that Empire, of any Mutiny among the Souldiers, for want of pay. An happiness whereof these ages have been little guilty. For the amassing of this treasure, and defraying of this charge, AUGUSTUS made not use only of his own Revenue. Wars which are undertaken, and Souldiers that are levied for the common safety, ought in all reason to be maintained on the common purse. The Grandeur and security of an Empire, concerns in all respects, as much the People as the Prince. For which cause he erected an Exchequer in the City, which was called Ærarium militare, or the Souldiers Treasury; whereto the twentieth part of every mans Estate was brought, according to the true and perfect valuation. This was esteemed a heavy burden at the first, and indeed it was, but that the people felt the sweetness and effects of it in the common safety. In that respect, the interest was greater than the principal. Subjects that have a care either of the common peace or honour, will not repine at payments and taxations, though more than ordinary. It is a poor conceit to think that Princes either are able or obliged, to maintain the Wars without assistance from their people: or that the treasures which in these respects they give the King, they do not give unto themselves. I may perhaps repute him for a cunning Sophister, but never for a faithful Subject, which coyns distinctions betwixt the welfare of the King, and the weal of the Kingdome. These Legions he employed as occasion was, either to curb the Natives, or secure the Borders. The Roman Empire seldom had such perfect peace, but that there were employments always for the Souldiers. If that they had in any place a short cessation from the Wars, yet they were not idle. Idleness doubtless is the greatest enemy to Martial Discipline. Therefore he kept them at such times perpetually busied, either in paving Bogs, or in draining Marshes. By means whereof, he made not only many of the Barbarous Countreys, both fruitful in themselves, and profitable to the Chequer: but thereby also he secured his own affairs, and disarmed his enemies. For many times the Barbarous people trusting to such advantages, were apt too often to rebel; and having got themselves within those Mynes and Fastnesses, stood on their Guard, as in some fashionable or defensible Forreys. The surest means to keep a conquered people from all occasion of revolting, is to lay waste their Wood-Lands, and makes all parts passable. The opportunity of a safe retreat, makes not more Theatres than R-bels.

35. Those whom he placed over his Provinces and Armies, he neither would remove under three years Government, nor yet continue after five. A longer stay might teach them too much cunning, Augustus. in practising on the dispositions of the people, and perhaps prompt them to work into the favour of the Natives, and the Men of War; and so at last to establish in themselves a Sovereignty. Cæsar long stay in Gaul, (a second five years being added unto that which was first allowed him) made him so potent with the People, and gracious with the Souldiers, that in the end he brought the Roman Empire under his subjection. And on the other side, to take them from their charges under three years continuance, were to have called them home, before they were well learned in the Customs and the nature of the Provinces; so making them unable to instruct their Successors. As for the men whom he employed in those commands, he culled them always out of the most valiant and upright in the Camp and Senate. A Prince more willing and desirous not to employ men likely to offend, than after the offence to punish and chastise them for it.

36. Besides his forces by Land, he also maintained at Sea two invincible Armadoes. The one lay at Anchor near Ravenna, in the upper Sea, to awe and defend Dalmatia, Crete, Greece, Cyprus, Asia, &c. The other at Misenum in the lower Sea, to protect and keep under Gaul, Spain, Africa, Egypt, Syria, &c. Neither was this the only use of two such puissant Fleets, but in all probability they were to cleanse the Sea of Pirates; to have a care to the conducting of the Tributes and Customs into the Exchequer; and served also for transporting Corn, and other necessary provisions, for the sustenance and relief of the City. In the ensuing Civil Wars, these two Navies proved to be of great importance: The revolt of them giving as great a blow to the one side, as a comfort to the other. The principal assurance of Otho in his Wars, was the immovable fidelity of the Misenian Fleet; and the siding of the other with Vespasian, brake the hearts of Vitellius best followers.

37. Now as he thus strengthened the Provinces in general, so did he cast an especial eye on three particulars, viz. Italy, Gaul, and Egypt. Italy rounded Rome the Metropolis of the Empire; and therefore he ought to be well assured of its good faith and allegiance to him. Nor was he ignorant, that the Bellum Sociale raised by the people of that Countrey, in the Free State, more shook and endangered the Empire, than the Invasions of Pyrrius or Annibal. Therefore as formerly he planted in it two and thirty Colonies, of old and trusty Souldiers, to keep it sure unto himself; so now he did divide it into eleven Regions, each having peculiar Magistrates and Under-Officers. This not so much to ease the City Pretor, although he had employment enough at Rome; but because it was thick set, and as it were overlaid with People, whose rising might endanger the Common-wealth. So by his Colonies he kept a Garrison upon them, as it were, that they could not revolt: and by his Officers and Judiciaries (as I may call them) he set so strait a Watch about them, that they durst not practise.

38. Gaul, now called France, was both a large and fertile Countrey, stored with a people, valiant in all attempts, and in many desperate. A people with which the old Romans fought rather to maintain their own liberty, than to encrease their Dominions; a Tribe or Colony of which had sacked the City of Rome, and endangered the Capitol. A people finally with whom the Romans durst not make war, till they had almost all the residue of the World in subjection. Remembrance of their ancient Reputation, and store of money, might occasion many desperate practices against the quiet of the Empire. The readiest way to keep them in obedience, was to keep them poor: for without wealth high stomachs may well feed on the hope of Liberty, but digest it never. Licinius his freed-man, was the fittest fellow for such an Office, who is presently made the Tauk-master of the Province. The Gauls used to pay a Monthly Tribute, which he much inhauced (besides private and petty means of proling) by making fourteen Moneths in a year. The Solicitors of that people at Rome make complaint to AUGUSTUS. He sometimes yielded unto them, sometimes excused his freed-man; some things he would not know, many he would not believe, others he dissembled. Licinius to make up his peace, sent to the Emperor all his treasure, and that huge Mass of Gold and Silver by those unlawful means heaped up together: which he not only willingly received, but his turn being served, and the Gauls not a little impoverished; he recalled Licinius, and sent Tiberius to settle the Province. So old and common a thing it is with great Princes, to suffer their Vice-Roys, and Under-Officers, to suck like Sponges, the Wealth of the Subject, till they are quite full; and then to squeeze them into their own Coffers.

39. But the Province whose tuition and defence he principally regarded, was Egypt; not so much for the valour and courage of the Inhabitants, as the natural strength and situation of the place. Alexander of Macedon having annexed it to his Empire, never committed the entire Government and Jurisdiction thereof, to one man; fearing lest he presuming on the wealth of the People, and size of the Countrey, would settle the possession in himself. And so AUGUSTUS calling to mind as well the multitude, as the levity and inconstancy of the Natives; that it was very rich in coyn; and the Roman Granary (as serving the City four Moneths yearly with Corn) not only trusted nor the rule thereof into the hands of any of the Senators, but expressly forbid any of that Order (without his special permission) to sojourn there. It is a principle in State, never to license men of great houses, and credit among the people, to have free access into that Countrey, whose revolt may endanger the whole Empire. Wherefore it was a weakness doubtless in the Council of King Henry the sixth, to suffer Richard Duke of York, to pass at pleasure into Ireland; where he had harbour and relief, and whence he brought supply both of Men and Money. But to return to Egypt, Germanicus entering once into Alexandria, only to see the Antiquities of it, and return; stirred such suspicions, and distractions in the jealous head of Tiberius, that he spared not sharply to rebuke him for it. Vespasian also being by the Syrian Legions chosen Emperor, first assured himself of Egypt, as the Key of the Sea and Land; with a small power, against a strong host easily defended. This place he resolved to make his Sanctuary, if his designs succeeded not luckily. And to this place he hastened, after the defeat defeat of the Vitellian Army; that so detaining the ordinary provision of Victuals, he might by Famine compel the City of Rome to stand at his devotion. The Government of this Province was by AUGUSTUS always committed to some one of the Roman Gentry, as less able, by reason of his low condition, to work against the Princes safety. Neither would he allow his Deputy the glorious attributes of Lieutenant, Legatus, Proconsul, or Prætor. Captain or President of Egypt was their highest Title; there being even in Titles no small motives to Ambition.

40. AUGUSTUS having by these means reduced both the City and Provinces under his absolute command, and being now declining in strength, by reason of a sudden and violent sickness; began to call his wits to Council, how to dispose of the Estate after his decease. Male-child he never had any. His Daughter Julia, a woman of immodest carriage, never made further use of her fathers greatness, than that she satisfied her Lusts with the greater insolence. Marcellus, his Sisters son, and Julias husband, was a young man of an ingenious disposition, and seemingly capable of the fortunes which attended for him. Him, being yet young, AUGUSTUS preferred to the Pontifical dignity, and Adulthood: Yet once upon his sickness, he privately determined to choose a Successor in the Common-wealth, rather than his own Family; and not to leave the Empire to Marcellus, whom he held unable to undergo it, but to his companion in Arms, Agrippa; a man daunted neither with adverse, nor altered with prosperous fortunes. This Marcellus afterwards so stomached, that he began to grutch at Agrippas greatness, and to bear a vigilant eye on his plots and actions. Contrarily, Agrippa unwilling to offend him, under whose future Government he was in all likelihood to end the rest of his dayes, with much ado obtained leave to retire unto Lesbos: that so his absence either might allay, or remove the displeasure, conceived against him by the young Prince. An action full of wisdom, and magnanimity. For though AUGUSTUS chief end was, to discountenance the popular dependencies of his son, by the favours heaped on his servant: yet did Agrippa know, that a Favourite ought to have so much in him of the Persian Religion, as to worship the Rising Sun also; and that he should resemble old Janus with the two faces, with th'one looking on the King regnant, with th'other on the Prince successor.

41. Marcellus being dead, Agrippa returning married his Widow, and on her begat two Sons, Caius and Lucius; whose actions afterward afforded such variety for censure, that there was wanting neither much reason to commend, nor little to condemn them. On these two, or at the least one of them, AUGUSTUS now grown aged, resolves to settle the Estate; and if they failed, upon such others, as by the liberty of the Laws, he might adopt: Adoption, in the estimation of the Roman Laws, being indeed another Nature. Posterity, whether it be natural, or only legal, is the best supporter of the Arms Imperial. Such as both fortifies the Prince, and assures the Subject. Yet this he did not without much reluctance, and a great conflict in his minde. "Sometimes his thoughts suggested to him, that the deligned Successors draw to them all the attendance and respect, from the Prince in possession; That they have always a lingering desire to be actually seated in the Throne; That they suppose the life of the present Prince too tedious, not caring by what means it were shortened; That sometime it is pernicious, yea even to the appointed Successor himself also. On the other side, his better thoughts prompted him to consider, in what a miserable distraction he should leave the Empire, if sudden death should take from him an ability to nominate his heir; The fear conceived in the whole City, at his last sickness; That Pyrrhus of Epirus, was of all hands condemned, for leaving his Kingdom to the sharpest sword; That the Common-wealth fallen into dissensions, could not be settled again without a lamentable War, and a bloody Victory; That the people seeing him childless, would not only condemn him, but perhaps endeavour to recover the old liberty, though with the ruin of the State; That it was the custom of Tyrants, to desire the eternizing of their deaths, by the downfall of their Countreys. His mind thus distracted and perplexed, at last he brake in this manner. "Thou hast, Octavian, a Wolf by the ears, which to hold still, or to let go, is alike dangerous. Many inconveniences may ensue, if thou dost not declare thy Successor; more, if thou dost. The good of the Republique consisteth in knowing the future Prince; Thine own welfare dependeth on the concealment. The Common good is to be preferred before any private; Yet ought Charity to begin at home. No, Octavian, no; As thou hast receiv'd, so shew thy self worthy of the Title of Pater Patriæ. Yea, and perhaps this designation may secure thine own Estate. For what will it profit the people to conspire against thee; when they shall see a Successor at hand, either of thine own body, or thine own appointment, ready to take thy place, and revenge thy wrongs?"

42. Thus resolved, he adopteth Caius and Lucius; desiring, though he made shew to the contrary, they should be Consuls Elect; and called Princes of the Youth. Yet wisely forecasting the dangers incident to himself, if they should make their abode in Rome; he sendeth them with honourable charge into the Provinces abroad: as well to exercise them in feats of War, as to take away all cause of faction in the Court, and sedition in the City. Which mystery of State as it was anciently practised by most Princes, so at this day by the Grand Seigneur: who always sendeth his eldest son unto Amasia, as Governour thereof; from whence till the death of his Father, he never returneth. In these journeys dyed the two young Princes; a misfortune which AUGUSTUS bare nobly; neither banishing grief, with a Stoical Apathy; nor spending the time in womanish lamentations. Having performed due Rites to the dead, he adopted his Wives Son Tiberius. A man for the conveniency and ripeness of his age, not unfit; in feats of Arms, nor unexpert; in humane learning, not ignorant; but withall suspected to be cruelly given, and possessed with the hereditary pride of the Claudian Family. A strange medley of vertuous and vicious qualities. Tiberius, such was the will of his Father, to establish the succession, with more stayes than one, adopted Germanicus, his Brother Drusis Son; then commanding over eight Legions in Germany: which done, he speedeth to his charge in Illyricum. This man AUGUSTUS appointed to be his Successor, as it was afterwards (and not improbably) conjectured, neither in care to the State, nor in love to the party; but to win honour to himself: and to make the Roman people again wish for him; when they should see that infinite disproportion in all Royal and Kingly qualities, between the old and new Emperors. A fetch after imitated by Tiberius, in the adoption of Caius Caligula.

43. The last (though not the least) help of the Empires establishment, was the long life and reign of our AUGUSTUS: as having ruled the State 16 years before, and 34 years after his confirmation in the Sovereignty, by the Senate and people. All the young men in the City were born after the first Decennium of the Monarchy. Most of the old men during the Civil Wars. Few had seen what was the ancient form of Government in the Common-wealth; many did not desire it. For at the present, enjoying Peace both at home and abroad; and hearing what sad and tragical reports their Fathers made of the former troubles and proscriptions: they contented themselves with the new Government; as more esteeming a secure and happy subjection, than a dangerous and factious liberty. By which long time of Empire, and the policies already recited, besides many others, which I can neither learn by relation, nor gather by presumptions; did AUGUSTUS so firmly settle the Roman Monarchy, that it continued some hundred of years without alteration: though all his immediate Successors were in a manner Monsters, incarnate Devils, and indeed any thing rather than men: Tiberius, Caius, Claudius, Nero, Gallus, Otho, and Vitellius, both by their own Tyrannick and their Bondmens Extortions; would have ruined any Monarchy not founded by AUGUSTUS.

44. To speak concerning the Domestical affairs of this Emperor, is beyond my Theme. As either how far he suffered himself to be ordered by his Wife Livia; or whether he used variety of women, not so much to satisfy an inordinate appetite, as by so many women to fill out the secret designs of many men. He was too exact a Statesman to be perfect in Souldiery; and in all his Wars was prosperous by Fortune rather than by Valour, or his Captains Valour than his own. The Common-wealth which he found weak and in Rubbish, he left Adamantine, and invincible. In behaviour he was affable and gracious; in his discourse, sententious; to the good, of a most sweet disposition; to the lewd and dishonest, harsh and unpleasant. Friendship he contracted with few, and that slowly; but to them, whom he once loved, constant and bountiful to the last. Finally, such a one he was, of whom I will only say what I finde spoken of Severus; It had been an ineffable benefit to the Common-wealth of Rome, if either he had never dyed, or never been born.

Thus having drawn the Picture of this puissant and prudent Prince (though I confess with too much shadow) I now proceed unto the Catalogue of the Roman Emperors: in which I shall take notice of such of their Actions only as had relation to the Publick, either in the improvement or decrease of their Power and Empire; or point to any signal matter which concerns the Church.

The Roman Emperours.

A. M.

- 3918 1 Julius Caesar the last of the Dictators, and the first of the Emperours, in memory of whom the following Emperours were called Cæsars, till the time of Adrian; when it became the title of the heir apparent, or designed Successor; the first who had it in that sense being Ælius Verus, though he lived not to enjoy the Empire.
- 3923 2 C. Octavianus Caesar, to whom the Senate gave the name of Augustus; who added unto the Roman Empire the Provinces of Noricum, Pannonia, Rhætia, a great part of Spain, and the whole Kingdom of Egypt. In his time the Lord CHRIST was born: 56.
- A. C.

- 71 10 Flavius Vespasianus, chosen by the Syrian and Judæan Armies, subverted utterly the Common-wealth of the Jews, by the valour and prowess of his Son Titus; and brought Æthiopia, Lycia, Rhodes, Samos, Thrace, and Syria Comagene, under the form of Roman Provinces: 9.
- 80 11 Titus Vespasianus, the fortunate Conqueror of the Jews.
- 82 12 Fl. Domitianus, who raised the second persecution against the Christians. An. 96. 15.

- 99-14 Ulpianus Trajanus, by birth a Spaniard, adopted by Nerva: he made Dacia a Province of the Empire; carried the Roman Armies over Euphrates, subduing Armenia, Adiabene, and Affria; and raised the third Persecution against the Christians. An. 110. 19.
- 118-15 Elisus Adrianus, who utterly exterminated the Jewish Nation, and continued the Persecution begun by Trajan. 20.
- 138-16 Antoninus Pius, whose friendship was sought by the very Indians. 24.

- 241-27 Gordian, elected by the Senate against Maximinus. 6.
- 247-28 Philip, an Arabian, supposed by some to be a Christian. 5.
- 252-29 Decius, slain in war against the Goths; the Author of the seventh Persecution raised against the Church. An. 250. 2.
- 254-30 Gallus Hostilianus. 2.
- 256-31 Emilianus, the Moor.
- 256-32 Valerianus, the Author of the eighth Persecution, An. 259. He was taken prisoner by Sapor, King of Persia, and made to serve him for a footstool.
- 33 Gallienus, Son to Valerianus, in whose time the 30 Tyrants ingrossed unto themselves several parts of the Empire.
- 271-34 Claudius II. who after a short and troublesome time, left it to
- 272-35 Quintillus his Brother, who enjoyed the same but 17 days.
- 273-36 Valer. Aurelianus, restored again the ancient discipline, suppressed all the Invaders of the Empire, and vanquished the Goths; but was a great persecutor of the Church, An. 278. 6.
- 279-37 Annianus Tacitus, descended from Tacitus the Historian.
- 38 Florianus, an Emperour of two months only.
- 280-39 Valerius Probus. 6.
- 286-40 Aurelius Carus, together with his two Sons Carinus and Numerianus.
- 288-41 Diocletian, first associated Maximinianus by the name of Emperour, or Augustus; and afterwards Galerius of Dacia, and Constantius Chlorus, by the name of Cæsars. He had continual Wars against the Persians, and raised the tenth Persecution against the Church, An. 295. Which held so long, and was so vehement withall, that as St. Hierome writes, there were 5000 slain for every day in the year, save the first of January. He afterwards resigned the Empire, and lived in private at Salona. 20.
- 308-42 Constantius Chlorus, a friend to Christians. 2.
- 310-43 Constantine, Son of Chlorus, surnamed Magnus, or the Great, the first Emperour that countenanced the Gospel, and embraced it publicly; which he is said to have done on this occasion. At the same time that he was saluted Emperour in Britain, Maxentius was chosen at Rome by the Prætorian Souldiers; and Licinius named Successor by Maximinus, the associate of his Father Chlorus. Being penfive and solicitous upon these distractions, he cast his eyes up towards Heaven, where he saw in the Air a lightsome Pillar in the form of a Cross, wherein he read these words, In æto viv, in hoc vince; and the next night our Saviour appearing to him in a Vision, commanded him to bear that figure in his Standard, and he should overcome all his Enemies. This he performed, and was accordingly victorious, from which time he not only favoured the Christians, but became a very zealous Professor of the Faith and Gospel. Know Zosimus an Heathen Historian, partly out of malice to the Christians in general, and partly a particular grudge to the Emperour Constantine; reporteth otherwise of the causes of his Conversion: But the authority and consent of all Christian Writers, who deliver it as before is told, is far to be preferred before the testimony of one single Heathen, had he not been biased (as he was) by his disaffections.

Before this time it is observed, that few (if at all any) of the Roman Emperours dyed a natural death, as after they generally did. From Julius Cæsar unto Constantine there were 40 in all. Of which Julius was openly murdered in the Senate; Augustus made away by his wife Livia; as Tiberius afterwards by Macro; Caligula was slain by Cassius Chæreas; Claudius poysoned by his wife Agrippina; Nero, Nero, and Otho, laid violent hands upon themselves; Galba, and Vitellius, massacred by the Souldiers; Domitian by Stephanus, Commodus by Letus and Eleëtus, Pertinax and Julianus by the Souldiers of their Guard; Caracalla by the command of Macrinus; Macrinus, Heliogabalus, Alexander, Maximinus, Maximus, and Balbinus, successively by the men of War; Gordianus by Philip, Philip by the Souldiers; Hostilianus by Gallus, and Emilianus; and they by the Souldiers; Valerianus dyed a Prisoner in Parthia; Florianus was the Author of his own end; Aurelianus murdered by his household servants; Gallienus, Quintillus, Tacitus, and Probus, by the fury of the military men. And yet I have omitted out of this Account such of the Emperours as were cumuloously made by the Army, without the approbation of the Senate; as also the Cæsars, or designed Successors of the Empire; most of which got nothing by their designation and adoption, but ut citius interficerentur. Some of these were cut off for their misdemeanours: some, for seeking to revive again the ancient Discipline; and some, that others might enjoy their places. The chief cause of these continual massacres, proceeded originally from the Senate, and Emperours themselves. For when the Senators had once permitted the Souldiers to elect Galba, and had confirmed that election; *Evulga*to (saith Tacitus) imperii arcano, principem alibi quam Romæ fieri posse: more Emperours were made abroad in the field by the Legions, than at home by the Senators. Secondly from the Emperours alone, who by an unseasonable love to their Guard-Souldiers, so strengthened them with priviledges, and nullified them in their licentious courses; that on the smallest rebuke, they which were appointed for the safety of the Princes, proved the Authors of their ruin: so truly was it said by Augustus in Dion, Metuendum est esse sine custode, sed multo magis a custode metuendum est. The last cause (be it causa per accidens, or per se) was the largess which the new Emperours used to give unto the men of service; a custom begun by Claudius Cæsar, and continued by all his Successors: inasmuch that the Empire became saleable, and many times he which had most had it. As we see in Dion when Sulpicianus offering twenty Sesteriums to each souldier, was (as if they had been buying a stock at Gleick) out-bidden by Julianus, who promised them five and twenty Sesteriums a man. So that Herodian justly complaineth of this Donative. Id initium causæ; militibus fuit, ut etiam in posterum turpissimi contumacissimiq; evaderent, sic ut avaritia indies, ac principum contemptus, etiam ad sanguinem usq; proveherent. That is to say; From this occasion and beginning, the Souldiers every day grew more shameless, and less regardful of their Prince: so that their covetousness encreasing, and the contempt they had of their Emperours waxing more and more, ended at last in the frequent shedding of their bloods, in hope to have a better Market of the next Successor: So as the Emperour Constantine wanted not good reason, besides their siding against him for Maxentius, to cashier these Guards, as grown more dangerous than useful to Imperial Majesty. And so accordingly he did; levelling their standing Camp to the very ground, disbanding the whole company, or putting them under other Officers, and to other Services; by means whereof they were not able to create the like disturbances, or dispose of the Empire as before. And for the Captains of these Guards which before were two (Præfetti Prætorio in the Latine) he encreased their number unto four (one for each quarter of the Empire) giving them a Civil Jurisdiction in exchange for the Military Command which they had before, and casting them behind in place after the Patricii, an Order of his own devising.

As for the extent and latitude of the Roman Empire, whilst it remained one intire Body (as it was before the time of Constantine, who at his death divided it among his sons) it was in length about three thousand miles; namely from the Irish Ocean West, to the River Euphrates on the East; and in breadth, it reached from the Danubius Northward, to Mount Atlas on the South, about two thousand miles. And though the Romans had extended their Dominions sometimes farther East, and North; yet could they never quietly settle themselves in those conquests. Nature (it seemeth) had appointed them these bounds, not so much to limit their Empire, as to defend it. For the enemies found those Rivers, by reason of the depth of the Channel, and violent current of the stream, as a couple of impregnable Fortresses; purposely (as it were) erected to hinder them from harrying the Roman Countreys.

The Revenues of it Lipsius in his Tract de Magnitudine Romanæ, esteemeth to be about one hundred and fifty millions of Crowns; and that they were no less, may be made more than probable by these reasons. 1. It is affirmed by divers, and among others by Boterus, that the yearly Revenues of the King of China amount to one hundred and twenty millions of Crowns. And if this be true (as few question it) we cannot in proportion guess the whole Empire of the Romans to yield less than one hundred and fifty millions; especially considering what Arts-Matters the Romans were, in levying and raising their Taxes and customary Tributes. 2. The Legionary Souldiers which were dispersed over the Provinces, received in ordinary pay, (besides provision of corn, apparel, and Officers wages) five millions, 516062. pounds and ten shillings of our money; which amounteth unto sixteen millions of Crowns or thereabout. In the City it self were kept in continual pay, seven thousand souldiers of the Watch, four thousand or six thousand for the defence of the City; and ten thousand for the Guard of the Emperours person. The two first had the same wages, the last the double wages of a Legionary Souldier. Add hereto the expences of the Palace; and other means of disbursements, and I think nothing of the sum can be abated. 3. We read that C. Caligula spent in one year two millions and one hundred thousand of Sesteriums; how Nero most lavishly gave away two millions and one hundred thousand of Sesteriums; and how Vitellius in few months, was nine hundred thousand Sesteriums in Arrearages; every Sesterterium being valued at seven pound sixteen shillings three pence: all of them huge and infinite sums. 4. When Vespasian came to the Empire, the Exchequer was so impoverished, that he professed in open Senate, that he wanted to settle the Common-wealth forty millions of Sesterteriums, amounting to three hundred and twelve millions of our English money; which Prostration (saith Sueton) seemed probable, Quia & male partis optimè usus est. Now unless the ordinary Revenues came to as much, or more than we have spoken; by what means could this extraordinary sum be raised. 5. We may guess at the general Revenue by the moneys issuing out of particular Provinces; and it is certain, that Egypt afforded the Ptolemies twelve thousand talents yearly: neither had the Romans less; they being being more perfect in inhabiting, than in abating their Intrado. France was by Cæsar felled at the yearly tribute of twenty millions of Crowns. And no doubt the rest of the Provinces were rated accordingly. 6. And lastly the infinite sums of money given by the Emperours in way of largesse, are proofs sufficient for the greatness of the in-come. I will instance in Augustus only, and in him, omitting his Donatives at the victory of Actium, and the rest, I will specify his Legacy at his death: He bequeathed (by his Testament, as we read in Tacitus) to the common sort, and the rest of the people, three pound eight shillings a man; to every souldier of the Prætorian bands, seven pounds sixteen shillings three pence; and to every Legionary souldier, of the Roman Citizens, four pound ten shillings six pence: which amounted to a mighty mass of money.

The Arms or Ensign of this Empire when it was up and in the flourish, was the Eagle: not born, as now, in colours, and a banner; but in an Image or Portraiture on the top of a Spear, or other long piece of wood, to be fixed in the earth at pleasure. This Ensign, Spear & Eagle together, they called the Labarum: Que signa, quod quasi labantia hastis appenderentur labara dixerunt, saith Lipsius, Epist. Quæst. Ep. 5. The use as of this, so of other standards, Lyra giveth us in his Notes on the second of Numb. namely, ut ad cornu aspectum, bellatores dividantur & uniantur, to call together, and distribute the souldiers according to occasions. And certainly for this end and purpose were those Ensigns first invented. Afterwards they were applied to the distinguishing of Tribes and Families; and at last bestowed by Kings and Princes as the honorary marks of well-deserving: those which had been the Ensigns of War, so becoming the Ornaments of Peace. At what time the form of this Labarum was altered, and began to be born in colours, I have not yet read. It is now an Eagle Saturus, in a Field Sol; which kind of bearing the Heralds call mostrich. It was first born by Cæ. Marius in his second Consulship, and in his Wars against the Cimbrii, from him conveyed to Cæsar, who was allied to him in design and person, and so derived unto the Emperours, his Successors.

But to proceed, Constantine having settled his affairs in peace, and cashiered the Prætorian Guards, fell to new modelling the Empire; which he conceived to be too cumbersome and unwieldy to be governed by the former Polity, as indeed it was. And first of all he augmented the Roman Provinces to the number of one hundred and twenty, or thereabouts; over every one of which he ordained a particular Præfatus, that had his residence in the chief City of that Province. Then he reduced these Provinces under fourteen Dioceses, (for so he called the greater distributions of his Empire) seven of which were in the East parts thereof, that is to say, the Diocese of Egypt, of the Orient, of Asia, of Pontus, Thracia, Dacia, and Macedonia: and as many also in the West, viz. the Præfecture of the City of Rome, (which I count for one) the Diocese of Italy, Africa, and Illyricum, of France, Spain, and Britain. Finally in stead of the two Præfatus Prætorio which had the command of the Prætorians, he ordained four for the quarters of the Empire: that is to say, the Præfatus Prætorio Italia, under whom were the Dioceses of Italy, Africa, and Illyricum; 2. Præfatus Prætorio Galliarum, who had under him the Dioceses of France, Spain, and Britain; 3. The Præfatus Prætorio Orientis, who had command over the Dioceses of Egypt, the Orient, the Asian, the Pontick and Thracian Dioceses; And 4. the Præfatus Prætorio Illyrici, under whose super-intendence, besides Illyricum it self, were the Dioceses of Macedonia and Dacia only; each of these Præfatus having a Vicarius, or Lieutenant in the several Dioceses under his authority, who fixed their residence in the head City of the Diocese. And this I have the rather noted, because of the relation which the Polity of the Christian Church had to this Division: it being so ordered in the best and purest times thereof, that in every City where the Emperours had an Officer, whom they called Defensor Civitatis, the Christians should have a Bishop; in every chief City of the Province a Metropolitan; and over every Diocese an Archbishop or Primate, from whom lay no Appeal unto any other. And so far Constantine did well; if at the least the casting of the Empire into so many Dioceses was of his devising. But I have no reason to believe that it was more ancient: the Patriarchs or Primates of Rome, Carthage, Alexandria, Antioch, and other of the greater Churches, being settled in a preeminence of jurisdiction over the Provinces, and Metropolitans assigned to them long time before the Council of Nice, and consequently before the Empire (nay the birth) of Constantine, who possibly might add no more in this great business, than the assigning of a Præfatus Prætorio to each several quarter, and the allotting of the Dioceses unto each Præfatus. But whether it were so or not, certain it is, that he committed divers errors, which did more prejudice the Empire, than any thing that had been done by his Predecessors. First in translating the Imperial Seat from Rome to Byzantium; by which transplantation the Empire lost much of its natural vigour: as we see by experience of Plants and Flowers, which being removed from the place of their natural growth, lose much of their virtue which was formerly in them. On which reason, Camillus would not suffer the Romans to remove their Seat unto the City of the Vesii, newly conquered by him: but to prevent them in it he fire on the Town, and so consumed it, ut nunc Veios fuisse laboret Annalium fides, as my Author hath it. A second fault of this Constantine, was the dividing the Empire amongst his sons, which only concerned himself. For though it was quickly reunited in the person of Constantinus (his brethren dying without issue) yet his example being followed by others; the Empire was after torn into many pieces to the destruction of the whole. 'Tis true, the former Emperours used sometimes to associate some partner with them; but so that they did manage it as one sole Estate: Constantine (if I remember rightly) being the first which parcelled it into several sovereignties, each independent of the other, allotting to Constantinus, Greece, Thracia, and all the Provinces of the East; to Constans, Italy, Illyricum, Africa; to Constantine, Gaul, Spain, and Britain. The third fault of this Emperour was his removing the Legion, and Colonies which lay before on the Northern Marches, into the Eastern parts of his dominions; pretending to use them as a Bulwark against the Persians; playing thereby those passages open, at which not long after the barbarous Nations entered, & subdued the West. For though instead of these Colonies he planted Garrisons and Forts in convenient places, yet these being filled with Souldiers, for the most part out of other Countreys, fought not as in defence of their native Soil, (as the Colonies would and must have done) but on the first onset of those Barbarians abandoned them to the will of the enemy. So that Zosimus (though in other of his reports about this Prince he he bewrayeth much malice) doth call him, not untruly, the first Subverter of that flourishing Monarchy. To these three we may adde a fourth, which concerns the Emperours in general; namely their stupid negligence and degenerate spirits, which shewed it self most visibly in the last of

The Western Emperours.

- 341 1 Constans, the youngest son of Constantinus Magnus, his brother Constantine being dead, in the third year of his reign, remained sole Emperour of the West. 13.
- 354 2 Constantius, the other of Constantines sons, succeeded Constans in his part; after his decease, uniting the divided Empire into one Estate.
- 3 Valentinian Emperour of the West, his brother Valens ruling in Constantinople, and the Eastern parts.
- 4 Valentinian II. youngest son of the former Valentinian.
- 399 5 Honorius the second son of Theodosius the Emperour, (his elder brother Arcadius reigning in the East) in whose time Alarick with the Goths invaded Italy, sacked Rome, and made themselves Masters of the Countrey, which afterwards they left in exchange for Spain. 26.
- 425 6 Valentinian III. during whose time Attila and the Hunnes made foul work in Italy, and the Vandals, seized upon Africa, as they did on Italy and Rome also after his decease: Murdered by Maximus a Roman (whose wife he had trained into the Court, and ravished) as shall be shewn hereafter on another occasion. He was son unto Constantinus Cæsar by Placidia Sister to Honorius, and Widow of Anthaulfus King of the Goths.
- 455 7 Maximus having slain Valentinian the third, succeeded in the Empire; but on the coming of the Vandals, whom Eudoxia the wife of Valentinian (who had some inkling of the manner of her husbands death) had drawn into Italy, he was stoned to death by his own souldiers. 1.
- 456 8 Avitus, chosen Emperour in a military tumult.
- 457 9 Majoranus. 4.
- 461 10 Severus. 6.
- 467 11 Anthemius, who at the end of five years was slain (as were the three before him) by Recimer (a Suevian born) the chief Commander of the Armies; who had again to get the Empire for himself, but dyed as soon as he had vanquished and slain Anthemius.
- 471 12 Olybrius, an Emperour of four months only.
- 472 13 Glycerius, another of as little note: As also was
- 14 Julius Nepos, deposed by Orestes a noble Roman, who gave the Empire to his son called at first Momillus, but after his assuming the Imperial title he was called as in contempt Augustulus.
- 473 15 Augustulus, the last of the Emperours who resided in Italy, vanquished by Odoacer King of the Herni and Turingians. An ominous thing, that as Augustus raised this Empire, so an Augustulus should ruin it.

But though Augustulus lost the Empire, yet Odoacer was not suffered to enjoy it long: Zeno the Emperour of the East sending Theodoric King of the Goths, to expel him thence; and to possess himself of Italy, the reward of his valour. And this the Emperour did the rather, partly because the Goths were Christians, and in good terms of correspondency with him: but principally to remove that active Nation somewhat further off, who lay before too near the borders of his own Dominions. And that he might dismiss them with the greater content and honour, he made Theodoric a Patrician of the Roman Empire; an honour first devised by the Emperour Constantine; and of so high esteem from the first Institution, that they who were dignified therewith, were to have precedence of the Prætorii Præfatus, who before took place next to the Emperour himself. Nor did the famous Charlemain set upon it any lower estimate, in case he did not adde much unto it; when to the Title of Emperour of the Romans he added that of a Patrician in the style Imperial. Theodoric thus authorized and encouraged, marches toward Italy; and having vanquished Odoacer, secures himself in his new Conquests by divers politick proceedings; first by Alliances abroad, and then by Fortresses at home. To fortifie himself abroad, he took to Wife Adelheida, daughter to Clodoveus (or Clovis) King of the French; marrying his sister Hermisfride to Thorismond, King of the Vandals in Africa; Amalasanta a second daughter to Embaricus a Prince of the Goths in Spain; and Amnelberge his Niece, to Hermisfridus King of the Turingians. Being thus backed with these Alliances with his Neighbour Princes, (all equally concerned in the subverting of the Roman Empire) he built Towns and Forts along the Alpes, and the shores of the Adriatick, to impeach the passage of the barbarous Nations into Italy. His Souldiers and Commanders he dispersed into most parts of the Countrey; partly to keep under the Italians, of whose wavering and unconstant nature he was somewhat doubtful; partly to unite both people in a mixture of Language, Marriages, and Customs; and partly that he might more easily in War command them, and in Peace correct them. Italy, which before was made a thorough-fare to the barbarous Nations, and quite disordered by the frequent inundations of Lust and Rapine; he reduced to such a peaceable and settled Government, that before his death they had quite lost the memory of their former miseries: in stead whereof a general felicity had diffused it self over all the Countrey. Such Cities as had been formerly defaced, he repaired, strengthened, and beautified. In his wars he was victorious, temperate in his times of peace, and in his private carriage discreet and affable. Finally (as Velleius saith of Morobodanus) he was Natione magis quam ratione Barbarus: And went the most judicious way to establish his dominion in Italy, of any of the Barbarous Princes that ever had invaded the Roman Provinces, which he left thus confirmed and settled unto his Successors.

The Kings of the Goths in Italy.

- 495 1 Theodoric of whom before; who to his conquest of Italy added that of Illyricum, as also the appendant Islands to both those Countreys, and wrested Provence in France, from the Goths of Spain.

- 527 2 Athalaricus, Nephew to Theodoric by his daughter Amalasunta, who in the minority of her son managed the affairs of the Goths in Italie. Fearing some danger out of Greece, she restored Provence to the French, and by their aid drove the Burgundians out of Liguria. A Lady skilful in the Languages of all those Nations which had any commerce with the Roman Empire, inasmuch, that pro miraculo fuerit ipsam audire loquentem, saith Procopius of her.
- 534 3 Theodatus, the son of Hamulfride, the Sister of Theodoric, succeeded on the untimely death of Athalaricus. Who being in War with the Romans, (or rather with the Greek Emperours, endeavouring to recover Italie from the hands of the Goths) and desiring before hand to know his success; was killed by a Jew to shut up a certain number of Swine, and to give to some of them the names of Goths, and unto others the names of Romans. Which done, and going to the styes not long after, they found the Hogs of the Gothish faction all slain, and those of the Roman half unbristled: and thereupon the Jew foretold, that the Goths should be discomfited, and the Romans lose a great part of their strength; and it proved accordingly. Which kind of Divination is called Oscuaria, and hath been prohibited by a General Council. The loss of this battle (won by Belisarius Commander of the Armies of the Emperour Justinian) drew on the loss of Rome, and the East parts of Italie, (with the Realm of Naples) and occasioned the death of Theodatus, slain shortly after these great losses by the Goths themselves.
- 537 4 Vitiges, chosen by the Goths, besieged and taken in Ravenna by the said Belisarius.
- 540 5 Idobaldus, Governour of Verona, on the calling home of Belisarius, chosen by the Goths, and by them not long after slain.
- 541 6 Ardaricus, of whom nothing memorable.
- 542 7 Totilas, a right valiant Prince, recovered all which had been got from his Predecessors, and sacked Rome in the light of Belisarius, then returned into Italie, and not able to hinder him. Vanquished and killed in fight by Narses, in the 11. of his reign.
- 553 8 Tyas, the last King of the Goths in Italie, who being vanquished by Narses, in the fourteenth year of his Reign, submitted himself to the Eastern Emperours: but after breaking out again, he was finally discomfited, and slain by Narses, not far from the City of Nocera, An. 567. After which time the Goths and the Italians mingled in blood and language, became one Nation.

But the miseries of Italie, and those Western parts were not so to end. No sooner had God freed them from the rod of his visitations, which he had laid upon them in the times of Perfection, formerly remembered, and given them peace within their dwellings; but they became divided into schisms and factions: and after wallowed in those sins, which a continual surfeit of prosperity hath commonly attending on it. Inasmuch that devout Salvian, who lived much about these times, complains of that high hand of wickedness, wherewith they did provoke the patience of Almighty God; the lives of Christians being grown so deplorably wicked, that they became a scandal to the Faith and Gospel. In nobis patitur Christus approbrium, in nobis patitur lex Christiana maledictum, saith that godly Bishop. So that their sins being ripe for vengeance, God sent the barbarous Nations, as his Executioners, to execute his divine justice on the impenitent men; and made them sensible, though Heathens, that it was Gods work they did, and not their own, in laying such afflictions on these Western parts. Ipsi fatentur non sum esse quod facerent, agnimus se perurgeti divino iussu, as the said godly Bishop doth inform us of them. On this impulsion the Vandals did acknowledge that they first wasted Spain, and then harried Africa: And at the same did Attila the Hun insert into his Royal Titles the stile of Malleus Orbis, and Flagellum Dei; acknowledging thereby his own apprehension of some special and extraordinary calling to this publick service. Nay, as Jornandes doth report, some of these barbarous people did not stick to say, that they were put on this employment by some Heavenly visions, which did direct them to the work which they were to do. In prosecution of the which, in less time than the compass of 80 years, this very Italie (though antiently the strength and seat of that Empire) was seven times brought almost unto desolation, by the Fire and Sword of the Barbarians, viz. First by Alarick, King of the Goths, who sacked Rome; Naples, &c. 2. By Attila King of the Huns, who razed Florence, wasted Lombardy, and not without much difficulty was diverted from the spoil of Rome, by the intercession of Pope Leo. 3. By Genseric King of the Vandals, who also had the sackage of Rome it self. 4. By Biorgus King of the Alani, in the time of the Emperour Majoranus. 5. By Odoacer King of the Hervuli, who drove Augustulus, the last Western Emperour out of his estate; and twice in thirteen years laid the Countrey desolate: 6. By Theodoric King of the Goths, called in by Zeno Emperour of Constantinople to expel Odoacer and the Hervuli. And 7. by Gundebald King of the Burgundians, who having rancked all Lombardy, returned home again, leaving possession to the Goths. As for these Goths, being the first and last of those barbarous Nations who had any thing to do in the spoil of Italie, after they had reigned here under eight of their Kings, for the space of 72 years, they were at last subdued by Belisarius and Narses, two of the bravest Souldiers that had ever served the Eastern Emperours; and Italy united once more to the Empire, in the time of Justinian. But Narses having governed Italie about 17 years, and being after such good service most despitfully used by Sophia (never the wiser for her name) the wife of the Emperour Justinus, abandoned the Countrey to the Lombards. For the Emperors envying his glories, not only did procure to have him recalled from his Government; but sent him word, That he would make the Eunuch (for such he was) come home; & spin among her maids. To which the discontented man returned this answer, That he would spin her (such a web, as neither he nor any of her minions should ever be able to unweave. And thereupon he opened the passages of the Countrey to Alboinus King of the Lombards, then possessed of Pannonia; who coming into Italie with their Wives and Children, possessed themselves of all that Countrey which antiently was inhabited inhabited by the Cisalpine Galls, calling it by their own names Longobardia, now corruptly Lombardy. Nor staid he there, but made himself master of the Countreys lying on the Adriatick, as far as to the borders of Apulia: and for the better Government of his new Dominions, erected the four famous Dukedomes, 1. of Friuli at the entrance of Italy, for the admission of more aids if occasion were; or the keeping out of new Invaders. 2. Of Turin, at the foot of the Alpes against the French: 3. Of Benevento, in Abruzzo, a Province of the Realm of Naples, against the incursions of the Greeks; then possessed of Apulia, and the other Eastern parts of that Kingdome: And 4. of Spoleto, in the midst of Italy, to suppress the Natives; leaving the whole, and hopes of more unto his Successors.

whom more anon. In the mean time we will look into the story of some of the former Kings, in which we find some things deserving our consideration. And first beginning with Alboinus, the first of this Catalogue, before his coming into Italy he had waged war with Cunimundus, a King of the Gepids; whom he overthrew, and made a drinking Cup of his Skull. Rostmund daughter of this King he took to Wife; and being one day merry at Verona, forced her to drink out of that drested Cup; which she so stomacked, that she promised one Helmichild, if he would aid her in killing the King, to give him both her self and the Kingdome of Lombardy. This when he had consented to, and performed accordingly, they were both so extremely hated for it, that they were fain to fly to Ravenna, and put themselves into the protection of Longinus the Exarch. Who partly out of a desire to enjoy the Lady; partly to be possessed of that mass of Treasure which she was said to bring with her; but principally hoping by her power and party there, to raise a beneficial War against the Lombards; persuaded her to dispatch Helmichild out of the way, and take him for her husband; to which she willingly agreed. Helmichild coming out of a Bath called for drink, and she gives him a strong poison; half of which when he had drunk, and found by the strange operation of it how the matter went, he compelled her to drink the rest: so both dyed together. 2. Clephes the second King extended the Kingdom of the Lombards to the Gates of Rome: but was so tyrannical withal, that after his death, they resolved to admit of no more Kings, distributing the Government among 30 Dukes. Which division, though it held not above 12 years, was the chief cause that the Lombards failed of being the absolute Lords of all Italy. For the people having once cast off the yoke of obedience, and tasted somewhat of the sweetness of licentious Freedom; were never after so reduced, to their former duty, as to be aiding to their Kings in such Atchivements as tended more unto the greatness of the King, than the gain of the subject. 3. Cunibert the 14. King was a great lover of the Clergy, and by them as lovingly required. For being to encounter with Alachius the Duke of Trent, who rebelled against him: one of the Clergy knowing that the Kings life was chiefly aimed at by the Rebels, put on the Royal Robe, and thrust himself into the head of the Enemy, where he lost his own life, but saved the Kings. 4. Aribert the 17. King, gave the Coltian Alpes containing Piemont, and some part of the Duchy of Millain to the Church of Rome: which is observed to be the first Temporal Estate, that ever was conferred upon the Popes, and the foundation of that greatness which they after came to. 5. The 19. King was Liutprandus, who added to the Church the Cities of Ancona, Narnia, and Humana, belonging to the Exarchate; having first won Ravenna, and the whole Exarchy thereof. An. 741. the last Exarch being called Eutichius. But the Lombards long enjoyed not his Conquests. For Pepin King of France, being by Pope Stephen the third, solicited to come into Italy; overthrew Alfuphus, and gave Ravenna to the Church. The last King was Desiderius, who falling at odds with Adrian the first, and besieging him in Rome; was by Charles the great, Successor to Pepin, besieged in Pavia, and himself with all his children taken prisoners, An. 774. And so ended the Kingdome of the Lombards, having endured in Italy 206 years. Lombardy was then a Province of the French, and after of the German Empire: many of whose Emperours used to be crowned Kings of Lombardy, by the Bishops of Millain, with an Iron Crown; which was kept at Modocum, now called Monza, a small Village. This Charles confirmed his Fathers former donations to the Church; and added of his own accord, Marca Anconatina, and the Dukedome of Spoleto. For these and other kindneses, Charles was by Pope Leo the fourth, on Christmas day crowned Emperour of the West, An. 801. whose Successors shall be reckoned when we come to the story of Germany. At this division of the Empire, Irene was Emperess of the East; to whom and her Successors was no more allotted than the Provinces of Apulia, and Calabria, (the East parts of the Realm of Naples) being then in possession of the Greeks. To the Popes were confirmed or given by this Emperour and his father, almost all the Lands which they possess at this day, though afterwards extorted from them by the following Emperors, or under colour of their Title: by many several wayes and means brought again unto them, as shall be shown hereafter in convenient place. The Venetians, in that little they then had, remained sui iuris. The rest of Italie, containing all the other Provinces of the Kingdom of Naples, together with Tuscany, Friuli, Trevigina, and whatsoever is at this day in the possession of the Dukes of Millaine, Mantua, Modena, Parma, Admifferrat, and the Duke of Savoy as Prince of Piemont, together with Liguria, or the State of Genoa; was reserved by Charles unto himself, and in his life-time given by him to Pepin his second son, with the title or title of King of Italie. But long it did not rest in the house of France; the Princes of the Lombards wresting it from the line of Charles, and after weakning and dividing it by their several factions; till in the end, instead of an united Kingdom, there rose up many scattered Principalities, as shall hereafter be declared. But first we must proceed to the Kings of Italie, of which we shall endeavour as exact a Catalogue, as the confusions of that State can be capable of.

The Kings of Italie, of the French, Italian, and German Lines.

- 1 Pepin son of Carolus Magnus, died before his Father.
- 2 Barnard, son of Pepin.
- 3 Ludovicus Pius, Emperor, and King of France.
- 841 4 Lotharius, Emperor, eldest son of Ludovicus. 15.
- 856 5 Ludovicus II. Emperor, eldest son to Lotharius. 20.
- 876 6 Carolus Calvus, Emperor, the youngest son of Ludovicus Pius. 2.
- 7 Caroloman, nephew to Ludovicus Pius, by Ludovicus his second son, surnamed the Antient.
- 8 Carolus Crassus, or the Fat, Emperor, brother of Caroloman, the last King of Italie of the house of Charles, he died Anno 888.
- 888 9 Guy, Duke of Spoleto, contends with Berengarius Duke of Friuli, both of the Longobardian Race, for the Kingdom of Italie; and in fine carrieth it against him.
- 894 10 Lambert, the son of Guy, crowned by Pope Formosus.
- 11 Ludovicus, son of Bojon, Earl of Ardenne, King of Arles and Burgundy, by some Writers called only Earl of Provence; upon the death of Lambert invadeth Italie; and is made King.
- 917 12 Berengarius Duke of Friuli, vanquisheth Ludovicus, is made King of Italie; and at last overcome by the Hungarians; who having wasted the Countrey returned back again.
- 13 Rodolph Duke of Burgundy Trans-jurane, called into Italie against Berengarius, resigned it in exchange for the Kingdom of Arles and Burgundy to his Cousen.
- 926 14 Hugh D'Arles, King of Arles and Burgundy, who held the Kingdom of Italie upon this resignation; but after many troubles, was at last outed of it by Berengarius, and returned into France.
- 946 15 Berengarius II. son of the former Berengarius, on the retreat of Hugh, received by the Italians as Protector to Lotharius the son of Hugh; besieging Adelbais the next heir of Italie (on the death of Lotharius) was taken prisoner by the Emperor Otho.
- 16 Otho, called into Italie by Adelbais, daughter to Rodolph King of Burgundy and Italie; married the Lady, and in her right is King of Italie.
- 974 17 Otho II. son of the former Otho, married Theophania neece to Nicophorus Phocas, Emperor of Constantinople, and hath Calabria for her Dower. 20.
- 984 18 Otho III. Emperor, and King of Italie, in whose minority the Kingdom was usurped by
- 19 Harduicus, a man of great power in Italie, who kept it all the time of Otho; till being broken with long wars by Henry the succeeding Emperor, he was forced to quit it.
- 20 Henry, the second Emperor of that name, having thrice vanquished Harduicus, got the Kingdom of Italie, and left the same unto the Emperors his Successors: the Title of Italie after this time being drowned in that of the Empire; and the Countrey governed as a part and Member of the Empire, by such Commanders and other Officers as the Emperors from time to time sent thither. But long it staid not in that state. For the Popes of Rome knowing how much it did concern them in point of Polity, to weaken the Imperial Power in Italie, without which their own Grandour could not be maintained; stirred up continual factions and wars against them; and by that means, and by the Censures of the Church which they denounced according as they saw occasion; did so astonish and distract them; that in the end the Emperors began to lay aside the affairs of Italie, by which they reaped more trouble than the profit came to. Inasmuch that Rodolphus Habsburgensis, a valiant and a politic Prince, finding the ill success which Henry the fourth and fifth, and Frederick the first and second, Emperors of more puissance than himself, had found in their Italian actions and pretensions; resolved to rid his hands of that troublesome and fruitless Province; and to that end made as much money as he could of that commodity, which he saw he was not like to keep. And yet he sold good penny-worths too, to them that bought them; the Florentines paying for their Liberties but six thousand Crowns, the Citizens of Luca ten thousand; others as they could make their Markets. And being once required the reason, why he went not into Italie to look to the affairs thereof, as his Predecessors had done before him: he is said to have returned for answer that conceit of the Fox, for his not going to attend (as the other beasts did) at the Lions Den:

— Quia

*Quia me vestigia terrent
Omnia me adversum spectantia, nulla retrorsum.*

That is to say,

I dare not go, because no track I see
Of any beast returning towards me.

Which faulty and improvident resolution being followed by too many of his Successors, not only gave the Popes the opportunity they looked for; of making themselves the great disposers of the affairs of Italie; but many petit Princes thereby took occasion of getting all they could lay hold on for themselves, and others. For by this means, the Sealigers made themselves Masters of Verona, the Passariens of Mantua, the Carrarians of Padua, the Bailions of Bononia; and by the same the Florentines got Pistoia, and Ferrara was possessed by the Venetians. And although Henry the 7. provoked by these indignities, made a journey thither, reduced many of the revolted Cities to their former obedience, and was crowned King at Millain with the Iron Crown; as were also Ludovicus Bavaria, and Charles the 4. two of his Successors: yet found they in conclusion such small benefit by the enterprise, as did not quit the charge and trouble which it put them to. So in the end Italie was left wholly in a manner to the Popes disposing, who gave away to others what they could not manage; or otherwise confirmed those men in their usurpations, whom they found already possessed of the Emperors Countreys: and bound them by that means the faster to the See of Rome, of which they were to hold their estates in fee; the Emperors having nothing left them but the empty Title, nor exercising the Imperial Power there any other way, than by changing Earldoms into Marquises, and Marquises into Dukedoms, which they often did for ready money, or reward of Service, or to preserve some shadow of their ancient Interest.

And now we are to look on Italie as under a new face of things, not only in regard of several Principalities and forms of Government; but as replenished with new Colonies or sets of people, differing from the old in manners as well as language. And though the Soyl be now as it was before, yet hath that also found some change in the different production of the natural Fruits, as well as in the Manufactures and works of Art. For now besides their Corn and Wine, which anciently were the staple Commodities of this Countrey; they supply the rest of Christendom with Rice, Silks, Velvets, Taffeties, Satrans, Grograins, Rashi, Fustians, Goldwire, Allom, Armour, Glasses, and such like commodities, which make their Merchants very wealthy; who being for the most part, Gentlemen of noble houses, not only lose not the esteem of their Nobility by following the Trade of Merchandise (as in other places;) but by reason that they are possessed of estates in land, which they manage by their Bayliffs and other Servants, they are become the wealthiest Merchants in all Christendom.

Nor do the Gentry come behind them in all manner of affluence, which can be possibly enjoyed in so rich a Soyl. Their Lands they set not at a rent, but at thirds and halves, according as the Soyl is more or less fruitful; seldom abiding in the Countrey, but only for a moneth or two in the Summer times; but then they entertain themselves with their Musick and Mistresses under the fragrant hedges and shady bowers, in as much solace and delight as may be desired. The residue of the year they spend in Cities, and places of the most resort, for change of company. But on the other side the Countrey Farmer lives a drudging and laborious life, liable to all the Taxes and Impositions which are laid on the Land; the Landlords part coming in clearly without any disbursements or defalcations; inasmuch that it is proverbially, but most truly said, that the rich men in Italie are the richest, and the poor men the poorest, in all the world.

The people generally are grave, respectful, and ingenious. Excellent men (said once an Hispaniolian and Italian) but for these three things; that is to say, in their lusts they are unnatural, in their malice unappeasable, in their actions deceitful. To which might be added, that they will blaspheme rather than swear, and murder a man sooner than slander him. But this perhaps may be the fault but of some particulars: it being observed by moderate and impartial men, that they are obedient to their Superiors, to Inferiors courteous, to their Equals full of all Civilities, to Strangers affable, and most delicious by all fair and friendly offices to win their loves. In apparel they are said to be very modest, in the furniture of their houses sumptuous, at their Tables neat, sober of speech, enemies of all ill reports of others; and of their own reputation so exceeding tender, that whosoever slandereth any one of them, if it come unto the parties ear, he is sure to die for it. Of money and expence he is very thrifty, and loves to beat no more cost, than he is sure to save by, or receive great thanks for: but otherwise for civil carriage and behaviour, surpassing all the Gentry of the World besides. Only in strictness to their wives they exceed all reason, of whom they are so extremely jealous, that they shut them up all day from the common view, and permit them liberty of discourse with few or none. The lock used by a Gentleman of Venice to be assured of his wives chastity in the time of his absence, is so known a story, that it needs no report. But touching the predominancy of this jealous humor in most Southern Nations, we shall speak more hereafter when we come to Spain. And yet if that be true, which is proverbially spoken of the women of Italie, the husbands have more reason for this strict restraint, than other Nations are aware of. For though they be for the most part witty in speech; and modest, in the outward appearance, as much as any; yet it is said of them in the way of proverb, that they are as Magpies at the door, Saints in the Church, Goats in the Garden, Devils in the house, Angels in the streets, and Sirens in the windows, not wanting on this ground to set out themselves with all advantages of Art, there being few amongst them who use not painting, and other the sophistical helps to fallacious Beauty; and thereupon they have a saying, that, if God make them tall and fat, (for the title of a goodly woman is much prized among them) they will make themselves fair.

The language of both Sexes is very Courty and fluent, all of them speaking the Courtezan, or Court language; notwithstanding the diversity of Dialects which is amongst them. For though there be a remarkable difference betwixt the Florentine and Venetian, the Millanese and the Roman, the Napolitan and the Genoese; yet it is hard to be discerned by the tone or pronunciation, what language any Gentleman is of. But generally it is best spoken in the great Dukes Countrey, in the Cities of Florence and Sienna, but in Florence especially; in which City Guicciardini the Historian, Boccace the Author of the Decameron, and other great Masters of the Italian language, did live and flourish in their times.

For other men of note both for Arts and Arms, Italy hath afforded many since the fall of the Empire, viz. Aeneas Silvius, afterwards Pope, by the name of Pius the second; 2. Marsilius Patavinus, a stout defender of the Imperial Rights; 3. Petrarch, a Roman born; 4. Angelus Politianus, the Restorer of polite Literature in Italy; 5. Rodolphus Volaterranus; and 6. Picus Mirandula, two great Humanitians; 7. Guido Bonatus, a famous Astrologer; 8. Ariosto, and 9. Tasso, the most renowned Poets of their times, and the later never followed since; 10. Sixtus Senensis, one of the best Antiquaries of the Nation, and a great Divine; 11. Bellarmino, and 12. Baronius, the Buttrisses and Pillars of the Church of Rome. And then for Arms, 1. Ludovicus Conius, the first Restorer of the honour of the Italian Souldiery; 2. Forti-Bracchio, and 3. Nicolas Piccinino, two of his training up in the feats of Chivalry; 4. 5. Sforza the father and the son; of which the son attained by his valour to the Dukedom of Milain; 6. Christopher Columbus, a Genoese; Americus Vesputius, a Florentine, and 8. Sebastian Cabot, a Venetian, the fortunate Discoverers of America; 9. Andrea D'Orta, Admiral of the Navies to Charles the fifth; and 10. Ambrose Spinola (both Genoese) Commander of the Armies of Philip the second, King of Spain: Which last being once upbraided by Maurice, Prince of Orange, as issued from a Race of Merchants (though otherwise of a very ancient and noble Family) returned this tart and sudden Answer, that he thought it a greater honour to him, being a Merchant, to have the command of so many Princes; than it could be unto the other, though a Prince by birth, to be under the command of so many Merchants.

The usual Division of Italy is into six parts, 1. Lombardy, 2. Tuscanie, 3. the Land of the Church, 4. Naples, 5. Riviera de Genoa, and 6. the Land of Venice: and of them there is passed this Censure according to the principal Cities, i. e. Rome for Religion, Naples for Nobility, Milain for beauty, Genoa for stateliness, Florence for Policy, and Venice for riches. But take it as it stands at the present time, and

The Kingdome of NAPLES.

THE Kingdom of NAPLES is invironed on all sides with the Adriatick, Ionian, and Tuscan Seas, excepting where it joynerh on the West to the Lands of the Church: from which separated by a line drawn from the mouth of the River Tronto (or Druentus) falling into the Adriatick, to the Spring-head of Axofenus. By which account it taketh up all the East of Italy; the compass of it being reckoned at 1468. miles.

It hath been called sometimes the Realm of Pouille, from Pouille or Apulia, a chief Province of it; the first possession of the Normans (the Founders of this Kingdome) in these parts of Italy: but called most commonly the Realm of Sicil, on this side of the Phare, to difference it from the Kingdom of the Isle of Sicil, lying on the other side of the Phare or Strait of Messana. The reason of which improper appellation proceeded from Roger the first King hereof, who being also Earl of Sicil, and keeping there his fixed and ordinary residence; when he obtained the favour to be made a King, desired (in honour of the place where he most resided) to be created by the name of King of both the Sicilies. And that indeed is the true and ancient name of the Kingdome, the name or title of King of Naples not not coming into use till the French were dispossessed of Sicil by the Aragonians; and nothing left them but this part of the Kingdome, of which the City of Naples was the Regal Seat, called therefore in the following times, the Kingdom of Naples; and by some of the Italian Writers, the Kingdome only.

This is esteemed to be the most fertile place in all Italie, abounding in all things necessary for the life of man, and in such also as conduce to delight and Physick; viz. Many Springs, and Medicinal waters, Baths of divers vertues, sundry Physical herbs. It hath also an excellent breed of Horses, which may not be transported but by the leave of the King, or at least the Vice-roy; great store of Allom, Mines of divers Metals, and the choicest Wines, called anciently Vina Massica, and Falerina, frequently mentioned by the Poets. And as for Merchandise, to Alexandria they send Saffron, to Genoa Silks, to Rome Wine, and to Venice Oyl, &c.

The Noblemen or Gentry hereof, live of all men the most careless and contented lives; and like the Tyrant Polyrates in the elder stories, have nothing to trouble them, but that they are troubled with nothing. And there is a great number of them too, there being reckoned in this Realm in the time of Ortelius, 13 Princes, 24 Dukes, 25 Marquesses, 90 Earles, and 800 Barons; and those not only Titular, as in other places, but men of great power and revenue in their several Countreys; infomuch that the yearly income of the Prince of Bisignan is said to be an hundred thousand Crowns, one year with the other; the Princes of Salerno, and St. Severine being near as great. They are all bound by their Tenure to serve the King in his Wars, which gives them many privilegedges, and great command over the common Subject: whereby as they were made the abler to assist the King, upon any foreign invasion; so are they in condition also of raising and countenancing such defections as have been made from King to King, and from one Family to another, as sorted best with their ambitions and particular interrestes. For not alone the Nobles, but in general as many of the common people as can be spared from husbandry; are more addicted to the Wars than they are to Merchandise. The Nobles in pursuit of honour, and the Paissant out of desire of being in action; so that the greatest part of the Forces which serve the Spaniard in the Low-Countreys, are sent from hence. To which, the humor which they have from the highest to the lowest, of going bravely in Apparel, serves exceeding fitly. An humor which is so predominant in both sexes, that though the Paissant lives all the rest of the week in as great servility and drudgery, as his Lord doth in pride and jollity; yet on the Sundays and Saint-days, he will be sure to have a good suit to his back, though perhaps he hath no meat for his belly. And for the women, she that works hard both day and night for an hungry living, will be so pranced up on the Sundays and other Festivals, or when she is to shew herself in some publick place; that one who did not know the humor, might easily mistake her for some noble Lady.

The principal Rivers of this Kingdome are, 1. Sybaris, 2. Basentus, 3. Pescara, 4. Trontus, 5. Ausidus, 6. Salinellus, 7. Vomanius, 8. Salinus, and 9. Gargilian. The most famous of which, are Ausidus and Gargilian. The first as being the only River of Italie, which rising South-side of the Apennine, forceth a breach through it to the upper Sea: but more for the great battel fought on the banks thereof, called the battel of Cannus, or which more hereafter. The other no less famous for those many battels, which have been fought near it between the French and the Spaniards, for the Kingdome of Naples: especially that famous battel between the Marquess of Saluzzes, General of the French, and Gonsalvo, Leader of the Spaniards; the loss of which Victory by the French, was the absolute confirmation of the Realm of Naples to the Spaniards. More famous is this River for the death of Peter de Medices, who being banished his Countrey at the coming of King Charles the 8. into Italie, and having divers times in vain attempted to be reimpatriate, followed the French Army hither, and after the loss of the day, took ship with others, to fly to Cajeta; but over-charging the vessel, she sunk and drowned them all. But most famous is it, in that Marius, that excellent, though unfortunate Captain, being by Silla's faction driven out of Rome, hid himself stark naked in the dirt and weeds of this River: where he had not layen long, but Sylla's Souldiers found him, and carried him to the City of the Minturnians, being not far off. These men, to please Sylla, hired a Cimber to kill him, which the fellow attempting (such is the vertue of Majesty even in a miserable fortune) run out again, crying, he could not kill C. Marius. This River was of old called Liris; and towards its influx into the Sea expatiated into Lakes and Fens, called the Lakes of Minturni, from a City of that name adjoining.

It is divided into the Provinces of 1. Terra di Lavoro, 2. Abruzzo, 3. Puglia, or Apulia, 4. Terra de Otranto, 5. Calabria Superior, 6. Calabria Inferior, and 7. the Isles of Naples. Some of which have some smaller Territories adjoining to them, which we shall meet withal as they come in our way.

TERRA DI LAVORO is bounded on the North with Abruzzo, from which separated by the Apennine Hills; on the East with the River Silurus, which parteth it from the lower Calabria; on the South with the Tyrrhenian or Tuscan Sea, and on the West with Latium, or Campagna di Roma; from which divided by the river Gargilian; called anciently Campagna Felix, in regard of the wonderful fertility of it, and that it was the seat or dwelling of the Campans; by some modern Latinists called Campagna Antiqua, to difference it from Latium, which they now call Campagna di Roma, or Campagna Nova. And for the other name of Terra di Lavoro, or Terra Laboratoris, it was given to it, from the continual labour of the Husbandman in cultivating the ground, and carrying in the fruits thereof; but neither the reason, nor the name so new, as some men suppose. But I am sure, as old as Pliny, who calleth these parts sometime by the name of Laboria, sometimes of Campus Laborinus; and gives this reason of the name, quod ingens in eo colendo sit Labor, because of the great pains it requires to till it, and the great profit reaped by them who did till and manure it.

The Countrey foceeding, fruitful in Wines and Wheat, that by Florus the Historian it is called led Cereris & Bacchi certamen, and deservedly too. For in this noble Region one may see large and beautiful fields overhaded with rich Vines, thick and delightful Woods, sweet Fountains, and most wholesome Springs of running waters; useful as well for the restoring of mans health, as delight and pleasure: and in a word, whatsoever a covetous minde can possibly aim at, or a carnal cover.

Towns of note here were many in the elder times. The principal whereof, 1 Cajeta, seated on a fair and capacious Bay, from the crookedness whereof it is thought by Strabo, to have took the name; the word in the Laconian language signifying crooked. Others will have it so called from Kala, Uro, with reference to the burning of the Fleet of Aeneas by the Trojan Ladies; for fear of being forced again to go to Sea, where they had been so extremely tossed in their former voyages. But why that Fact committed on the furthest coasts of Sicily, should be so solemnly commemorated here on the shores of Italy, I can see no reason, and therefore we may far more probably derive it from Cajeta, the nurse of Aeneas; in memory of whom, being buried here, or hereabouts, Aeneas is affirmed to have built this Town. Of which thus the Poet, Æneid. lib. 7.

Æternam moriens famam, Cajeta, dedisti.*

That is to say,

Aeneas Nurse, Cajeta, by her death,
Did to these shores an endless fame bequeath.

But on what ground soever it first had this name, it is assuredly a place of great strength and consequence; and of so special importance for the estate of this Kingdom, that (as Cominius hath observed) if King Charles the 8. had but only fortified it, and the Cattle of Naples; the Realm had never been lost. 2. Naples, the Metropolis of the Kingdom, a beautiful City, containing seven miles in compass. It was once called Parthenope, and falling to ruine, was new built, and called Neapolis. Among other things, here is an Hospital, the revenues whereof is 60000-Crowns yearly, wherewith, besides other good deeds, they nourish in divers parts of the Kingdom, 2000 poor Infants. In this City, the disease called Morbus Gallicus, or Neapolitanus, was first known in Christendom. This City is seated on the Sea-shore, and fortified with four strong Castles, viz. 1. Castle Capodua, where the Kings Palace was; 2. Ermo; 3. Castle del Ovo, or the Castle of the Egge, and 4. Castle Novo, or the new Castle. But nature hath not done much less to her Fortifications, than the hand of Art; the Town being for the most part environed by Sea, or Mountains not to be ascended without great difficulty and disadvantages. Which Mountains, as they serve on that side as a bank to the City, so do they furnish the Citizens with most generous Wines; and being once ascended yield a gallant prospect both for Sea and Land. A City honoured by the seat of the Vice-roy, and the continual resort, if not constant residence of most of the great men of the Realm; which makes the private buildings to be very graceful, and the publick stately. And yet it had increased much more in buildings, than it is at present, if the King had not forbidden it by special Edict. And this he did, partly at the perswasion of his Noblemen, who feared that if such a restraint were not laid upon them, their vassals would forsake the Countrey to inhabit here, so to enjoy the privileges and exemptions of the Regal City: but principally upon jealousy and point of State, the better to prevent all revolts and mutinies, which in most populous Cities are of greater danger. 3. Capua, once the head of the Campanians, seated in a delicious and luxurious soyl, and one of the three Cities which the old Romans judged capable of the seat of the Empire, the other two being Carthage, and Corinth. Being distressed by the Samnites, they were fain to cast themselves into the Arms of the Romans, who did not only take them into their protection, but suffered them to live according to their own Laws, as a Free Common-wealth; rather like a Confederate than a Subject-State. Which freedom they enjoyed, till after their revolt to the Carthaginians; when being reduced to their obedience by force of Arms, they lost all their Liberties, and hardly scaped its fatal and final ruin: drawing the whole Nation of the Campanians, with divers lesser States, which depended on them, into bondage with it, A.V.C. 542. Appius and Flaccus being Consuls. The pleasures of this place was it which enervated the victorious Army of Annibal, who wintered here after the great defeat given to Tarentina Varro at the Battell of Canna; whence came the saying, Capua melle Cannas Annibali. 4. Cuma, a City once of great power and beauty, till Campania was subdued by the Romans; after which it decayed in both. Near hereunto was the Cave or Grot of one of the Sibyls, called from hence Cumæa; and not far off the Lake called Lacum Avernum, the fink whereof is said to have poisoned Birds as they flew over it; supposed by ignorant Antiquity for the entrance of Hell. And finally, from this place it was, that Aeneas is fabled by the Poets to have gone down to the infernal Ghosts, to talk with his Father. 5. Nola, where Marcus discomfited the Forces of Annibal, and thereby gave the Romans to understand, that he was not invincible. 6. Puteoli, a small Town standing on a Creek of the Sea, just opposite to Baia, on the other side of it; from which distant about three miles and an half. Both Towns remarkable for the Bridge built betwix them by Caligula, composed of sundry vessels joyned together in such sort, that there was not only fair and large passage over it, but victualling houses on both sides of it: Over which Bridge thus made, he marched and remarched in triumphal Robes, as if not only the Earth, but the very Seas were made subject to him. And this he did (as himself afterwards affirmed to some of his friends) to awe the Ocean; and imitate (if not exceed) the like acts of Xerxes and Darius,

Darius, mentioned in the ancient Writers; as also to terrifie the Britains and the German Nations, with the report of such a notable exploit; or (as some thought) to fulfil the Prophecie of one Thrasibulus a fortune-teller of those times, who had been often heard to say in the life time of Tiberius (his next immediate Predecessor) that it was impossible for Caius to succeed in the Empire, as it was for him to ride on Horseback from Baule to Puteoli. 7. Not far hence, on a Semicircular Bay, stands the City of Baia (whereof Baule before mentioned is a part) so called, as they say, from Baius, one of the companions of Ulysses in his Navigations. A City in the flourish of the Roman Empire of five miles in length, and two in breadth; so wonderfully endued by nature, and adorned by Art, that no place in the world was thought comparable to it:

Nallus in Orbe locus Baiis præluet amœniæ.

Few places in the world there are
With pleasant Baia to compare.

As it is in Horace.

A City beautified with magnificent Temples, multitudes of Baths, or Bannias, Imperial Palaces, stately buildings, and the adjoining Mannor-houses of the principal Romans, whom the pleasures of the place invited hither; and was indeed too great and sensible a monument of the lasciviousness and luxury of that prosperous people, of which the Ambubaie mentioned in the Satyrist is sufficient proof; (though some fetch the Etymologie of the word far enough from Rome, deriving it from Ambub; a Syrian word signifying a Pipe, from whence the Latines give this name to their Minstrels) now so demolished by War, and devoured by Water, that there is nothing of it to be seen but some scattered ruins. 8. Misenum, seated near a great hill or Promontory of the same name, at the foot whereof there is a large and capacious harbour; where Augustus keeping one Navy, and another at Ravenna in the upper Sea, awed the whole Roman Empire. But these were places of renown in the former times, all which, excepting Naples, are now only known by what they have been, not by what they are. The principal Cities at this time, are (next to Naples it self) Sessa, the Simessa or Snissa of the ancients; and now the title of a Dukedom to the house of Cordova in Spain derived from Gonsalvo the great Captain, of whom more hereafter. 2. Aversa, a Town of great strength and consequence, second to few in all the Kingdom; but forced to yield (though the Earl of Monsperier then Vice-roy of the Realm for Charles the 8. were in person in it) to the good fortune of Gonsalvo, spoken of before: the whole Kingdom following shortly after. 3. Ceano, 4. Salvi, 5. Venasfre, and 6. Caserte, with others, to the number of 22, besides 166 Castles or defensible places. Here is also in this Tract the Hill called Gallianum, where Annibal that great Master in the Art of War, frighted that wary Captain Fabius Maximus, by the stratagem of two thousand Oxen, carrying fire in their horns; by which device he freed himself out of those difficult Straights, in which he was at that present. And in this Countrey there is also the Hill Vesuvius, that cateth out flames of fire, the smoke of which stifled Pliny the younger, coveting to search the cause of it. The flame hereof brake forth cruelly also during the reign of Titus, calking out not only such store of smoke, that the very Sun seemed to be in the Eclipse, but also huge stones: and of ashes such plenty, that Rome, Africk, and Syria, were even covered; and Herculanum, and Pompeii, two Cities in Italy, were overwhelmed with them. There were heard dismal noises all about the Province; and Giants of incredible bigness seen to stalk up and down, about the top and edges of the mountain; which extraordinary accident, either was a cause, or preface of the future Pestilence, which raged in Rome and Italy long after.

On the East side of this Campania, and properly (as anciently it was esteemed) a part thereof, lieth that little Territory, which Alfonso King of Naples caused to be called the Principate; bounded upon the East with Calabria inferior, or that part thereof which is called the Basilicate; from which parted by the River Silarus. It extends 33 miles in length, and 10 in breadth: and was of old the seat of the Picentini, a colony of the Piceni dwelling on the Adriatick, Principal places of it, 1. Misfi, by the Italians called Mafso, of more note for the Hills adjoining, than any great beauty or antiquity it hath in it self. Those hills now called Monte Mafso, but known to the Romans by the name of Montes Mafficii; of special estimation for the rich Wines, called Vina Maffica. 2. Nucerina, nine miles from the Sea, in a very plentiful and delicious soyl. 3. Rivelli, a City not long since built, which for the elegance of the buildings hardly yields to Naples. 4. Melfi, or Amalphi, an Arch-bishops See, in which it is supposed that the Mariners Compass was first found out. It is situate on the Sea-side, and giveth name to the coast of Amalfi, fenced with Hills or Mountains of so great a height, that to look down into the Valleys or the Sea adjoining, makes men sick and giddy. A Town of great note (were there nothing else to commend it to our observation) for the finding out of the Mariners Compass, (as before is said) devised and contrived here about the year 1300. by one John Flavio, a native or inhabitant of it. 5. Salerno, about a mile from the Sea, the title of the Prince of Salerno, and an University, but chiefly for the study of Physick, the Doctors of which wrote the Book called Schola Salerni, dedicated to a King of England: not to K. Henry the 8. as it is conceived, for then the Commentary on it, written by Arnoldus Villanovanus, (who lived about the year 1313) must needs have been before the Text. And therefore I conceive it dedicated either to King Richard the first, or King Edward the first, who in their journeys towards the Holy Land, might bestow a visit on this place, and give some honourary encouragement to the Students of it. Besides these there are said to be in this small Territory, fifteen other good Towns, and two hundred and thirteen Castles or walled places; but these the principal.

II. North of Campania, lyeth the Province now called ABRUZZO, bounded on the East with Puglia, Abruzzo.

Puglia, or Apulia; on the West, with Marca Anconitana; on the North, with the Adriatick Sea; and on the South, with the Apennine. It is called, Apurum by the Latins, but the reason of the name not agreed upon: divided anciently between the Picentes and the Samnites: the Picentes taking up those parts which lay next the Adriatick; the rest (being far the greater part) was possessed by the Samnites. These last (for of the others we shall speak elsewhere) a people which held longer wars with the state of Rome, than almost all Italy besides; as keeping them in continual action for the space of 70 years together, besides many after-claps. In which long course of Wars, the Romans were so hardly put to their shifts, that they were four times fain to have recourse to the last refuge; which was the choosing of Dictators; and yet came off so often with success and victory, that it afforded them the honour of thirty Triumphs. But these Samnites, as they were a potent, so they were also a compound Nation; consisting of the Ferentani, Caraceni, Peligni, Preacini, Vestini, Hirpini, and Samnites properly so called; into which name the rest of the inferior Tribes were after swallowed. The chief City of the whole was called Samnium, whence they had their name; which in the conclusion of the War was so defaced by Papirius the Roman Consul, ut hodie Samnium in ipso Samnio requiratur; that not improperly (saith Florus) a man might ask where Samnium stood, even in the middle of the City. Which hapned A. V. C. 481.

The River of Pescara runneth through the midst of it, and divideth it into two parts, whereof the one containeth 5 Cities, and 150 Castles, or walled places; the other, 184 Castles, and 4 Cities. The principal Cities of the whole, 1 Arpinum, once the chief Town of the Arpinates, and the Countrey of M. Tullius Cicero, that famous Orator, now a poor Village called Arpino. 2 Beneventum, heretofore called Maleventum, as we finde in Pliny, because the Winds hereabouts were so fierce and violent, that men could not sit upon their Horses; but had at last that name of Beneventum, from the pleasant Plains and spacious Valleys which lye round about it; in like manner as the Countrey of the old Allobroges, exchanged the name of Malvo, into that of Salvo. It was one of the four Dukedomes which the Lombards erected, when they first came into Italy, for the better assuring of their Conquest; and was given to the Church of Rome by the Emperor Henry the fourth, in exchange of a certain Tribute remitted by Pope Leo the ninth to the Church of Bamberg; where the said Emperor was born; and is still under the command of the Popes of Rome. 3 Aquila, built by the Emperor Frederick the second, King of Naples, to assure the Realm upon that Quarter. 4 Lanciano, four miles from the Adriatick; a Town of great Trade, and much resorted to by Merchants at her Annual Fairs. 5 Ortona, the Port-town unto Lanciano. 6 Teranum, or Teran (Ptolemy calls it Inter-amna) anciently the Metropolis of the Preacini. 7 Cittadi Chieti, situate on a Hill some seven miles from the Sea, heretofore known by the name of Theate. 8 Aguino, the Birth-place of Thomas Aquinas the great School-man, who first brought the scattered limbs of Popery into a body. Here stood also the old Town Cosinum, the chief City of the Peligni, made good a while by Domitius Enobarbus against Julius Caesar, in his first following after Pompey, then retired from Rome. And seven miles hence, 10 Sulmo, honoured with the birth of Ovid, that renowned Poet, as himself testifieth,

Sulmo mihi Patria est, gelidis uberrimus undis, Mellia qui nonies distat ab Urbe decem.

Full of cool streams Sulmo, my native land,
From the great City ninety miles doth it stand.

There belongeth also to Abruzzo the Countrey of Molise, in which are 104 walled places or Castles, and four considerable Towns; the principal of which is Bovianum, or Boiano, now a Bishops See, in former times a Colony of the Romans, by Pliny called Bovianum Undecumanorum to difference it from another in this Tract of the same name, which he calls Bovianum vetus. 2 Luparetha, of which little memorable. In this Countrey also (I mean Abruzzo) are the straights called Furca Caudina, in which when the Samnites and their confederates had so inclosed the Romans, that there was no possibility to escape, they sent to Herennius, a man for his Age much honoured, and for his Wisdom much followed by them, to know what they should do with the captive Enemy. Word was returned, that they should send them home safe, and without dishonour. Thinking the old man had not been well informed of the state of the business, they sent to him again, and he advised, that they should put them all to the sword. These contrary answers made them judge amiss of the old mans brain; and therefore following their own fancies, they spoyled the Romans, and disarmed them, and despitfully used them, and so sent them home. Which when Herennius came to know, he much lamented the imprudence of so rash an action; but much more the destruction of this Countrey, as a consequent of it. Telling them, after their return, that had they given the Romans a safe and honourable deliverance from the present danger, they had made them their friends for many Ages; or had they put unto the sword for many of their Souldiers and chief Commanders, they had disabled them for long time from pursuing the War: The middle course which they had taken, would be their undoing; and so accordingly it proved. For the Romans not being made their Friends by so odious a benefit, but hatching revenge for the disgrace, soon renewed the War; and under the conduct of Papirius subdued the Countrey, and handled the poor conquered people with the like despight. An excellent Precedent unto Princes and those in power, how to proceed towards men of Quality and Rank, when they have them under; which must be, either not to strike at all, or to strike home and to the purpose. Nic. Machiavil in his Florentine History taxeth Rinaldo of Albizi for committing a great Solacism in point of State, in that hating Cosmo

de Medicis, and desiring to remove him from his publik managery of affairs, he thought it was sufficient to procure his banishment: which Cosmo, afterwards returning, paid in better coyn. Whereupon he inferreth this notable Aporism, that Great persons must not at all be touched, or if they be, must be made sure from taking Revenge. Yet do I not interdict a Prince, or any supreme Governours, the use of Mercy. I know it is the richest Jewel which adorns the Crown. Nor dare I take upon me to direct the use of that excellent verue. Only I shall observe what usage hath been commonly afforded towards such persons after their Delinquencies; whose liberty or life may create danger to the publick. The first is present Execution; for Mortui non mordeant, as the saying is: a course more to be allowed of where it cannot, then commended where it may be spared. The second is either close imprisonment under trusty Guards, or else confinement to the house and custody of some trusty Statesman: in which great caution also is to be observed. For besides that nothing is more ordinary than the escape of great Prisoners, either by corrupting or deceiving their Keepers; We find in our Histories, how Dr. Morison Bishop Ely, being committed to the custody of the Duke of Buckingham by King Richard the 3. not only procured his own liberty, but brought about that Duke to the contrary faction. The last, which is in all times the gentlest, and in some cases the safest, is not only an absolute pardon of life, and a grant of liberty; but an endearing of the party delinquent, by giving him some place of honour, or committing unto his fidelity some office of trust; it being the nature of most men, that where they are not trusted, they are never true; and that as long as they lie under suspect and jealousies, they will be apt to entertain some thoughts of their lost condition. And of this kinde of dealing with a person Delinquent, we have a pregnant instance in the Emperor Otho: who not only pardoned Marius Celsus one of Galba's faction, and a chief one too; but put him in place nearest to him, and made him one of his principal Leaders, in the following War against Vitellius. His reason was, Ne hostis metum Reconciliat onis adhiberet, lest lying aloof as a pardoned Enemy, he might conceive the breach were but badly made up. And on the other side, Marius Celsus proved so sensible of the obligation, that he continued faithful to him to the very last; and lost his life in the pursuance of his quarrel: shewing thereby, that persons of a generous and noble disposition, are more obliged by favours, than restrained by terror. But it is now time I should free my self of these Furca Caudina, and sport my self a while in the Plains of Apulia.

But I must note, before I take my leave hereof, that these two Provinces of Campania and Abruzzo, make up the greatest, richest, and best peopled part of the Realm of Naples. And therefore when the Kingdom was divided between the French and the Spaniards, it was allotted to the French, as having the priority, both of claim and power. The Provinces remaining, although more in number, yet are not comparable to those two for wealth and greatness, and were assigned over to the Spaniards, as lying most conveniently for the Realm of Sicilie.

III. PUGLIA is bounded on the West, with Abruzzo; on the East, with Terra di Otranto; on the North, with the Adriatick Sea; on the South, with Calabria. It contains the whole Countrey called of old Apulia; from whence the Puglia of the Italians, and the Pouille of the French are to be derived.

The whole Countrey containeth in it besides Villages and Towns unfortified, 126 Castles and walled places, with 13 Cities of good note. The most considerable of which we shall meet withall in our Chorography of the several parts, divided antiently by Ptolemy, and since him, by Leander; into Apulia Dannia, and Apulia Peuceetia: the former subdivided into the Capitanate, and Pouille the Plains; the later into Bari, and the Land of Otranto. For that the land of Otranto, (though now a Province of it self) did sometimes pass in the account of Apulia; seems to me most probable, in that all the East parts of this Kingdom were held by the Constantinopolitan Emperors (after the coming in of the Lombards) by no other names then those of Apulia and Calabria; and by no other names then those were assigned over unto Otho the 2 of Germany, on his marriage with Theophania, Niece to one of those Emperors. And I conceive that it was then laid unto Apulia, rather then to Calabria, first, in regard that the old inhabitants were the same in both; the Iapyges, Messapians and Salentini, possessing promiscuously all this Tract from Mount Garganus in Dannia, to the Promontory called Iapygium in the most Eastern angle of the Land of Otranto. And secondly, in regard that the people of both, have a disease peculiar only to themselves, occasioned by the biting of a little Serpent called a Tarantula, not curable but by musick only. This said, we will proceed in our Survey of the parts. And first,

APULIA DANNIA, is that part hereof which lieth next to Abruzzo, from which parted by the River Phiternus (now called Fortore) and so extending East-wards to the River Ausidus (Losonto, the Italians call it) where it meets with Peuceetia. The reason of the name is not yet agreed on. But I finde no more probable conjecture of it, than that it should be called thus of Dannus, the son of Danae by Pilamnius, once the King of this Countrey; it being reported in the Legends of those elder times, that Danae being delivered of Perseus whom she had by Jupiter, was by his Father the King Acristus, exposed to the mercy of the Seas; by which she was wafted with her young son to the coasts of this Province, here taken up by a poor Fisher, and by him carried to the Court, where the King became so enamoured of her, that he took her to Wife, and by her was Father to this Dannus. But Dannus had not long enjoyed it, on the death of his Father, when either by force or composition, he was fain to leave it to Diomedes King of Etolia: who at the end of the Trojan War, wherein he was principal Actor, hearing of the libidinous courses of his Wife Agiale, abhorred the thought of living with her; and so came with his people to this Countrey, where he fixt his dwelling, and built the City of Argirypa, whereof more anon. But as for Dannus, though he was not able to keep the possession of this Countrey, yet he bequeathed his name unto it; and afterwards withdrawing into Latium with such of his subjects as were willing to follow his Adventures, he became there the chief head of the Ru-

By which we also may conclude, that it took this name with reference to some Town of Etolia, which was the native Countrey of Diomedes. For although I know that many of the ancient Writers, suppose it to have been first called Argos Hippium, with relation to a famous City of that name in Peloponnesus; and afterby contradiction or corruption to be named Argrippam; yet these words of Patrie de nomine gentis, do perswade me otherwise. Diomedes having nothing to do in the Countrey of Argolis, where that City stood; nor in the whole demy-Island of Peloponnesus, whereof Argolis was a part or Province. It was called also Diamedia, and urbis Diomedis, because of his foundation, and his Royal Seat, after his fixing in this Countrey; but at the last it came to be called Aryp, and by that name was known in the time of the Romans greatness; Now nowhere to be found but in the ruins of time.

The chief Towns are, 1 Lecci, Altinum in Latine, a rich Town well built, and very well peopled. 2 Castro, a Sea Town, but not well fenced by Art or nature, which hath made it very often a prey to the Turks. 3 Gallipolis, a Town built on so craggy a rock, that it is conceived to be unconquerable. 4 Brundisium, the head Town of the Salentini, once glorying in the most capacious Haven of all the world; from whence there was continual passage into Dalmatia, Epirus, Macedon, and the rest of Greece. Here was it that Pompey took ship to flee from Cesar, and Cesar took shipping also to pursue after him: when to encourage the Pilot who was afraid of the storm, he cried out, Cæsarem uisus es after him: when to encourage the Pilot who was afraid of the storm, he cried out, Cæsarem uisus es

Otranto:*

Calabria fortunam ejus. It was first built by the Ætolians, under the conduct of one Diomedes, and called Brontesfon, which in the Mæssapian Tongue signifieth the horn or head of a Stag, which it much resembles: from whence the Latines give it the name of Brundisium. At this day it is but a mean Town, the Haven of it being so choaked, that a Gally can very hardly enter. 5. Hydruntum, a very ancient Town, and yet still reasonably well peopled, having a strong a Cattle upon a Rock for its defence, and a capacious Port for Traffique; the principal at the present of all the Province, which is therefore called Terra Hydruntina, by our modern Latinists. It is now called Otranto, and is a place of such importance, that the taking of it by Mahomet the Great, An. 1481. put all Italy into such a fear, that Rome was quite abandoned. Not well inhabited again till the expulsion of the Turks in the year next following.

Pass we on next to the two Calabrias, so called from the Calabri an ancient people of this Tract, inhabiting that part hereof which formerly had been called Magna Grecia, now Calabria Superior, with a part of the Country of the Salentini, lying on the Northern side of the Gulf of Tarento, now called by the name of Otranto. But the Greek Emperors being possessed of these parts of Italy, when the more Western parts thereof were under the Goths and Lombards, extended the name of Calabria, as far as to the Strait of Messina, taking the County of the Bruttii, now Calabria Inferior, into the account: and making but two Provinces of their whole Estate which was left in this Continent by the names of Apulia and Calabria: of which Apulia conveyed all the Country on the coast of the Adriatick, from Abruzzo to the extreme point or Promontory in the land of Otranto, called anciently Iapygium, now the Cape of St. Mary; Calabria, all the rest of these parts of Italy, which lie between the Tuscan or Tyrrhenian Sea, and the Bay of Tarentum. So that the ancient Calabria, was burpart of this; and of that Ennius the old Poet was a Native, as is affirmed by Ovid in his 3 de Arte.

Old Ennius his Garden tills
Among the steep Calabrian Hills.

Now called the Basilicate, and reckoned as a member of the lower Calabria.

But leaving these matters of remote Antiquity, let us behold the Country as it standeth at the present; divided of late times into Inferior and Superior, in which distinct capacities we shall look upon it. Premising only by the way, that this Countrey is the title of the eldest Son of the Kings of Naples; who were from hence called the Dukes of Calabria; and that before it was subjected to these Kings, it had a King of its own; Holofernes, whose daughter Flora was married unto Godfre of Bovillon, being King hereof, An. 1098.

V. CALABRIA SUPERIOR, called formerly Magna Grecia, from many great and famous Cities founded there by the Grecians, hath on the East the Adriatick or Ionian Sea; on the West Lucania, from which it is divided by the Apennine and the River Crathis; on the North, Sinus Tarentinus, or the Gulf of Tarento; and on the South and South-East, Calabria inferior, and Golfo di Squillacy, of old called Sinus Scyllæticus. The principal Cities at this time are, 1. Belcastro, eight miles from the Sea, where once stood Petilia. 2. Bisignano, the title of a Prince, fortified with a very strong Cattle, and endowed with the best Revenues of any principality or other Noble-man of Title in all the Kingdom. 3. Macerata, an Arch-bishops See, a rich Town, and well peopled. 4. Rossano, three miles from the Sea, a well fortified City, and situate in a very fruitful and pleasant Soil. 5. Altavilla, which giveth title also to a Prince. 6. Terra Nova, given with the title of Duke to Gonsalvo Fernandez de Cordova, commonly called the great Captain, as a reward of his signal service in the conquest of the Realm of Naples: and still enjoyed (together with the title of Duke of Sessa) by the house of Cordova.

As for the chief Cities of the Greeks in the former times, they were Locris founded by the Locrians, a people of Achæa. Here lived the Law-maker Zaleucus, who ordering Adultery to be punished with the loss of both eyes, was compelled to execute the Law on his own Son, as the first offender. Therefore to shew the love of a Father, and the sincerity of a Judge, he put out one of his Sons eyes, and one of his own. He also provided in his Laws that no woman should be attended in the street with more than one Maid, but when she was drunk; that she should not go abroad at night, but when she went to play the Harlot; that she should not wear gold or embroidered apparel, but when she meant to set her self to open sale; and that men should not wear Rings and Tissues, but when they went about the prostituting of some woman; and many others of this mould. By means whereof both men and women were restrained from all extraordinary trains of Attendants, and excess of Apparel; the common consequents of a long and prosperous tranquillity. It was also famous in old times for the victory which Ennomus an excellent Musician obtained against Arifonius of Rhegium, another of the same profession. For though Arifonius had made his prayers to Apollo the god of Musick for his good success; yet Ennomus plainly told him, that Nature was against them in this contention, which had made all the Grashoppers mute on that side of the water. And so accordingly it hapned. For when the day appointed came, Ennomus had the ill hap to break one of his Harpstrings, even in the middle of his Musick; when presently a Grashopper leaped upon his Harp, and supplied most melodiously the place of the broken string; and by that means obtained the victory to Ennomus. An accident not unworthy of the Muse of Strada, in his personating of the Poet Clandian. And though I bind bind not any man to believe this Tale (though of Strabo's telling) yet there are very good Authors for thus much thereof, that on the one side of the River, Alax, which parteth Locris from Rhegium, the Grashoppers do merrily sing; but on the other side, which is that towards Rhegium, they are always silent. 2. Tarentum, a Town of no less note, situate on the Bay called Sinus Tarentinus; first built by the Spartans: the people whereof having a great command on the Country adjoining, were one of the last Italian Nations taken in by the Romans. Nam quis post Tarentinos auderet: For who durst stir when once the Tarentines were vanquished? faith the Historian. For in the ruin of this Estate, the Apulians, Lucani, Bruttii, and the neighbouring Calabrians being all confederate together in defence thereof, were brought under the command and power of Rome, A.V.C. 578. all which (from the beginning of the Tarentine war some nine years before) were either a free people, or in a kind of subjection to this mighty City; but never felt the force of the Roman puissance. So that the war began but on to this City; and ended in the total subjection of these several Nations, An. 481. Papyrius Cursor, A.V.C. 472. and ended in the second time Consul, as before was said. In the defence of this people, and Sp. Carvilius being then the second time Consul, as before was said. In the defence of this people, did Pyrhus war against the Romans; the hope of getting this place by Annibal, was the loss of Capua; and finally here lived Archytas so famous for his flying Dove. 3. Crotana, the Inhabitants whereof were once so active, that at one Olympick meeting the Victors were all of this one Town. Their glory much decayed in a battle against the Locrians, in which one hundred and twenty thousand of them and their Confederates, were vanquished by fifteen thousand of the enemy. 4. Amyle, a Town inhabited formerly by Pythagoras, who having been often terrified with a false report of the approach of their Enemies, published a Law prohibiting all such reports. By which means, their Enemies coming unawares possessed themselves of it. Hence grew the proverb, Amyclas silentium perdidit; and hence that notable saying of Lucilius, who being commanded to be silent, returned this answer: Mihi necesse est loqui, scia enim Amyclas silentio perisse. 5. Sybaris, a City built by the Grecians after the destruction of Troy; the people whereof were Lords of 25 good Towns, and could Arme 30000 men. A people so effeminate, that they permitted no Smith nor Brazier, no nor so much as a cock to live amongst them, because they would not have their sleeps disturbed: but the Fiddlers, and Mulicians were in high request, which advantage the Crotonians taking, (with whom then in hostility) they entered the Town in the habit of Mulicians, and so mastered it. Before which accident there had been a Prophecy, that the Town should never be taken, till men were more esteemed than the Gods themselves. It hapned that a slave being grievously beaten by his Master, and obtaining no pardon for the Gods sake, upon whom he called, fled to the monument of some of his Masters Ancestors, and was pardoned by him; which coming to the ears of Amrys the Philosopher, he forsook the Town, most men holding him mad in a time of no danger to leave so delicate a seat: whence came the Proverb, Amrys insani, applied to such as under the pretence of madness or folly do provide for their safety.

VI. CALABRIA INFERIOR is bounded on the North with Calabria Superior, from which parted by the River Crathis, and a branch of the Apennine; on the South with the Tyrrhenian Sea, and the Strait of Messina; on the West with that part of Campania which is called the Principate: and on the East with a part of the Adriatick or Ionian Sea. It was antiently the habitation of the Bruttii, whom the Greek Writers generally call Bretti; and their Country Britania; upon which ground, some of our modern Criticks (envying so great an honour to the Isle of Great Britain) have transferred to this Province the birth of Constantine, the first Christian Emperour. These Bruttii being first conquered by the Romans, with the rest of Italy, after the defeat of Canna, took part with Carthage, and was for a long time the retreat of Annibal, whom the Romans had shut up in this corner. A Country not much short in fruitfulness of the rest of the Kingdom; and having the advantage of so much Sea, is the better situate for Traffique. At one extremity hereof, is the Promontory called by Ptolomy, Leuco Petra, now Labo di Spartimento; all along which, especially in the month of May, are taken great store of Tunnies (a fish which much resembleth mans flesh) which being barrelled up are sold to Mariners. Here are two Rivers also of a very strange nature; of which the one called Crathis, makes a mans hair yellow, and dyeth silke white; the other named Buseantus, causeth both hair and silke to be black and swarthy.

The principal Cities of it are, 1. Consentia, an antient Town, comprehending seven little Hills, and a Cattle on the top of one of them, which commandeth both the Town and Country adjoining. It is built betwixt the said two Rivers, and is still reasonably rich, though not so wealthy now as in former times. 2. Rhegium, or Rhezo, on the Sea-shore, opposite to Messina in the Isle of Sicily, which is supposed to have been broken off from the rest of Italy, and that this Town had the name of Rhegium from the Greek word ῥήγιον, which signifieth to break off, or to tear asunder. A Town in former times very well traded, but left desolate in a manner since the year 1594. when it was fired by the Turks. 3. Castrovillare, seated upon the top of a very high Mountain 4. Belmont, and 5. Altomonte, two very fair Towns, whose names sufficiently expresse their pleasant and lofty situations. 6. St. Euphemie, from whence the Bay which antiently was called Sinus Lamestinus, or Lamestinus, is now called Golfo di St. Euphemie. 7. Nicastro, three miles from the Sea, the same with Newcastle in England.

On the West side of this Calabria, and properly a part thereof, but reaching to the North as far as Apulia, standeth that mountainous Country, which in the subdivision of these Provinces by King Alfonso, was called the BASILICATE; antiently the seat of the Lucani, and therefore called Lucania by the elder Latinists. Divided from the Principate, or West parts of Campania, by the River Silarus. A Country heretofore very unsafe for Travellers, by reason of the difficult ways, and assured company of Thieves; but now reduced to better order. It containeth in 93 walled places, Naples. places, and nine Towns or Cities, the chief whereof are, Possidonia, or Pest, a City situate in solement and benign a soil, that Roses grow there thrice a year. 2. Polycastro, on the Sea-shore, as the former is, honoured with the title of a Dukedom. And Dian or Diamus, a more midland City, near which there is Valley 20 miles in length, and four miles in breadth; which for all manner of delights, and fruitfulness, yields to none in Naples.

VII. The ISLES of NAPLES are either in the Adriatick, and Tuscan Seas, or in the Bay of Puteoli. In the Adriatick Sea, are the Islands of Diomedes, right against Apulia, where it encountereth with Abruzzo: so called from Diomedes King of Etolia, who after the end of the Trojan War, (in which he was so great a stickler) fettered himself in some part of Apulia; the principal whereof are, St. Maries, St. Dominico, and Tremitana. 2 The Island of Acates, over against the Town of Gallipoli. 3 St. Andrews, in the Bay of Tarentum. 4 And finally, the two Islands of Dioscoros and Calypso, over against the Cape of Lacinia, now called Colonne, in the upper Calabria. Of all which there is little famous. In the Tuscan or Tyrrhenian Seas, are the Islands of Pontia and Panditaria (now called Palmarde) as little famous as the other; save that the last is memorable in the Roman Stories, for the confinement of Agrippina the wife of Germanicus, and mother of Caligula, by the appointment of the Emperor Tiberius Nero.

Those in the Gulf or Bay of Puteoli are of better note. The principal whereof are 1 Ischia, heretofore called Oenotris, from its plenty of Wine, wherewith it aboundeth to this day; as also with Allom, Sulphur and most excellent fruits. It is in compass 18 miles, and so begirt with Rocks and dangerous Cliffs, that it is accessible at one entrance only; and that too fortified with a strong and impregnable Citadel: and therefore chosen by King Ferdinand for his place of refuge, when he was outed of his Kingdom by Charles the 8. Here is also good plenty of Hares and Conies. 2 Prochita, now called Prochita, about six miles in circuit, wherein are very wholesome Bathes, good store of Conies, Hares, and Pheasants; the shore replenished with Fish, and the land with Fountains. John de Prochita, who plotted the Sicilian Vespers, was once Lord of this place; but afterwards for a reward of that service, made Vice-roy of Valencia, a Kingdom of Spain. 3 Capree, a small rocky Island having no Haven, nor convenient station for Ships, but of a mild and temperate Air; much beautified by Augustus Caesar, in regard that an old sapless tree upon his casual landing here, did bud forth afresh. After that, it was much honoured by his retirement from affairs of State; and as much dishonoured by Tiberius his next Successor, who withdrawing hither many times from his Court at Rome, made it the Theater of his Cruelties, and most filthy Lulls. It hath a little City of the same name, having a fortress, and a Bishops See; and another Town called Anacapa, inhabited by Fishermen, and Ship-wrights belonging to the Navy of Naples. Into this Island they used to confine offenders in former times, and sometimes also at this day. 4 Anaria, a small Island given by Augustus to the Neapolitans in exchange for Capree, whose before it was.

There are few Nations under the Sun, who have suffered under more changes and alterations of State, than the Inhabitants of this Kingdom. For being at the first a mixture of several Nations, some of them preyed upon the others, till they were all subdued (as hath been shewn before) by the power of Rome. In the declining of her fortunes, they followed for the most part the Carthaginians, and took part with Annibal; and he being called home, they returned again to their old obedience. When Italy was subdued by the Goths, it became subject to that people, as Sicily, and the rest of those Islands did; and when the Lombards Lorded it in the Roman Provinces, all Naples fell into their hands, except Apulia and Calabria; which the Greek Emperors having conquered from the Goths with the rest of Italy, kept (but with much difficulty) to themselves. In the division of the Empire betwixt Carolus Magnus and Irene, these two last Provinces only were assigned to the Constantinopolitans, the rest to Charles, and his Successors: both outed of their several parts by the prevailing Saracens, under the conduct of Sabba, and other successive Generals. These partly dispossessed by the Emperor Otho the first, and his Amain forces; challenging a right herein, as King of Italy; that right confirmed and enlarged by the marriage of Otho the 2. with Theophania, Niece to Nicephorus Phocas the Eastern Emperour, who brought Apulia and Calabria for her Dower or Portion. But long the Germans had not held it, when they were again expelled by the Greeks and Saracens, joyning together against them as a common Enemy; who afterwards held bitter wars against one another, for the sole command. During these wars, it hapned that one Drangot a Gentleman of Normandy, having in the presence of Duke Robert (the Father of William the Conqueror) slain one Reposfel, a Gentleman of like quality; to avoid the justice of the Prince, and the practices of Reposfel's kindred, fled into this Countrey, attended by such of his followers, as either did depend upon his fortunes, or had been meddlers in the Fray. Where being come, the Duke Benevent, Vicegerent to the Eastern Emperour, took them into pay. Their entertainment being bruited in Normandy, and a report raised withal that the Greeks hearkned after men of valour and action; caused many private Gentlemen to pass over the Alpes, and there to hew themselves out a more prosperous fortune, than formerly they had enjoyed. The fortunate success of which last Adventurers, drew thither also Tancred, the Lord of Hauteville, who with his twelve sons came into Apulia, An. 1008. and in short time not only drove the Saracens thence, but the Grecians also, as men that had broke Covenant with them in the division of the Booty. For William the son of Tancred, combining with Melroco, Governour of Apulia for the Greek Emperour, and with the Princes of Capua and Salerno, men of power and honour, for the conquest of Sicily (which the Saracens then wholly held) agreed amongst themselves to divide the places conquered by them into four equal parts; one, for each Adventurer. But when the Saracens were driven out, Melroco having new supplies sent him out of Greece, seized on the possession of the whole Island in the Emperors name. Which injury William commonly dissembled till Melroco's Forces were dispersed, and then he suddenly set upon him; first took the City of Melfe, and after by degrees, most of the Towns and places which the Greeks held in Italy: of which both he and his Successors kept possession by the Title of Dukes of Calabria only. Of these (though all of eminent virtue) there were two besides this William, of special fame. 1. Robert Guiscard, the third son of Tancred, the most valiant Captain of his time, and chief establisher of the Normans power in Italy; to which he added in conclusion the Isle of Sicily, together with the City of Naples it self, and all the Lands which lie betwixt it and Rome. 2. Bohemund the eldest son of this Robert, who going with Godfrey of Bovillon and others of the Western Christians to the Holy Land, was for his signal merit invited with the Kingdom of Antioch; inherited by his children after his decease.

But to proceed, this Guiscard at his death, (but not without some wrong to the children of his Brother William, whom he had dispossessed of all by the Popes Authority) gave Sicily, with the title of Earl, to his son Rogero; and his estates in Italy, to his other son William: who going to Constantinople to marry with the Emperors daughter, was outed of his part by his brother Rogero; made not long after, by the Pope, the first King of this Family.

The Kings of Naples of the Norman Line.

- 1125 1 Rogero, Earl of Sicily, created by Pope Anacletus 2 King of both the Sicilies at the town of Benevent; which City, in requital of so great a favour, he restored again unto the Church, from which it had been taken (after the first Donation of it) by the German Emperors. 24.
- 1149 2 William, the son of Rogero, who to assure himself of his Kingdoms, was content to take them as a gift from the hands of Pope Adrian the 4. to be holden for ever in Fee of the Church of Rome. 21.
- 1170 3 William II. son of the former William, who left a daughter called Constance, who became a Nun. 26.
- 1196 4 Tancred, the base son of William the 2. excluded his Sister from the Crown, but was sententially deposed by Pope Celestine the 3. who had an aim to get the Kingdom for himself. But when he saw that Tancred was too strong for him, out of meer fright to be defeated of his purpose, he called in the Germans, the ancient enemies of his See; and gave the Lady Constance, then almost fifty years of age, in marriage unto Henry the 6. 2.

The German Line.

- 1198 5 Henry, the sixth of that name, Emperor, and Duke of Schwaben, succeeded on his marriage with the Lady Constance. 4.
- 1202 6 Frederick, son of the Emperor Henry and Queen Constance, crowned at the age of three years; afterwards Emperor by the name of Frederick the 2. He had to wife the daughter of John di Bren, the titular King of Hierusalem, of which the Kings of Naples have ever since had the Title of Kings; and in the rights of this Kingdom, the Kings of Spain.
- 1250 7 Conrade, the son of Frederick, King of Naples and Sicily, as also Emperor and Duke of Suevia, or Schwaben; poisoned (as it was conceived) by his base brother Manfred. 4.
- 1254 8 Manfroy or Manfred, base son of Frederick, and Duke of Benevent, first governed the Kingdom as Protector unto Conradine, the son of Conrade; but after took it to himself against the will of Pope Urban the 4. who being weary of the Germans, called in Charles Duke of Anjou, and the Earl of Provence, brother to Lewis the 10. of France: it being usual with the Popes (as Machiavel very well observeth) to call new men into Italy, and stir up new wars for their own ambition; not suffering any to possess that long which themselves (through their weakness) could not hold, and practising the overthrow of those very men, whom themselves had raised to power and greatness.

The French Line.

- 1261 9 Charles, Earl of Anjou and Provence, overcame King Manfred, and was after Crowned by Pope Vrbane the 4. who conditioned with him, that neither he nor his Successors should assume the Empire; and that they should pay fifty thousand Crowns per annum as a Rent to the Church. This Charles did also vanquish Conradine the son of Conrade, the last of the royal house of Suevia, whom he caused to be beheaded at Naples. After which bloody Act, neither he nor any of his posterity, did either quietly or long enjoy these Kingdoms. For in his owntime Peter King of Aragon, claimed the Kingdom of Naples, in right of Constance his wife, the daughter of Manfred: betwixt whom and Charles, a single combat was appointed to be fought in Bourdeaux, before King Edward the first of England, to decide the Controversie. But whilst Charles there expected him, he seized on Sicily, An. 1281. This Charles reigned three and twenty years.
- 1284 10 Charles II. son of Charles the first, formerly prisoner in Sicily to Peter of Aragon, was ransomed by the procurement of King Edward above named for 30000 Marks. By Mary, daughter of Stephen, King of Hungary, he had fourteen children: the most pertinent of which which (to our purpose) were Charles surnamed Martel, King of Hungary in right of his Mother; Robert King of Naples, John of Durazzo; and a daughter (whose name I finde not) married to Charles, Earl of Valois, who in her right obtained the Earldom of Anjou. 26.

- 1310 11 Robert, the second son of Charles the 2. 32.
 1342 12 Joane, the Niece of Robert by his son Charles, first married Andrew, the second son of Charles King of Hungary, whom she hanged at her window for insufficiency; and for her second husband had Lewis, Prince of Tarentum, who over-straining himself to satisfy her carnal appetite, died. Her third husband was James, Prince of Majorca, a gallant young Gentleman, whom she beheaded for lying with another woman. Her fourth, Otho of Brinswick, a tough Souldier, who had the good fortune to outlive her. She was twice driven out of her Kingdome by Lewis King of Hungary, brother of Andrew her first husband: restored the first time by the power of Pope Clement the sixth; but at the second time taken and hanged at the same window where she had hanged her first husband. But first, out of an hatred to her next heirs of the house of Hungary, she adopted Lewis Duke of Anjou, (descended from Charles Earl of Valois spoken of before) for her heir and successor.

The Hungarian Line.

- 1371 13 Charles III. son to Lewis, and nephew of Prince John of Durazzo before mentioned, by the power of Lewis, King of Hungary, and the favour of Pope Urban the fifth, was made King of Naples. He overthrew and killed in battel Duke Lewis of Anjou, his competitor, and after the death of King Lewis of Hungary, succeeded in that Kingdome also; but long he had not reigned therein, when poisoned (as it was supposed) by the old Queen Mother, to advance her daughter to that Throne. 15.
 1386 14 Ladislaus, son of Charles the 3. having a quarrel with the Pope, made a voyage Royal unto Rome, where he forced his entry, and was there triumphantly received: on which displeasure the Pope called in Lewis 2. Duke of Anjou, who gave Ladislaus a great overthrow. Inasmuch, as Ladislaus used to say, that if Lewis had followed his Victory the first day, he had been master of his Kingdome and Person too; if the second, of his Kingdome, but not of his Person: but not pursuing it till the third day, he failed of both. So in the end he was compelled to flee to Rome, and give over the enterprise. 29.
 1415 15 Joane II. Sister of Ladislaus, of as much levity, but not altogether of so ill a fame as the former Joane, observing the unprosperous successes of the house of Anjou, she adopted for her heir, Alphonso the fifth of Aragon; who had some claim unto the Kingdome as the direct heir of Pedro, or Peter the 3. and Constance the daughter of King Manfred, spoken of before. But finding him to stand too much on his own right, and to be too forwards in taking a possession of it, before her death; she revoked that Adoption, and made a new grant of that Estate to Lewis the fourth, Duke of Anjou, and after his decease to his brother Rene, or Renatus: both vanquished by the Aragonians.

The Aragonian Line.

- 1434 16 Alfonso King of Aragon, partly by Conquest, and partly by Adoption, having got the Kingdome; left it well settled unto Ferdinand, his natural son. 24.
 1458 17 Ferdinand, the base son of Alfonso (the lawful sons inheriting the Realm of Aragon Sicily, &c.) succeeded in the Realm of Naples. 36.
 1494 18 Alfonso II. Son of Ferdinand, in whose time the French began to aim at the Realm of Naples. This King and his two Predecessors were of the Order of the Garter.
 1494 19 Ferdinand II. Son of Alfonso the second, outed of his Estate and Kingdome by Charles the eighth, son of King Lewis the eleventh of France, whom Rene the last Duke of Anjou had made the sole Heir of all his Titles, and Possessions. And though Charles upon his Conquest was solemnly crowned, yet posting back again into France before he had settled his affairs in this Kingdome, and having much discontented the chief men of Anjou in Faction; she lost it suddenly to the same Ferdinand from whom he had so suddenly won it.
 1497 20 Frederick II. brother of Alfonso the second, and uncle of this last Ferdinand, succeeded him in his Estates; and was the sixth King that had reigned in Naples within the compass of three years: that is to say, Ferdinand the first, Alfonso the second, Ferdinand the second, Charles of France, the second Ferdinand again, and then this Frederick. Finding himself betrayed by the Spaniards, he submitted himself to Lewis the XII. King of France, and yielded up his Kingdome to him. And indeed what else could that poor Prince do, when he saw his own blood, and such as had taken his Realm into their protection, conspiring against him?

For when Charles made his passage towards Naples, Ferdinand the Catholick, sent Gonsalvo, (who was afterward for his valour surnamed the Great Captain) with some Forces to resist the French Invaders. But when the French were expelled, Gonsalvo would not leave the Country, because his Master had not as yet sent for him. In the mean time it was agreed between Lewis of France, and this Fer-

Ferdinand, that they should joyntly set upon the Kingdom of Naples: That having won it, the French should possess Abruzzo, and Lavoro; the Spaniards, Puglia, and both Calabrias: That the first should be entituled King of Naples; the other, Duke of Apulia. This Confederacy was kept secret till the French Forces were come to Rome; and Gonsalvo possessed (under pretence of defending it) of all Calabria. So that it was no marvel that they made themselves Masters of the Country. An Action in which the French dealt very unadvisedly, in bringing into Italy where he was before the sole Moderator, another King as great as himself; to whom as to his Rival, his enemies might have recourse on all occasions; and the Spaniards as unnaturally, in betraying for the moiety of a Kingdom, a Prince of his own blood, under pretence and promise of succours. But the two Kings did not continue long in good terms of Partnership. For the Spaniards being more intent upon their advantages, soon picked a quarrel with the French, within two or three years drove them out of all, and to this day keep it: though both this Lewis, and his successors Francis the first, and Henry the second, have divers times, and with great effusion of blood, attempted the recovery of it.

The Spanish or Castilian Line.

- 1503 22 Ferdinand III. surnamed the Catholick, King of Castile, Aragon, &c. and Naples. 131.
 1516 23 Charles V. Emperor, King of Spain, and the IV. of that name in Naples. 43.
 1558 24 Philip the 2. of Spain, and the first of Naples. 40.
 1598 25 Philip II. of Naples, 3. of Spain. 22.
 1621 26 Philip III. of Naples, 4. of Spain.

The Arms of this Kingdom are Azure, Seme of Flower de Lys, Or, a File of three Labels, Gules. The Revenues of it are two Millions and a half of Crowns; whereof 20000 are due to the Pope for Chief-rent; and the rest so exhausted in maintaining Garrisons upon the Natives, and a strong Navy against the Turks, that the King of Spain receiveth not a fourth part of clero.

The Kingdom of SICILIA.

Before we can come into the Isle of Sicily, we must first cross that branch of the MEDITERRANEAN Sea, which is called the Fare, or Strait of Messana; where the passage is so strait and narrow, that it exceedeth not in breadth a mile and a half. In other parts, as the Sea grows wider, it is distant from the main land of Italy near 300 miles; that is to say, from the Town of Drepanum in Sicily, to the City of Naples. As for the Mediterranean Sea, it is so called because it interlaceth the midst of the earth; extending from the Straights of Gibraltar on the West, to the Coast of Palestine on the East; and so dividing Africk both from Europe, and Asia Minor. In the Scriptures, Joel 1. 4. it is called by the name of Mare magnum, or the great Sea: great in the comparison of the dead Sea, and the Sea of Galilee, lying on the other side of the land of Palestine; but small enough if compared to the Ocean, with which in probability the Writer of that Book might have no acquaintance. Besides which general name of the Mediterranean, it hath also many particular names, as the Adriatick, Ægean, Ionian, and Carpathan Sea, where it bordereth upon Greece, and Anatolia; Mare Lybicum, where it runneth by the shores of Africk: with reference to Italy called in some places, Mare Tyrrhenum, in others Mare Ligusticum; in some parts Mare Siculum, and in others Mare Sardinum, &c. And as the Chameleon is said to apply it self to the colour of the nearest adjacent body; so this Sea taketh its particular denominations from the nearest shores. These Seas are also called by some modern Writers, in imitation of the French, by the name of the Levant, or the Seas of the Levant; because in respect of France, Spain, Britain, Germany, &c. they lie toward the East; the word Levant signifying in the French, a rising up, and more especially the Sun-rising. The principal Islands of this Sea which relate to Italy (for of others we shall speak in their proper places) are those of Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica and some Isles adjoining unto these.

SICILY environed round with the lower, or Tyrrhenian Sea, contains seven hundred miles in compass; and is supposed to have been joyned to Italy in former times, being then a Peninsula, or Demy-Island, such as Peloponnesus; and joyned to the Continent by as narrow an Isthmus. The reason of that name we shall see anon.

The separating of it from the main Land of Italy, is by the Poets ascribed to Neptune, who with his three-forked Mace or Trident broke it off from the land, in favour of Joculus the son of Æolus; that so he might inhabit there with the greater safety, being environed round with waters. Which though it be a Fable or Poetical fiction, yet with some help from the Mythologists, may be made a story. For if by Æolus, and Neptune, we understand the Winds and Seas, it intimates that it was divided from the rest of Italy, either by the fury of the Waves, or by the violence of some Earthquakes, to which this Island is still subject; which might in time consume and wear away the Earth. Nor want there very good reason for this supposition; as, 1. the narrowness of the Straight, exceeding not a mile and a half; inasmuch as at the taking of Messana by the Carthaginians, many of the people saved themselves by

by swimming over this Strait, into the opposite parts of Italy. 2. The shallowness of it, being found upon a diligent sounding, not to be above eight fathom deep. Then 'tis observed, that the land on both sides is very brittle, full of caves and chinks made in it by the working of the Sea, on this separation; and that on the Italian coast where the Strait is narrowest, there stands a City of old called Rhegium, which signifieth a breach or cutting off, from the Greek word Phrygus, which signifies to break off, or violently to pull asunder; and is supposed to be so called upon this occasion. And indeed the violence of the Sea is so great and dangerous in this narrow channel, so subject unto blustering winds issuing out of the hollow caverns of the earth; that the breaking off of this Island from the rest of Italy, is a thing most credible. Which dangerous nature of the passage, being also full of Rocks, and unsafe by reason of the Whirl-pools, occasioned it to be called by Florus the Historian, Fabulosus infame monstrosus fretum; chiefly so called with reference to Scylla and Charybdis, of which so many fabulous things are reported by the ancient Poets. Of these, Charybdis is a Gulf or Whirl-pool on Sicilie side, which violently attracting all vessels that come too nigh it, devourereth them, and casteth up their wracks at the shore of Tauromenium, not far from Catana. Opposite to this in Italy, standeth the dangerous Rock Scylla, at the foot of which many little Rocks shoot out; on which the water strongly bearing, making that noise, which the Poets feign to be the barking of dogs. The passage between these two being to unskilful Mariners exceeding perillous, gave beginning to the Proverb;

Incidit in Scyllam cupiens vitare Charybdim.

Who seeks Charybdis for to shun,
Doth oftentimes on Scylla run.

But there are other things which made Sicilie famous in old times, besides these two, as viz. the punishment of the Giant Enceladus, for his attempt against the gods: the frequent burnings of Aetna (under which he is fabled to be shut up) being supposed to proceed from his sulphurous breath. Secondly, the birth of Ceres in this Isle; and thirdly, the Rape of Proserpine. To these two last the Isle was consecrated in those dayes; to Ceres, in regard she first taught the people to sow Corn, whence the word Ceres is often used in the Poets to signifie Bread, and other necessary provisions for life, as Sine Cere & Baccho frigis Venus: To Proserpine, because bestowed upon her by Pluto, to please her after the Ravishment committed on her.

It is situate under the fourth Climate, the longest day being 13 hours and an half. And was once called Trinacria, because it shoots forth into the Sea with three Capes or Promontories: viz. 1. Pelorus, now Capo de Foro, to the North; 2. Pachinnus, now Capo Passaro, to the West; and 3. Lilybaeum, now Capo Boii, or Capo Caro, to the South. This last looketh towards Carthage, and the shores of Africk, from which distant 180 miles. And of this Strabo doth affirm, that a man of quick and strong sight getting up into a Watch-tower that stood in this Cape, descried a Fleet setting sayl out of the Haven of Carthage; and told the Lilybitians their bigness and number. That this is true, I dare not say: for besides the unlikelyhood of kenning at so great a distance; we are taught by Philosophy, that the Sea being of an orbicular form, wellerth it self into the fashion of a round Turret or Hill, till it put bound to the eye-sight. From these three corners, this Countrey was (as we have said) called Trinacris or Trinacria, according to that of Ovid.

Trinacris a positu, nomen adepta, loci.*

An Island with three corners braves the main,
And thence the name of Trinacris doth gain.

The first Inhabitants that we finde to have dwelt in this Countrey, are the huge Giants so often mentioned in the Odysses of the divine Poet Homer, called Laestrygones and Cyclopes; of which last rank was the so much famous Polypheumus, who with so much humanity entertained Ulysses and his companions. These were afterward rooted out by the Sicani, a people of Spain, who called it Sicania. As for the name of Sicilia, some derive it from Sicleus, a supposed King of Spain, who is fabled to have conquered this Countrey. But the truth is, it came from the Siculi, who being by Evander and his Arcadians driven out of Latium, came into this Island: to which, having Mastered the Sicani, and driven them from the West and the Northern part, to the East and South, they left their name. At their first landing they built the City of Zancle, called afterwards Messana, together with Nea, Hybla, Catana, and Leontium. After them came another Italian people named the Morgetes, being driven thence by the Oenstrians; and sat down in that part of the Island where stood the City of Morgentum, built by them at their first arrival. The first of all the Greeks who set footing in it (not to say any thing of the coming of Minos hither, in the pursuit of Daedalus, having more in it of the Fiction than Historical truth) were the Chalcidians, a people of the Isle Embasa, now called Negropont; who built the City of Naxos; and after them Architas of Corinth, with his fellow adventurers, by whom Syracuse was either first built, or very much beautified and repaired. Next them the Rhodians and Cretans sent some Colonies hither, the first Founders of Gela; and after of the renowned City of Agigentum: And not long after a new Plantation sent from Sparta built Heraclea. The Citizens of

of Megarus, another state of Greece, sent a Colony also, who built Selinus. And so did those of Messene also, who taking the Town of Zancle from the Siculi, new built or beautified it, and gave unto it so repaired the name of Messana. Nor is it to be thought, that the Tyrians and Phoenicians, being so great undertakers of publick business, and very powerfull in shipping, would sit still, when so fair a booty did invite their industry: who sailing on the Promontories of Pachinnus and Lilybaeum, and some of the adjoining Islands; did fortifie them for the better securing of the Trade which they had in Sicily. But all these several Adventurers having several interestes, joyned not together in the work of an absolute Conquest; but planting themselves only on the Sea-shores, altered not the name by which they found it called at their coming thither.

The people are ingenious, eloquent, and pleasant, but withall very unconstant, and so full of talk, that from thence came the Proverb, Gerra Sicula. They are also said to be of a very envious, suspicious, and distrustfull nature, incapable of injuries, and vehement in pursuit of revenge, as appears by that great slaughter which they made of the French: yet withall courteous enough to strangers, and Parasiticall enough to their superiors. They have been famous heretofore for many notable inventions, Aristotle ascribing to them the Art of Oratory, and first making of Pastoral Eclogues; Pliny of Clocks (or rather of Hour-glasses; for Clocks were but a late invention, and that of the Flemmings) and Plutarch of Military Engines; which last were brought by Archimedes unto great perfection.

The Christian Faith was first preached here, by some of the Disciples of St. Peter, whom he sent hither at his first coming to Rome; of which Pancratius (whom we call commonly St. Pancrace) is said to have been the first Bishop of Tauromenium, and Marianus of Syracuse. They are now generally of the Religion authorized by the Popes of Rome; that of the Greek Church being rather connived at than allowed of; in the Communion whereof here are thought to be ten thousand souls, but looked on by the rest as schismaticall people. For the most part they use the Italian Language, but very much altered, by the Greek, Arabian, Norman, French, and Spanish tongues; to which Nations they have been severally subject, since the time of the Romans. The totall number of the people is thought to be about a Million and a half.

The soyl is incredibly fruitfull in Wine, Oyl, Honey, Minerals of Gold, Silver, and Allom, together with plenty of Salt and Sugar; which last commodity the Natives sell in the Canes unto the Venetians, and buy it again of them when it is refined; and thereby letting strangers go away with the best part of their gains; as generally they do in all other Merchandize, which they permit to be exported, rather than put themselves to the trouble of Trafficking abroad in Foreign Nations. There are also Gems of Agates, and Emeralds. It yeeldeth also great store of the richest Silks, which grow plentifully about Messana; variety of most excellent and delicious fruits, both for taste and colour: with such abundance of all sorts of Grain, that it was called in old times Horreum Romanum, or the Granary of the Roman Empire; and doth now furnish some parts of Italy, Spain, and Barbary, besides Malta, and the adjacent Isles, with that which can spare of her superfluities. Nay, Tully doth not only call it the Granary and store-house of the City of Rome, in regard of Corn, but addes that it was accounted for a well-furnished Treasury; as being able of it self without charge of the State, to cloath, maintain, and furnish the greatest Army, with Leather, Corn and Apparell. And if Diadormis Siculus may be credited in it, he telleth us, that about Leontium and some other places, Wheat did grow of it self, without any labour of the Husbandman. At this day in some parts of the Isle, the soyl is so exceeding fruitful, that it yeelds unto the Husbandman an hundred measures of Corn for one. And certainly the Corn of this Countrey must needs yeeld a wonderfull increase, the King of Spain receiving an hundred thousand Crowns yearly for the Custome of Wheat. In this Countrey is the Hill Hybla, so famous for Bees and Honey; neer which there was a City of the same name also, which afterwards was called Megara. And here is also the Hill Aetna, now called Mont-gibel, which continually sendeth forth flames of Fire, to the astonishment of all beholders. The most famous conflagrations in the former times were presently before the breaking out of the War in Sicily, which the Roman Writers call Bellum servile; not pacified but by the slaughter of 70000 of the Slaves which had taken Arms against Rome; and shortly after the death of Julius Caesar, portending those proscriptions and bloody Wars, which did after follow. And to this day such extraordinary eruptions of it are accounted ominous. The Hill it self is of that height, that it is ten miles from the top to the bottom, and may be easily discerned by Saylers at an hundred miles distance: the lower parts thereof being very fruitful, the middle shaded with Woods, and the top covered with Snow, a great part of the year, notwithstanding the frequent vomiting of flames and cinders. But these eruptions of fire are not now so ordinary as they have been formerly; the matter which gave fuel to it being wasted by continual burnings; so that the flames which issue hence are hardly visible but by night; though the smook shew it self the most part of the day. And when it doth break out, which is commonly once in three or four years, it falleth in great flakes on the Vales adjoining, to the destruction of the Vintage, and great loss of the Countrey. But that, they say, is recompensed by the plenty of the following years; the ashes thereof so barling and enriching the soyl, that both the Vines and Corn-fields are much bettered by it. And this report I am the apter to believe, in regard we find by late experience here amongst our selves, that the Turf taken from the ground and burnt to ashes, and so spread on land and ploughed into it, doth yeeld a very great improvement, even to barren soyls. Which kind of Husbandry is called the Devonshire of land, because there first used; but in Hampshire it was called, as I remember (having been unfortunately too long a stranger there) by the name of burning and beaking. But to return again to Aetna; Into this fiery Furnace the Philosopher Empedocles cast himself, that he might be reputed a God.

Dcus

Deus immortalis haberi
Dum cupit Empedocles, ardentem fervidus Aetna
Insultat
as Horace in his Book de Arte Poetica.

Empedocles to be a God desires,
And casts himself into th' Aenean fires.

The reason of these fires is the abundance of Sulphur and Brimstone, contained in the bosome of the Hill; which is blown by the wind, driving in at the chaps of the Earth, as by a pair of bellows. Through these chinks also there is continually more fuel added to the fire, the very water adding to the force of it: as we see that water cast on coals in the Smiths Forge, doth make them burn more ardently. The reason of this flame is thus set down by Ovid.

Ista bitumineæ rapiunt incendia vires,
Luteaq; exiguis ardescent sulphura flammis.
Atq; ubi terra cibos alimentaq; debita flamma
Non dabit, absumpsit per longum viribus ævum,
Naturæq; summi nutrimentum decrit edaci,
Non feret Aetna famem, desertaq; deseret ignes.

A rozen mould these fiery flames begin,
And clayie brimstone aids that fire within:
Yet when the slimie soyl consumed, shall Yeeld no more food to the feed fire withall,
And Nature shall restrain her nourishment,
The flame shall cease hating all famishment.

Under this Hill some Poets feign the Gyant Enceladus to have been buried, as before is said, whose hot breath fired the mountain lying on his face. Others suppose it to be the Shop of Vulcan, and the Cyclops; and the grofs Papists take it for the place of Purgatory; all alike unfallible.

The principal Rivers hereof, 1. Taranta, anciently called Terisus. 2. Himera, neighboured by Mount Hybla, much famed for Honey. 3. Isaurus. 4. Hypsa. 5. Acausius, of great note for its precious stones. None of them much observable for length or breadth, but that defect supplied by the commodiousness of Bays and Creeks, which are very frequent in this Island; and by the benefit of Fountains and fresh-water Lakes. Most memorable amongst these, 1. The Lake called Palicorus, (now Napibia) which for three moneths doth cast forth water very hot, but of very ill smell; of which there is mention made in Pliny, by the name of Ephintia. 2. A Fountain near the foot of Aetna, the water whereof is sharp like Vinegar; and sometimes boyleth; into which a piece of cloth cast, being before steeped in water mixed with Gall, becomes suddenly black. 3. Another Fountain near Drepanum, the water of which, as soon as drunk, provoketh looseness. All which effects proceed from that sulphureous and bituminous matter, of which the whole Island is exceeding full. 4. Arethusa, of greater fame among the Ancients, than all the rest, especially in that the River Alpheus (a River of Greece) having swallowed up one hundred and forty lesser streams, and losing it self under the ground, is thought to empty it self into it. The thing affirmed by Seneca and Strabo both; and seems to be sufficiently proved, by the several instances of a wooden dish or cup lost in the River Alpheus, and found rising up in this River; and by the leaves of certain trees growing on the banks of that Greek River, and swimming on this in great abundance; there being none of these trees in all Sicily. Dicitur Alpheus (scilicet Aetna) se non confociare pelago; sed subter maria, terrasq; depressus, hinc agere alveum, atq; hic se rursus extollere.

This Island is famous for the worthy Scholars she once produced, viz. Aeschylus, the first Tragedian of fame; who being bald through age, once walked in the fields, where by chance an Eagle taking his bald pate for a white Rock, let a shell-fish fall on it, of that bigness that it beat out his Brains. 2. Diodorus Siculus, that famous Historian. 3. Empedocles the first inventor of Rhetorick; and his fellow Gorgias. 4. Euclide, the textuary Geometrician, who taught in Megaris. 5. Archimedes, a most worthy Mathematician, the first Author of the Sphere; of which instrument he made one of that art and bigness, that one standing within, might easily perceive the several motions of every celestial orb. He made also divers military Engines, which in the siege of Syracusa sorely vexed the Romans (and was at last slain in his study by a common Souldier in the sack of the Town, to the great grief of the General Marcellus. 6. Epicharmus, the first inventor of Comedies; and 7. Theocritus, the first Author of Pastoral Eclogues. In the latter times, Nicolas Abbot of Palermo, a learned Canonist, and Cardinal of the Church of Rome, commonly called Panormitanus, was of greatest fame.

In Plinius time there were reckoned in this Island seventy two Cities, of which only twelve are now remaining. The whole divided at this time into three small Provinces, that is to say, 1. Val de Noto. 2. Mazara, 3. and Mona; to which the Isles adjoining may add a fourth.

1. VALLIS DE NOTO taketh up the Eastern parts of the Island. The chief Cities of which are, 1. Syracusa, once the Metropolis of the whole Island, and a most flourishing Common-wealth, it was (as Tully reports) the greatest and goodliest City of all that were possess'd by the Greeks, for for situation very strong; and of an excellent prospect, from every entrance both by Sea and Land. The Port thereof which had the Sea on both sides of it, was for the most part environed with beautiful buildings; and that part of it which was without the City, was on both sides banked up, and sustained with very fair walls of Marble. Nor was it only the goodliest City of the Greeks, as Tully tells us, but one of the greatest also in the World, as is said by Strabo; by whom it is affirmed, that without the outmost wall thereof, (for it was environed with three Walls) it contained one hundred and eighty Furlongs in compass, which of our measure cometh to eighteen miles. It was compounded of four Towns made up into one, that is to say, Insula (or the Isle) Acradine, Neapolis, and Tyche; besides the Port called Hexapla, which commanded the rest; the greatness of all which, the ruines and foundations of it do still demonstrate. It standeth North of the Promontory called Pachinus, and was built by Architas of Corinth, about the time of Jotham King of Judah; who being for an unnatural Rape, committed on a young Gentleman, banished his Country, together with his friend and Companion Miscellus; consulted with the Oracle at Delphos, how and in what place they should dispose of themselves. The Oracle demanding whether they most affected wealth, or health: Miscellus answered health, and Architas wealth; and thereupon the former was directed to settle himself at Crotone in Italy, and the other here. Nor did the Oracle deceive him in his expectation; this Town by reason of its beautiful and commodious Port, proving of greatest trade and wealth next to Carthage it self, in those times of the World. It was the custom of this Town, when any of the Citizens grew too potent, to write his name in an Olive leaf; which being put into his hand, did without more ado condemn him to banishment for five years, and was called Petalisme, from the Greek word Πτελον, signifying a leaf. Yet could not this device so well secure them in the possession of their so much desired Freedom, but that this City fell oftner into the power of Tyrants, than any one City in the World. That which is now remaining of it is the work of Augustus, who after a second destruction of it in the time of Pompey, sent a Colony hither, and built upon the Isle and the parts near unto it. But now the whole Isle (Ortygia the Ancients called it) is taken up with a very strong Castle; the whole City also being very well walled, and held by a Garrison of Spaniards. 2. Noto, which gives name to this whole Division. A City which heretofore contended with Syracusa in point of greatness: situate on a very high Rock, unaccessible on all sides but by one narrow passage; and having under the Cape of Passari a very fair and capacious Harbour, the Key of Sicily on that side. 3. Augusta, situate on the shore also, and of so large a Haven that it could never be fortified. 4. Castro Giovannis, a Town of about four thousand Families, situate in a wholesome air, and a fruitful soil, which they hold to be the very Navel and exact middle of the Island. It is also much prized for Mines of most excellent Salt. 5. Lentini, famous for its Lake, whose fishing is farmed for eighteen thousand Crowns yearly. It was anciently called Leontium, and stood somewhat North of Syracusa; with which continually in war, either to preserve their own Liberties, or get the Sovereignty of the other. 6. Enna, a midland Town, whence Pinto is said to have ravished Proserpine: In after times the dwelling of that Syrus Ennius, who stirred up the Roman Slaves against their Lords; and having broke open the common Prisons, and received all such as came unto him, patched up an Army of forty thousand. This War the Roman Writers call Bellum Servile, ended at last, but with no small difficulty, by the valour and good fortune of P. Rutilius.

2. MAZARA containeth all the West parts of the Island. The chief Cities whereof, 1. Agri-gentium, now called Gergenti, famous for Phalaris the Tyrant, and his torturing Perillus in a Brazen Ball, which he had made for the destruction and torture of others. Of which aptly Ovid, —Nec enim lex iustior ulla est,

Quam necis Artifices arte perire sua.

Most just it is a Man should be tormented
With that, which first his cruel Wit invented.

It was said anciently of the people of this City, that they built as if they should never die, and eat as if they were sure to live no longer. 2. Palermo, anciently called Panormus, and then a Colony of the Phœnicians; now the chief City of Sicily, and the Seat of the Spanish Vice-roy. Situate on the West Cape of the Island looking towards Sardinia, beautified with large Streets, delicate buildings, strong walls, and magnificent Temples. It hath no natural Port appertaining to it, (Drepanum serving anciently as the Port thereof) but of late there is an Haven forced out by a mighty Pierre; a work of vast expence, and worthy of the greatness of Rome. It is also an Arch-bishops See, and an University. 3. Monreale, commonly called Morreale, famous for the Church, the Arch-bishops See. It is called in Latine, Mons Regalis. 4. Drepanum, now called Trapani, situate on a Promontory thrusting into the Sea, not far from that of Lilybium, a Town well fortified, in regard of the ill neighbourhood of the Moors, who do often pillage on these coasts; and having the Command of a very fair Port. The Inhabitants of this place are said to be the best Seamen of Sicily. 5. Mazara, which gives name unto all this Vale, situate South of Lilybium, and not far from Selinus. 6. Eryx, situate on a Mountain over-looking the Sea, said by the Ancients to have took this name from Eryx the son of Venus, slain here by Hercules: memorable in those elder times for being the Seat of K. Acistes, who so kindly entertained Aeneas, and his wandering Trojans; and a magnificent Temple, in which Venus was worshipped, who from thence was called Erycina; as Sive tu mavis Erycinam ridens, in the Poet Horace. This was the last Town which the Carthaginians held in Sicily. On the furrendry whereof by Anilcar the Father of Annibal; at the end of the first Punic War, it was conditioned by the Romans, amongst other things, that the Carthaginians should relinquish all the claim or title which they had to any part of this Island; which thereby fell unto the Romans (the State of Syracusa excepted only.) Who, whatsoever colour they were pleased to put upon that action, were principally tempted to it by ambition and covetousness. And therefore in my mind Florus states it rightly, who saith, that it was undertaken specie quidem jurandi Sociis, re autem sollicitante prada; i.e. under pretence of aiding the Mamertines, who had put themselves into their protection, but in plain terms to get possession of the Island which lay fit for Italy. Now and long since a ruine only, the place on which it stood being called Mount St. Julian. 7. Segesta, on the Sea-side, not far from Eryx, near unto which the Trojan Ladies weary of their many long and dangerous voyages, and fearing to go again to Sea, burnt the Fleet of Aeneas; on which occasion it was built. Peopled at first by such of the more old and feeble Trojans, (Longevusque senes, & fessas agere matres, as the Poet hath it) who chose rather to fix their dwelling here, than to follow the fortunes of Aeneas, in his quest of Italy. Called then Acesta, in honour of King Acestes spoken of before, part of whose Kingdom it was made; afterwards Egesta, from Egestas one of Trojan race, born here, by whom it was repaired and beautified; and at last Segesta.

3. MONA lieth on the North-east of the Island, opposite unto Palis de Noto. The chief Towns of it, 1. Nicosia, in the mid-land. 2. Milase, on the Northern Promontory. 3. Messana, a City of great strength and beauty, just opposite to Rhezo in Italy. It was the first Town which the Romans had in this Island, being put into their hands by the Mamertines, a Troop of Souldiers brought thither out of Campania for the defence of the City; who finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, made themselves Masters of the place; but being withal too weak to hold it, chose rather to surrender it to the Romans, than to its true and proper Owners. Hence the beginning of the first War betwixt Rome and Carthage. A City it is at this time, of the most beautiful building of any in Sicily; and peopled by the wealthiest sort both of Merchants and Gentlemen, who live here in great pleasure (if not voluptuousness) as having plenty of all necessary provisions, fruits of all kinds, delicious Wines, and Snow to moderate and qualifie the heats thereof, at cheaper rates than any elsewhere in the Country. On the West side there stands a strong Citadel, highly mounted, and well Garrisoned, which commands the Town: and not far off a very high Lanthorn, where lights are kept burning all night long, for the direction of such Mariners, as are to pass those dangerous Straights; which from this Phare or Watch-Tower, is called commonly the Phare of Messana. The Haven of this Town is the fairest of Sicily, whose entrances are so strongly fenced and bulwarked, that the people let their Gates (in derision of the Turks) stand alwayes open. It is also an Arch-bishops See. 4. Catanara, so often vexed by Dionysius the Tyrant of Syracuse; more ancient then beautiful: seated on the North side of a great (but hollow) Bay, not easily approached by Ships, and therefore neither held by any Garrison, nor much traded by Merchants; the riches of the place consisting principally in the fruitfulness of the soil, the habitation of many of the Gentry, and by being a small University. It was once a Colony of the Naxians. And so was also Tauromenium, the fifth Town of note in this part of the Island, called sometimes from its Founders Naxos, but now Thermino; a ruine only of what was in the former dayes; a place by nature of great strength, but over-topped by Syracusa and Messana, betwixt which it standeth. It was in this part of the Country that the Cyclops dwelt, there being three little rocky Islands (now not inhabited) not far from this Town, which for a long time were called Cyclops Scopuli.

4. On the West part of Sicily lie the ÆOLIAN or Vulcanian Islands, heretofore only seven, and all almost of equal bigness; now eleven in number. The first name derived from Æolus, once Lord of them; who being well skilled in divining from what coasts the Winds would blow, (which he conjectured by the smok ascending from them) occasioned the Poets to make him the God of the Winds. The other is derived from Vulcan the God of Fire; by reason of the continual flames of fire from thence evaporating in those elder dayes. But now the matter of those flames being waited in long tract of time, there is only one of them which burneth, now called STOMBOLO; by some Writers Strongyle, from the roundness of it. An Island of about ten miles compass, but such as seems to be no other then a large round Mountain. Out of the top whereof issueth continually a flame like a burning Beacon, easily discernible far off, but at nights especially: a place so full of horror to the neighbouring Islanders, that they and many others of the Romish Catholics conceive it to be Hell it self. And yet in those parts where the rage of the fire offendeth not, it is of a very fruitful soil, and apt for tillage.

2. But the fairest and best peopled of those Islands, is that of LIPARA, some ten miles in circuit, (from whence the rest are called the Liparian Isles) so named from Lipara the chief Town, said to be built in the time of Josiah King of Judah; the See of a Bishop, under the Arch-bishop of Messana. The Island generally fruitful, well furnished with Allom, Sulphur, and Bitumen; and with some hot medicinal Batches, which are much frequented, and from thence called Thermessa, by the ancient Writers. It was formerly of so great wealth, that falling into the displeasure of Agathocles (then the Tyrant of Syracuse) they were able to buy their peace of him, at the sum of one hundred Talents of Gold; which sum they had no sooner paid, but the Tyrant for a farewell, robbed their very Temples. Unprosperous in his Actions always after that adventure. Nor sped it better with the Turks, who in the year 1544. laid the Country desolate; in which condition it remained, till Charles the sixth replenished it again with Spaniards, and fortified it very strongly against all invasions.

3. Not far off lieth another of these Islands, now called FAVOGANA, or Fauciana, but anciently Ægusa, conceived to be the same which Livy and Florus call Ægates; in which there is a fair and capacious Bay, able to receive the greatest Navies; and near to which Lucretius Catulus the Consul gave the Carthaginians their last blow at Sea, which drew along with it the surrendry of Eryx, and the loss of Sicily. Dedyne, Ericosa, Eunymos, and Phenicusa, four other of these Islands, but of lesser note, I pass over willingly; and make haste to

4. HIERO, the seventh and last of these Islands of any consideration, and the eighth in tale, called also Vulcania, in which Vulcan was worshipped; said to have first appeared above the water at such time as Scipio African died. A barren, stony, and uninhabited place, by reason of the fires which formerly have flamed so hideously (especially in the year 1444.) that it made not only the rest of these Islands, but all Sicily tremble. Near unto this Isle was fought the first Naval fight betwixt Rome and Carthage. Before which time the Romans had never used the Seas, as being totally employed in the conquest of Italy; inasmuch that when they had built their Gallies, they were fain to exercise their men in rowing, by placing them on two Seats near the water with Oars in their hands. Which notwithstanding, having devised an Engine like a Grapling hook, they so fastned the Adverse Fleet unto them, that the whole fight seemed a Land-battel fought upon the Sea. The victory fell unto the Romans, C. Duilius the Consul then commanding in Chief; and honoured with the first Naval triumph that was ever solemnized at Rome.

After this Island was once known to the Greeks, they sent from all their chief Cities several Colonies, who planted in the Sea-coasts of the Country, as before noted. But so as they never united themselves in a body together, but had their several estates and particular ends; whereby they came to be divided into many factions, and at last made themselves a prey to as many Tyrants. Phalaris lording it at Agrigentum, Penates at Leontium, Gelon at Syracuse, Cleander at Gela; and when one Faction grew too weak to resist the other, they called in several Foreign Nations to abet their quarrel. For on this ground the Carthaginians were first called into Sicily by the Messanians, against the Aggrigentines. And on the same was managed here a great part of the Peloponnesian Wars: the Athenians siding with the Leontines, and the Spartans with the Syracusans: in which the whole power of Athens was broken by Sea and Land; and their two Generals Nicias and Demosthenes, murdered in prison. But because Syracuse was a City of the greatest Authority, and of greatest influence over theret of Sicily, we shall more punctually insist on the State affairs thereof. The Government of which at first was popular, as it was in most of the Greek Colonies, according to the platforms which they brought from home; and was but newly altered to the Aristocratical, when Gelon made himself King of it, about 26. years after the expulsion of the Tarquins at Rome; whom with as many as succeeded in the Royal dignity, take along as followeth.

The Tyrants, or Kings of Syracuse.

- A.M.
3465 1 Gelon, the Prince or Lord of Gela, taking advantage of the quarrels in Syracusa, betwixt the Magistrates and People, made himself Master of the City; and was chosen King. A valiant and prudent Prince, by whom 150000 Carthaginians were slain in battel, for their first welcome into Sicily. 7.
3472 2 Hiero, the brother of Gelon, a valiant King also, but a rude and coverous man, whereby he lost the love of his people. 11.
3484 3 Thrasybulus, brother of Hiero, whose Government proved so cruel and unsupportable, that he held it not above 10 Moneths; who being forced into Exile by the Syracusans, the people did a while enjoy their liberty; but withal fell into those Factions, which after 60 years made them lose it again.
3544 4 Dionysius, that so famous Tyrant, from being General of the Forces of the Syracusans, made himself their King: A man of great vices, but great virtues withal. He brought almost all Sicily under his obedience, and the Town of Rhegium in Italy, reigning in all 38 years.
3582 5 Dionysius II. succeeding his Father in his Kingdom and vices, but not in valour or wisdom, was first outed by Dion a noble Gentleman of Syracuse; and afterward taken Prisoner by Timoleon of Corinth, to which City he was sent, and there died in Exile.
3635 6 Agathocles, by trade a Potter, after that a Souldier; 20 years after the death of Timoleon, made himself King of Syracuse. To draw the Carthaginians out of Sicily, he passed over into Africk, and besieged Carthage; which example Scipio after followed, but with better fortune. 29.
3681 7 Hiero II. of a Commander of their Armies chosen King of Syracuse, by a Party which he had made amongst them. In his time brake out the first Punic War, the Romans being called in by the Mamertines, who held Messana against the Carthaginians; the Lords at that time of the greatest part of the Island. 56.
3737 8 Hieronymus, the son of Hiero, after whose death Syracuse and all Sicily became subject to Rome, by the fortunate conduct of Marcellus.

Of these eight Kings, the six first commonly pass under the name of Tyrants; from whence, and from some others of like disposition, who lorded it over the rest of the free Cities of Sicily, the name of Siculi Tyranni grew into a Proverb. But of all none more hated than the two Dionysii, who were so odious, that there were continual execrations poured on them; only one old woman praying for the life of the later. Who being asked the cause, made answer, that she knew his Father to have been a monstrous and wicked Tyrant; on whom when the curses of the people had prevailed, and obtained his death; this his son succeeded, worse by far than he; for whose life she was resolved to pray, left after his death the Devil himself should come amongst them. But to proceed, after these Tyrants, as they called them, were rooted out, and the Island was conquered by Marcellus, it always followed the fortune of the Roman Empire; till in the partition of that Empire, it fell together with Apulia and Calabria, into the power of the Greeks. In the declining of whose greatness, this Island having been miserably pillaged and spoiled by the Emperor Constantine, An. 669, became a prey to the Saracens; from them recovered again by the help of the Normans, who held both this and the Realm of Naples, in Fee of the Church, under the title of Kings of both Sicils. From that time forwards it ran the fortune of that Kingdom, subject unto the Princes of the Norman and German lines, till the death of Conrade, no interruption intervening. After whose death when Manfroy or Maufrede, the base son of the Emperor Frederick, and brother of Conrade, had forcibly made himself King of these Countries; it was offered to Richard Earl of Cornwall, Brother to Henry the third of England: a Prince of such riches, that he was able to dispend an hundred Marks per diem, for ten years together; which according to the Standard of those times, was no small sum. But the conditions which the Pope proposed were so impossible for the Earl to perform, that his Agent told him, he might as well say to his Master, I will give thee the Moon; climb up, catch, and take it. The Earl refusing it, it was offered the King for his second son Edmund, who was invested by the gift of a Ring, and money was coined in his name by the Pope's appointment, with the inscription of Almudus Rex Sicilia. But the King not being able to pursue the business, because then overburthened by his Barons Wars, and the Pope having sucked no small store of Treasure from him; it was in the year 1261. given unto Charles Earl of Provence and Anjou, brother to Lewis the 10. Under him those Countries jointly continued subject till the year 1281. in which his Competitor, Peter of Aragon, claiming it in right of his wife the daughter of Manfroy before mentioned, promising him to fight a single combat before our K. Edward the first, at Bordeaux, fail'd of his Word; and in the mean time so contrived it, that at the sound of a Bell tolling to prayers, all the French men in Sicily were cruelly massacred. This exploit is known now under the name of Vesperis Sicilis; and was managed by John de Prochita, a Gentleman of the Realm of Naples, whom Charles had dispossessed of the Isle of Prochita, whereof he had been formerly Lord; and not content to do him such a piece of injustice, added a further infolency to it, in the forcing his Wife. Provoked with these two injuries, the abused Gentleman plots with King Pedro of Aragon, to make him Master of the Isle of Sicily, where he had very good intelligences; and where the French by reason of their Lusts and Infolencies had so exasperated the Natives; that they were capable enough of any such impressions, as a man sharing with him in his sufferings, could imprint upon them. According to the compact made, Don Pedro rigged out his Navy, under pretence of some exploit against the Moors, and anchoreth in the Port of Sardinia, there to expect how well the Tragedy would be acted; which fell out so agreeably to his expectation, that in one instant as it were, on the signal given, the French were universally murdered in all parts of the Island: the people being so enraged, that they would not spare women great with child, if supposed to have been got by any of that hated Nation; and Pedro coming in with his Navy as the deed was done, was by the general consent of all sorts of people, crowned King of Sicily. A bloody policy, I confess, which as the Actors learned of the English Saxons, who had made like riddance of the Danes; so did they teach it to the French, who practised it on the Hugonots of France in that horrid Massacre of Paris, An. 1572. An Act which so provoked the Pope, that he solemnly accursed the King, and caused many of the neighbouring Princes to arm against him. But the Fox fare'd never the worse for that: who did so order his affairs, that he did both clear his own Country of those Enemies which on the Popes curse had come in against him; and settled Sicily more firmly in obedience to him. Since which time this Island hath belonged to the House of Aragon, but not always in possession of the Kings thereof, being a while governed as a State apart by its own Kings, whose succession followeth.

Kings of Sicily of the House of Aragon.

1281. 1 Pedro, or Peter the third King of Aragon by birth, of Sicily in the right of his wife, the choice of the people, and the Legacy of Corradine (the last of the Royal line of Suevia) but principally by the power of the sword.
1291. 3 Frederick, the brother of James, on his brotherstakeing the Crown of Aragon, got possession of Sicily. By Frederick Alfonso, a younger son of this Frederick, the title of Duke of Athens came into this Family.
1336. 4 Peter, or Pedro II. Son of Frederick.
1342. 5 Frederick II.
- 6 Peter, or Pedro III.
- 7 Lewis, son to Peter III.
- 8 Frederick III. in the life of Lewis his brother called Duke of Athens; after his death succeeded in the Kingdom of Sicily.
1389. 9 Martin, son to Martin the first, King of Aragon, succeeded in the right of his wife Blanch, daughter of Frederick the third; and dying without issue, gave the Kingdom unto Martin his Father.
1409. 10 Martin II. of Sicily, and the first of Aragon, of which last he was King by birth, and of the former by the gift of his son. After which time the Isle of Sicily being again united united to the Crown of Aragon, was never separated from it; except it were when John King of Aragon gave it to Ferdinand his son, the better to fit him for the bed of Isabel Princess of Castile, with whom the match was then in treaty; and when the Emperor Charles the fifth gave it, with Naples, unto Philip his eldest son, on his marriage with Mary Q. of England, who thereupon was stiled King of Naples, Sicily, and Hierusalem. But this held only for a year; his Father shortly after resigning to him all his Kingdoms; whereby it became joyned to Spain again.

The Revenues of this Kingdom are by some said to be but 800000, but as others say, a million of Ducats; most of which is again disbursed on the entertainment of the Vice-roy, and the defence of the Island. The Arms are, Or, four Pallets Gules (being those of Aragon) betwixt two Flanches Argent, charged with as many Eagles Sable, beaked Gules, which was the bearing of Manfroy King of Naples, and Sicil, spoken of before, who gave those Arms with reference to his descent from the German Emperours.

This Island for the number of its Nobility compares with Naples; as having in the time of Ortelius, 80. years ago, 7 Princes, 13 Marquesses, 14 Earls, 1 Vicount, 48 Barons: Men of authority and power in their several Territories, and therefore not permitted to live much in the Island; the greatest part of their time being spent in the Court of Spain; but more to satisfy that King upon reason of State, than any affection of their own to so long an exile. And for the Government of the Church;

Here are
Archbishops 3. Bishops 9

The Kingdom of SARDINIA.

THE Island and Kingdom of SARDINIA lieth West from Sicily; from the nearest point whereof called Cape Boti, or Cape Coro. It is distant about 200 miles. It is in length 180 miles 90 in breadth, 560 in the circuit; and is situate under the 4. Climate, the longest day being 14 hours.

In the time of Aristotle it was called Ichnusfa, next Sandaliotis; from the resemblance which it hath to a mans Shooe or Sandals; and finally Sardinia from Sardus the son of Hercules, who coming out of Africk possessed the same. For this there is sufficient authority amongst the Ancients. Of the first names saith Pliny in as plain terms as may be, that Timaeus called Sardinia Sandaliotis; and Myrsilus, Ichnusfa, from the similitude which it hath to the Shooe-sole, or impression of a mans foot on the ground; Sardiniam Timaeus Sandaliotin appellavit ab effigie sole; Myrsilus, Ichnusam a similitudine vestigii. And for the last nothing can be more plain than that of Pausanias, who tells that the first who came by shipping unto Sardinia, were certain Africans under the conduct of Sardus the son of Maceris, whom the Egyptians called by the name of Hercules; who coming into this Island then called Ichnusfa, τὸ ἐν τῷ ἑνὶ Σάρδου τέρῳ περιβαλὼν τὸν ποταμὸν, caused it after his own name to be called Sardinia. For further evidence whereof, the people in the Latin tongue are called Sardi; the adjoining Sea, Mare Sardonum. And to this name it was so constant, that no following Plantations from other Countries, were ever able to alter it. Some Companies of Antica, led by Iolani, came and settled here, where they built Olbia, and Agrillia: leaving a memory of Iolani their Captain in some places, which remained in the time of Pausanias, called Iolania; and taking to themselves for his sake the name of Iolatenenses. And after the destruction of Troy, some of that scattered Nation came and planted in some void parts of the Island, kept to themselves the name of Iienenses, and by that name are mentioned both by Pliny and Livy. But neither of these Nations did attempt the change of the name, because not of ability to suppress or out-power the Natives. Nor could the Carthaginians do it, though a more puissant Nation then the former were; and such as by the nearness of their habitation (Sardinia being distant but 160 miles from Africk) had all advantages to make (as at last they did) a full Conquest of it: building therein the Cities of Charmis, Chalaris, and Sulchi; and holding it until it was unjustly extorted from them by the Romans, at the end of the first Punic War: at what time Carthage was in danger to be ruined by the revolt of her own Mercenaries; and so not able to resist.

But of the name and first Plantations of this Island we have said enough. Let us now look upon the place; in which it is reported that there is neither Wolf nor Serpent, neither venomous nor hurtful Beast, but the Fox only, and a little Creature like a Spider, which will by no means endure the light of the Sun, except held by violence. Some Pools it hath, and those very plentiful of Fish; but generally so destitute of River water, that they are fain to keep the rain which falls in Winter for their use in Summer. By means whereof, and for that there is no passage for the Northern winds, being obstructed by the high Mountains near Cape Lugadori, the air is generally unhealthy if not pestilential: Inasmuch that Tully writing to his brother Quintus being then in this Island, adviseth him to remember, as in point of health, that he was in Sardinia; and speaking of Tigellus a Sardinian born, saith of him, that he was more pestilent than the Country which bred him.

The soyl is very fertile in respect of Corfica, but barren if compared with Sicil; which yet may rather be imputed to the want of good manuring in the Husbandman; than any natural defect in the soyl itself. Well stored with all sorts of Cattel, as appears plainly by that plenty of Cheese and Hides which which are sent hence yearly into Italy and other places. The horses hereof, hot, head-strong, and hard to be broken, but will last long. The Bulls naturally amble, so that the Countryman rideth them as familiarly as they do in Spain on Mules and Asles. Here is also the Beast called Mufrones, or Musfrignes, found in Corfica also, but in no other part of Europe; somewhat resembling a Stag, but of so strong an hide, that it is used by the Italians in stead of Armour: Of the skin of which carried to Cordova in Spain, and there dressed, is made the right Cordovan Leather. Finally, here is an Herb, of which if one eat, it is said he will dye with laughter; Whence came the Proverb, Risus Sardonicus. The truth of which report I shall not dispute, though it be by others more probably conjectured, that the Herb being of a poysonous nature, causeth men to dye with such a Convulsion or attraction of Sinews, that they seem to grin, or laugh at the time of their death.

The people are small of stature, of complexion inclining unto swarthynefs, and that either by reason of the heat of the Sun, or more probably from their African extraction: their behaviour much participating of that people also. So slothful in the times of the Romans, that they were grown into a Proverb, and a Law made to compel them to work; but now esteemed a very painful and laborious Nation. Much given to hunting, and so prone to Rebellion, that the Spaniards permitteeth no Cutler to live among them; yet peaceable among themselves, and in some measure courteous unto Strangers also. Their Language a corrupt Catalonian; their diet on meats common and gross; their apparel in the Towns (especially that of the women) gorgeous, in the Villages fordid.

In matters of Religion they are little curious. That which they make most shew of, is according to the Rites and Doctrines of the Church of Rome; which both their neighbourhood to the Pope, and their subjection to the Spaniard, have imposed upon them. But in their practice of it they are loose enough, going to Mass on Sundays and Saints dayes; which done they fall a dancing in the midst of the Church, singing in the mean time songs too immodest for an Alehouse. Nay, it is thought that their Clergy it self is the most rude, ignorant and illiterate of any people in Christendom; saying their Masses rather by rote, than reason, and utterly unable to give any account of their Religion.

It is divided commonly into two parts, viz. Cape Longudori, towards Corfica, and Cape Cagliari, towards Africk: the first the least, and withal mountainous and barren; the last the larger, level, and by much more fruitful. Chief Cities of the whole, 1. Calari, first built by the Carthaginians, and situate in that point of the Island which lieth nearest to Africk; which from hence took the name of Cape Cagliari, by which it is at this day called. A City of such fame, when it was first taken by Gracchus for the use of the Romans, that it is called by Florus, Urbs Urbium; and was destroyed by the said Gracchus, the better to disable the Natives from rebelling against the Conquerors. Being new built again in more settled times, it was a second time destroyed by the Saracens; and finally re-built and beautified by the Pisians, at such time as they were Masters of this part of the Island. Very well fortified by Nature, as seated on the top of an Hill; and hath under it a spacious and goodly Haven, much frequented by Merchant. The Town it self adorned with a beautiful Temple, being the See of an Arch-bishop, many fair Turrets, and the constant residence of the Vice-roy: from whose authority it is exempt by especial privilege, as to the legal Government of it, and ordered by a Common-Council of its own Citizens. 2. Bessa, on the West side of the Island, another Arch-Episcopal See. 3. S. Reparata, on the North, looking towards Corfica. 4. Aguilastra, on the Western shores. 5. Sassari, a Town of consequence, where they have an Aqueduct twelve miles long, reaching from thence unto S. Gavina. Algher-Busa, a good Town, situate in a wholesome air, and a fertile soyl; and having a fair Haven of six miles in length, in which the Ships of Genoa and Catalonia do most commonly ride. 7. Oressagne, a large Town, but very ill peopled, by reason of a bad air which proceeds from the Fens; the Country about which gives title to the Marquess of Oressagne. 8. Turrita, once a Roman Colony, now little better then a ruine; yet giving title to the third Archbishop of this Island, who is called in Latine Turritanus. Here are also in divers parts of this Island the remainders of sundry Towers and Forts which the people call Noracks from Nora, one of the sons of Geryon; who (as they think) came into this Country, and built the first dwelling or mansion in it. And this Tradition of the Vulgar hath so much in it of Historical and undoubted truth, that certain Colonies from Spain came and placed here, under the conduct of one Nora; somewhat before the expedition of the Aticks under Iolan, as Paulinus testifieth.

This Island taken by the Romans from the Carthaginians, as before is said, was first under the immediate Jurisdiction of the Præfitt of the City of Rome: but after by Iustinian was made a Province of his new Dioceses of Africk; and as a part thereof, or rather an Appendix to it, was challenged, invaded, and finally conquered by the Saracens, Anno 807. From them recovered by the joyn't forces of the Pisians and Genoese, who divided it betwixt them: the Southern part, called Cape Cagliari, being allotted to the Pisians, and the Northern towards Corfica, to those of Genoa. But the Genoese not content with the partage, (their portion of the Island being less in quantity, and worse in quality) began to quarrel with the Pisians, and at the last to break into open Wars. To part the Fray, Pope Boniface the 8. bestowed it on James King of Aragon, who driving thence the Genoese, Anno 1324. became Master of it. The Aragonian before that did pretend some Title to it, in right of the Kingdom of Sicily, then in his possession; to some preceding Kings whereof it had once been subject: and having backed that Claim by the Popes Donation who challenged it as a part of St. Peters Patrimony; incorporated it for ever to the Crown of Aragon. Once indeed it was offered unto Anthony of Barbon, in exchange for his Title to Navarre, but without any purpose of performance; that being only a device to fetch him off from the party of the Reformed in France, to which he formerly adhered; adhered; and was as suddenly laid by, as if it had done the feat intended in the Proposition.

The Government hereof is by a Vice-roy, who resides at Calari, and must of necessity be a Spaniard, under whom are two Deputy Governours, Spaniards also; the one for Cape Cagliari, the other for Cape Longudori. Inferior Officers of Command may be of the Natives. What profits arise hence to the Crown of Spain, I have no where found. The Arms hereof are said to be Or, a Cross Gules, betwixt four Saracens heads Sable, curled Argent. Which Arms were given upon the taking of it from the power of the Moors: but first taken (as some say) for the Arms of Aragon, on occasion of the heads of four chief Princes of the Moors which were found severed from their bodies in the Battel of Alcoraz, Anno 1094, won by Don Pedro King of Navarre and Aragon.

There are divers small Islands about Sardinia, as 1. Isola Rossa, heretofore called Phintania. 2. The Isle of Hercules, now called Asinaria. 3. St. Peters, anciently Hieracum, or Accipitrum, with others of as little note: all which, as the Appendants of Sardinia, do belong to the Spaniard.

There are in this Island,
Archbishops 3. Bishops 15.

The Land of the CHURCH.

WEST of the Realm of Naples, lyeth the LAND OF THE CHURCH, extended North and South, from the Adriatick to the Tuscan Seas. Bounded on the North-east with the River Trontus; on the South-east, with the Asofennus, by which two parted from that Kingdom; as on the North-west by the River Po, and Fiore, by which separated from the State of Venice; and on the South-west with the River Pisces, by which it is divided from the Modern Tuscany, or the State of the Florentine.

By this Accompt the Popes Dominion taketh up the whole middle of Italy; having in breadth from the one Sea unto the other above two hundred miles, and in the length along the Adriatick, to the furthest parts of Romandiola, above three hundred. By which advantages it lieth most fitly for the command of all the rest, it being very easie for the Popes to convey their forces by Sea or Land, into what part thereof they please. And were it not that the Popes commonly are of several factions; and that the Successor pursueth not the designs of his Predecessors, but hath his own ends to himself, which for the most part are driven on without consideration of increasing the publick Patrimony; it is not possible, but that the Pope long before this time, had been Lord of all. And this may be conceived the rather, considering the extraordinary fertility of the soyl, able to spare provisions for the greatest Armies; the multitudes of people which it may afford, in regard they are so seldom consumed by Wars; and that the men of this Dominion (but chiefly those of Rome, and the parts adjoining) are conceived to be the best Souldiers of Italy; as retaining some sparks of their Ancestors valour, together with their gravity, magnificence, and a certain greatness of courage, which seems to be particular to them of this Nation. And they preserve also to this day so much of the ancient Roman, as to prefer any kind of life, before Trades or Merchandise. For though their Lands be very well tilled, and their Vines well dressed, and all things done exactly in the way of Husbandry; yet for their Manufactures they are brought from other places, as Venice, Naples, Florence, Genoa. And though they have the Sea on both sides, and the advantage of many fair and commodious Rivers and Havens, which with little cost might be made very useful: yet do they no way improve their fortunes, or the publick Patrimony in the way of Traffick; which is the main defect of the Papal Politie, and filleth a rich Country full of poor and indigent persons. But to proceed to the description of the Popes Estate, it containeth the Provinces of 1. Romandiola, 2. the Territory of Ferrara, 3. the Estate of Urbine, 4. Marcia, Anconita, 5. Ducato Spoletano with Sabinia, 6. S. Peters Patrimony, and 7. Campagna di Roma.

1. ROMANDIOLA extendeth from the River Isanrus (now called Foglio) by which parted from the Dukedom of Urbine on the East, to the Dukedom of Parma on the West, from which parted by the River Panaro, called of old Scultenna; and from the Apennine on the South, to Padua, and the Adriatick, on the North. It was called anciently Flaminia, from Flaminius the Roman Consul, who having won it from the Galls planted Colonies in it; and had the honour (though he pursued this War against the will of the Senate) to have it called by his own name: and for the better partage betwixt Rome and this, made a very large Causeway, which for a long time was called Via Flaminia. Chief Rivers hereof, besides those spoken of already, which are only borderers. 1. Ariminum, now called Marechia; and 2. Rubicon, now called Pissatello, betwixt Ariminum and Ravenna, of which more anon.

The chief Cities of it are, 1. Bononia, (or Bologna) seated in a spacious Plain near the Apennine hills, a very populous City, of a round form, and a great circuit: the building Antick, seeming for the most part to be the work of the Lombards, the foundation of the houses of Free-stone, the rest of Bricks; built with arched Cloysters towards the street, under which one may walk dry in the greatest rain. A City honoured with many Palaces of the neighbouring Nobles, the chief University of Italy, and the retiring place of the Popes. The Civil Law is much studied here, inasmuch that from hence proceeded the famous Civilians Johannes Andreæ, Asa, Bartholæus, and Sociinus. I believe they have built Castles in the air, which ascribe the founding of this University to Theodosius the 2. The Charter of whose foundation

By Charles the Great, and by him given to the Bishops of Rome, together with Anconitana and Spoleto, as a requital for the Kingdom of France, confirmed unto King Pepin his Father, by the consent and authority of the Popes. The donation of this Exarchate to the Popes, partly to blot out the memory of the Exarchs, and partly to make the people obedient to those Prelates; changed the name of the Country from Flaminia (by which name it was formerly known) to Romandiola, and now to Romagna. Notwithstanding which Donation, or Original Grant, the Popes enjoyed not long the possession of it: The Emperours of Germany, and their Vice-gerents in Italy, wresting it by strong hand out of the possession of the Church; and giving it to such as deserved well of them, and were most likely, or most able to uphold their Faction. And so it stood, till the last Popes conspiring with the French Kings Lewis the 12. and Francis the first, brought them into Italy, Anno 1509. and by their aids, and by the censures of the Church, so prevailed in fine, that they extorted Ravenna, and some other places, out of the hands of the Venetians, ejected many petty Princes out of other Cities, which they pretended to belong to St. Peters Patrimony; and thereby got possession of all those Territories, which lie betwixt the State of Venice, and the Marches of Ancona.

2. The Territory of FERRARA lieth in the very skirts of Romandiola towards the Venetian; extending one hundred and sixty miles in length, and about fifty in breadth: the soil thereof exceeding rich, but subject to the overflowings of the River Po; which makes the air in many places to be somewhat unwholsome. And though as well the former Dukes as the Popes, who are now Lords hereof, have been at great charge in raising high Banks and Ramparts to keep in the waters: yet could not this resist the violence of the River, falling from so high a Spring, and seconded with so great Land-floods (as sometimes it is) but that it makes many breaches in them, do they what they can. The places of most note herein, are 1. Grassano in the borders of Tuscany, near the Apennine. 2. Carpi, a place of great importance, seated in the midst of this Dukedom; belonging heretofore to the house of the Pici. But partly by exchange made with Marcus Pico, partly for one hundred thousand Crowns ready money, given unto Lionel Pico, once the Lord hereof; it was by Charles the 5. incorporated into this estate. 3. Commachia, seated in the Marshes of the Adriatick, from which the Princes of this Family of Este, were at first called only Lords of Commachia; a place which yielded great profit to the former Dukes, by the fishing of Eels. 4. Saxole, given by Duke Alphonso in exchange for Carpi.

Ferrara.

Carpi. Here is also the Territory and Lordship of the Polesin, the cause of so many quarrels and contentions between the ancient Dukes of Ferrara and the State of Venice. But the chief honour of this Dukedom is in the Capital City, that which denominates the whole. Ferrara, a City of five miles in compass, so called from the Iron mines which are about it; commodiously seated on the River Po, which by reason of its breadth, depth, and violent swiftness of the current, is a sufficient rampart to it on that side; the other sides being fortified with a strong wall, and a spacious moat. In the middle of the City is a fair and spacious Market-place, into which do open on all sides about twenty streets, all of them half a mile in length; and all so straight and evenly built, that the furthest end of each of them may be easily seen. Near to this Market-place is a little Island, in which the former Dukes had a stately Palace, called Belvedere, from the fair Prospect which it had or gave to the whole City; and on the North side of the City a large Park for pleasure. The other houses are for the most part built of fair Free-stone, not joining unto one another as in other Cities, but at a pretty distance with neat Gardens between. Ariosto, the Author of that ingenious Poem called Orlando Furioso, and Hierome Savanarolo the Prophetic Fryer, were both of them natives of this place: of which the first lieth here entombed, the last for preaching against the Pope, was burnt at Florence.

In the declining of the Power and Empire of the Lombards, this City together with Faenza was given by Desiderius their last King, to the Church of Rome, the better to oblige the Popes by so great a benefit. But being taken from them by the Emperours of the house of Schwaben, it was again recovered by the prowess of the Countess Mathildis, Anno 1107. who took it, with many other Towns in Italy, from the Emperour Henry the 4. and at her death conferred the same upon the Church. The Popes once more possessed hereof, and not able to hold it, gave it in Fee for ever unto Azo of the House of Este, a man of great sway in the affairs of Italy, who valiantly had defended it against Ezzelinus, Vicegerent of Frederick the 2. This was the first of this Family who had Ferrara in propriety: His Ancestors being called before the Marquesses of Este, and sometimes Marquesses of Ferrara, (but in title only) as Governours hereof in behalf of the Pope of Rome. Obizzo the Grandchild of this first Azo, obtained of Rodolphus the first, (who was willing to make what money he could of his lands in Italy) the Cities of Rhegium and Modena; that Grant confirmed by Guido Legat of Pope Benedict the ninth, with the Popes consent, Anno 1304. Other improvements there were made by the following Princes, according to the chance of War; but none of them continued constant in their possession, but these three Cities and the Territories adjoining to them. As for this Family de Este (Familia Aetfina it is called in Latine) it took this name from Este, or Aetfe, a small Town in the Siegneury of Venice, conferred upon the Ancestors of this Azo, by Charles the Great. And for the Chiefs or Princes of it, they have been of great authority and power in their several times, commanding sometimes the Venetian Armies, and sometimes the Popes: great favours of learned men, and advancers of learning; inasmuch that the Reinaldo's and Rogero's of Este, make up a great part of the Poems of Ariosto and Tasso, two of the greatest wits of Italy; and finally allied to many of the best Houses of Christendom. The Catalogue of whom, since they were made the Hereditary Lords and Princes of this noble City, I have here subjoined.

The Dukes and Marquesses of Ferrara.

- 1264 2 Obizzo, the sixth of that name, Grand-son to Azo by his son Reinaldo, second Marquess of Ferrara.

- 1450 13 Borsius, another of the base sons of Nicolas 2. succeeded Leonel in the Estate; who being made Duke of Mutina by Frederick the 3. was by Pope Paul created Duke of Ferrara also, Anno 1470.

lenged this Estate in the right of the Church; and partly by force, partly by composition (whereof we shall say more when we come to Modena) united it for ever to the See of Rome.

The yearly Revenues of this Dukedom were heretofore two hundred and fifty thousand Crowns; now not so much worth unto the Pope, by reason of the Alienation of Modena and Reggio; of which more hereafter.

The Arms of these Dukes (which for the honour of this noble and illustrious Family, and for the strangeness of the Coat, I shall here put down) were Pale-wise of three pieces, 1. Partie per Fesse, in a chief Or, an Eagle displayed Sable, membred, langued, and crowned Gules; and in Base Azure, three Flowers de Lys Or, within a Border indented Or and Gules. 2. Gules, two Keys in Saltier, the one Or, the other Argent, charged in Fesse with an Esccheon of pretence Azure, supporting an Eagle of the third, membred and crowned of the second. Over all in chief a Papal Crown Or, garnished with sundry Gems Azure and Purple. The 3. as the first Counter-placed. Which Coat upon the falling of the House of Ferrara, doth now belong to that of Modena and Reggio, as descended it.

3. From the Territory of Ferrara proceed we to the Estate of Urbine; both Dukedoms and distinct Estates till these later times: this last the younger of the two, and consequently (as in the ordinary course of Nature) the survivor also; but swallowed at last into the Popedom as the other was. Bounded on the West with the River Isaurus (now called Foglia) by which parted from Rumandiola, on the East from Marca Anconitana, on the North with the Adriatick, and on the South with the Apennine Hills, by which parted from Tuscany. So called from Urbine the chief City of it, and the Ducal Seat. It is in length about 60. miles, 35. in breadth: Some pieces and Estates belonging anciently to the Church, lying intermingled with the Lands and Signeuries which belonged to the Dukes.

The soyl is very fruitful of Corn, Wine, and Oyl, plentiful of Figs and other fruits of most pleasant taste; and in a word, affording all things necessary for the life of man. But the air is generally unwholesome, especially about Pesaro and Fossombrone, by reason of the low flats and overflows of the water. The Principal commodities which they vend abroad, are the Wines of Pesaro, sold in great abundance to the Venetians; and dried Figs, which they vend unto Bologne, and other places.

The most famous River is Metaurus, (now called Metrimo) and a famous one it is indeed, by reason of that great battel fought on the banks thereof, betwixt Asdrubal the brother of Annibal, and his Carthaginians; and the two Consuls Livius and Cl. Nero: in which, after a long and hot dispute, the victory fell unto the Romans; there being 56000 of the Carthaginians slain, (as Livius writeth) and 5400 taken prisoners. Polybius speaks of a less number both slain and taken; and like enough it is, that Livius, to advance the honour of that Family, might enlarge a little. But whatsoever was the truth in this particular, certain it is, that this victory turned the tide of the Roman Fortune, which from this time began to flow again upon them: the Citizens of Rome beginning at this time to trade and traffick, to follow their affairs, and make contracts and bargains with one another, which they had long forborn to do; and that with as secure a confidence, as if Annibal were already beaten out of Italy. This famous River riseth in the Apennine hills, and passing by Fossombrone, a Town of this Dukedom, falls into the Adriatick.

There are reckoned into this Dukedom seven Towns or Cities, (four of which are Episcopal Sees) and three hundred Castles. The principal of which are, 1. Urbine, one of the most ancient Cities of Italy, which both Tacitus and Pliny mention; a fair Town, well built, and the Dukes ordinary seat in Summer. It is seated at the foot of the Apennine hills, in a very rich and pleasant soyl, built in the fashion of a Miter, and therefore called Urbinas, quod urbes binus continere videbatur. Francisco Ubaldo the first Duke, built here a very sumptuous Palace, and therein founded a most excellent Library, replenished with a great number of rare Books, covered and garnished with gold, silk, and silver; all scattered and dispersed in the time that Cesar Borgia seized on the Estate. Polydore Virgil, the Author of the History of England, which passeth under his name, was a Native here: an History of worth enough as the times then were, except only in such passages as concern the Pope (the Collector of whose Peter-pence he was then in England) whose credit and Authority he preferred sometimes, before truth it self. 2. Pisaurum, now called Pesaro, the strongest Town of all the Dukedom, two miles in compass, and fortified according to the modern Art of War: the fortifications of it being first begun by Francisco Maria, and perfected by Guido Ubaldo, his son and successor; the ordinary seat of the Duke in Winter, well Garrisoned, and therefore trusted with the publick Armory. It is seated near the shore of the Adriatick, at the mouth or influx of the River Isaurus, which parts it from Romagna: populous, of handsome buildings, and a very strong wall, the soyl exceeding rich, but the air so bad, that partly in regard of that, and partly by their eating of too much fruits, nothing is more frequent here then Funerals, especially in the moneth of August; few of the Inhabitants living to be fifty years old. 3. Senigallia, called anciently Sena Gallica, (Gallica being added to it to difference it from another of that name in Tuscany) a strong and well fenced City near the River Metaurus, over which there is a Bridge consisting of eighty Arches; made of that length, not so much in regard of the breadth of the Channel, as the frequent overflowings of that turbulent Water. 4. Fussombrone, called in old Authors Forum Sempronii, for air and soyl of the same nature with Pisaurum; bought by D. Frederick of Galeazzo Malatesta, for thirteen hundred Florins of Gold. 5. Cabo or Cagli, on the Sea. 6. S. Leon, a good Town, and the chief of the Country of Montefeltre, which is a limb of this Dukedom. 7. Fano, not far from the Sea, an Episcopal City, and anciently belonging to the Church of Rome: of old times called Fanum fortuna, from a Temple there erected to Goddess Fortune (Te facimus Fortuna deum, as the Poet hath it.) 8. Engubium (now called Anguico) a Town belonging longing to these Princes, but properly within the bounds of the Spoletan Dukedom; and there we shall hear further of it. Of the Castles the principal are Marivola, and the Rock of S. Leon, which were the last that held good for Duke Guido Ubaldo against Cesar Borgia, Duke of Valentinus, son to Pope Alexander the sixth; and the first which did return again under his obedience. For which cause when he fled the second time from the said Borgia, he dismantled all his other Castles, as being more likely to admit than resist the Invader; and these two last being very well fortified, he left to keep possession of the Country for him.

Here is also within the limits of this Estate, the Dukedom of CAMERINO, an ancient and well peopled Town, of a strong natural situation amongst the Hills: an Estate holden of the Church by the noble Family of Varena, till the time of Pope Paul the third; when Julia di Varena the heir hereof, conveyed it by marriage unto Guido Ubaldo Duke of Urbine. But the Pope pretending an Escheat for want of heirs males, made himself Master of it by force of Arms: and gave it to his son Piero Farnese, whom afterwards with the consent of the Colledge of Cardinals he made Duke of Parma; and settled Camerino on the Church, as it still continues.

As for the fortunes of this Country, it was anciently the habitation of the Senones; a Nation of the Cisalpine Galli, who only had the honour of sacking Rome, to which City it continued subject, till the declining of the Empire in the time of Honorius. They being rooted out at last (of which more in Lombardie) and the Country peopled with Roman or Latine Colonies, it followed the same fortunes with the rest of Italy, till the time of Conradin, the last Duke of the Imperial House of Schwaben, when Urbine was first subdued by the Earls of Montefeltre, whose Successors increasing in power, added the Town and Territory of Eugubio to it. And in the bustles betwixt Lewis of Bavaria the Emperour, and Pope Clement the sixth, Anno 1345. Gelasio di Montefeltre held it by no other Title, but as the Emperours Vicegerents. This Family enjoyed it till the year 1444. by the Title only of Earls of Montefeltre, and Lords of Urbine; when Frederick Ubaldo, for his singular and surpassing valour, was by Pope Eugenius the fourth, created the first Duke hereof: to hold as Feudatories of the Church, and paying 2240 Crowns for an Annual quit-rent. A man of such repute for all gallant qualities, that he was by King Henry the sixth, made Knight of the Garter; in recompence of which high honour, the English to this day enjoy many priviledges in these Dominions. Guido Ubaldo this Dukes son lost his Estate to Cesar Borgia; after whose death he did recover it again by the power and favour of Pope Julio the second, to whom succeeded Francisco Maria di Rovero, his sisters son, in whose Family it continued till now of late, as will appear by this ensuing Catalogue of

The Dukes of Urbine.

- 1444 1 Frederick Ubaldo, of the ancient Family of Montefeltre the first Duke of Urbine, and one of the Knights of the honourable Order of the Garter.
 2 Guido Ubaldo, son of Frederick, for a while outed of this Dukedom by Cesar Borgia. He was Knight also of the Garter.
 3 Francisco Maria di Rovero, sisters son and next heir to Guido Ubaldo, was in his own right Lord of Sengallia, and had Pisauro from the Pope in reward of his many services done unto the Church; dispossessed for a while by Pope Leo the tenth.
 4 Laurence de Medices, Father of Catharine di Medices the French Queen, and of Alexander the first Duke of Florence; was for a while made Duke of Urbine by Pope Leo the tenth, (being of that Family) but lost it shortly after to Duke Francisco, who after the death of Pope Leo, recovered his Estates again, and died possessed of the Dukedom.
 1538 5 Guido Ubaldo II. son of Duke Francisco.
 6 Francisco Maria II. son of Guido the second, whose line expired, it escheated not long since (for want of heirs male) to the Church of Rome.

The Revenues of this Dukedom were reckoned to have been 100000 Crowns per annum; but might have been raised to a greater sum, had not the Dukes preferred the love and ease of their Subjects, before the filling of their own Coffers. He was able to raise 1200 good Souldiers out of this Estate; and more the people would supply, if they had occasion. The Arms hereof Azure, a Tower Argent, environed with Flower de Lyces Or.

4. MARCA ANCONITANA is bounded on the West with the State of Urbine; on the East, with the River of Trontus, or Druentus, by which it is parted from Abruzzo; on the South, with the Apennine Hills, by which parted from the Spoletan Dukedom; on the North, with the Adriatick. The reason of the name we shall have anon.

It was formerly the dwelling of the Picentes, possessed all these parts on the Coasts of the Adriatick, from the River Rubicon on the East, to that of Anfidus on the West. For aiding the Tarentines their Allies, in their War against Rome, they were invaded and subdued by the Romans, A.V.C. 485. which was about five years before the first Punic War, under the Conduct of Sempronius; at which time they were so great and multitudinous a Nation, that they were numbered to amount to 260000, which were then brought under the Command and Vassalage of the Roman Empire. When Italy was divided into no more than eight Regions, these Picentes only made up one; so did they also when divided into eleven. Afterwards, in the time of the Antonini, they made up one of the sixteen Provinces, into which Italy was divided by those Emperours; and the same repute it held in the time of Constantine, Picenum making alwayes one: Asculum caput gentis, as Florus calls it, which was the head of their Nation, being the Metropolis of the Province. Called in those times Picenum Annonarium, partly by reason of the abundance of grain which it did produce; and partly to distinguish it from the dwelling of the Picentini, which from its nearness unto Rome, had the name of Picenum Suburbicarium; that part of Campania at this time, which is called the Principate. In the declining of the Empire, it was first called Marcha Firmiana, from Firmo, once a Roman Colony, and at that time of most importance in the Country; but by transferring the chief seat from Firmo to Ancona, in the time of the Lombards, it came to have the name of Anconitana. The chief Rivers, besides those named already, which are only borderers, are, 1 Chientius, 2 Sentinus, and 3 Potentia; all rising in the Apennine, and passing with a swift course to the Adriatick.

The chief Towns, 1 Ancona, seated on the Hill Cimmerius, shooting into the Sea, glorying in giving name to the Province, and her Haven built by Trajan the Emperour; one of the fairest in the world, not so much for capacity, as the pleasantness and beauty of it: the descents down unto the water being made of Marble, and very delectable walking on all sides of it. The City it self is begirt with hills, on one of which Pope Clement the seventh built a very strong Castle, Anno 1532. under pretence of defending the Town against the Turks, but indeed to keep the people in more full subjection, who till that time, did yearly choose their own Magistrates, and lived according to their own Laws, like a Common-wealth. 2 Recanati (heretofore Alia Recina) seated upon the banks of the River Mulso, renowned for the great concourse of Merchants from all parts of Europe, at her Annual Markets; and a vein of the most excellent Wines. 3 Firmo, furnished the Strong, in former times of most esteem in all the Province which was hence called Marca Firmiana; and to this day, a place of great strength and consequence; and an Archbishops See. 4 Macerata, now of most credit, by reason that the Popes Legat keeps his residence there, and with him the Chancery for his Marquisate. 5 Loretto, called in Latin Lauretana, a little City betwixt Recanati and the Sea; well fortified against the Turks, and other Pirates who once spoiled the same, and might be easily tempted thither on the like occasions: The Church here being admirably rich, and frequented by Pilgrims from all parts, to pay their devotions unto our Lady of Loretto, and behold her Miracles. Concerning the removal of whose Chamber hither, in our description of Palestine, you shall meet with a very proper Legend. 6 Ascoli, furnished the Fair, seated at the influx of the River Druentus, and on the furthest side of it towards Abruzzo, to which by some it is ascribed. Anciently the chief City of the Picentes, as before is said, and then called Asculum, conquer'd by the Romans, under the conduct of Sempronius, A.V.C. 485. Nigh unto this City, was fought the second battel between C. Fabricius and the Romans on the one side, and Pyrrhus with the Epirates on the other; wherein the Victory (as Plutarch telleth us) fell to the King, having slain 6000 of his Enemies; but yet with such loss on his side also, that he ascribed to some of his friends and followers, that such another Victory would quite undo him; and with such appearance of valour and virtue in the Romans, that he could not but break forth into this acclamation; O quam facile esset orbem vincere, aut mihi, Romanis militibus, aut me rege, Romanis! This Town also was the seat of the War called Bellum sociale, raised by the people of Italy against the Romans; Popedius being both Author of the Rebellion, and Captain. They, for a while, sorely flaked the state of Rome; but at last were vanquished, and this Town by Strabo Pompeius forced and spoiled. 7 Adria, now not otherwise famous, than that it gave denomination to the adjoining Sea, and the Emperour Adrian. 8 Humana, which together with Ancona, was given to Pope Zachary, by Luitprandus King of the Lombards, about the year 741. The succeeding Popes after the giving of this Inch, took the whole Ell.

5 Having surveyed the Provinces of the Church along the Adriatick, we must next cross the Apennine, which parts the Marches of Ancona from the Dukedom of SPOLETO (DUCATO SPOLETANO the Italians call it) which takes up the Western part of that Province, which the old Romans called Umbria; and therefore before we come to the description of this, we must a little look on the state of that. A Country bounded on the East with the River Aniene, dividing it from the East parts of Latium; on the West with Tuscia or Hebruria; on the North, with the Apennine; on the South, with the reaches or windings of the Tiber, the main body of Latium, and with that part of Tuscanie, which is now called S. Peters Patrimony. So called, because being situate under the shade of the Apennine Hills, it was Regio Umbrosa. Some give another reason of it, and think that the Inhabitants were called Umbri, quasi Opusgi, as men that had escaped the Deluge; because so ancient a people, that no body could tell the original of them.

But whatsoever was the reason of the name, they were a stout and valiant people, and gave the first check to Annibals career, after his great Victory at Thrasymene; repelling him with loss and shame from the walls of Spoleto: yet not of power sufficient, for all their valour, to preserve their Country. From the Tuscans, who are said to have destroyed in it 300 good Towns. Made by that means, if not plainly subject, yet so obnoxious to the will and pleasure of the Victors, that at their instance or command they sided with them in a war against the Romans (whom formerly they had found very quiet neighbours); and by the Romans were subdued together with the rest of the Confederates then in Arms against them, A.V.C. 458. Decius and Qu. Fabius then the fifth time Consuls, which was about 77 years before Annibal fell into their Country. After which time in such esteem, that it was one of the eleven Regions into which Italy was divided by Augustus Caesar; and finally together with Tuscia, made up a Province of the Empire.

As for the Dukedom of Spoleto, it taketh up the Western parts of the Province of Umbria, as before was said, included betwixt the Apennine, the Tiber, and the River Nar, by which last (now called Nera) it is divided from Sabinia, or the Land of the Sabines. The Countrey of a mixt nature, equally composed of very rough hills, and yet most delectable vallies; exceeding plentiful of all necesfaries, and much commended heretofore for the extraordinary fecundity of the women. The Wine hereof is much commended by Martial, as the best of Italy.

*De Spoletanis quæ sunt cariola lagenis
Mallueris, quam si musta Falerna bibas.*

That is to say,

If with Spolet bottles once you meet,
Say that Falerno Must is not so sweet.

Places of greatest note herein, 1 Spoleto, built partly on the hill, and partly on the lower ground; the residence heretofore of one of the four Dukes of the Lombardians, who governed as Vice-roys, or Lord Presidents, of the remoter parts of that Kingdom: from whence the Country round about it was called Ducato Spoletano. It is still a Town of good esteem, populous, and of handsome building; and hath a strong Fortrefs for defence thereof, built upon the ruins of an old Amphitheatre: to which men pass over a great bridge of stone, upheld by 24 great pillars, which joyns two Mountains together; having between them a deep Vally, but narrow and without any water. Theodorick the Goth built a fair Palace in this City, rebuilt by Narses, but since ruined. 2 Æugubium (now called Æugubio) seated on the foot of the Apennine; in or near that place where anciently stood that City which Pliny calls Juginium; Ptolomy, Isuuius, utterly subverted by the Goths. A Town well seated in a fruitful and wealthy soyl, and blessed with an industrious people: acknowledging the Dukes of Urbine for Lords thereof, till that estate was swallowed up into the Popedom. 3 Nuceria, (now Nocera) in Plinius time called Alfatena, at the foot also of the Apennine; the people of which in former times much traded in their wooden vessel. 4 Assisium, or Assise, destroyed almost to nothing in the Civil Wars of Italy, and only famous at this time, for a See Episcopal, and being the birth-place of S. Francis; the Founder of the Franciscans, or Cordeliers, as the French call them, but we in England the Gray Friars. 5 Citta de Castello, anciently Tipherdum, on the banks of Tiber. 6 Tudertum, now called Todi, seated near the Tiber, on the declivity of a rich and fruitful hill.

The rest of Umbria towards the East, not being within the compass of the Spoleto Dukedom, but under the command of the Popes of Rome, is by late Writers called SABINIA, because the dwelling in times past, of the ancient Sabines: who being taken into Rome, and made Free Denizens of that City in the time of Romulus, upon the League concluded betwixt him and Tatius, then the King of this people, for a long time lived under the protection of that mighty City. But after joyning with the Latins in a War against it, they were subdued by Curius Dentatus the Roman Consul, and made a subject Province of that Common-wealth, A. V. C. 463. But though the Sabines, at this time bare away the name, yet were they not sole Masters of it in these elder times; the greatest part hereof being possessed by some Nations of the Umbri, whom by a general name they called Vilumbri (the Sabines interjected betwixt them and Rome) and as a member of that body, subdued together with the rest of the Umbri by the conquering Romans. Afterwards in the division of Italy made by Antoninus, it was called Nursia; and in that made by Constantine, it was contained within the new Province of Valeria, Reate being the Metropolis, or head City of both. A Territory of no great circuit, but abundantly fruitful in Oyl or Olives, Vines and Fig-trees: watered with the River Farfarus, which cutteth through the very midst of it; and with the Lake called anciently Lacus Velinus (now Lago di Podesluco) esteemed to be the Centre or Navel of Italy by some ancient Writers; the waters of which are of such a nature, that in short time they will clothe a piece of wood with a coat of stone, and yet yieldeth excellent Trouts, and other good Fish. The Towns and Cities of most note, are, 1 Reate (now called Reite) an ancient City, and the Metropolis heretofore of all this Tract; as well when it was called Nursia, as when it was under the name of Valeria. 2 Nursia, a City no less ancient, seated amongst the Hills, which for the most part are covered with snow; from which Town, being heretofore of more reputation, the Province of Nursia, spoken of in the Itinerarie of Antoninus, took denomination. 3 Magliano, a pleasant and well-peopled Town, at this time the principal of this Territory. 4 Oriculum, built amongst many fruitful hills, a mile from Tiber. 5 Narnia, the Country and Birth-place of the Emperor Nerva, the first of all the Emperors not born in Rome, as after him there were few born in it. The soyl about it is of so different and strange a nature, that it is said to be made dirty by the Sun and Winds, and dusty by Rain: the City well-peopled, and a Bishops See, seated upon a very steep and craggy Hill, not far from the River Nar (now Negro) from which perhaps it took the name. A City given unto the Church of Rome by Luitprandus King of the Lombards; of which the Popes of Rome having got possession, never left practising till they had got into their power all the rest of the Country. Little else famous in the whole Region of Umbria, but that in the Western part thereof, is the Lake called Lacus Vademonius, near to Ameria, now called Amelia, a Town of the Dukedom, where Dilobella overthrew such of the Senones, a valiant Nation of the Galls, as had escaped the Sword of Camillus, Quinctius, Corius, and other fortunate Commanders in the wars against them; Ne quis extaret in ea gente (saith the Historian) qui incensam à se Romanam gloriaretur: a former slaughter being made of them by Camillus, on the banks of Aniene, the Eastern limit of these Umbri.

S. Peters
Patrimony.

5. S. PETERS PATRIMONIE, properly and specially so called, is that part of Tuscanie, which appertains unto the Church; bounded upon the East with Tiber, which divides it from Latium, or Campagna di Roma: on the West, with the River Pisio, which falleth into the Sea near the Mountain of Argentario, and parteth it from the estate of the great Duk of Tuscanie; on the North, with the Apennine, and the Spoleto Dukedom on the South, with the Tuscan or Tyrrhenian Sea. It took this new name presently on the donation of the Countess Mathildis, who gave it for ever unto the Church, An. 110. (Paschal the second sitting in the Chair of Rome) to be the Patrimony of S. Peter, and his successors in that See. A Countrey not inferior unto any in Italy, for the fertility of the soyl: but for the most part of an unhealthy Air, by reason of the frequent overflowings of Tiber, and the thick woods which hinder that the winds cannot purge and cleanse it.

The principal Cities, and places of most observation, are, 1 Perugia, formerly called Perusia; a famous Town; in which Augustus besieged L. Antonius the brother, and Fulvia the wife of M. Antony the Triumvir; who, when they had in vain attempted to seduce Rome from his party, repaired to this City; which also at the last, yielded to the more fortunate Emperor. Augustus afterwards, having much adorned and beautified it, caused it to be called Augusta; but it returned not long after, to its ancient name. It is seated very pleasantly on the banks of Tiber, not far from the Apennine, in a very rich and fruitful soyl; well built both for the publick and private structures; a Bishops See, and made an University, An. 1090. In the distractions of Italy betwixt the Emperours and the Popes, this City was seized on by the Bailions, who held it as Vicars of the Church. The Oddier, an opposite Faction to them, having got together a strong party of Malecontents, so suddenly entered one night into the City, that the Bailions began to fly: nor was there any thing to hinder them from being Masters of the Palace, but the chain which was drawn cross the gate. One of the Souldiers going about to cut this chain, and wanting room to wield his arm, cryed aloud, Give back: which words being heard, but not well understood by those furthest off, put them to their heels; and the foremost, which thought they fled not for nothing, ran away too. So the City was saved. 2 Orvieto, seated on so high a Rock, that it is no small terror to look down from the top of it, into the vallies beneath; in which there is a Church of a wondrous lightness, and yet the windows of the same (if we may credit Adrianus who reports it) are made of Alabaster, instead of Glass. 3 Viterbo, famous for the long residence of the Popes, at such time as they were affronted by the Roman Senators. 4 Civitas Vecchia (called anciently Centumcella) the only useful Haven that belongeth to Rome; which being ruined by the Saracens, was rebuilt by the Popes, new named, and fortified with a very strong Castle for the defence of their Shipping. 5 Porto, seated on the mouth of Tiber, over against Osia; but cannot make one good Haven betwixt them both; a Bishops See, who is one of the seven Cardinals which is always assitant to the Pope. 6 Farnese, the ancient Seat and Patrimony of the Farnesis, now Dukes of Parma. 7 Bracciano, which gives the title of a Duke to a branch of the Ursini, a well-known Family of those parts. 8 Bacchano, near the last in found, although not in fire: compassed round about with Hills in form of a Theatre, having a fair Lake in the midst; out of which runneth the River Cremara, near which the Fabii were slain.

Here was in this Country also the City of the Veii, affirmed to be as big as Athens, but questionless of great wealth and power; in a War against which, managed for the most part by the aforesaid Fabii, 306 of them were slain in a day, at the battel of Cremera, a petit River of the Tuscans: only one little child of them being left at home, who reitored the house; and was the Ancestor of that Fabius Maximus who preserved Italy, in the wars with Annibal. Of which great slaughter, thus saith Ovid,

— — — Veientibus Arvis
Ter centum Fabii, ter cecidere duo.

— — — On the Veientine plain
Three hundred and six Fabii were slain.

This City of the Veii was at last, after a ten years siege, taken by Furius Camillus, and by him levelled with the earth; because he found that the common people of Rome had a mind to leave their own City, and inhabit here. Here is also that fatal River of Alia, nigh unto which Brennus and his Galls, (that people, as shall be shewn hereafter, having 200 years before been drawn into Italy by the sweet taste of the Italian Wines) slaughtered the Romans: the Roman Army at that time consisting of 40000 Souldiers, most of them being raw and unexperienced; the Galls not more in number, but naturally of a more fierce and hardy courage, and withal so big-boned, that it seemeth they were born to be the terror of mankind, and the ruin of Cities. Which overthrow at Alia, and the vanquishment of the Fabii, hapning in one day, though in divers years, occasioned the old Romans to put that day among those unfortunate dayes, on which they never did attempt any business of importance. The like custom, whether on superstition, or fear of ill luck, is used by many Christians; and especially on Childermas day: on which Philip de Comines telleth us that Lewis the 11. used not to debate of any matter, but accounted it a sign of some great misfortune towards him, if any man communed with him of his affairs; and would be marvellously displeased with those that were near him, if they troubled him with any matter whatsoever. In this particular, little less superstitious (if not more) than the ancient Romans. And finally, here is the famous Lake called Thrasymene (now Lago di Perugia, from the nearness of it to that City) where Annibal slew Flaminius the Consul, and 15000 of his Romans: which fight continued three hours, with so great an eagerness, that the Souldiers perceived not a terrible Earthquake which at that time happened.

6 CAMPAGNA DI ROMA, containeth that part of Italy, which anciently was called Latium, the habitation of the Latins, and seat of Rome; so called, for that it is adjoining to that famous City, as the more proper Territory, and precinct thereof. It is sometimes also called Campania nova, to difference it from Campania properly so called; the seat and dwelling of the Campans. It is bounded on the East with the said Campania, from which it is parted by the River Acrofenus; on the West, with Tiber; on the North, with Umbria, or the now Ducato Spoletano, and Sabinia; and on the South, with the Tyrrenian, or Tuscan Sea; and came unto the Popes by no other Title, than as they had the Sovereignty and possession of the City of Rome, to which it always did belong.

The old Inhabitants were the Latins, as before is said, but subdivided into many petite and inferior Tribes, such as the Equi, Volsci, Fidenates, and others of as little note, to the number of thirty, all vanquished piecemeal by the Romans, first under the conduct of their Kings, and then of their Consuls and Dictators. Broken at last by L. Quintius the Dictator, A. V. C. 295. they became associates with the Romans, and so continued for the space of 100 years and upwards. But growing insolent on the sack of that City by the Galls, and impudently requiring that one Consul yearly should be chosen by and from themselves, they drew the Romans into Arms: by whom subdued under the leading of Manlius Torquatus, and Decius Mus, then Consuls, A. V. C. 413. Subject from that time forwards to the state of Rome, but enjoying greater privileges than the rest of the conquered Nations did; excepting such to whom the like were granted by especial favour.

The chief place of it in old times was the City of Alba, then the Seat-royal of the Latin, or Sylvan Kings, ruined by Tullus Hostilius the third King of Rome, in which war Rome and Alba being laid at the stake, the whole action was committed by the Romans to the Horatii; to the Curatii, by the Albani, being three Brethren of each side; in which it hapned that two of the Horatii were first slain, and the third counterfeiting a flight severed his enemies, and so flew them; whereby the Albani ever after became subject to Rome. 2 Lavinium, built by Æneas in honour of his wife Lavinia. 3 Antium, honoured many times with the seat and retirement of the Emperors: the Countrey round about affording variety of Recreations. The people once very strong in shipping, till the taking of the Town by Mævinus a Roman Consul, who having broke their Forces at Sea, brought with him into Rome, the Beaks of their Ships and other Vessels, with which he decked and beautified the Pulpit for Orations (in the common Forum) which have generally ever since been called Rostra. This was the chief City of the ancient Volsci, a people very strong in shipping, though without an Haven: afterwards much frequented by the principal Romans in their retirements from the City, so that for pompous and stately buildings it might compare with any other. Out of the ruins of this Town long ago destroyed, sprang the new City called Nepesinum, situate on a Rock near unto the Sea, the steepness of which gives it natural strength enough; and yet it is fortified besides with two strong Castles, surveying the Sea, and commanding the shore. 4 Ardea, the chief Town of the Rutuli, and seat of Turnus, the Rival and Competitor of Æneas: afterwards taken by Superbus the last King of the Romans; to which when the Galls had taken Rome, the miserable Citizens were compelled to fly. 5 Gabii, taken also by the same Superbus, whose son Sexsus counterfeiting some dislike of his Fathers cruelties, fled to the Gabii, by whom improvidently entrusted with the command of their City, which he betrayed unto the Romans. 6 Offia, anciently the Port-town to Rome, built at the mouth of Tiber, by Ancus Martinus, the 4th King of Rome; but the Haven hath been long since dammed up, to stop the passage of the enemies Ships unto the City. The Bishop of this Town useth to consecrate the Pope. 7 Præneste, first conquered by the Romans under Qu. Cincinnatus the Dictator. Nothing so much endamaged this City as its natural and artificial Fortifications: for when the Romans in the times of sedition abandoned the Town, they used to make this place their refuge. Among others, Marius the younger made it the seat of war, against L. Sylla: but perceiving the unsuccessfulness of his affairs, here killed himself; and Sylla entering it as conquerour, put 12000 of the Citizens to the sword. It hath since been so often sacked, that it is very short now of its former lustre; but still it holds the reputation of a Bishops See. 8 Tibur, an ancient City also, and seated in a healthy Air. It is now called Tivoli, where there is a Fountain, which with artificial Engines moved with water, representeth the notes of divers Birds. A device very rare (it seemeth) in the time of Adrianus, who reporteth it; but now grown ordinary. In the perfection of which Art, as almost all Civil Nations may pretend a share; so I conceive that the priority herein doth belong of right unto the French, whose Malter-pieces in this kind do far exceed the rest of Europe. For in the Kings house at St. Germain, seven miles from Paris (if it be lawful for me to digress a little on this Argument) one may behold the Statua of a Nymph, sitting before a pair of Organs: whose fingers by the help of water, are taught to manage the keys in so due an order, and the instrument to yield such a Musick to it, as comes exceeding near the Organ, if it be not the same; her head in the mean time jolting from one shoulder to another, like an old Fiddlers as a Wake; there being also not far off, the counterfeits of divers Mills, who very busily plyed their work till the Musick founded, and then stood still as if enchanted with the noise. In another place, upon the drawing of a Curtain, one may see two Titrons riding on their Dolphins, in a Sea of water; each of them with a shell in his hand, which interchangeably and in turns served in stead of Trumpets. In a third, the story of Perseus and Andromeda most lively acted; and in a fourth fourth Orpheus in Sylvia posita, Orpheus playing on a Viol, the Trees moving, and the wilde Beasts dancing in two rings about him, by the artificial guidance of the waters only; the pretty Birds in every place so chirping out of their several and respective notes, that the hearer would conceive himself to be in some pleasant Grove. But it is time to go from Tivoli to Velitri (called anciently Velitra, and then a City of the Volsci) famous for the birth of the Emperor Augustus, and the dwelling of the Æavian Family; a place most delectably seated amongst the Vines, which yield as rich Wines as most in Italy, to Anxur, so called of the Temple which was here dedicated to Jupiter, surnamed Anxur; that is, Beardless; first built by the Spartans, who flying from the severity of Lycurgus his Laws, did here fear themselves, after a Colony of the Volsci, and at last of the Romans. But this town being destroyed by the tyranny of time, there started up 11 Taracina in the place thereof, seated upon a Mountain; but near the Sea, which it embraceth like a half Moon (it is now called the Bay of Mola): this City lying on the one horn thereof, in the very extremity of the Popes Dominions; and that of Cajeta on the other; which is the first Port-town of the Realm of Naples. The Countrey hereabouts hath most pleasant Orchards, of Citrons, Oranges, and Limons; the Oranges having at the same time both ripe and Green Fruits, and represents a kinde of Summer in the dead of Winter.

Such other things as are remarkable in this Campagna (heretofore called Latium) but more by what they have been, than they are at the present, are 1 Tusculum, a Village which belonged to Tully, who here composed his excellent Book, called the Tusculan Questions. 2 Formia, built by the Lacicians, heretofore the delight and solace of the ancient Romans, now visible only in its ruins. 3 Prævernium, once the chief City of the Volsci, and the seat of Camilla, a noble Amazonian Lady; who aided Turnus the Rutulan, in his sharp war against Æneas and the Trojans, where she lost her life. 4 Circe, an old City (in the place whereof now stands S. Felix) the habitation of Circe, that so much celebrated Sorceress; of whom, and her chanting of Ulysses and his companions, there is so much upon record, in the ancient Poets. Near to which is the head-land called the Circean Promontory, the repercussion of the Waves by whose Southern Basis makes a dreadful noise; and gave occasion to the fabulous inventions of the roaring of Lions, howling of Dogs, &c. which were heard about that Witches dwelling.

But the great glory of Latium, and indeed not of Italy only but of all the World, was that the famous City of ROME was seated in it, being built on the East side of Tiber; now much enlarged by the increase of 42 lesser streams or Rivers. It is distant from the Sea about 15 miles, first built, as Fryer Leander a great Italian Antiquary is of opinion, by Roma, Daughter or Wife to one of the Latin Kings. But being forsaken and forlorn, by reason of the unwholsom air coming from the Fens; was rebuilt by Romulus, much pleased with the natural strength of the situation, and therefore like to make a good Town of war. And this tradition I should rather subscribe unto, than that it was called Rome from Romulus; who had he pleased to challenge the honour to himself, might better have caused it to be called Romulea (of which name there was a Town among the Samites) than to call it Roma. But whatsoever greatness it did after come to, it was small enough (God knows) at first; the City comprehending the Mount Palatine only, and therefore not a mile in compass: the Territory not extending, as Strabo witnesseth, above six miles from the City; and the Inhabitants thereof at the first general Muster, amounting at the most to 3300 men. So inconsiderable they were, as well in quality as numbers, that their neightbors thought it a disparagement to bestow their daughters on them; and therefore they were faine to get themselves wives by a sleight of wit: proclaiming solemn Playes and Pastimes to be held in Rome; and ravishing the women which came thither to behold the sports. The Kings succeeding much enlarged it. Mount Aventine, and the hill Janiculum on the other side of the water, being walled and added to it by Ancus Martinus; as Quirinalis, Esquilinus, and Viminalis, were by Servius Tullius; Capitolinus and Mount Colinus, came not in till afterwards. But at the last it was improved to such an height, that in the flourishing times of that Common-wealth, the men increased to the number of 463000, and the compass of the Town unto 50 miles; there being on and about the walls 740 Turrets. And in this number of 463000 men, I reckon neither fervants, women, nor children, but men able to bear Arms, Ætæ Danicæ, and such as were inrolled into Cense, or the Subsidie Books. To which if we should add their wives, children, and servants, we cannot probably conjecture them to have been fewer than three or four Millions: and so Lippius is of opinion, in his Tract de Magnitudine Romana. The most memorable buildings of it, were first the Capitol, founded by Tarquinius Superbus, and beautified with the spoils of their conquered Neighbourhood; saved from the fury of the Galls by the cackling of Geese. Tacitus calleth this house, Sedem Jovis optimi maximi, aspicatæ à majoribus pignus imperii conditum. It was twice burnt, once in the Civil Wars of Sylla and Marius; and again in the Wars of Vespasian and Vitellius. In the third building of it, Vespasian carried the first basket of earth; after him the Nobility did the like, to make the people more forward in the service: and perhaps the custom of laying the first stone in a building, or driving the first nail in a timber-work, by him whose edifice it is; hath from hence, if not beginning, yet growth. 2 Here was the Temple of Janus, open in the time of wars; and shut in the time of peace; which, during all their Monarchy, hapned but thrice: namely, during the reign of Augustus, after the first Punic War, and in the time of Numa. 3 Here was the Bridge called Pons Sublicius, on which Horatius Cocles resisted the whole Army of King Porcena, Tarquinius, and the Tuscan; till the Citizens behind had broken down the bridge, received him swimming to the bank with joyful acclamations, and saved their City from present ruine. Here lived the famous Warriors, so much renowned in the stories of elder times; here flourished the exact Martial discipline, so memorized by ancient Historiographers: and finally here were laid up the spoils and Trophies of all Europe.

ROME, as now it standeth lower on the bank of Tiber, upon Campus Martius, (where it was built ROME. built after the inundation of the Goths and Vandals) is in compass about eleven-miles, within which compass is not a little waste ground. The Inhabitants of all sorts reckoned to amount to 200000, two parts whereof are Clergy-men and Courtiers; that is to say, such as have their dependance on the Court of Rome, either by holding offices and places of employment under the Popes, or by attending on his person, or waiting on the Cardinals and eminent Prelates who are there abiding; or otherwise being of the retinue of such Foreign Ambassadors as are always commorant in the City to follow the Negotiations of their several Masters; all which must needs amount to a very great number. It was first built on the East-side of the River, in the Territory of Latium, but now there is little left of the old City but the goodly ruins; and here and there some Churches and scattered houses (except it be a little on the North-East of the River, from the Gate called Del Popolo, to the Island of Tiber): the rest, especially toward the South, being taken up with Pastures and fields of Corn. The main body of the City, as now it stands, is on the West-side of the water, and the Holy Island; consisting of three distinct parts or members. Of these the least is that which they call La Isola, but anciently the Holy Island; first made an Island by the Corn, Straw, and other goods of the Tarquins, which the Senate not vouchsafing to convert to any publick or private use, commanded to be flung into the River; where it sunk and settled to an Island, called afterwards the Holy Island, from a Temple herein built unto Esculapius, brought hither from Epidaurum, in the shape of a Serpent. This Island is not above a quarter of a mile in length, and hardly half so much in breadth; but full of stately Churches and beautiful houses. Next to this is that which they call Trastevere; or Trans-Tiberina, but of old Janiculum, from the Mountain of that name included in it: Called also Civitas Ravennatium, or the City of the men of Ravenna, of the Souldiers which Augustus kept at Ravenna against Antonius; and after placed in this part of the City, which by reason of the unwholsomness of the air, is inhabited only by Artizans and poor people; yet compassed about with walls, except on that side next the water, and adorned with many goodly Churches and some handsome buildings. But the chief glory of the City consisteth in that part of it which is called Il Borgo, lying on the North side of the other, but disjoined from it; compassed about with wals by Pope Leo the 4. and from thence called Civitas Leonina. For in this part there are, 1. the Church of S. Peter, which were it once finished, would be one of the rarest buildings in all the World. 2. The Castle of S. Angelo, impregnable unless by Famine. 3. The Popes Palace, called Belvidere, which with the Gardens thereof was compassed about with a very high wall, by Pope Nicolas the 5. and had his name from the fair prospect which it hath: in the same sense, as Belvoir Castle here in England; the Barony and Manſion of the Earls of Rutland. A Palace of magnificence and receipt enough. 4. The Library of the hill Vatican, properly called the Palatine, but more commonly the Vatican Library: a Library first founded by Sixtus the 4. who not only stored it with the choicest Books he could pick out of Europe; but allowed also a large revenue for the perpetual augmentation of it. Bibliothecam Palatinam in Vaticano, toto terrarum orbe celebrem, aduēctis ex omni Europa libris construxit; proventusq; certos, &c. So Onuphrius. When the Duke of Burbon sacked Rome, Anno 1527, it was much defaced and ransacked; but by the succeeding Popes it hath been again recovered to its former fame, and beauty. Rome is now an University; which was founded by Urban the fourth, at whose request Thomas Aquinas professed here. Pope Nicolas the fifth was a special benefactor to the same; and after him, Leo the tenth, who revived the Greek Learning and Language, which were in these parts almost forgotten. And finally, to this place are brought all the treasures of those parts of Christendom subject to the Popes authority: partly for the expence of strangers, which do there remain on their several pleasures or occasions; and partly for the expeditions which are there obtained, for the Investitures of Bishopricks, and Buis of Benefices, Indulgences and other matters of Court-holy-water; and partly in the Pensions, which are paid there to the Cardinals and other Ministers of those Kings and Princes, which know best how to make their ends of the Popes ambitions. So that it may be truly said, there came not more Tributes into Old Rome from the conquered Provinces, than hath been brought into the New from the subject Churches, which have submitted to the power of the Roman Prelates: and that they have as great command now under the pretence of Religion, as ever they had formerly by force of Arms. So truly was it said by Proper of Aquitane, (if my memory fail not).

Roma caput mundi, quicquid non possidet Armis,
Religione tenet.

That is to say,

What Rome subdu'd not with the Sword,
She holds by colour of the Word.

But yet there wants the Genius of the ancient City, the power and natural courage of the old Inhabitants, which held the same against the bravery and assaults of all Foreign Enemies: this City during the time of the ancient Romans, being never took but by the Galls; but since Pontifical, it hath been made a Prey to all Barbarous Nations, and never was besieged by any that did not take it. In a word, the City of Rome as now it standeth, is but the carcass of the old, of which it retains nothing but the ruins, and the cause of them, her sins.

The Popes much brag of the foundation of their Church, and the authority of S. Peter; whose being there is indeed constantly attested by most ancient Writers; inſomuch that Calvin, though no friend to the Popes of Rome, yet propter Scriptorum consensum, in regard of the unanimous consent of of the primitive times, did not think fit to controvert it. The silence of the Scriptures is a Negative Argument, and concludes nothing to the contrary; against so great a Cloud of unquestioned Witnesses, as soberly and positively have affirmed the same. And yet I would not have it thought by the captious Romanists, that I conceive that it makes any thing at all for the Popes Supremacy, because he sits in Peter's seat: no more than it did make for Vibius Rufus (as Dion doth relate the story) to attain Tullies eloquence, or Cæsars power, because he married Tullies widow, and bought Cæsars chair: though the poor Gentleman did beſool himself with this opinion, that he should be Master of them both. Of which see Lib. LVII. And yet the Popes rely so much upon this fancy, of being the direct heirs of S. Peter, and all his prebeminences, that all things which they say or do, must be entituled to S. Peter. Their Throne must be S. Peters Chair; their Church S. Peters Ship, their Lands S. Peters Patrimony, their Tributes and exactions must be called Peter-pence, their Excommunications fulminated in S. Peters name; and all their Buis and Faculties sealed Annulo Piscatoris, with S. Peters Signet. Nay they went so far at the last, that Pope Steven not being contented to be Peters Successor, did take upon him in plain terms to be Peter himself. For being distressed by Astolphus King of the Lombards, he sends for aid unto King Pepin in the following stile. Petrus Apostolus JESU CHRISTI, &c. i. e. Peter the Apostle of JESU CHRIST to you the most illustrious King Pepin, and to all Bishops, Abbots, &c. I the Apostle Peter, whose adopted sons you are, admonish you that you presently come and defend this City, &c. And doubt you not, but trust assuredly, that I myself, as if I stood before you, do thus exhort you, &c. and that I Peter the Apostle of God, will at the last day yield you mutual kindnesses, and prepare you Tabernacles in the heavens. Baronius who records this Letter, Anno 755. num. 17. was it seems, pretty well persuaded of it, that the Pope and Peter were all one. For in his Exhortation or Paranesis to the State of Venice, being then upon some differences with Pope Paul the fifth, he stileth him in plain terms thus, Paulus idem, Petrus vicem Christi agens in terris, i. e. Paul, who is also Peter, and Christs Vicegerent. But leaving these imaginary claims and challenges of S. Peters privileges, though they did really advance the reputation of that See in the darker Ages: two things there were which did exceedingly conduce to the improvement of their power, in the more knowing and discerning times of Christianity. Of which the principal, was the Orthodoxy of the Bishops or Popes of Rome, their eminent and sincere profession of the Faith of Christ; when almost all the other Churches were either torn in pieces by the fury of Schisms, or waited and subverted by the fraud of Heresie. In which regard, Appeals were frequently made to the Church of Rome, as a more competent Judge of the truth of Doctrine; the communion of it much desired by all true Christians; and a repair thither for relief and shelter in the times of trouble, made by the Orthodox Professors under persecution. And of these times, and this condition of that Church, we are to understand such passages of the Ancient Writers, as magnifie the Faith of the Church of Rome, and set it above all the batteries and assaults of Heresie. Such is that passage of S. Cyprian, Romanos esse ad quos perfidia non potest habere accessum, lib. 1. ep. 3. and that of Hierome, Romanam fidem (i. e. Romanorum fidem) Apostolica voce laudatam, cunctis mediis preſtigias non recipere, in Apol. cont. Rufin. and many others of that kinde. Which passages it were as foolish and ridiculous to apply to all following times; the condition of that Church being different, from what then it was; as to accommodate all those Elogies and commendations to the present City of Rome; which the Orators and *Panegyrist*s of the elder times have hyperbolically ascribed to old Rome, in her greatest glories. The next was the fixation of the Popes in the Metropolis, or Imperial City; which drawing to it such a multitude of suiters and attendants from all parts of the world, could not but add much to the power and reputation of those Prelates, who had the happiness and honour to be resident there: and thereby opportunity to gain more Disciples, to solve more doubts of conscience, and decide more controversies, than any other could expect. And so we are to understand that passage in S. Irenæus, in which he saith, Ad hanc Ecclesiam propter potentiorum Principalitatem, necesse est omnino convenire Ecclesiam, i. e. eos qui sunt undiq; Ecclesia. And so they did as long as Rome enjoyed the honour of a more potent Principality than other Cities. But when that more potent Principality failed to be at Rome, by the removal of the Imperial See, first to Constantinople, and afterwards unto Ravenna; then did the Bishops of Constantinople and Ravenna, dispute with those of Rome for Superiority: the chief seat of Religion most commonly following the seat of the Empire. And in this claim the Patriarch or Bishop of Constantinople prevailed so far, that with the permission of Mauritius the Emperor, he took upon him the title of Universal Patriarch. Gregory the Great (of whom it is said that he was the worst Bishop of all that went before him, and the best of all that came after him) was at that time Bishop of Rome; who sharply inveighed as well against the Emperor, as the Patriarch of Constantinople, for this Title; and plainly maintained, that whatsoever called himself Universal Bishop, was the fore-runner of Antichrist. As for himself, it is probable that he took the title of Servus servorum Dei, more in opposition to him of Constantinople, than with an intent to be so truly. To which though those of Rome reply, that Gregory did not absolutely condemn this Title, but only blame John the Constantinopolitan Patriarch, for assuming to himself that attribute, which properly belonged to the See of Rome; yet this cannot be. For then either in the old Buis of the former Popes, we should find mention of this Title; or else Pope Gregory would have assumed it to himself, that the world might take notice to whom of right it did belong. But Boniface, who next but one succeeded Gregory, having further aims, applied himself to Phocas that bloody Tyrant: who having murdered the Emperor Mauritius, his wife and children, and thereby got the general hatred of all the good Subjects of the Empire, the better to assure himself of Italy, which he feared was ready to revolt, declared this Boniface to be the Oecumenical Bishop, and Head of the Church. To such a good beginning, such a gracious Patron, do the Popes stand indebted for that power and Empire, which now they challenge to themselves over all the Church.

Now

Now as the Bishop of Constantinople, and Ravenna, did challenge a priority or precedency; of the Popes of Rome; by reason that they were respectively honoured with the Seat Imperial: so were there divers other Bishops, as Antioch, Alexandria, Carthage, Millain, which claimed an equality with them; and would by no means yield them any superiority. For trial of whose claim, we must look back on somewhat which hath been said before; where it is shewn that the Roman Empire was divided into fourteen Dioceses, each Diocese being subdivided into several Provinces, each Province comprehending many several Cities: then that in every of those Cities, where the Romans had their Defensores, the Christians also had a Bishop; in the Metropolis of each Province, which commonly was the seat of the Roman President, the Christians had their Metropolitan; and that in each principal City of each several Diocese, wherein the Vicar of that Diocese had fixed his dwelling, there did the Christians place a Primate. And this was done according to that famous Maxim of Optatus, Respublica non est in Ecclesia, sed Ecclesia est in Republica, that the Church is in the Common-wealth, and not the Common-wealth in the Church. Upon which foundation the Fathers in the Council of Chalcedon, raised this superstructure, Εκκλησιαστικὴν τὴν τιμὴν, &c. that the honours of the Church should be accommodated unto those in State. So that according to this Platform, the Primates of the Church were of equal power, each of them limited and restrained to his proper Sphere; out of the which if he presumed once to act, he moved irregularly, and in his Eccentricities. And for those Primates, I shall give you once for all this general Muster, that is to say, the Patriarch or Pope of Rome, for the Diocese or Præfecture of that City; the Primate or Archbishop of Millain, for the Diocese of Italy; of Syrium, for that of Illyricum; of Lyons, for that of France; of Tork, for Britain; of Toledo, for Spain; and of Carthage, for Africa. Then for the East parts of the Empire, there was the Patriarch of Alexandria, for the Diocese of Egypt; of Antioch, for that of the Orient; the Primate or Archbishop of Ephesus, for the Diocese of Asia; of Nicomedia, for that of Pontus; of Bizantium, or Constantinople, for that of Thrace; of Thessalonica, for the Diocese of Greece, and of Justiniana prima, for that of Dacia. Amongst all which there was a mutual correspondence and Co-ordination, for the general Government of the Church; maintained by Letters of intercourse, which they called Literas Formatas, and Communicatorias; but no subordination, and much less subjection, unto one another, as doth appear most evidently by the Canons of the Council of Nice, assigning to the three great Patriarchs their peculiar bounds, according to the custome of the former times. As for the Diocese or Patriarchate of the Popes of Rome, it contained in it those ten Provinces, which were immediately subject to the Præfect or Provoost of that City (an Officer first instituted by Augustus Cæsar) that is to say, the Provinces of Tuscia and Umbria, Picennum Suburbicarium, Campania, Apulia and Calabria, Valeria, Savennium, Lucania and the Bruttii, in the main Land of Italy; and the three Islands of Sicily, Corfica, and Sardinia. In which regard, (I mean as to the immediate Government of those Provinces by the Præfect of the City of Rome) as they are called Regiones Suburbicariae, by Ruffinus an Italian Writer; so anciently the Pope himself was called Urbicus, or the City-Bishop, as appears plainly by Optatus, who calleth Pope Zepherinus, Zepherinus Urbicus. But the Popes were not long content with that allotment, growing up daily by a iteddy and constant watchfulness upon all occasions, to encrease the Grandour of that See; and taking to themselves the honour to be Vindices Canonum, the strict and punctual preservers of the ancient Discipline, which took extremely well with all sorts of people. Till in the end from being Vindices Canonum, they came to be Interpreters, and at last the Rulers, or rather the Over-rulers of the Canons; and from chief Labourers in the Vineyard, they became the Landlords: which was the honour aimed at, and at last obtained by the foresaid Boniface, whom that cruel and butcherly Tyrant Phocas made the Head of the Church, the sixty sixth Bishop and first Pope of Rome: the Latine word Papa coming from the old Greek πάππας, signifying a Father. A Title at the first common unto other Bishops, as is evident to any one, who hath read the Fathers; but after this appropriated unto those of Rome. Of these Popes, their Succession, and times of Government, our Chronologers are very uncertain: not one of them that ever I had the luck to see, agreeing exactly with another. The reasons whereof, as I conceive, are, 1 The frequent Vacancies; and 2 the many Schisms which have hapned in it; and 3 the Anti-Popes in them created: the Writers of those times accounting him only among the Popes, to whose faction they were most devoted. This Catalogue ensuing I have collected principally out of the Tables of Helvicus, Freigius, Bill. rsmine, and Onuphrius, whose differences I have reconciled as well as possibly I could: premonishing the Reader, that where the number of years which every Pope is found to sit in the Papal Chair, makes not up the full number from his first admission, to the coming in of his Successor; it must be understood of some Schism or Vacancy, hapning in the Interval, by which the tale is to be made up. And for the difficulties which occur amongst the Antients, in the first Succession, some placing of them thus, Linus, Cletus, Clemens; some Linus, Clemens, Cletus; and finally some others putting Clemens the first: I know no better way to compose the same, than to affirm (as many of the Fathers do) that S. Peter and S. Paul were Co-founders of the Church in Rome; S. Peter of the Church of the Circumcision, and S. Paul of the Gentiles; each of them being Bishop of the Church of his own foundation: and then to draw down the Succession in this manner following.

To these 179 Popes, add the 65 Bishops which preceded that arrogant title of Universal, and they make up the full number of 244. How many are to come, he must be a cunning man that can determine. And yet such cunning men there have been, who have determined positively, but withal, Prophetically, of the number of Popes; by name S. Malachy one of the first Apostles of the Irish Nation, very much honoured by that people to this very day. Of whom there is remaining in Massingham's collection of the Irish Saints, a certain number of Mottoes, in the Latin tongue; agreeable to the nature or chief accidents of as many Popes successively to one another, according to the order of those several Mottoes: and thereunto this Prophecy annexed, that when so many Popes had sat in S. Peter's Chair, either the World should end, or the Popedom fail. The Book was shewed to me by the Author, when I was at Paris, and the Popes names in order joyned to every Motto, as far as to the time of Urban, who last deceased; which I compared as well as memory would serve me, and found the Mottoes and the Popes to be very answerable. The Motto for Pope Urban, which I took most notice of, was, Lilium & Rosa: a Motto very suitable to the principal Action which was like to happen in his time, being the conjunction of the English Rose, and the French Lily; in the Marriage of Charles King of England, and Madam Henrietta Maria the Princess of France; which that Pope earnestly promoted, in his speedy and cheerful granting of the Dispensation. And to take from me all suspicion of Imposture, this Massingham shewed me an old Book written by one Pion a Fleming, and printed near 200 years before his Collection; in which the Mottoes stood as in his they did, and comparing the Mottoes with a printed Catalogue of the Popes, I found the name of Urban, and that Motto, to jump even together. From Urban downwards there remained (as I now remember) 36 Mottoes more to come; by consequence if this Malachy were as true a Prophet as one Malachy was, just so many Popes, and then the Popedom to be ruined, or the World to end. But I hope God for his Elect's sake will abridge those days, and not permit the superflitions and corruptions of that Church to endure so long; nor so many Affertors and Defenders of those Roman Heterodoxies, to be added to the former number. Out of the stories of all which (preremitting many things of less consideration) I will only select some few passages, for the better understanding of their state and story.

1. Pelagius the first, ordained that Hereticks and Schismaticks should be punished with temporal death; which severity continueth still: and that none should be preferred to Ecclesiastical dignities by Gifts, and Bribes; which pious order is long since antiquated.

2. Vitalianus, first brought Organs into the divine service of the Church of Rome, to be used with the singing or vocal Music formerly in use; which afterwards was brought unto more perfection by the Popes succeeding.

3. Constantine was so generally beloved of all men, that going to Constantinople, Justinian the second kilt his feet in sign of honour, which some of the ambitious Popes in times succeeding, drew into example, and at last brought into a custome as it still continueth.

4. Pas-

4. Pascal the first, caused the Priests of certain Parishes in Rome, by reason of their nearness to his person, their presence at his Election, and to honour them with a more venerable Title, to be called Cardinals. Now mates for Kings, and numbered about 70. but more or fewer at the sole pleasure of the Popes.

5. Eugenius the second took to himself within the Territories of the Church, the Authority of creating, Dukes, Earls, and Knights; as the Exarch of Ravenna had used to do.

6. Sergius the second, was the first that changed his name. For, thinking his own name, Bocca di Porco, or Swine's mouth, not consonant to his dignity, he caused himself to be called Sergius; which precedent his Successors following, do also vary their names. So that if one be a Coward, he is called Leo; if a Tyrant, Clemens; if an Atheist, Pius, or Innocent; if a Rustick, Urbanus; and so of the rest.

7. John the eighth is by most men confessed to be a woman, and is usually called Pope Joane. To avoid the like disgrace, the Porphyry Chair was ordained; Ubi ab ulisq; diacono, &c. so that both in a literal and mystical sense, this woman may not unfitly be called, The Whore of Babylon. The name of this Female Pope, the Romish Chronologers have not inserted into the Catalogue; the reason, as Marianus Scotus giveth it, propter turpitudinem rei, & sexum muliebrem. And from hence it is that in the common Catalogues, these Popes that have called themselves Johns, are so ill ordered; some making that John which succeeded Adrian the second, An. 872. to be the 8th. and others the 9th. Platina only of all the Pontificians reckoneth Pope Joane as the 8th. of the Johns, and so forward: in which particular I have followed his authority. And it is probable enough that God might suffer that proud See to fall into such an infamy, the better to humble the ensuing Popes, in the times of their greatest ruff and flourish; or to prevent the brag of that continued Succession, they so much pretend to. More of this Argument, (as to the truth of the story in matter of Fact) he that lists to see, may satisfy himself in Mr. Cook's Book of Pope Joane; who most indolently hath answered all objections, which have been made against it by those of Rome.

8. Nicolaus the first, the better to fasten the Clergy to the See of Rome, and make them the less obnoxious to their natural Princes; was the first who did by Law restrain them from marriage. Saying that it was the more honest to have to do with many women privately, than openly to keep a wife: and some of his Successors followed it so close, that a Priest of Placentia being accused to have wife and children, was deprived of his Benefice; but upon proof made, that she was the wife of another man, and his Strumpet only, he was again restored unto it.

9. Adrian the third ordained, that the Emperour from thenceforth should have no more to do with the Election, or confirmation of the Pope; but that it should be left wholly to the Romish Clergy.

10. Formosus was so ill beloved, and of such a general disesteem, that Pope Steven the seventh caused his body to be unburied, all his A&S reversed, two of his fingers to be cut off; and then the mangled carcase to be again interred among the Laity. And though these Acts of Steven were adjudged illegal, both by John the tenth, and Pope Romanus, two of his Successors; and the doings of Formosus justified: yet Sergius the third caused his corrupt and putrified body to be taken once more out of the grave; and his head to be cut off, as if still alive. So little did the infallibility of St. Peter's Chair prelerve these Popes from falling into gross and irreconcilable contradictions.

11. John the twelfth, was the next after Sergius the second, that changed his name; a very wicked, cruel, and libidinous man: who coming to that place by his Fathers greatness, cut off the Nose of one Cardinal, and the hand of another, for that they had signified to the Emperour Orto the first, what a scandal all the Church did suffer by his detestable life; and finally being taken in Adultery, was slain by the husband of the woman.

12. Gregory the fifth, finding the power of the Emperour, as long as it continued in a way of succession, not likely to be over-born by that of the Church; and being withal incensed against the Romans, who till that time retained some shadow of an Empire; projected the election of the future Emperours, by the Princes of Germany; by which the Germans were distracted into Factions, and the Romans weakened; and so a door left open to the Popes of Rome, to make their ends upon them both.

13. Steven the tenth brought the Church of Millain to be under the obedience of the Popes of Rome, which till that time had challenged an equality with them; as before Pope Domnus had done the Church of Ravenna, which for some time had challenged the precedence of them.

14. Gregory the seventh, commonly called Hildebrand, a turbulent and unquiet man, who first adventured to draw the premises laid down by some of his Predecessors into a conclusion: Excommunicating the Emperour Henry the fourth, for meddling with the Investitures of Bishops, and causing Rodolph Duke of Suevia to rebel against him. A man much favoured against the Princes of her own House by the Countess Mahilda; who is said to be so much his friend, that for his sake she left the company of her husband, and disherited her right Heirs, settling her whole estates in Italy on the See of Rome. And though the Emperour had the better of this Pope, and made him fly out of Rome, and dye in exile; yet he was slain at last to submit himself to Pope Paschal the second; (who had armed his own son against him) to attend bare-foot at his own door and cry peccavi.

15. Sergius the third, ordained the bearing of Candles, in the Feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, thence called Candlemas's day.

16. Sergius the fourth was the first that on Christmas's night, with divers Ceremonies did consecrate Swords, Roses, or the like; to be sent as tokens of love and honour to such Princes as deserved best of

of them, or whom they desired to oblige. Thus Leo the tenth sent a consecrated Rose to Frederick Duke of Saxony, requesting him to banish Luther: and Paul the third an hallowed Sword to James the fifth of Scotland, to engage him in a war against Henry the 8th. who had then withdrawn himself and his Kingdom, from the Popes commands.

17. Nicolas the second took from the Roman Clergy the election of Popes, and gave it to the College of Cardinals.

18. Celestine the second, was the Inventer of that mad manner of cursing, or Anathematizing, by Bell, Book, and Candle.

19. Alexander the third, pursuing the desperate course of Gregory the seventh, excommunicated the Emperor Frederick the first; and by railing war against him in every place, brought him to that exigent, that he was fain to prostrate himself at his feet: when the Pope treading on his neck, said aloud Super Aspidem & Basiliscum, &c. profanely applying those words to the present occasion. And when the Emperor, to put the better colour on his disgrace, meekly replied, Non tibi sed Petro; the Pope not willing to lose his part of so great a glory, subjoyned as angrily, Et mihi & Petro.

20. Innocent the third held a Council in Rome, in which it was decreed that the Pope should have the correction of all Christian Princes; and that no Emperor should be acknowledged, till he had sworn obedience to him. Which bringeth into my mind that jolly humour of the great Cham of Tartary; who when he hath dined, commands his Trumpeters to sound, and make Proclamation, that now all other Kings and Princes may sit down to dinner. He brought in the Doctrine of Transubstantiation, and ordained that there should be a Pix made to cover the consecrated (but now transubstantiated) Bread, and a Bell to be rung before it. He is also said to have first imposed Auricular Confession upon the people.

21. Nicolas the third was the first Pope who practised to enrich his kindred, intending to make one of them King of Lombardy, another King of Tuscany; and to raise the rest to great Advancements out of the Lands of the Church. Before which time (as Machiavel very well observeth) as there was no mention of the advancement of any of the Popes kinsfolks or posterity; so afterwards they studied no one thing more than to preferre their own blood; inasmuch that they have not only laboured (as he saith) to make them Princes, but if it were possible would procure the Popedom to be made hereditary. So he, with probability enough. For so dearly do they love their Nephews (by which name they use to call their Bastards) that it was very justly said by Pope Alexander the third, The Laws forbid us to get Children, and the Devil hath given us Nephews in their stead.

52. Boniface the eighth, of whom it is said, that he entered like a Fox, reigned like a Lyon, and dyed like a Dog; by his general Bull, exempted the Clergy from being chargeable with Taxes and Payments, unto Temporal Princes. Which being complied with by the Clergy of England, King Edward the first put them out of his protection; and so the Popes Bull left roaring here. He caused the Book of the Canon Law, called the Decretals, to be first set out: and instituted the Feast of Jubilee, to be held in Rome every hundredth year; but by Clement the sixth it was brought unto the fiftieth year, and since reduced to the five and twentieth. This is that Boniface, who in that great concourse of people which repaired to Rome, to observe his new Feast of Jubilee, (to which every one that did repair was to have a plenary remission of all his sins) shewed himself one day in the habit of a Pope, and the next day in that of an Emperor; and caused two Swords to be born before him every day, in sign that all power Ecclesiastical and Temporal did belong unto him.

23. Clement the fifth was the first that made Indulgences and Pardons saleable. For seeing (said he) that one drop of our Saviours blood had been enough to have saved all Mankind, and yet that all his blood was shed; the over-plus was left to the Church as a standing Treasure, to be disposed of by St. Peter and his Successors. And hereunto, to make his Treasure the more inexhausted, he added the Merits of the Virgin Mary, and all other Saints. Being wearied with the insolencies of the people of Rome, he removed the Papal See to Avignon in France, where it continued for the space of seventy years.

24. Clement the sixth had an ill time of it. For in his Papacy the Emperor gave freely all Lands belonging to the Church, to such as formerly had usurped them; to be holden by them of the Empire. Upon which title the Maltesi became Lords of Rimini, the Ordalassi of Forli, the Vareni of Cambrino, the Benivolieri of Bononia, the Manfredi of Faenza, &c. Which Estates were never recovered to the Church, till the time of Pope Julio the second; though conquered from the present owners in the time of Alexander the sixth, by Cesar Borgias his son; who had an aim of selling them, and perhaps the Papacy it self; on the Borgian Family.

25. Gregory the eleventh returned the Papal Chair again to the City of Rome, whither he conveyed himself by Sea, in private, for fear of being withheld by the French: and being come thither, found the chief parts of the City so over-grown with briers and bushes, and the principal buildings of it so decayed and ruinous, that a little longer absence would have made it desolate.

26. Paul the second endeavoured to encrease the Majesty of the Popedom by Arms and Avarice, and exceeded all his Predecessors in pomp and shew: causing his Miter to be enriched with Diamonds, Saphirs, Emeralds, and other Stones of great price; and augmenting the splendour of the Cardinals with a scarlet Gown, whom Innocent the 4th. had graced with red Hats before. He brought the Jubilee from 50 years to 25.

27. Sixtus the fourth ordained a constant Guard to attend his person. He very much beautified and repaired the City of Rome, and was the first founder of the Vatican Library. But on the other side

he

he is said by some, to have set all Offices and preferments to sale, and to have builded in Rome Stewes of both sexes, to bring in Beads, and to authorize our Ladies Palter.

28. Alexander the sixth, setting aside all modesty, was the first that openly acknowledged his Nephews (as they call their Bastards) to be his Sons. By one of which, the Cesar Borgias before named, he recovered Forli, Imola, and many other estates from the present owners, on a design of settling them in his own Family, as before is said; and to that end called in the French, who after made such foul work in Italy.

29. Julio the second had more in him of the Soldier, than the Prelate, recovering many Towns unto the Church which had been formerly usurped, being taken from the Occupants by Cesar Borgias; and keeping Italy in his time in continual wars. This is the Pope who passing over the Bridge of Tiber, brandished his Sword, and threw his Keyes into the River; saying, that if Peters Keyes would not serve his turn, then Pauls Sword should do it.

30. Leo the tenth was indeed a great Favourer of Learning, but of great prodigality, and vast expence. For maintenance whereof, he sent his saleable Indulgences into France, and Germany: which business being indiscreetly handled by his Ministers, occasioned Luther in Germany, and Zuinglius amongst the Switzers, first to write against them; and afterwards to question many points of Popish Doctrine. In pursuance of which quarrel, the Pope of Rome burnt Luthers Books, whom he declared for an Heretick; and Luther did the like at Wittenberg, with the Popes Canon Law, whom he declared to be a Persecutor, a Tyrant, and the very Antichrist. Which flame encreased so fast and enlarged so far, that it burnt down a great part of the Papal Monarchy.

31. Pius the fourth continued the Council formerly called at Trent by Pope Paul the third, but interrupted and layd aside from one Pope to another, and having brought it to an end, and thereby settled and confirmed the Interests of the Church of Rome, caused it to be received as Oecumenical: though the Italian Bishops being most of them the Popes creatures, did more than double the number of all the rest; and yet some of the rest also were but merely Titulars. He added also a new Creed consisting of twelve Articles to be added to that of the Apostles, by all who lived in the Communion of the Church of Rome. But of the words and actions of these Ghostly Fathers we have said enough; if not too much. I will therefore end with that of the Painter, who being blamed by a Cardinal, for giving to St. Peters picture too much of the red, replied, that he had made him so, as blushing at the lives of those who were called his Successors.

As for the Temporal power and greatness of the Popes of Rome, there is a pretended Donation of the Emperor Constantine; by which the City of Rome it self, most part of Italy, and Africa, and all the Islands of those Seas are conferred upon them: the forgery whereof is very learnedly shewn by our learned Cracamborpe, in his discourse upon that subject. But that Donation might most justly be suspected of Fraud and Forgery, though no body had took the pains to detect the same; considering how fearful the Popes are grown to have the truth thereof disputed: inasmuch that many leaves are razed out of Guicciardine by the Inquisition, where it had been questioned. For in that place the Historian not only denyeth the said feigned Donation, but affirms that divers learned men reported, that Constantine and Sylvester (to whom it is said to have been made) lived in divers Ages. Then sheweth, how base and obscure the Authority of the Pope was in Rome it self, during the time that the barbarous Nations made havock of Italy. 2 That in the institution of the Exarchate, the Popes had nothing to do with the Temporal Sword, but lived as subject to the Emperours. 3 That they were not very much obeyed in matters Spiritual, by reason of the corruption of their manners. 4 That after the overthrow of the Exarchate, the Emperours now neglecting Italy, the Romans began to be governed by the advice and power of the Popes. 5 That Pepin of France, and his Son Charles having overthrown the Kingdom of the Lombards; gave unto the Popes, the Exarchate, Istria, Ancona, Spoleto, and many other Towns and Territories about Rome. 6 That the Popes in all their Bulls and Characters, expressed the date of them in these following words; Such a one our Lord the Emperor reigning. 7 That long after the translation of the Empire from France to Germany, the Popes began to make open protestation, that the Pontifical dignity was rather to give Lawes to the Emperours, than receive any from them. 8 That being thus raised to an earthly power, they forgot the salvation of souls, sanctity of life, and the Commandments of God, propagation of Religion, and Charity towards men: And that to raise Arms, to make war against Christians, to invent new devices for getting of money, to profane sacred things for their own ends, and to enrich their kindred and children, was their only study. And this is the substance of Guicciardine in that place: an Author above all exception. He was a man whom the Popes employed in many businesses of principal importance; so that no hate to them, but love to the truth, made him write thus much. As for the City of Rome, so unlikely is it to have been given by Constantine, that neither Pepin nor Charles his Son, (though more beholding to the Popes than that Emperor was) could be induced to part with it. Lewis furnished Pius is said to have been the first Donor of it, and a Copy of his Donation is found in the third Book of Volaterran; subscribed by the Emperor, his three Sons, ten Bishops, eight Abbots, fifteen Earls, and the Popes Library-Keeper: yet notwithstanding it is thought, by many very learned and judicious men, that really there was no such matter; but that all this was forged by Anastasius the Popes Bibliothecarian, or Library-Keeper, who is cited as a witness to the Donation. And yet to put the matter further out of question, let us next hear what that great Politian and Statesman, the Recorder of Florence, Nic. Machiavel hath observed in this case. Rome (saith he) was always subject to the Lords of Italy, till Theodorick King of the Goths removed his Seat to Ravenna; for thereby the Romans were enforced to submit themselves to the Bishops, An. 430. or thereabouts. And talking of the estate

"of the Popedom, An. 931. he states it thus. In Rome were elected yearly out of the Nobility two Consuls, who according to the ancient Custom ruled that City. Under them was appointed a Judge to minister justice to the people. There was also a Council of twelve men, which gave Governours unto the Towns subject to Rome. And for the Pope, he had in Rome more or less Authority, according to the favour which he found with the Emperours, or others then most mighty; but the leaving of Italy by the German Emperours, settled the Pope in a more absolute Sovereignty over the City. And yet it seems they were not of such absolute power, but that the Romans tugged hard with them for their Liberties. Concerning which he tells us in another place, That the ambition of the people of Rome did at that time (viz. An. 1010.) make much war with the Popes; and that having helped the Pope to drive out the Emperour, and altered the Government of the City as to them seemed good, suddenly they became Enemies to him; and the Popes received more injuries at their hands, than at any other Christian Princes; and that even in those days when the Censures of the Popes made all the West of the World to tremble, yet even then did the people of Rome rebell, and both the Popes and the people studied for nothing so much, as how one of them might overthrow the Authority and Estimation of the other.

But for the method and degrees by which the Popes ascended to their temporal greatness, take here an extract of the Story collected out of the best Authors, by the most reverend Father in God the late Lord Arch-bishop of Canterbury, in his learned and laborious work against Fisher the Jesuit. The Pope (saith he) being chosen anciently by the Clergy and people of Rome, used always to receive from the Emperours hands a ratification of that choice: insomuch that about the year 579. when all Italy was on fire with the Lombards, and Pelagius the second contrained through the necessity of the times, to enter upon the Popedom without the Emperours leave; S. Gregory then a Deacon, was shortly after sent in an Embassy to excuse it. But when the Lombards grew to great in Italy, and the Empire was so infested with the Saracens, and such changes hapned in all parts of the world, as that neither for the present the Homage of the Pope was useful to the Emperour, nor the Protection of the Emperour, available for the Pope: by this means was the Bishop of Rome left to play his own game by himself. A thing which as it pleased him well enough, so both he and his Successors made great advantage by it. For being grown to that eminence by the favour of the Emperours, and the greatness of that City and place of his abode; he then found himself the more free, the greater the Tempest was that beat upon the other. And then first he set himself to alienate the hearts of the Italians from the Emperour; in which he did prevail so far, that Theophylact the Exarch coming into Italy, was opposed by the Souldiers, who wished better to the Pope, than to the Emperour; and the Emperours own Governour was fain to be defended from his own Souldiers by the power of the Pope, who had gotten an interest in them against their own Master. Next he opposed himself against him; and about the year 710. Pope Constantine the first did openly affront Philippicus the Emperour, in defence of Images, as Onuphrius telleth us. After him Gregory the 2d and 3d. took up his example, and did the like by Leo Isaurus. By this time the Lombards began to pinch very close, and to vex on all sides not only Italy but Rome too. This drives the Pope to seek a new Patron, and very fitly he meets with Charles Martel in France, that famous Warrior against the Saracens. Him he employeth in defence of the Church against the Lombards; and the Address seems very advicedly taken, it proved so fortunate to them both. For in short time it dissolved the Kingdom of the Lombards, having then stood two hundred and four years, which was the Popes security: and it brought the Crown of France into the House of Charles, and shortly after the Western Empire. And now began the Popes to be great indeed. For by the bounty of Pepin, the son of Charles, that which was taken by him from the Lombards, was given to the Pope; that is to say, the Exarchate, and all that lay betwixt the Apennine and the River of Po. So that now he became a Temporal Prince. But when Charles the great had set up the Western Empire, then he resumed the Ancient and Original power, to govern the Church, to call Councils, and to order Papal Elections. And this power continued for a time in his posterity; for Gregory the seventh was confirmed in the Popedom by the same Henry the fourth, whom he afterwards deposed. And it might have continued longer, if the succeeding Emperours had had Abilities enough to secure, or vindicate their own Rights. But the Pope keeping a strong Council about him, and meeting with some weak Princes, and those oft-times distracted with great and dangerous wars, grew stronger till he got the better; yet was it carried in succeeding times with great changes of Fortune, and different success; the Emperour sometimes plucking from the Pope, and the Pope from the Emperour; winning and losing ground, as their spirits, abilities, aids and opportunities were; till at last the Pope settled himself on the grounds laid by Gregory the seventh, in that great power which he now useth in and over these parts of the Christian World. A power first exercised (saith he in another place) by this Pope Gregory the seventh, and made too good upon the Emperour Henry the fourth, as by Pope Adrian the fourth, Alexander the third, with some others, upon Frederick Barbarossa. And others of the Emperours were alike served when they did not submit. And for this I hope his Holiness was not to be blamed. For if the Emperour kept the Pope under for divers years together, against all reason, the Pope, as Bellarmino affirms, being never subject to the Emperour, and wanting force to stand on his own Prerogative: I hope the Pope having now got power enough, may keep the Emperours under foot, and not suffer them any more to start before him.

Having thus a little glanced at the means, by which the great power of the Church of Rome was first obtained; let us next consider of those policies, by which this Papal Monarchy hath been so long upheld in esteem and credit. We may divide them into three heads. 1 Those by which they have insinuated and screwed themselves into the affections and affairs of the greatest Princes: 2 Those by which already they have, and by which they will hereafter be able to secure their estate; And 3 those by which they keep the people in obedience and ignorance.

1. Concerning the first. First the Donation of several Kingdoms to them which have no right title, but by these Grants of the Pope, cannot but binde them fast to uphold that power, without which they could lay no claim to that which they are possessed of. Of which sort was the confirmation of the Kingdom of France to the house of Pepin; of Naples to the house of Schabens; and Anjou; of Navarre to the Spaniards. 2 The readiness of their Ministers to kill such as resist them; and cannot but necessitate Princes to seek their friendship, and hold fair with them: especially since by a writ of Excommunication, they can arm the Subjects against their Sovereign; and without the charge of levying one Souldier, either destroy him utterly, or bring him to conformity. The frequent Wars raised by them against the Emperours of Germany, and that against King John in England, by these Papal fulminations only; the poisoning of the said King John by a Monk of Swinstead, and killing of King Henry the third of France, by Jacques Clement; are full proofs of this. 3 Then followeth their allowance of Marriages prohibited both by God and Nature; the issue of which cannot but uphold the Popes Authority, without which their birth would be illegitimate, and consequently themselves unlawful Marriages of others, than ever Prince could do by the lawful Marriage of his own. Not about the Marriage of her Mother to King Henry the eighth; the lawfulness of which depended chiefly on the dispensation of Pope Julio the second. 4 Then cometh in their dispensing with the Oaths and break off those Treaties, which have been solemnly made and sworn betwixt them and their Neighbour. By means whereof, such Princes think themselves not perjured, because dispensed with by the Pope; and commonly get something in advantage, or point of profit, for which they cannot becometh the chooling of the younger Sons of great Princes, into the rank of Cardinals; which obligeth the whole Stock or Family to the Papal Throne: that being a means whereby young Princes as by these courses he holds in with all Christian Princes generally, which are of the Religion of the Church of Rome; so hath he fastned more particularly on the King of Spain; whereof we shall speak further when we come to that Country.

2. Concerning the second. So it is that their Estate hath the firmest foundation of any, as being built on the Consciences of men possessed with an opinion of their Infalibility, and that undoubted power they pretend unto, not only in Heaven and upon Earth, but also over Hell and Purgatory. 2 Then comes the innumerable Preferments at their disposing, for men of all humours and affections; as having in their power the disposing of almost all the Benefices and Bishopricks in Italy, half of those in Spain, divers in Germany and France: which keepeth the Clergy, and all such as are that way studied, in a perpetual dependence upon that See; especially injoying by it many notable Privileges; which those of the Temporality are not capable of. 3 Consider next the multitude of Monks and Friars, whose very being depends wholly upon his Authority; every Monastery and Convent being a Garrison (as it were) to defend the Papacy, and train up a Militia of Spiritual Janissaries; men most affectionately devoted to his See and Service. Of these it is conceived that there are no fewer than a Million, one half whereof at least may be fit for action; and all maintained at other mens cost; themselves not disbursing a penny towards it. 4 Their Pardons and Indulgences are a great increase to their Revenue: some of them as unlimited as that of Pope Boniface the eighth, which was for 82000 years to all that could say such a Prayer of S. Augustines; and that for every day, Toties quoties. 5 Their practising on Penitents, whom they persuade in the very agony of their souls, that there is no salvation for them, but by giving part of their Estates unto the Church. 6 Nor have they found any small advantage to their Power and Patrimony, by the invention of Spiritual Fraternities; which are Appurtenances (as it were) to the Orders of Friars, and may in number perhaps equal them. Into these the Lay-people of all sorts, men and women, married and single, desire to be inrolled; as hereby injoying the Spiritual prerogatives of Indulgences, and a more speedy dispatch out of Purgatory.

3. Concerning the third. 1 They deter the people from reading the Scripture, alleading unto them the perils they may incur by mis-interpretation. 2 They breed an Antipathy between the Papists and the Protestants; insomuch that a Papist may not say Amen, unto a Protestants Deo gratias. 3 They debar them from all fund of the Religion, in prohibiting the Books of the Reformed Writers; and hiding their own Treatises, in which the Tenet of the Protestants is recited only to be confuted; insomuch that in all Italy one shall seldom meet with *Bellarmino*s works, or any of the like nature to be sold. 4 They have under pain of Excommunication prohibited the Italians from Travell and Traffick with Heretical Countreys, or such places, where those contagious sounds and lights (as they term them) might make them return infested. 5 The Severity, or Tyranny rather of the Inquisition, but the smallest suspicions of being this way addicted. And 6 the People thus retrained from Travell (of which we shall speak more at large when we come to Spain) crusheth not only the beginnings, well, are taught to believe that the Protestants are Blasphemers of God and all his Saints; that in England Churches are turned to Stables, the people grown barbarous and eat young Children; that Geneva is a professed Sanctuary of Roguery, and the like. We have yet two later examples of their dealing in this kind. First, the gross slander of the Apostase (or as they call it; the Retconciliation) and other Ministers, keep their coffers low; the entertainment of their ordinary Nuncios in the Courts of Christian Princes, amounting to no less than 1200 Crowns a month to each. And 3 their greedy desire to enrich their Sons or Kinsmen with the treasures of the Church (with which humour Pope Sixtus the fifth, being of poor and obscure birth, was never touched) keeps them always bare. Add unto these the excessive gorgeousness of the Papal vestments (in which vanity every one seeketh to excell the other) especially that of their Triple Crown; which must needs put them to great charge, and continual issues of their treasure. And for an evidence of this last, we finde that Clement the fifth, who first transferred his See to Avignon, to shew his gallantry to the French (probably unacquainted with the like fine lights) had his Crown thick set with Carbuncles and precious stones; one of which being lost by a fall from his Horse, was valued at 6000 Ducats.

As for the Forces of the Church, the Pope is able to impress as great a number of Land-souldiers out of his estate, as any Prince or Common-wealth within the limits of Italy. Paul the 3d sent to the aid of Charles the 5th in the Wars of Germany, 12000 Foot, and 500 Horse; and yet raised his own Family to the Dukedom of Parma. Pius the fifth sent to the aid of Charles the ninth, against the Hugonots, 4000 Foot, and 1000 Horse; which Forces they maintained at their own charges. And when Clement undertook the War of Ferrara, he raised out of his estate 20000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, in less than a month; which was more than most Princes in Europe could possibly have done. And for the valour of his Souldiers, and ability of his Commanders, they retain to much (as before was said) of their Ancestors virtues; that there are thought to be many Families in the estate of the Church, able to furnish all the Common-wealths and Princes of Christendom, with sufficient Captains. What; and how little he is able to do by Sea, may be best seen out of the aid which he sent to the Venetians, at the famous Battel of Lepanto, wherein he furnished them with no more than twelve Gallies; and those too hired of the Duke of Florence: The Venetians in the Adriatick, and the Florentines in the Tuscan Seas, having all the Trade, and consequently all the power in the Seas of Italy. 'Tis true, the Pope was bound by the capitulation, to bear the fifth part of the charge of the War, and with the help of the rest of the Princes of Italy (who were to march under his colours) to set forth 50000 Foot, and 4500 Horse: which is as great an Argument of his riches and power by Land, as the other is of his weakness at Sea.

Having a purpose in the prosecution of this Work, to mention such particular Orders of Knight-hood, as most Countreys have given beginning to; I will here set down the Orders of such Papish Spiritual Knights or Friers, which his holy benediction hath erected, and for allowance doth maintain. And for our better proceeding, we will begin with the original of a Monastical life; and then we will make special mention of some of the Romish Votaries of both sexes. Know then, that under the seventh persecution raised against the Church by Decius, one Paulus, born at Thebes in Egypt, retired to a private cave under the foot of a Rock, Anno 260. Here he is said to have lived one hundred years, and to have been seen of no man but one Anthony, who was at his death. This Anthony was the first that followed the example of Paulus; a man of a noble house, and one that sold all his estate, that he might the more privately enjoy himself. He lived an hundred and fifty years, and is called the Father of the Monks. To these beginnings, doth Polydore Virgil refer the original of the Monks, and religious orders; the name Monk coming from the Greek μῆν, because of their lonely and solitary lives. Those of the Religious Orders are called Fraters, and in English Friers, from the French word Frere, which signifieth a Brother; and that either because of their brotherly cohabitation; or else because they are Fraters in malo, brethren in mischief and delinquency.

The foundation of Monastical life thus laid by Paulus, and Anthony; the world increased so fast in Monks and Eremites, that it seemed necessary to prescribe them Orders. Hereupon Saint Basil gathered them together, living formerly dispersed; and is said to be the first that built them Monasteries. He is also said to have ordained the three Vowes of Poverty, Chastity, and Obedience; to have instructed them in good Arts, true Religion, and in the service of God, with Hymns, Prayers, and Watching. Of this Order there are not many in the Latin Church, but good plenty of them in the Greek. They are bound to abstain from all kinde of flesh, and are called Monks of S. Basil, by the name of that Father; amongst the Writings of which Father, the Rules for these Monasticks are set down at large.

2 The next who prescribed Orders was S. Augustine, born in the year 350, who being thirty years of age, is said to have obtained a Garden without the walls of Hippo, for private contemplations. Twelve only he assumed into his society, living with them in all integrity, and wearing a leathern Girdle to distinguish them from Monks. Branched afterwards into two several and distinct Orders, the one called by the name of Canons Regular, whose chief House here in England was St. John near Colchester; the other called commonly Austrian Friers, or the Eremites of S. Austin, as others call them; Of such esteem formerly in the University of Oxford, that all who took the Degree of a Master of Arts, were to submit themselves to their Oppositions in the publick Schools, and receive approbation from them; from whence the form, in Augustinus hinc responderit vel opposuerit, still retained among them. Their house in London stood in Broadstreet, of which a part of the Church still standeth, converted to a Church for the use of the Dutch; the rest demolished, and in the place thereof a stately Mansion erected by Sir William Paulet the first Marquis of Winchester, and Lord Treasurer of England. These make the first Order of the Friers Mendicants. The first Monastery of them was erected at Paris by William Duke of Guien, Anno 1155; and Anno 1200, they began to flourish in Italy, by the favour of John Lord of Mantua. The other branches of this Tree, are 1 the Monks of S. Hierom, 2 the Carmelites, 3 the Crouchet Friers, and 4 the Dominicans.

The Papacy.

1 The Monks of S. Hierom challenge their original from the worthy Father of the Church, so called. They flourish especially in Spain, where there are thirty two Monasteries of them; their chief House being St. Bartholomews of Lupiana; and have taken unto themselves the Rule of St. Austin. Their Robe is a white Cassock, under a tawny Cloak.

2 The Carmelites, so called from Mount Carmel in Syria, pretend their original from Elias, and John the Baptist. They only allowed at first the Rule of S. Basil; and were confirmed in Europe by Honorius the third. They are by some called Jacobines, from a Church dedicated to S. James, where they had their first Convent; and by us, the White Friers, from the colour of their habit. Their House in London stood in Fleetstreet, converted since into a dwelling of the Earls of Kent, besides other Tenements. Their Rule was afterwards corrected according to the Rule of S. Austin, by Donna Eresba (or Teresa) a Spanish woman; who made them also certain Constitutions, confirmed by Pius the fourth, Anno 1565.

3 The Friers of S. Crosse, Crossed, or Crouched Friers, were first ordained by Cyriacus Bishop of Hierusalem, who shewed to Helena the place where the Cross was hidden; hence this Order; which being almost decayed, was reformed first by Urban the second, and afterwards by Innocent the third, under the Rule of S. Austin. Their Robe is Watcher, and in their hands they carry the figure of the Cross. Their house in London near the Tower, still retains its name.

4 The Dominicans, or Friers Preachers, were instituted by S. Dominick, a Spaniard. He put himself in this Order with sixteen of his Disciples, under the Rule of S. Austin, Anno 1206, and had his device confirmed by Honorius the third. Their duty is to preach the Gospel in all places unto the farthest parts of the world; which both they did, and their successors since have done, not at home only, but in India and America, with great zeal and diligence. They are called by us Black Friers, from the colour of their habits, and are the third Order of Friers Mendicants. Their house in London stood near Ludgate, and took up the whole Precinct which is still called Black Friars; though nothing be remaining of it but the very name.

3 The third that prescribed Orders was S. Benedikt, born at Nursia, in the Duchy of Spoleto, Anno 472. He gathered the Monks of Italy together, gave them a Rule in writing, caused them to be called Benedictines, or Monks of S. Benedikt; and lived till he had seen twelve Monasteries filled with them. After his death this Order grew so populous, that there have been of it 29 Popes, 200 Cardinals, 1603 Archbishops, 4000 Bishops, besides some thousands of Canonized Saints, which they use to brag of. Their habit is a loose Gown of black, reaching down to the ground, with a Hood of the same; an under-garment of white woollen, and boots on their legs. The other principal streams of this Fountain are, 1 the Monks of Clugnie, 2 of Carthusia, 3 of Citeaux, 4 the Celestines.

1 The Monks of Clugnie, are so called from the Abbey of Clugnie in the County of Burgundy; the Abbot whereof, by name Odo, was the first that reformed the Benedictines, then fallen from their former integrity, Anno 913. He obtained of the Popes and Emperours, that all such Abbies as would come under the compass of his Reformatory (which were in all about two hundred) should be called the Congregation of Clugnie, and that they might call their Chapters, and dispatch their common businesses, when and as often as they pleased.

2 The Carthusians were first instituted by one Bruno, a German Doctor of Divinity, at the Town of Carthusia in Dauphine, Anno 1080. His followers, which were at the first but six, have at this day 93 Monasteries. They eat no flesh, live by couples, labour with their hands, watch, pray, and never meet together but on Sundays. Their house in London by corruption and long tract of time, got the name of the Charter-house, (the Monks themselves being corruptly called the Charter-house Monks;) now better known by the name of Suttons Hospital; from the Hospital of the Foundation of Richard Sutton, a wealthy Citizen of London.

3 The Monks of Citeaux were first instituted by one Robert, Abbot of Moleme, Anno 1090, or thereabouts; who together with 21 of the most religious of his Convent, retired to Citeaux in Burgundy Dutchy; hence the name. About five years after, one Bernard, a great Lord, became of their Order; who built and repaired for them 160 Abbeys. Their Robe is a white Cassock, girt with a Girdle of wooll, the rest black. They were by us called White Monks; and the common Benedictines, Black Monks; both from the colour of their habits.

4 The Celestines owe their original to Peter de Moron a Samnite, born Anno 1250; who being afterwards for his sanctity chose Pope, was called Celestine the fifth. He reformed the Benedictines, then much degenerated; and had his Order confirmed by Gregory the 11th. There are at this present 124 Monasteries of them.

4 The fourth and last that prescribed new Orders to the Monasticks, was St. Francis of Assis in the Duchy of Spoleto. He fell from Merchandize, which was his first profession, unto the study of Religion, going barefoot, and behaving himself very penitently: whereupon, great store of Disciples following him, he gave them a Rule in writing; by which they are bound to profess absolute beggary, and are not permitted to carry any money about them, or more victuals than will for the present serve themselves and their Brethren. This they observe punctually in their own persons, but give themselves leave to have a Boy with them, to do both without scruple. S. Francis desired they should be called Minors, to shew their humility; but they are generally called Franciscans by the name of their Founder. By the French called Cordeliers, because of the knotty Cord which they wear about them instead of a Girdle; by us, the Gray Friers, from the colour of their upper Garment. Their house in London stood near Newgate, of which the Church, the Cloysters, and some other the publick Offices do still stand entire; the whole converted to an Hospital for poor Children by King Edward the sixth,

The Signeury of VENICE.

North of the Lands of the Church from Romandiola to the Alpes, lie the Italian Provinces of the State of VENICE; bounded upon the South with the Territory of Ferrara, and the rest of Romandiola; on the West, with the Dukedom of Millain; on the North, with the main body of the Alpes; and on the East, with the Adriatick and the River Arfia, by which last parted from Liburnia, a Slavonian Province. Besides which it commands a great part of Dalmatia, together with the Islands of Candi, Corfu, Ithaca, Zanti, Cithera, and certain others of less note. The length of their Dominions by Sea and Land extending above a thousand miles, but the breadth not answerable.

The nature of the soyl, and the principal Rivers which refresh it, we shall see anon in the description of the Provinces into which divided. According to which Provinces and the chief Cities of them, the Character of the people may best be taken: it being said proverbially by the Italians, that the Venetians themselves are stately, crafty, and greedy; the Veronians, studious and faithful; the Paduans fierce, the Vincenians eager on revenge; those of Friuli, grateful, but inconstant; those of Hirving silver; those of Trevizo fowls; that the Brescians are fit to dig in trenches, those of Venice lay ambushes, those of Padua to manage horses. And of the women it is said, that those of Crema are deceitful, those of Venice insolent, those of Vincenza constant, those of Verona gracious, those of Treviso jealous, those of Brescia diligent, and the Bergomans crafty.

But not to dally longer in these proverbial characters (though they carry a great deal of truth in them) certain it is that the Venetians themselves do affect a great deal of gravity in their actions, speak very little at the table; very severe where they have authority, and many times in the excess. And yet such is the constant temper of their Government, and their impartiality in doing Justice, that they are very well obeyed, and generally well beloved of all their subjects (notwithstanding the heavy prebonds by Sea and Land, maintaining wars continually with the Turks in Palestine; the Emperors of Constantinople in Greece it self; the Genoese by Sea, and their neighbours of Italy in this Continent. But of late times they have more studied to preserve, than enlarge their Dominions; and that too rather by expence of money, than the loss of blood; and by wit rather than by valour. So fortunate in this last kind of practice, that Machiavel observed of them in his time, that whatsoever they lost by War, they recovered by Treaty. A pregnant evidence whereof we shall see anon.

To proceed now to the description of such of the Provinces and Estates of this Common-wealth, as pafs under the accompt of Italy, they are these that follow, that is to say, 1 Marca Trevigiana, 2 Friuli, 3 Hiria, 4 the Italian Isles of the Adriatick; of which now in order; leaving the other Members of this Estate to be considered in their proper places.

1 MARCA TREVIGIANA is bounded on the South, with the River Athesis, and the most Northern branch of the Po, which from some lime-kills near adjoining, they now call Fornaces, by which parted from the Territory of Ferrara, and the rest of Romagna; on the West, with the Rivers Minus and Sarca, and the Lake of Benacus, (now called Lago de Garda from a little Town of that name adjoining) by which parted from the Dutchy of Millain; on the East, with Friuli, and the Gulf of Venice; and on the North, with the Alpes which divide it from Tirolis, a Province of Germany. In the time of great Augustus Cesar, this tract together with Friuli the next neighbouring Province had the name of Venetia, from the Veneti, the old inhabitants hereof; and by that name made one of those eleven Regions, into which he then divided Italy. How it obtained this new name, we shall see anon.

The principal Rivers of this Tract are, 1 Brenta, called anciently Meduacus Major, which rising in the Alpes not far from Trent, and watering the fields of Padua, passeth into the Sea, near the City of Venice, making up the famous Haven of Malamocco. 2 Bachilio, called anciently Meduacus Minor, which riseth also in the Alpes, and passing by Vincenza, emptieth it self into the Brenta. And 3 Athesis, now called Adige, which springeth also out of the Alpes not far from Trent, and having taken many lesser streams into its channel, passeth by Verona, and after is divided into two great branches; whereof the one falls into the Sea, the other loseth it self in the midst of the Marishes.

The chief Cities of it are, 1 Vincenza, one of the twelve Cities built by the Tuscan, or Hetrurians on this side of the Apennine; pleasantly seated on the banks of the River Bachilio, and another navigable water called Retone (Erorenus formerly.) The Territory of the City not more large than fruitful, abounding with all store of fruits, and yielding an excellent kinde of Wine, which from thence is vendued unto Venice. The buildings of it for the most part of polished stone, whereof the fields adjoining afford special Quarries; and the Inhabitants generally an industrious people, making great quantity of Silks, with which they do adorn themselves, and supply their Neighbours. 2 Trevizo, seated on the banks of the River Silus, (which runneth through the middle of it) in the midst of a large and spacious plain, abounding even to admiration, with most excellent wheat, and all other necessaries. A City of no ancient name, nor mentioned by Polomy, or others of the old Geographers: but of sufficient note in the later times, for being the residence or seat of those Provincial Governors (Marquesses they are sometimes called) which the Lombardian Kings sent hither to defend their borders. Hence it gave name to all the Countrey, in Latine called Marca Trevigiana, or Tarvisiana, as some call it: taken by the Venetians, and lost again divers times; but was finally conquered Anno 1380. or thereabout, Antonio Venieri being Duke of Venice. 3 Padua, formerly called Patavinum, built by Antenor, whose Tomb is still here to be shown. From him named Antenor, as some report, but after called Patavinum quasi Padavinum, from its nearness to the River Po, and the Fens thereof. Situate in so delectable and sweet a soyl, that Constantinus Palaeologus was used to say, that did not the authority of the Scriptures persuade him otherwise, he should look for Paradise no where else, than in persuavi Patavina amoenitate, amongst the flourishing and delightful sweetnes of the Paduan field. The Town of great esteem in the time of the Romans, who much resorted to the same: and much frequented at the present for the University here established Anno 1220. famous for Physicians, who have here a Garden of Similes; of good name also for the birth of Livy the Historian, Julius Paulus a Civil Lawyer his Co-temporary, L. Aruntius Stella, and C. Valerius Placcus, two famous Poets celebrated by Marial; and in the later times, of Marsilius Patavinus a Minorite Frier, who wrote so learnedly in behalf of the Emperour, against the Pope; Fr. Zabarella the Civilian, Mic. Savanorela the Physician, Maginus the Geographer, and divers others. It was much renowned in former times for the humanity of the men, and chastity of the women; which last to eminent and famous, that as chaste as one of Padua, grew into a Proverb. Hereunto alludeth Marial, speaking of his lascivious writings;

Tomb

Idda puecla leger, sis Patavina licet.*

Young Maids my wanton lines will long to see,
And read them o're, though Patavines they be.

The City after much vicissitude of Fortune, fell into the power of the Venetians, with all her Territories, being in compass one hundred and eighty miles, Anno 1400. Michael Seneo then Duke of Vincenza being won about the same time also. 4 Brescia, the second City for bigness and beauty in all Lombardy. It is also the seat of an Arch-bishop, who is an Earl, a Marquess, and a Duke. Her Territories are in length one hundred, in breadth fifty miles; which the Citizens, together with their freedom, bought of Otho the German Emperour, but lost it to Philip Maria Visconti, Duke of Millain, Anno 1421. to whom they yielded upon certain conditions; which being broken by the Duke, they gave themselves unto the Signeury of Venice, Anno 1434. Francis Foscari being then Duke; under whom it continueth to this day. The City is very populous, the air sound and good, the soyl exceeding plentiful of Corn, wine and fruits; and having in it Mines both of Iron and Copper, to the great enriching of the people. It was anciently the chief of the Centomani, who coming out of Gaul, drove the Tuscan hence, and seated themselves in their habitations, till finally conquered by the Romans. It is situate on a little River called Garcia, which runneth through the middle of it; and is said to contain at this time 50000 Inhabitants. 5 Verona, so called (as some conceit it) quasi vere una; or as others, quasi Brenonia, because built by Brennus; both false and frivolous alike. It is situate on the banks of the River Athesis, and is counted the first City of the second rank of the Cities of Italy: proud in the birth of Catullus, a well-known Poet, and in an Amphitheatre (a remainder of the Roman greatness) able to contain 80000 persons. The Territories hereof are sixty five miles in length, forty miles in breadth; enriched with many medicinal herbs, (especially on Mount Baldus, an hill therein) where the Physicians go a Simpling. 6 Berbricum, or Bedriacum, as some Writers call it, two dayes march from Verona, now a small Burrough named Labinia, and never of any great note when it was at the best. Remarkable in the Roman stories, for the defeat here given by the Vitellians unto Otho's Army; and after, by Vespasians forces unto those of Vitellius. By Tacitus called in that regard dnalus Romanis cladibus notus & infaustus Vicus. 7 Crema, a Town of no great Antiquity, but situate in a wealthy soyl, well peopled, and as well built for the private Edifices: so strongly fortified, that it is reckoned the chief Bulwark of the Signeury of Venice, against the Millanese, on the borders of which State it standeth. First built about the year 970. by some remnants of the Anthropomorphites, who on the destruction of Parnassus (a Town of Lombardy) where before they lived, abjured their heresie, and were permitted to build here. Honoured in succeeding times with a See Episcopal; and either the birth-place or preferment of John Cremenfis, a Roman Cardinal. Who being by Pope Honorius sent into England, Anno 1225, to dissuade the Clergy-men from Marriage; and having in a Convocation of the Clergy called for that purpose, highly advanced the honour of the single life, and shewed the inconvenience and unfitness of Marriage, in men preferred unto Holy Orders; was the night following (to the great discredit both of his cause and person) taken in Adultery. 8 Bergomo, a right ancient Town, but very well built, seated upon the side of an hill, and having a very large and beautiful Suburb; the Territory whereof hath many rough and craggy Mountains, the Spurs and excursions of the Alpes; but withall many rich and delightful valleys, intermingled with them. The people of this City and Countrey are said to speak the coarsest language of any in Italy; but to have as fine wits as the best. Places of more inferior note are, 1 Este, (Ateste in most Latine Writers) whence came the Family D'Este, late Dukes of Ferrara. 2 Lincium, a strong Garrison on the borders of Mantua; as 3 Cassel-France is towards Ferrara; and 4 Seravalle, of most remarkableness for the great quantity of Armour which is therein made. 5 Feltri, which still preserves its old name of Feltria; most memorable at the present for a See Episcopal. 6 Altina, a Bishops See also, but destroyed and ruined.

This Province being anciently a part of the Cisalpine Gaul, fell to the power of the Romans at the end of the second Punic war: and being conquered by the Romans, did continue theirs, till first the Goths, and afterwards the Lombards became Masters of it. Afterwards in the fall of the Kingdom of Lombardy, it fell first unto the French, and after to the German Empire; from which by many mean conveyances, ances, it came at last to Ottocarus, King of Bohemia and Duke of Austria, who bought the same of Ulricus the last Duke of Carinthia: whose Predecessor probably had been seized hereof, from the time that Henry son of Engelbert, Præfect of Histria, adopted by Henry of Epstein Duke of Carinthia, or Karnten, succeeded him in that Estate. Upon a reconciliation made betwixt this Ottocarus and Rodolphus of Habsburg (then Emperor of Germany) it was added (together with Austria it self) unto the Patrimony of that Family, sold by Duke Leopold the ninth, to the Cararars, then Lords of Padua; in the ruine of whose Estate and Family, it fell (together with that City) into the power of the Venetians, who still hold the same.

2 FRIULI hath on the East the River Formio, which parteth it from Histria; on the West, Marca Trevisana, and a branch of the Alpes; on the North, the main body of the Alpes, which divide it from Germany; and on the South, the Adriatick Sea, or Gulf of Venice.

It is called Forum Julii in the Latine (of which that of Friuli is derived) from Julius Cæsar, who conducting his Armies this way, built the Town to named; and from that march of his, the Alpes adjoining, as 'tis thought, had the name of Julia. By some Writers of the middle times it is called Regio Aquilegensis, as appertaining for the most part, by the gift of the Emperours Otho and Conradus, to the Church, or Patriarchate of Aquileia; and by the common people of Venice for the most part, Patria, or the Countrey; because from these parts they derive their first Original. In which regard part of the Region of Venetia, as before was said.

The Countrey is in a manner square, each side fifty miles; watered with the Rivers of 1 Hydra, heretofore of no small fame for the silver Mines. 2 Tilaventum, rising from the Alpes, and navigable towards the latter end of its course: but broken into many channels (seven at least in number) which makes it not so navigable as it would be otherwise; most of these channels being shallow, and easily forded, but swift and violent withall, by reason of their fall from the neighbouring hills. 3 Natisso, neighboured by the famous City of Aquileia. 4 Timavus, mentioned in the first of the Æneids, which rising out of the Alpes, and running under ground for the space of 330 furlongs, breaketh out again; and being branched into nine Channels, falleth into the Gulf or Bay of Trieste. By Niger it is now called Larcina; but by Leander named Timavo. The Soil sufficiently fruitful, except towards the Alpes, and yielding a very pleasant Wine, which Pliny did prefer before any in Italy.

Towns herein of most note and consequence, 1 Aquileia, or Aquilegia, as some call it, made the Metropolis first of the Province of Histria and Venetia, by the Emperor Antoninus; as afterwards of the whole Diocese of Italy, by the Western Emperors. Honoured in that regard with the feat of the Præfatus Prætorius, or of his Vicarius or Lieutenant: translated from Millain to this City, as the Gate of Italy, by which the barbarous Nations were to make their entrance; never so like to be shut out, as by the power and presence of so great an Officer. After this time, and on this occasion the Bishop hereof had the title of Patriarch. And here the Patriarchal See had not long continued when the City was destroyed by Attila, that furious Hun; 37000 of the Citizens being slain with the sword, the rest removing to some places of more safe abode. Re-edified afterwards by Nursis, but never able to recover its former lustre. After which time fearing the like miseries from the hands of the Lombards, the Patriarchal See was removed to Venice, as the safer place, and settled in the Isle of Grada; yet so, that the succeeding Bishops of Aquileia (for they stayed at Venice only till the times were quiet) do still retain the dignity and name of Patriarchs, as well as those of Grada do, and with better reason. For besides the honour which it had in being made the seat of the Præfatus Prætorius, it had been formerly more honoured with the residence of Augustus Cæsar, who here kept his Court; whence it had the name of Roma altera, or a second Rome; and of Tiberius who lived here with Julia the daughter of the said Augustus, before his coming to the Empire. As for the City it self, it is situate on the River Natisso, but not well inhabited at the present; partly because of the ill Air, partly by the removal of the Patriarch thence, drawn by the Venetians of late times, for good reasons of State, to fix his dwelling in their City, and drawing after him a great resort of Bishops, and others of the Clergy of his Jurisdiction, principally by the ill neighbourhood of Venice, attracting all Trade unto it self. Most memorable in old story for enduring that famous siege against Maximianus, for the safety of the Empire of Rome, and her Emperors Maximianus and Ballianus. In whose cause the Citizens hereof were so resolutely faithful, that they bereaved the women (willing to lose that invaluable ornament of their sex, for the common good) of the hair of their heads, to make Bow-strings withall. Nor did this pious constancy of theirs want an happy issue. For they beheld the Tyrant headless under their walls (slain by the hands of his own Souldiers) and saw the Metropolis of the World preserved by their loyalty. And yet the matter was not ended with the death of the Tyrant; the Souldiers and people laying hands on his children also, and putting all unto the sword. Of which cruelty being asked the reason, they returned this Answer, That not a whelp was to be spared of so ill a litter; none of the brood of such a Cur; or in the language of the Author, Pessimi Canis Catulus non est relinquendus. 2 Trieste, of old called Tergetum, from whence a spacious Bay adjoining had anciently the name of Sinus Tergetinus, and is now called Golfo di Trieste. The Bay replenished principally with the water of the River Timavus, which with many streams doth fall into it; and is therefore by the inhabitants of that Gulf or Bay, called Fons Maris, as Polylus in Strabo telleth us. The Town of greater Antiquity than observation, mentioned by Pliny and some others of the Ancient Writers, but not else considerable. 3 Monifalcon, famous for its medicinal herbs. 4 Porto Grunare, of old called Portus Romantinus, an Haven-town, as the name importeth. 5 Concordia, in former times of no small esteem; but so demolished by Attila the Hun, that it is now nothing but a ruin. The people hereof betaking themselves to the Islands in the Marshes of Venice, where they planted in Torrebellan, Mariano, Constantiana, and some others were adjoining to them, them, of which more hereafter. 6 Udina, or Uden, the fairest and largest at this time of all the Province, containing about five miles in compass, and about 15000 Inhabitants. Honoured for a time with the Patriarchal See, removed hither from Aquileia, at some siege thereof: of which though long ago deprived, yet it is still the ordinary seat of the Procurator or Provincial Governour, sent from Venice hither. 7 Palma, a new Town, as being built by the Venetians no longer since than the year 1183, but held to be the best fortified of any in Italy. 8 Cividad d'Austria, first built by Julius Cæsar, in some of his marches towards Gaul, by whom it was called Julium, after Forum Julii, whence the name of Friuli (Disfridus Foro-Julienfis, as the Latins call it) came unto the Province. But being taken and repaired by some Princes of the Austrian Family (on the borders of whose Estate it standeth) it got this new name of Cividad d'Austria.

This Province anciently was the seat of the Euganei, inhabiting this tract and part of Marchia Trevigiana. But those being vanquished by the Veneti; and the Veneti by the Cisalpine Gauls, it became finally subject to the State of Rome, and in the fall of that great Empire was one of the four Dukedoms founded by the Lombards, when they conquered Italy: the other three being Turin Benevent, and Spoleto. The Family of the Benregarii were once Dukes hereof; three of which were of special fame; and two of them Competitors for the Kingdom of Italy. But this Family being suppressed by the Emperor Otho, he gave a great part of the Countrey to the Church of Aquileia; to which almost all the rest was added by the Emperor Conrad; yet so that there were divers petty Lords, who had good estates in it; the name of Duke remaining unto some of the ancient race. One of which named Luitprandus, envying to the Venetians their increase of Dominion, made war against them; which ended in the loss of his Countrey, Anno 1020, or thereabouts; ever since subject to that State: the Patriarch of Aquileia (whose authority in this Countrey began to decline, in the rising of the state of Venice) surrendering all his interests also to that powerful Signemur, as better able to defend it against all Pretenders, Anno 1420. But notwithstanding this surrendry, the Patriarch hath still large possessions and revenues here, and still retains his Jurisdiction over the Prelates of this Countrey, and those of Histria and Trevigiana (20 in all, or thereabouts) fixt only which are those of the Isles of Venice, continuing at this day under him of Grada.

HISTRIA is environed on the East, West, and South, with the Adriatick, in the manner of a Demy-Island, or Peninsula, save where it toucheth on Friuli; and on the North, is parted from Carinthia; with the Alpes of Germany. The Countrey very woody, and full of Quarries, affording materials to Venice both for ships and houses; not comparable for fertility to the rest of Italy; and of air so sickly and unwholesome, that the Venetians were compelled to hire people to dwell there, and afterwards to grant them many large immunities. It is two hundred miles in compass, watered with the Rivers of Formio, which they now call Risano; 2 Nauportus, called at this day Quietus; and 3 Arfis, which runneth into the Gulf of Cornero, called anciently Sinus Flanaticus, and divides this Countrey from Lithuania, a Slavonian Province.

The chief Towns of it are, 1 Cape de Istria, called in Plinius time Ægide; and being afterwards repaired by the Emperor Justin, was called Justinopolis. But being taken and destroyed by the Genoese, and re-built again, it took the name of Cepus Histria, or Cape d'Istria; because the principal of the Province, and a Bishops See. Of this See was Vergerius Bishop, about the time of Luthers first preaching in Germany; who with Antonio de Dominis Arch-bishop of Spalato, were of most note of any of these parts of the world, that fell off from the Church of Rome to the Protestant party, and therefore shall be spoken of in more particulars; Spalato in his proper place, and Vergerius here. Being a man of great industry, and eminent parts, he was by many of the Popes employed in Germany, against Luther. In which negotiation he behaved himself with such dexterity, and gave such content unto the Pope, that Paul the third, Anno 1541. intended to have made him Cardinal; had not some who envied him that honour, accused him of Lutheranism. To purge himself he began to write a Book, entitled, Against the Apostata's of Germany; in the pursuit whereof, pondering Luthers reasons he became of his opinion; which being known, he was driven from Justinople. He submitted himself and his cause to the Fathers at Trent, but could not get a hearing. Thence he went to the D. of Mantua, from him to the State of Venice; but no where finding protection, he retired unto the Grifons; and there preached; till Christopher Duke of Wittenberg, Anno 1548, placed him in his University of Tubing, and there allowed him a sufficiency of maintenance. It was built by Justinus (as before) the Nephew of Justinian the Emperor, as a fortress against the incursions of the barbarous people. 2 Pola, built by the Colchians, at their first coming hither; the name in their language importing as much as the place of banishment. It was after made a Roman Colony, and called Pietas Julia: but being first destroyed by Attila, after by the Genoese, it recovered the old name again; and still continueth with the title of a See Episcopal. It abuteth upon Sinus Flanaticus, or the Gulf of Queroero. 3 Parente, 4 Plin; 5 Cita Nova, all of them seated in the Mid-lands, and not much observable, but that Parente, and Cita Nova are Episcopal Sees: this last being anciently called Emonia, whence the Bishop hath the name of Emonensis. 7 Rovigno, in a little Island, and mounted on an high hill, not unfruitful in Olives; beautified with a convenient Port, and that defended also by a very strong Castle. The Town but poor, by reason of the ill neighbourhood of Venice, from which distant not above twenty miles; inhabited for the most part by Mariners, and skilful Pilots, hired by such ships as are bound for Venice, to conduct them safely over ther Bars of Malamocco. The Countrey adjoining mountainous and somewhat wilde, but those mountains covered on the outside, with Physical Simples; and yielding many Quarries of most excellent Marble, which to adorn the Venetian Palaces.

The Adriatic Isles of Venice.

It is recorded that the Histrans were a people of Colchis, who being sent by King Aetias to pursue Jafon and the Argonauts, were driven up this Gulf: and either for fear of the Kings anger, or not daring to venter their weak vessel to so long a voyage, as from hence to Colchis whence they came; stayed in this Countrey. It was after that time called Iapigia, from Iapis an Ætolian, who first planted here; and took the name of Istria from the Istri, a people on the banks of Ister, or Danubius; who made up a considerable part of this plantation. Siding with the Ætolians in their Wars against the Romans, and making many inroads and excursions on them; they were invaded first by Manlius, without leave of the Senate: and him they charged with such a fury that they beat him out of his Camp. Where finding plenty of Wine, and all store of Provisions, they fell round to it; till Manlius having rallied his men again, charged them in their Cups, and killed 8000 in the place; their miserable King being so hotly pursued by the Victors, that he was fain to kill himself for fear of Captivity. This was in Anno V. C. 575. Cl. Pulcher the next Consul perfected the conquest. Sempronius long time after that, sc. Anno V. C. 625. reduced it to the form of a Province. So it continued to the time of Augustus Cæsar, who joyning it to that of Venice (or Venetia) made out of both the eleventh and last Region of Italy. Under the Romans they continued whilst that Empire stood, and after the decay thereof regained their liberties; which they enjoyed till by Piracy molestings the Venetians, they lost many of their Towns to Duke Petro Condiano, Anno 938; and the whole Countrey was made Tributary, by the valour of the Duke Henry Dandolo, about the year 1190. After which many times rebelling, they were still re-conquered.

4. The fourth member of this estate with respect to Italy, are some ISLANDS in the Adriatick; which being principally under the command of this Common-wealth, is commonly called the Gulf of Venice; a Gulf extending in length 700 miles, in breadth 140 miles, in some places less; so called of Adria once a famous Haven-town (as before was said) at the mouth of Eridanus or Po. Concerning which we are to know, that though this Gulf or Bay of the Adriatick extending no farther than the Eastern parts of Dalmatia, where the Sea beginneth to take the name of the Ionian; yet Mare Adriaticum, or the Adriatick Sea was of greater length. Extended by the Ancients over the Ionian, and thence South-west-ward till it meeteth with the Tyrrhen Seas; and South-wards, till it come to the coast of Africa; inasmuch as Mare Libycum, or the Sea of Africa, is by Orosius made a part of the Adriatick. For speaking of the Province of Tripolis (a Province of Africa) properly and especially so called, he boundeth it on the North with the Adriatick; as he doth the Isle of Crete, on the South side of it, with the Libyan Sea, Quod & Adriaticum vocant, which they also call the Adriatick, as his own words are. The like might also be made evident out of other Authors both Greek and Latin: which I note here, because Pauls being tossed up and down in the Sea of Adria, as is said Act. 27. 27. and being after cast on shore in the Isle of Malta; occasioned some to think this Melitæ, or Malta, to be that Island of Dalmatia which is now called Melida; being seated in the Bay or Gulf of Adria: whereas the Text speaks plainly of that Isle of Malta, which lieth in the furthest parts of the Adriatick Sea, on the coasts of Africa. But to return to this Gulf, it was accounted heretofore to be very tempestuous and unsafe, as appeareth by Improbui racundior Adria, in Horace; the Minax Adriaticum, in Caullus, and the Ventosi tumor Adria, in Seneca Thyestes. But when the Emperess Helena had found the Cross on which CHRIST suffered, she caused one of the three Nails with which his body was fastened to it, to be thrown of purpose into this Sea; since which time, as Platina hath told us in the life of Pope Sylvester (and cites Saint Ambrose for his Author) it hath been very calm and quiet; the second nail being made into a Bridle for her Son Constantines Horse, and a Crest for his Helmet of the third. But not to trust too much to the truth of this miracle, certain it is that the Venetians are Lords of it, by reason of their Naval power: and that it is every year espoused to the Duke of Venice, by the solemn casting in of a Wedding-Ring; and every year Baptized on Epiphany day, by the Bishop of Zant. When this last ceremony took beginning, I am yet to seek. But for the first, which is performed with a great deal of state, every *Holy-Thurs*day, the Duke, and all the Magnificos being rowed in the Bucantaur (which is a rich and stately Gallie made for such solemnities, and capable of 200 persons, whence it had the name) it took beginning from Pope Alexander the third. Who being hardly put to it by the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, fled unto Venice in the habit of a Cook; Sebastia Cyani being then Duke: in prosecution of whose quarrel, the Venetians encountered Otho the Emperors son, vanquished him, and restored the Pope; The Duke returning back in Triumph with his Royal Prisoner, was thus saluted by the Pope; Cyani take here this Ring of Gold, and by giving it unto the Sea oblige it unto thee: a Ceremony which on this day (the Ascension day) shall be yearly observed, both by thee and thy Successors; thus so posterity may know that you have purchased the dominion thereof by your valour, and made it subject to you, as a Wife to her Husband.

The principal Islands of this Sea, lye on the other side thereof, on the coast of Dalmatia. Some few there are upon this side (but those, as well as these under the command of this Sigmeury) neither great, nor famous. Of these the chief are, 1. MALAMOCO, in Latin Mechnacum, situate at the South-west end of the bank or causey called Il Lido; now only considerable for the Haven, which is large and deep made by the influx of Meduans before mentioned; in which the greater ships do ride, till they hire Pilots from Rovigno to cross the Bars. It was ennobled heretofore with the Dukes Palace, and an Episcopal See: the See of Padua being translated hither, at the sack of that City by the Lombards. But the Dukes Palace being removed to Rialto, and the Episcopal See to the Island of Chioggia; it is now inhabited for the most part by none but Sea-men. 2. TORCELLAN, in which there is a little City of the same name, honoured with a Bishops See, (the Bishop of Altina with much people with him, for fear of the said Lombards retiring hither) but by reason reason of the ill air, not very well peopled. 3. MIRANUM, or MIRIANO, three miles in compass, and but one from Venice, of a sound air, and very well inhabited; the people whereof make the best Venice Glasses, so much used in all parts. 4. CHIOGGIA, called in Latin Fossa Clodia, a little West of Malamocco, at the very entrance into the Marishes from the Adriatick; distant from Venice 25 miles; to which it serveth in stead of a Bulwark. There is a Town in it of the same name, to which the Bishops See was removed from Malamocco, Anno 1103, and near to which are many Saltpitrs, which yield great gain unto the people, and as much unto the Common-wealth. Near to this Island, the Genoese so discomfited the Venetians in a fight at Sea, that thereupon, (the taking of the Island following shortly after) they were offered a blank Charter to write what they would. But the Genoese being grown too insolent on their good success, made the City desperate; who putting all to hazard led again upon them, beat them, pursued them home, and there utterly crushed them; as we shall tell you more at large, when we come to Genoa. 6. POVEGLIA, five miles from the City, first peopled by some who had raised a commotion in the City, on the death of Pietro Tradonico the thirteenth Duke. After which much increased both in wealth and buildings, till destroyed by the Genoese. It is called Pupilia by the Latins. 6. FUDECHA (in Latin called Judicia) so named from the Jews who did there inhabit: not above half a mile from the City, and not very large; but liberally furnished with most pleasant gardens. These and the rest reckoned as members of Trevigiana or appendants on it.

Between these Islands and the main land of Friuli, lyeth a shoal of little Isles, in and amongst which standeth the renowned City of Venice, the head City of this Common-wealth, and the glory of Italy. These Isles 72 number, but joynt together by many Bridges, of which here are said to be 4000 at least, besides 10000 boats for passage from one Isle to the other. The compass of the whole aggregate body said to be eight miles, the buildings fair, and generally adorned with glass windows; an Ornament not common in Italy; where the windows for the most part, are made with paper to let in the light: and that paper oyled all over, to keep out the wet. The number of the inhabitants estimated at 300 thousand. By the situation one would think, that it was denominated from Venetia, which in the old Latin signifieth the seething or frothing of the Sea. VENETIA maris exsuffatio est quæ ad litus veniat, saith the old Gloss upon Isidore, out of Marcus Varro. But the truth is, that it was so called from the Veneti, the old inhabitants of the neighbouring Province of Friuli; who to avoid the fury of the barbarous Huns then threatening Italy, abandoned the main land and built this City in the bogs and marishes of the Sea adjoining. And that it might afford them the greater safety, they not only built it in the most inward part of the Adriatick Sea, commonly called the Gulf of Venice; but in the midst of many Lakes of Salt-water, extending ninety miles in compass, and having on the East the said Adriatick Sea for the length of 550 miles: betwixt which and the said Lakes, there is a bank or causey which they call Il Lido, made as it were by nature, to defend the Islands which lye in this Lake, from the violent fury of the Sea. A causey of 35 miles in length, bending like a Bow, and opening in seven places only; which serve as well to keep the Lakes always full of water, as for the passage of Vessels to and from the City: known by the names of the Ports of 1. Brondolo, 2. Chiocci, 3. Malamocco, 4. the three Castles, or the Castles of Lio. 5. S. Erasmus, 6. Lito Maggiore, or the great shore; and 7. the Trepors: of which that of Brondolo lieth most to the South-west, and that of Trepors to the North-west of the said great Causey. And through every one of these there is safe passage for Ships and Barks of smaller burden: the bigger being compelled to lye at Anchor, on the South side of the City, near to the ports of Malamocco, and the Castles of Lio, which are very well fortified; and there must remain till they are brought in by skillful Pilots, who know the passages, which, by reason of the shifting of the sands, change very often. On the West and North sides, it is compassed with very deep Marishes, about five miles distant from the land; and on the South with many Islands, in which are several Churches and Monasteries, like so many Forts; which lie between it and those parts of Italy; which are not under the obedience of the Common-wealth. So that it is impossible to be taken; but by an Army which can stretch 150 miles in compass. It is built, as before is said, on 72 Islands, 60 of which lye close together round about the Rialto, the other at a greater distance. Of these the principal, 1. Heraclea near the Firm Land of Trevigiana, peopled at first by such as followed Magnus Bishop of Uderna, who to avoid the fury of the Lombards came and planted here: calling the Island and the Town which they founded in it by the name of Heraclea, in honour of it Heracles the Eastern Emperor, in whose time it happened. Made by this means a Bishops See, and being grown populous which it was honoured with the first seat of the Dukes of Venice, removed by Theodorus the seventh Duke to Malamocco, and from thence finally to Rialto. Destroyed by Papin King of Italy, son of Charles the Great; it was re-edified in the time of Angelo Patitatio the tenth Duke, and called Cita Nova; more memorable at this time for the antiquity of the Bishops See, than the number of Citizens. 2. Jussalam, neighbouring to Heraclea, first planted by some Countrey people, who flying the fury of the Lombards, brought with them a great drove of Mares and of Horses, whence it had the name of Equilene, or Equilia. Made afterwards a Bishops See also, by the name of Jesulanus or Equilenfis. 3. Grada, on the same part of the City also, but more towards the North, inhabited at first by such of the City of Aquileia as betook themselves thither to avoid the tyranny of the Hunnes; but made more eminent than before, by Paul the Patriarch of that City, who flying the fury of the Lombards, transported to this Island the Relicks and Treasures of his Church; and settled where the Church of S. Euphemia had been built before. And though Helie who succeeded Paul, obtained of Pope Pelagius the 2. Anno 580 that the Bishops of Grada should from thenceforth have the title of Patriarchs, and be esteemed the Metropolitans of the City and Countrey of Venice: yet the Aquileian would not so be robbed of his ancient privileges, and therefore stirred up many suites and disputes about it. The business compr-

Venice.

The Hiftrians had before infested them with Piracy, and were punished for it, in the time of Duke Pietro Candiano, by the loss of many of their Towns; but in the year 1390, the whole Countrey is brought under the command of this Common-wealth. Padua with a great Part of Trevigiana then appendent on it, they extorted from the noble family of the Carari, An. 1400. The City of Vicentia they possessed themselves of in the same year also; and not long after fully perfected their Conquest of Hiftria, with the revolts whereof they had before been often troubled.

But that whereby they most improved their estate was by a constant watching of their opportunities, taking advantage of the factions and fractions amongst their neighbours, and working their own greatness out of others ruins. By means whereof they came possessed of many places, of right belonging to the Empire, and the Church of Rome; as also of some Towns, pertaining to the Dutchy of Millain; and four of the best Havens in the Adriatick, which properly belonged to the Realm of Naples: not giving aid to any of their distressed neighbours, without the mortgage or direct sale of some piece or other. Which sordid kinde of Merchandizing, drew all the Princes, of those parts, (confederated together in a league at Cambray, Anno 1508) to make war upon them; every one to recover by strong hand, what the Venetian had extorted from them, in their necessity. And the confederates thrived so well, that Maximilian the Emperor recovered to the Empire, the Towns and Territories of Padua, Vicentia, Verona, Triest, Friuli, and whatsoever else he laid claim unto; the Popes in right of the Church, regained Ravenna, Cervia, Rimini (or Arminum) and Faventia; Lewis the 12 of France, in right of the Dutchy of Millaine, Bergamum, Crema, Crenona, Brixia: the King of Spain in right of the Realm of Naples, Andredonia, Trona, Barlette, and Monopoli, all upon the Adriatick; the Duke of Ferrara gained Rovigo, and the Duke of Mantua the town of Asulia. So that the Venetians being (like the Jay) stripped of all their feathers, were fain to quit the firm land, and betake themselves unto the Isles and Marishes of their City; having not one foot of all their whole Dominion left them in Italy, but their Seas and Islands. And yet in very little time, partly by working on the Pope to whom they quitted all their interest in the Towns aforesaid; and partly by dividing the rest of the confederates from one another; they recovered all that they had lost, in a little time: except the Towns of Naples only, for which they were not willing to contend with the Crown of Spain.

The Government is Arifocratical, managed only by the principal men of all the City, both for birth and breeding; the common people having no authority in affairs of State. The chief Officers at the first were many, whom they called Tribunes: but experience being had of that confusion, which a multitude of Governours carrieth for the most part with it, in the year 709. they made choice of one chief Officer, whom they called their Duke. Under these Dukes they have gotten that great Dominion which they now enjoy: The authority of which Dukes was at first more absolute, but by degrees restrained and limited within narrower bounds. He that beholderth him in his Robes, his gravity and outward Port, and the respect given him by the people, would think no Prince could be more absolute and supreme. But look upon him in the exercise and power of Government, and he is nothing in the world but an empty Title. For notwithstanding that he enjoyeth so great a dignity, yet hath he a full power in nothing, not being able to determine in any point, without the presence of his Counsellors (being six in number) who always sit with him, and dispatch affairs both publick and private; as namely, giving audience to Ambassadors from Forain States, receiving Letters from their own Ministers, granting of Privileges, and the like; in which the Duke can do just nothing, if four (at least) of these Counsellors be not present with him. And yet these Counsellors without him may conclude of any thing. Nay he is so retrained in all things to the power of the Senate, and to three Officers called the Capi, that he may not go out of the Town without their consent; and by them is prescribed an Order in his own Apparel. So that he is but little better than a Prisoner, when within the City; and a Traytor, if he stir abroad: at the best but an honourable Servant. And his Revenue is as little as his Authority; as being allowed out of the common Treasury, no more than 40000 Ducats a year, towards his expence and entertainment. As for the Sovereignty of the State, that resides wholly in the Senate; but representatively in the Duke, the six Counsellors, and the three Heads or Presidents of the Porty; which are those Officers (as I take it) whom they call the Capi. The Senate or Great Council, consists of all the Gentlemen of Venice, above five and twenty years of age, which may amount to the number of 2500. though seldom half that number do assemble at once, by reason of their several employments in affairs of the Common-wealth, in other places: who usually do meet together every Sunday morning, and on the morning of other Festivals, where they choofe Magistrates, and distribute Governments, and other matter of the State. But because such great bodies move but slowly, and are not very capable of trust and secrecy, they parcel this great council into lesser Members; whereof the principal are the Pregadi, and the Council of Ten. That of the Pregadi consisteth of 120 in which they treat of, and determine matters of the greatest importance; and therein Conclude commonly of such principal points, as formerly have been proposed and treated of in the great Assembly: And in this Council besides the 120 before mentioned, the Duke, the six Counsellors, and the Council of Ten, and all such as have born any publick Office, have their voice or suffrage. This is that Council which properly and more specially is called the Senate; in which nothing is to be concluded or passed into Acts, except four of the six Counsellors be present at them, and that sixty at the least of the whole number, give their suffrage to it. Then for the Council of Ten, their power is universal, over all affairs, such as the other Councils may not meddle with, as to conclude of war, or peace, to put in execution what they think most necessary for the benefit of the Common-wealth, and other things of like weight and moment: which which if they were first treated of in the General Council or Assembly, and after in that of the Pregadi, as they ought to be in common course; could not be possibly managed with such speed and secrecy, as the exigencies of the State require. And in this Council, with the Prince and his six Assitants, the Supreme Majesty of the State doth reside especially. Some other Officers there are, and those of great authority and reputation, as the Procurators of S. Mark, which have the charge of the publick Treasures; and the Avogadori, or Tribunes (as one might call them) of the people, being three in all; one of which must be always present in all consultations, lest any thing should pass to the prejudice, and infringement of the Privileges of the common people.

For the whole body of the City consisteth either of the Gentlemen, or of Artificers and Commons. These last are the defendants and progeny of such as came to settle here when the State was fixed; invited to dwell here, and to follow their occupations, by several Privileges and Immunities which were offered to them; and these they neither admit into any of their Councils, nor into any of the Offices of Trust and Power, except it be two; that namely of the Chancellor, and the principal Secretaries, which pertain only to the people. The other are the issue or descendants of those, who first laid the foundation of their City and Common-wealth: and these they have in such respect, and so high esteem, that to make any Stranger (how great and eminent soever) a Gentleman of the City, is the greatest honour they can bestow; and not bestowed but upon the best deserver. Henry the 3 of France taking this City in his way out of Poland, thought himself graced with this attribute, which they are very dainty and sparing of, it being the highest honour which they vouchsafe to import to such commanders of their own, and Ambassadors of other Princes, as have well deserved it. And that this honour may be kept up to the very height, and their Nobility grow not too cheap, by being too numerous; neither the younger sons of these Gentlemen within the City, or of the Noblemen in the Countrey, are permitted to marry. But otherwise they suffer them to satisfy their lusts, with too much impunity; and for their fakes allow of Stews, as an evil not to be voided on the former grounds.

Now as Otho in Tacitus said to the Pretorian Souldiers, Principes à Senatu oritur, Senatus à vobis: so out of these Gentlemen are chosen the Senators, out of them the Duke. His election by Contarenius is described in this manner. In the vacancy of the place, all the Gentry above thirty years of age are assembled. So many as meet, cast their names into a pot; and in another, are just so many balls, of which thirty only are guilt. Then a child draweth for each, till the thirty guilt ones be all drawn; for which thirty the child draweth again the second time out of another pot, that hath only nine guilt balls. The nine so drawn, nominate forty, out of which forty are twelve again selected by the same kinde of lot. These twelve nominate five and twenty, out of which five and twenty are nine again by lot set apart. These nine nominate five and forty, who are by lot again reduced unto eleven. These eleven choofe forty one of the best and chiefest of the Senators; who after an oath taken severally, to choofe whom they judge worthiest, write in a scrole every one whom he best liketh. The scrols are mingled together and then drawn; the fitness of the persons then drawn is discussed; and he that hath most voyces above five and twenty, is the man whom they pronounce to be elected, and adjudge with due solemnities to be created their Duke. By the like kinde of Lottery do they choofe Gentlemen in the Senate, and make publick officers; insumch that Contarenius, who hath committed unto writing these publick Forms, conceiveth (I will not say how rightly) that the Venetian Common-wealth was modelled by Plato's platform.

But whether this be so or not, certain it is, that this Common-wealth thus constituted, and modelled, as before is said; hath lasted longer under one form of Government, than any Republick in the world, either Greek or Roman. Nor hath it only preserved it self in the same condition, but may most justly be accompted one of the strongest Bulwarks of Christendome against the incroachments of the Turks: the wars whereof hath procured peace; and the peace thereof procured plenty, to the rest of Europe. Insumch, that it may well be said, that as Europe is the Head of the World, and Italy the Face of Europe; so Venice is the eye of Italy; the fairest, strongest, and most active part in that powerful Body. As if the Genius of old Rome by some Pythagorical transmigration had passed into the body of this powerful State; and animated it with all the vertues of that City, but knit with a more permanent and constant temper. From so base and abject a beginning, is this City grown to be one of the best Supporters of the Arms of Europe.

As for the religion of this State, they to lerate that of the Greek Church, but they themselves profess no other than that of the Church of Rome: yet with such caution and respect to their own authority, that they suffer not the Clergy to enjoy those privileges, which they possess in other Countreys, to the publick prejudice. Hence grew the quarrel betwixt them, and Pope Paul the fifth; in which the Signeury stood stiffly to their ancient Rights, and caused Mass to be duly said, notwithstanding all their Churches were under the Interdict; banished the Jesuites for ever out of their Dominions, for sticking too busily in behalf of the Pope: and in the end prevailed so far by their constant courage, that the Pope was fain to give over the cause, and reconcile them to the Church, without any submission. A notable example to all Chriitian Princes, how to behave themselves towards those of Rome; who are not to be gained upon, but by such resistances. So easie a thing it is for men of constancy and courage, to shake off that yoke, which Papal Ty ranny and Superstition hath imposed upon them.

In managing their wars they antiently observed two Rules, which most conduced to the enlargement and security of their Common-wealth. The first was the exempting of their own Citizens from the wars (not out of jealousy, but care of their preservation) unless compelled to the contrary by extreme necessity: the body of their Armies being compounded out of the Provincial Subjects, intermixt with Mercenaries. By means whereof, they did not only keep their City in the same condition, able at any time,

time, and at all times, to give Law to the rest of their Dominions: but waited the hot and boiling spirit of their Subjects, in the Wars abroad; which otherwise might have made too much work at home. The other was the entertaining of some neighbouring Prince to be the General of their Forces; whom in the conclusion of the service they dismissed with honour and reward. And by this course they avoided faction, and prevented servitude: Either or both of which might have happened by employing any of their own great ones in the chief command; who (after the example of Julius Caesar in the state of Rome) having a strong party within the City, and an Army without, might perhaps have made himself their Prince. But this was only in the conduct of their wars in Italy, and in such times when the State was not so well balanced as it hath been since.

As for the Forces of the State, we may behold them in relation to Sea, or Land. Their Land-forces which they have in continual pay, for defence of their Dominion, consist of 28000 Foot, with Captains, and all other Officers enrolled and paid; and besides those they have a choice band of 4000 Musquetiers: for exercising of which they keep yearly Musters, as well to improve them in experience, as to proportion them some gratuities, according to their well-deservings. And as for Horse, they maintain constantly 6000 men at Arms, well appointed and paid; the like whereof is not to be found in all Italy. And yet besides this constant and ordinary establishment, they are able to bring great Forces into the field; as appeareth by their Army against Lewis the twelfth: in which without disarming any of their Forts and Garrisons, they had 2000 men of Arms, 3000 light Horse, 30000 Foot, most of their own natural Subjects; saving that they were interlined with some bands of Swissers; to which people they give yearly pensions, to be assured of their aid upon all occasions. Then for the Sea-forces, besides that they keep fifty Gallies in continual action, for defence of the Adriatick, and that they have no less than 200 more laid up in the Arsenal, with all manner of tackling and ammunition appertaining to them: they have 10000 men enrolled to serve at the Oar, and may raise as many as they please for those kind of services, out of those parts of Sclavonia, which are subjected to them. But the great evidence of the power they can make at Sea, was the great Fleet set out against the Grand Seigneur for the War of Cyprus, An. 1570. in which they manned out one great Gallion, eleven great Gallies, five and twenty tall ships, and one hundred and fifty Gallies of lesser burden; being in all one hundred and eighty seven sail, fit for present service. To give the total sum in brief, they held a war by Sea and Land for seven years together, against all the Princes of Christendome (excepting England) confederated against them by the League of Cambray; in all which time they neither wanted men nor money; and in the end, were the least losers by the bargain.

By this we may conjecture also at the greatness of the publique Treasury, and of the yearly income which supplies the same. For though it be conceived that their ordinary standing Revenue be but four millions of Ducats yearly (which yet is more than any Christian Prince can boast of, except France and Spain) yet they have many other wayes to advance their Treasury, by laying new Imposts on commodities, as they see occasion; Which needs must rise to vast and most considerable sums, in a City of the greatest Traffick of any in Europe; and perhaps in all the world besides. And yet besides such Customs and Imposts as they lay on Merchandize, there is nothing which the people do eat or drink, for which they pay not something to the publique Treasury: over and above which, the poorest Labourer in the whole Signeury payeth his Poll-money also. Infomuch, that it is credibly affirmed, that the Christians generally do live in a better condition under the Turks, than under the Venetians. Without such helps, (though heavy and burdensome to the Subject) they could not possibly have spent twelve millions in the war against Selimus the second; and as many a little before that, in the enterprise of Ferrara, and the war raised against them by the League of Cambray, which was that formerly remembered.

As for the Dukes of Venice, though no Sovereign Princes, nor such as do succeed each other in the right of inheritance: yet being they are always men of most eminent note, and that in their names all the business of State is acted, and all writings dated, I will subjoin a Catalogue of them to this present; to the end that meeting with their names in the course of History, we may the better know in what times they lived.

The principal Orders of Knighthood in this Republick are, 1. Of S. Mark, who is the Patron of this City, instituted in the year 1330. and renewed again (being grown somewhat out of use) An. 1562. The honour is commonly bestowed on the person present, sometimes by Letters Patents on a party absent; as lately upon Daniel Heinsius, one of great eminence for learning in the Netherlands. The person chosen is to be of noble blood, at the least a Gentleman; the Word of Motto or the Order, is, Pax tibi Mact.

2. Of the glorious Virgin, first instituted by Bartholomew of Vincentia, An. 1222. Their charge is to defend Widows and Orphans, and to procure (as much as in them is) the peace of Italy. It was allowed of by Pope Urban the fourth, 1262. An. The Arms of this Order, are a Purple Cross, between certain Stars. The habit a white Surcote over a Ruffet Cloak; and seems to be as well a Religious, as a Military Institution, like to the Spanish Orders, and that of Malta.

There are in the Provinces of this

The great Dukedom of TUSCANIE.

HAVING thus run along the Coast of the Adriatick, or upper Sea, from the Lands of the Church, unto the Alpes, which divide Italy from Germany; let us next keep along the tract of the Tuscan or Lower Sea, from the said Lands of the Church, to that part of the Alpes which divide Italy from France. And in the first place we meet with the Dukedom of Florence, or the Estate of the great Duke of Tuscany; divided on the East from S. Peters Patrimony, by the River Pisto; on the West, from the Common-wealth of Genoa, by the River Macra, and the strong Fort of Sarazena; on the North from Romandiola, and Marca Anconitana, by the Apennine Hills; and on the South side it is bounded with the Tuscan or Tyrrhenian Seas.

It taketh up the greatest and goodlyest part of all that which antiently was called Tuscany, from the Greek word Σύμ, which signifieth to sacrifice; of which act of Religious Worship, or rather of some superstitious Ceremonies appertaining to it they are conceived to be the Authors. And to some say truth they were much given to Sooth-sayings, and Divinations, and such like vanities of Geniis: Tages, that Merlin of the old World, first appearing here, from whom they learned the greatest part of their Superstitions. So that this name was adventitious and accidental. For properly and originally it was called Tyrrhenian, from Tyrrhenus the son of Alys King of Lydia, who came and planted in these parts about the time that Gedon judged the Tribes of Israel. But these names signified the same both Country and people, though in divers Languages, and with respect to different Originations: the name of Tyrrheni, and Tyrrhenia being most used by the Greeks; as that of Tysci, and Tyscia, by their neighbours of Rome, who also called the people Heurysci; and the Country Heururia, from a particular Province of it which was so intitled. Antiently it extended as far Eastward as the banks of Tiber, the other bounds being then as they are at the present; and in that tract gave dwelling to a potent Nation. Who not content to be restrained within the Apennine and the Tiber, wasted three hundred Towns of the Umbri, the next bordering Nation: and built twelve Cities on the other side of the Mountains; that is to say, Adria, Verona, Vincencia, Trent, Bergamo, Mantua, Comio, Vercelle, Novara, Parma, Bononia, and Rhegium; all of esteem and reputation to this very day. They were the first Nation that carried an Offensive War to the Gates of Rome.

Tuscany. Rome, when they gave aid to the Tarquins under King Porfena; and held it out on the Defensive as long as any: No people in all Italy standing more stilly in defence of their common Liberties, than the Falisci, and Veientes, two Hebrman Tribes. But nothing could withstand the fortune of that growing Empire. Twelve Nations of them were brought under by Tarquinius Priscus, who from hence brought to Rome, the Eastes and Triumphal Ornaments, and other embellishments of State: the Vesii and Falisci, by the Sword of Camillus, the Conquest perfected by the conduct of Valerius Corvinus, and Publ. Cornelius A.V.C. 455. So the Tuscan were subdued at last, after they had been governed by their own Kings 113 years; that is to say, from Tarchon Priscus their first King, A.M. 2550, to Tuilius the last King, A.M. 3668.

The chief Towns of it in those times were 1 Vesii, and 2 Perusia, spoken of before. 3 Fesula, then of very great fame, now a poor Village hard by Florence. 4 Agellina, situate not far from the Lake of Thrasimene, which from hence was called Vatum Agellinum: the chief Town of the Tuscan at the coming of Aeneas into Italy; and the Seat Royal of Miternus that noted Tyrant, so often mentioned by Virgil. First built by the Pelasgi, a Greek people, and by them thus named; afterwards by mistake called Cere: by like mistake as Peru, Jucatan, and others of the American Provinces, got their present names: as shall there be shewn. For the Tuscan, or the Romans as others say, demanding in their language of a Country fellow, the name of the place; was answered in his language, Carē, that is to say, God save you, or God speed you: which word they taking for the name of the Town, did ever after call it Cere. Memorable in old time for the Burls adjoining, from hence called Balnea Carolina; more for the preservation of the Vestal Fire, and the other holy things of Rome, when that Town was taken by the Galls. Rewarded hereupon with all the privileges of Rome, except right of Suffrage: from whence the Tables, in which the Roman Censors used to enroll the names of those, whom they deprived of their votes in Senate, or any other publick Council, were called Cariæ Tabule. 5 Phaleria, on the sea-side, the principal Town of the Falisci, of which there is some remainder extant in the Village called Falaris. 6 Clusium, the Seat-royal of King Porfena, for aiding which against the Galls, the Romans drew upon themselves the fury of that turbulent people. Pisa, Arretinum, and such others as are still in being, we shall speak of afterwards.

The Rivers and the soyl do remain as formerly, though the first altered in their names. The principal of which are, 1 Arnus spoken of before, in the general survey of Italy. 2 Sercius, by Ptolomy called Boathis, a River which by the excellency of its Carps and Trouts, makes some amends, unto the people for its violent Land-floods. 3 Palis, as violent and dangerous as the other, but not so profitable; which falleth into Tiber, near Orviette. 4 Martha, by Ptolomy called Ofa. Here is also the Lake Volsinus, which is twenty four miles in compass; and that called antiently Sabatinus, but now Lacus Braciani, from which water was conveyed to Rome. By reason of these and other Lakes, and the frequent over-flowings of the Rivers, the Country in former times was full of Bogs, which made the air unhealthy, and the ways unpassable; it being in the Flats and Marishes of Hebrmania, that Annibal was so tormented, losing herein the greatest part of his Elephants, and one of his eyes. But since those times past by the industry of the people, and the great providence of the Princes; the Fens in most places are well drained, and the Bogs converted to firm land; whereby the air is rectified, and the ways made pleasant; care being also taken, by great banks and ramparts, to keep the Rivers for the most part within their channels. So that the Country is now full of very fruitful fields, and fruitfull vallies, swelled here and there with pleasant mountains, little inferior in fertility to the richest vales; abundantly well stored with delicious wines, and plentiful, in a word, of all the blessings of nature: save that the parts about Florence are defective in Wheat, the want of which is supplied from the fields of Sienna, where there is plenty enough of it for themselves and their neighbours; though so such superfluity, as to spare any of it unto other Provinces.

But to return unto the story, Tuscany being thus brought under the command of Rome, was made the second of those eleven Regions, into which Italy was divided by Augustus Caesar. In the division of it made by Antoninus, and in that of Constantine, it made with Umbria one of the ten Provinces, which was immediately subject to the Præfect of the City of Rome. Afterwards in the declination of the Roman Empire, it became a member of the Kingdom of Lombardy, then of the French, and finally of the German Empire: during which times it was governed by an Officer of trust and power, whom I find sometimes called the Margues, sometimes Duke of Tuscany; who had here more or less authority, as they could work on the necessities of their several Princes. Desiderius the last King of the Lombards had been Duke of Tuscany, and so was Albericus in the time of the Berengarii; and Guido is called Marquess of it, under the reign of Henricus Auceps the German Emperor. Afterwards as the Popes grew in power and greatness, so they made bold to intermeddle in the affairs of this Province: giving it one while to the Kings of Naples; another while to the Dukes of Anjou, making some challenge to that Kingdom. In which distractions the Florentines first bought their own liberty, of the Emperor Rodolphus Habspargensis; and after purchased the Town and Territory of Cortona, of Ladislaus King of Naples; that of Arezzo, for 40000 Florins, of Duke Lewis of Anjou. After this time they husbanded their affairs so well, that they became one of the most considerable Estates in Italy; and at the last by taking in Pisa and Sienna, they got the absolute dominion of the best and largest part of Tuscany: which now is under the command of the great Duke, and may be branched most stily into these four parts; that is to say, the Cities and Territories of 1 Florence, 2 Pisa, 3 Sienna, and 4 the Islands situate in the Tuscan or Tyrrhenian Seas.

1. And first the Territory or Estate of Florence, taketh up the North part of this great Dukedom, having the Apennine on the North, and the Estates of Pisa and Sienna on the South. So called from from the Cry of FLORENCE, situate nigh unto the conflux of the Rivers Arnus and Chianus; the former passing through the middle of the City, which is joyned together with four Bridges of stone: environed with mountains, which do serve as a Fortress against Invasions, and for defence against the Winds. First built by L. Sylla that bloody Dictator; afterwards made a Colony by the Triumviri, Augustus, Antony, and Lepidus; from the flourishing situation of it being called Florentia. The Lombards upon some displeasure razed it to the ground, but it was rebuilt by Charlemagne; to whom and whose Successors they continued faithful, as long as they had any thing to do with the State of Italy: but after, they betook themselves to the Papal faction, and were as rigid Guelfs as any. On this foundation it now stands, and is indeed a very fair and flourishing City, agreeable unto the name; the streets being very straight and large, paved with square stone, and always kept exceeding clean: the ordinary buildings beautiful above any in Italy, besides many fair and stately Palaces adorned with Statues. The principal of the Palaces is that of the Great Duke, taking up the room of 50 houses which were wont to stand there; capable of a great retinue: and for the largeness of the building, the Architecture and Ornaments of it, as also for the Gardens, Fountains, Statues, and other Accellaries, equalling, if not surpassing the goodliest Palaces in all Europe. The like may also be affirmed of the Cathedral, highly commended for the excellency of the Workmanship, but that especially of the Steeple, which both for stuff and structure is beyond compare. This Church is called commonly the Annunciata; and worthily accounted one of the chief Ornaments of Florence; in which City there are besides so many excellent pieces and curious rarities, that the Arch-Duke Charles was wont to say, that it was a City not to be seen but on Holy-days. As for the Inhabitants of this City and the parts adjoining, they are a very industrious people, and generally said to be of a very great wit, subtle heads and of great insight into business: and yet Count Imbalt, a French Gentleman, was used to say, Non sapevo dove confisasse l'ingegno tanto celebrato di Fiorentini; that he should never find where that great wit of the Florentines lay. Guicciardini the Historian, was without doubt a notable Statesman; and Machiavel, once the Recorder of this City, a man of as shrewd a brain as any; and so were the two Cosmo's of the house of the Medices: but whether all the Florentines, or the major part of them, be of such extraordinary wits as they say they are, I am not very well resolved of; nor is it much material to enquire into it.

The other Cities and chief places of this first division, are 1 Fesula, once a Roman Colony, now a small Village called Fiesoli; situate in the straights of the Apennine, not far from Florence, which is thought to have risen chiefly from the ruins of it: most memorable for the great defeat here given by Stilico, to the great Army of the Goths, conducted into Italy under Rhadagisus. 2 Pirozia, or Pistia, seated on the foot of the Apennine, but ruined with its own dissensions: of which the greatest and most lasting, were those betwixt the Neri and Bianchi (or the black men and the white) which divided Florence; and that between the Guelfs and Gibellins; which here took beginning, and for a long time exercised the peace of Christendome. This last began (as some say) upon the quarrel of two brothers, of which the one named Gnello, stood for the Pope; the other named Gibellino, declared for the Emperor. The quarrel spreading into parties, called the Guelfs and the Gibellins, became at last the wonder and amazement of all good people: inasmuch as some are of opinion, that the fiction of the Elfs and Goblins, wherewith we use to fright young childrer, was derived from hence. As for the City it self, it is seated in a fair and goodly plain, compassed with mountains; the streets paved with free-stone, and the Church (which is Cathedral) with Marble. It was first walled by Desiderius the last King of the Lombards, when he was Governour of this Province; but for all that was forced to submit it self to the power of the Florentine, by whom it was subdued A. 1150. when as yet themselves were not the absolute Masters of their own City. 3 Volterra built among the mountains, the birth-place of Linus successor to St. Peter in the See of Rome. It standeth on the top of an hill, the walls thereof made of square stone six foot long, which are very nearely joyned together without Mortar: and in those Walls five Gates for entrance, each Gate having near to it a very fair Fountain. The Marble Statues, and some Epitaphs in Tuscan Letters, do evidently declare it to be very antient. In this town was born Rodolphus Volterrannus, one of the greatest Reitorers of Learning in the West parts of the World. 4 Monte Pulciano, in Latin called Alnus Politianus, a well fortified City, and the birth-place of Angelus Politianus, the Reviver of the Latin or Roman Elegancies. 5 Prato, another strong piece of this part also. Neighbouring by a retiring place of the Great Dukes, called Pratoline, a right pleasant Village, beautified with a magnificent Palace; in which besides many other singularities, are most curious Water-works, equal, if not superior unto those of Tivoli. 6 Cortona, an antient City of the Tuscan, situate at the foot of the Apennine; sold to the Florentines, by Ladislaus King of Naples. 7 Arezzo, or Arezzo, one of the antient Cities of the Tuscan also, and sold to the Florentines as the other was; this being bought for 40000 Florins of Lewis of Anjou, then the Popes Viceroy in this Country. 8 Borgo San Sepulcro, seated on the Tiber, near; or within the Spoletan Dukedom; added to this Signeury by Cosmo de Medices, the first of that name; by whom bought of Pope Engegnus the fourth for the sum of 25000 Florins, and laid unto the Patrimony of this Common-wealth; to which it serveth for a Bulwark on that side of this Country.

To this Division also we may best refer the small, but rich Signeury of Massa, situate on the borders of the state of Genoa. Chief Towns whereof, 1 Massa it self, which gives the title of a Marquess to the Lord hereof, of the the Family of the Malespines. 2 Carara, three miles off from Massa, and more neer the Sea; of great fame for its Quarries of whitest Marble (much used in the time of the Roman greatness) and a breed of the fairest Women in Italy. The Prince hereof a Feudatary to the Duke of Florence, but amongst his own vassals absolute enough.

Pisa and Sienna.

2. The second member of this estate, is the City and Territory of PISA, lying towards the Sea, betwixt the Genoese on the West, and the Territory of Sienna on the East. The City first built by the Pisa, a people of Etruria in Greece: who following old Nestor from Troy, were by the violence of the wind driven upon this coast; and here upon the River Arno, where it meeteth with Serchio, did erect this Town. In the distractions of the Empire it stood up for itself, and grew so potent, that at one time they waged War both with the Venetians, and Genoese. They were once Masters of Sardinia, Corsica, and the Baleares; but finally being discomfited by the Genoese near the Isle of Giglio, An. 1369, they submitted themselves to the protection of Charles the fourth, by whom it was made free. Not long after, it was taken by John Geleazzo the first Duke of Millain, An. 1404, by John Mario, his son and Successor sold unto the Florentines; from whose command they freed themselves by a popular violence. The Florentines upon this besieged them, and brought them to such extremity of hunger, that they were ready to be starved. Yet such was the humanity of the Besiegers, that when they entered the Town, every man carried victuals in his hand in stead of weapons, to beget, as it were, new life in that rebellious people. This victory the Florentines got by the valour and conduct of Sir John Hawkwood, whom the Italians call Giovanni di Aguto; who being first a Taylor in Essex, afterwards served Edward the third in his French Wars, where he was Knighted. And when, upon the peace concluded after the battle of Poitiers, he wanted employment; he entered with his Regiment into Italy, and put himself into the pay of the Florentines, then in War with this City: who for his valour have honoured him with a very fair Tomb and Monument. When Charles the 8th went into Italy, the Pisans again revolted; and were not without much labour and great charges, reduced to their former obedience. As for the City itself, it is almost as big as Florence; this being five miles in compass, and that but fix; but very short of it in the numbers of people, Florence being said to contain 90000 souls, Pisa not a third part of that proportion; yet hath it very good advantages to make it populous, that is to say, the publick Arsenal for shipping, an University for Students, and the See of an Archbishop: the Cathedral Church of which is a very beautiful piece of work, the Gates thereof are brass, and the Steeple of it of such artificial and exquisite building, that it sheweth as if it were always falling. But the unwholfomeness of the air over-balanceeth all these fair advantages.

The next place of importance within the Territory of this City, is the Town and Haven of Ligorn (Liburnum it is called in Latin) seated upon the influx of the River Arno; well fortified against the Genoese, by whom the works were once slighted, An. 1297. Upon a Reconciliation made between those States it returned again to its old Masters. And when the Pisans were fold over to the Florentines, by the Duke of Millain; Thomas Fregosa Duke of Genoa, seized upon this place, and sold it also to the same Chapter, for 120000 Ducats. By the care of Duke Cosmo and his two sons, it is much improved in strength and beauty; and so well fortified, that it is thought to be one of the strongest Cities in Christendom: Cities I say, and not Castles, the Castles of Stockholm in Sweden, and that of Millain, being held to be the strongest Forts in the World. After this comes in 3 Pira Sancta, on the West side of the Arno, a place of great consequence and strength; one of the best pieces of the Pisans when a Free-estate, against their old enemies the Genoese, towards whom it standeth. 4 Terracola, Eastward of Ligorn, neighboured with a capacious Bay on the Mediterranean. 5 Castellana, an Episcopal See. And 6 Porto Berrato bordering on the Signeury of Sienna; now nothing but a station for Ships (nor much used for that) but heretofore beautified with one of the best Cities of the Tuscans, called Populonia.

3. The third member of this Dukedome is the City and Territory of SIENNA, lying betwixt the Estate of Pisa, and the land of the Church. The City said to be built by Brennus, who did there put his old sickly men to sojourn, and called it Sena: the birth-place of Aeneas Silvius, called afterwards Pope Pius the second; of Francis Piccolomini, after Pope Pius the third; and of Sixtus (hence surnamed) Senensis, the greatest Scholar of the three, if not of all the age he lived in. By Antonine in his Itinerarium called Sena Julia; to difference it perhaps from another of that name near the Adriatick, called Sena Gallia. Built near the Spring, or Fountain of the River Arbia, now better known by the name of Treiffa; but built (which makes the situation of it exceeding pleasant) upon an high hill, on which there is a Castle that commands the Town; the streets thereof even and very plain, centring in a large and spacious Market-place; near to which is a very fair Palace, used for a Senate-house in the Free-Commonwealth; and on the South side near the Walls, the Cathedral Church, reputed to be one of the fairest in Italy, having only one door into it, to which there is an ascent by fair Marble stairs, of which the Pavement is made also. Having long held the Gibelline or Imperial faction, it bought its liberty at an easie rate, of the Emperour Rodolphus the first. After it fell into the hands of the Spaniards, then of the French; and finally was made over to Cosmo de Medicis Duke of Florence, by the King of Spain, An. 1558. In consideration of the great charge he had been at to beat out the French; and other services expected for the time to come. Cosmo being thus invested in it, deprived the people of their Arms, altered the Government, and was the first Prince who had the absolute command of it, after the constitution of their Common-wealth: neither the French nor Spaniards ruling here as Lords, but only as called in by their several factions; and suffered to have Garisons in it of their own people, by the agreement of their party. And to say truth, it stood with good reason of State, that the Florentine should use all his wit to get this City; and having got it, use all means to assure it to him. For besides that great accession which it made unto his Estate; by adding thereunto the yearly income of an hundred and fifty thousand Ducats, above all expences: it was also to be carefully looked on as a Rival, which had long time stood in competition with it, for the sovereign command of Tuscany. Besides there had been mighty animosities be-between the Cities; the Florentine being always of the Guelphes, and the Siennays of the Gibelline faction. A faction at last so generally distasteth in all Italy, and so abominable to the Popes, that on an Ashwednesday, when the Pope being to cast Ashes on the heads of the Cardinals, was to have said, Memento O homo quod cinis es, & in cinerem converteris: according to the usage of the Church of Rome: seeing a Gibelline amongst them, he forgot himself, and said thus unto him, Memento O homo quod Gibellinus es, & cum Gibellinis morieris. Of chief note next unto Sienna, are 1 Montalcino (Mons Alcinus in Latin) a place of great strength both by industry and situation. 2 Castro Cartaldo, seated upon a lofty hill, most memorable for the Birth and Sepulchre of John Boccaccio, one of the best wits of his time, as his Decameron declareth; buried here with a sorry and unworthy Epitaph, not worth the labour of transcribing. 3 Soana, an Episcopal City; as also are 4 Pienza, 5 Crosetto, and 6 Chiusi; this last the Clusium of the ancient Tuscans spoken of before. Besides these are 26 walled Towns within this Signeury, but of no great observation in the course of business.

There belonged also unto this Common-wealth, when a State distinct, some Ports and Peeces on the Sea, which when it was configned over to the Duke of Florence, were retained by the Spaniard: partly thereby to keep those Princes at his devotion; but principally that by holding so many places of importance in his own hands, he might carry at his girdle the Keys of Italy, and become Lord Paramount of those Seas. Of those the principal, if not all, 1 Piombino, in Latin called Plumbinum, from some Mines of Lead; adorned with a strong Castle, and a plentiful Territory: the Castle in the hands of the Spaniard, but the Town and Territory in possession of a Lord of its own, who receives the whole rents of the Estate. 2 Porto Telamon, Eastward of Piombino, so called of old from Telamon, an adjoining Promontory, and known by this name in Plutarch, in the life of Marius. Accounted the chief City of Tuscany in those elder times, but most remarkable for the great battle fought near unto it betwixt the Romans and the Galls, A.V.C. 529. The Army of the Galls consisting of 70000 Horse and Foot; that of the Romans little (if at all) inferior to it. A fight in which Atilius, one of the Consuls being slain, the Victory was gotten by Emilius his Colleague, with the slaughter of 40000 of the Enemies, and the taking of 10000 Prisoners: Anerocstus and Congolanius two Kings of the Transalpine Galls being slain or taken. A Victory which drew after it a total subjugation of the Cisalpine Galls, which followed within three years after. 3 Orbitello, drawing more towards the East, the Cossa of the ancient Writers. 4 Monte Argentorati, a Promontory or Peninsula, thrusting it self into the Sea, over against Orbitello; by the Latins called Mons Argentarius: and thought by some, who have observed the situation, strength and extent thereof, to be the fittest place for a Royal City to be built in, to command those Seas. 5 Porto Hercule, which still retains its ancient name, imparted to it from some Temple of Hercules, which was founded in it; situate near the Eastern Isthmus of the said Peninsula. 6 Porto-Longone, a piece of special consequence for command of the Mediterranean; and for that cause of late times gotten by the French (then aiming at the conquest of Naples) but again recovered by the Spaniard, who doth now possess it.

The fourth and last member of this Estate, are the Islands in the Tuscan or Tyrrhenian Seas. The principal whereof is 1 Elva, not above ten miles from Piombino; called anciently Ethalia, by the vulgar Elva. Pliny affirmed it to contain in compass a hundred miles, but it proves upon a just measurement, to be but fifty. Not very well furnished with Corn, and less with fruits; but plentiful in Mines of Iron, as formerly for Steel and Copper: for which, especially for Steel, of great esteem in the time of Virgil, as appeareth by that passage in the tenth of the Aeneid, where it is called

For unexhausted Mines of Steel.

But for all that, the Steel now failing, the want thereof is supplied by Iron; which Iron is of so strange a nature, that every 25 year it reneweth again upon the Mines, and will by no means melt whilst it is in the Island, but must be carried somewhere else. It affordeth also Sulphur, Allom, Tin, Lead, Marble good plenty; and in some parts, the Loadstone also. Formerly it belonged to the Lords of Piombino, who not being able to defend it against the Turks, if they should at any time invade it; resigned it, by the Counsel of Charles the fifth, unto Cosmo di Medicis the Duke of Florence: reserving to themselves the Revenues of it, and the Government of all the Towns and Villages therein, except those that were thought fit for Fortification. It hath a very fair Haven called Porto Ferrario, capable to receive any great Fleet that should come thither; and therefore if the Turks and Moors had been Masters of it, they might easily have commanded all the coasts adjoining, as well in Provence as Italy. For the defence hereof, there are two strong Castles, situate on two little Mountains, on each side one; so fortified by Art and Nature, that they are held to be impregnable; having also good store of Canon, and all sorts of Warlike Ammunition. And not far off stands a strong Town built by the same Duke Cosmo, and by him called Cosmopolis; well fortified, and made the seat of his new Order of St. Stephen, of which more hereafter.

The second Island of note is Giglio, called Igium anciently, just opposite to Monte Argentorato, and having some 25 miles in compass; near unto which the Genoese so discomfited the Pisans in a Fight at Sea, that they were never able to recover their former puissance. 3 Capraria not far from Ligorn, so called from its abundance of Goats; and for the same reason Egiora, by the Greek Geographers:

The Tuscan Islands. as 4 Gallinaria not far off, took name from abundance of Hens. Of the rest nothing memorable, but that some of them do occur in the ancient Writers; of which sort are Meloria, heretofore Lancellum, not far from Capraria. 2 Lanusa, formerly Artemisia, in which there is a very good Haven. 3 Gurgona, 4 Troia, and 5 the small Islands which are called Formica. 6. To these may be added also the Isle of Planasia, more memorable than the rest, for the banishment and death of Agrippa Posthumus, the Nephew of Augustus Cæsar by his daughter Julia; here murdered by the command of Tiberius, to prevent all future competition to the State Imperial: situate somewhat nearer unto Corfica, than the rest of these Islands.

of the three Islands.

As for the MEDICES, whose posterity are now Dukes hereof, they were in the Free State Nobility; Maachiavel informs us in his Florentine History accounted in the chief rank of the Popular Nobility: (then those being such of the ancient Nobles, as to be capable of the Magistracy, and publick Offices (then wholly shared among the Commons) had as it were degraded themselves, and became part of the Commonalty. About the year 1410. John de Medicis, (the first great raider of this house) stoutly maintaining the Liberties of the People against the great ones; was by them so honoured and enriched, that he not only got a great party, but almost a Sovereignty in the City. To him succeeded his son Cosmo, one of the greatest Statesmen of those Times; who did not only much reform the Civil Government, but enlarged the Territory of the State by the addition of Casentino, Burgo, St. Sepulchro, and some other pieces. Dying in the year 1464, he left the managery of the State to Peter de Medicis his son, whose whole time was consumed in suppressing such Factions, as had at home been raised against him: and at his death left all his power, and the great wealth which he had gotten (but with a greater measure of his Fathers virtues) to Lawrence and Julian his two sons. The people after his decease, either desirous of Novelties, as most people are; or fearing to be made hereditary to this powerful Family; seemed to incline to one of the Soderinis, a man of plausible deportment, and well beloved. But he judiciously considering, that new houses as they are easily honoured, so are they as soon abandoned by the fickle multitude; conferred all the dependences which were cast upon him, on these two young men of the Medices: as being descended from a Family which had long governed the City. Against these two, the Pazzi, a potent house in Florence, conspired, and at last they slew Julian, but Lorenzo escaped: the blows which were struck at him, being received by one of his servants, whom two days before he had delivered out of prison. For this Fact the Pazzi were hanged at the Palace window, together with the Archbishop of Pisa, who had been of the conspiracy. To revenge the death of this Bishop, Pope Paul the 2. excommunicated the Florentines; and Ferdinand King of Naples warred upon them. Lorenzo to divert this mischief, went in person to Naples: where he grew so much into the good liking of the King, that there was a perpetual League made between them. After his death 1492. his son Peter, having very improvidently delivered Pisa and Ligorn, with other pieces, to the French King; was, together with his whole Family, banished. John de Medicis the son of Lawrence, and brother of Peter, being made Pope, by the name of Leo the 10. restored again his Family; who not long after his death were again exil'd. This disgrace Julia de Medicis son to the above-named Julian, and Pope of Rome, by the name of Clement the 7. not enduring, procured Charles the fifth to besiege it: which request was granted, and the City after two years resistance, yielded. The Emperor then gave it to Alexander Medicis (Grandchild to Peter, by his son Lawrence) Anno 1531. And he to restrain the insolencies of the people, built a strong Citadel in the Town. This Alexander was a Prince of good parts enough, had he not been too much addicted to Lust and Wantonness; which being observed by Lawrence de Medicis his own Cousin, he trained him to a secret place, under colour of bringing him to the bed of a beautiful Lady, and there basely murdered him. Which done, instead of calling the people to take Arms for recovery of their lost liberty, as he first intended; he fearfully left the City, and fled towards Venice. So that before the people had notice of the accident, the heads of the Medices consulted together, and sent for Cosmo de Medicis dwelling in the Country with his mother (and then about 18 years of age) to be their Prince: as being next Heir-male which was left of the Family, according to the Entail (as our Lawyers call it) made by Charles the Emperour. This Cosmo proving an excellent Statesman, and a fortunate Commander, so swayed the affairs of Italy, that Philip the second of Spain to be assured of his friendship, gave him the Signeury of Sienna, out of which he had lately driven the French; and Pius the 4. had an intent to have crowned him King of Tuscany. But Philip of Spain (though otherwise his special friend) thwarted that intent, as loath to have in Italy any more Kings than himself. After in the year 1570 Pius the fifth crowned the said Cosmo in the Court of Rome, with the title of Great Duke of Tuscany, for him and his Heirs for ever. In the new Dukes Coronet he caused to be engraven these words, Pius quintus Pont. Max. ob eximiam dilectionem & religionis catholicæ zelum, præcipuamque justitiæ studium, donavit. Thus forward were these Popes to honour this Family; but their Successors have been otherwise affected to it. For when one of Duke Cosmo's Successors did since intreat a succeeding Pope, that he might be created King of Tuscany; the Pope not liking so Lordly a title, made answer, that he was content, He should be a King of Tuscany, but not King of Tuscany. A Scholar-like distinction, but not so satisfactory to the point proposed.

The length of this Eitate is 200 miles, the breadth in some places not much inferiour, but growing narrower where it bordereth upon that of Genoa. In all which tract, the Great Duke hath but one considerable Port on the main Land, which is that of Ligorn; so that his strength in shipping is not very great: and yet might be greater than it is, if the Subjects did delight in Traffick; and not suffer their Commodities to be bought by Strangers (as generally they do in all this Country) and carried thence in foreign Vessels. For otherwise being an indutrious people, and well trained in Manufactures, their power at Sea must needs be greater than it is: the Great Dukes Fleet consisting ordinarily of no more than twelve Gallies, two Gallions, and five Galliaelles. And for his power by Land, he hath in readiness sixteen thousand Foot of his own Subjects, well trained and mustered under experienced Commanders, to serve him upon all occasions; and a hundred men at Arms, and 400 Light-horsmen, well paid, as well in times of Peace as in time of War. And besides these, he keeps so many Forts and Towns in continual Garrison, that his Eitate is said to be made of Iron.

What the Revenues of it were in the Free-Estate, I am not able to determine. That they were very great is manifest, in that having in those five years, wherein they waged War against the Duke of Milain, spent three millions and an half of Florens; their Treasury was so far from being exhausted, that the next year they befieged and endangered the City of Luca. Since the altering of the Commonwealth into a Dukedom, and the addition of a Territory and City of Sienna; the Revenues of the Duke are conceived to be a million and an half of Ducats yearly. Of which 60000 Crowns are raised yearly out of the Dominion of the City of Florence; 15000 more out of that of Sienna: the customs arising out of the Port of Ligorn, amount yearly to 130000 Ducats, the toll of Millitones only unto 160000; that of Salt, Mines, and Iron, falls not short of that: in all a million and 200000 Ducats. Then hath the Duke his stock going amongst the Bankers, and trades as much as any in the way of Merchandizing; whereas in other Countries he loseth the privileges of a Nobleman, that betakes himself to Trade and Merchandize. He useth also to buy up almost all the Corn which is brought into the Country out of other parts, and sell it again at his own price; forbidding any to be sold till all his be vendid. The rest is made up by Excise upon all Commodities, even unto very Herbs, and Salads, which lies very heavy on the Subject, the poor especially: inasmuch that it was rarely paid, and perhaps not untruly, Qui sub Medicis vivit, misere vivit: infomach that it was rarely paid, and perhaps not untruly, Qui sub Medicis vivit, misere vivit; applying an old Rule in a new sense.

The only Order of Knighthood in this Empire, is that of St. Stephen, instituted by Cosmo di Medici; An. 1561. and dedicated to St. Stephen; because upon the Festival of Stephen, Pope and Martyr, being the 6. of August, he won the famous battel of Marciano. Pope Pius the fourth confirmed it the same year, and granted them all the priviledges which they of Malta enjoy: conditioned that those of this Order should make a vow of Chariy, of conjugal Chastity, and obedience. They are to be nobly born, and in lawful Wedlock; of the Romish Church; and without note of infamy. The Robe is of white Chamlet, with a red Crofs on their left side, as well upon their military Garments, as their wearing Cloaks: intended principally against the Turks and *Moor*s, for which cause fetled first at Pisa, being near the Sea; but after at Cosmopolis in the Isle of Illa. The number of them is uncertain, the Great Duke the Supream Master of it. Other Orders are commonly simple, but this mixt; being partly religious, partly honorary.

The Arms are Or, five Torteaux Gules, two, two, and one, and one in chief Azure, charged with three Flower de Lyces of the first.

The State of LUCA.

IN the West part of Tuscany, betwixt the Estate of the Great Duke, and the Common-wealth of Genoa, lieth the City of Lucca, so called from Lucumo, a King of the Tuscans, who is said to have built it: situate on the River Serchio, not far from the mountains of Luna, whence the Country is at this day called Lunagiana. It is about three miles in compass, and contains about 24000 Inhabitants, who generally are a courteous and modest people, men of good judgment, and discreet, and by their wisdoms have preserved themselves a free Common-wealth, notwithstanding the attempts of more powerful neighbours: and they are very industrious also, and well seen in Manufactures, especially in weaving Silks and cloth of Gold, which they taught the Florentines. The City seated in a plain, compassed with Mountains on all sides except towards Pisfoia: so strongly fortified by the help of Art and Nature, that this City, Zara in Dalmatia, Canea in the Isle of Candy, and the Town of Livorno, were thought in former times (when the Art of Fortification was less known) to be the four strongest Towns in the Christian World. The streets thereof are narrow, but paved with broad Free-stone, and most easily to walk on: the buildings very fair, built of Free-stone also, and beautified with stone, and pleasant Gardens. On the North-west stands a very strong Castle, near which lieth the Cathedral, pleasantly paved with Marble, but very dark, as most of the Popish Churches, to give the better colour to the burning of Tapers in the day.

N

In this Town was the meeting of the three great Captains, Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, so pernicious to the Roman Republick. For Pompey desirous to maintain his authority, Cæsar to get honour, and Crassus to encrease his wealth, here united their Counsels: Pompey's authority to be upheld by Cæsar's Arms, and Crassus his riches; Cæsar's continuance in his Province to be maintained by Pompey's power, and Crassus his money; and Crassus his estate to be secured by Pompey's greatness, and Cæsar's military reputation. This done, they made a partition of the Roman Provinces among themselves, assigning Gaul to Cæsar, Spain to Pompey, and to Crassus, Syria: which strong confederacy was the cause of that alteration which after followed in that State. For Crassus being slain not long after, Pompey and Cæsar wanting a third man to poize the balance, fell first to discontents, then to civil Wars; which at last made Cæsar Lord of Rome. Upon which meeting, and the breach which succeeded afterwards, was grounded that so memorated speech of Cicero, that is to say, Utinam Pompeius cum Cæsare societatem antequam iniisset, aut nunquam diremisset.

But to return again to the affairs of Luca, in the declining of the Empire, it became possessed by the Goths, from them recovered by Narses with the rest of Italy. After this it again followed the fortune of the Empire, till taken by Count Boniface, the Father of that notable Virago, the Countess Mathildis: who being deceased without issue, and the Emperours pretending to it as to an Escheat, the Citizens made a Common-purse, and bought their Liberty of the Emperour Rodolphus for 10000 Crowns. Some say the money was disbursed for them by a Cardinal. But notwithstanding this purchase and their title by it, the Emperour Lewis of Bavaria seized upon it again, under pretence of freeing it from the faction of Castruccio, who had made himself absolute Master of it. By a German Garrison there left, it was sold to the Genoese; and having passed through many hands, the Emperour Charles the fourth got it once again: of whom they once more purchased their desired Liberties, for 25000 Florens of Gold; and to secure themselves thereof, demolished the Castle built by Castruccio. But being not able to maintain it by their proper strength, they have put themselves under the protection of their Potent neighbours; changing their Patrons, as conduced most to their preservation: and finding no security from Genoa, and as little from Florence, both which they severally tried; they put themselves at last into the Protection of the Dukes of Millain, and in that right are patronized by the Kings of Spain.

The Territories of this City extend in compass eighty miles, the chief Town next to Luca it self, being that of Luni, a Bishops See; all the rest ordinary Farms and Villages, but of a good air, and very well peopled: which yield a Revenue to the publick Treasury of 80000 Crowns per annum; and out of which the State is able to raise (if there be occasion) about 15000 Foot, and 3000 Horse. A great strength for so small a Signiory, but all too weak to save them from the Great Dukes clutches, if he did seriously attempt to force it, and would venture on the displeasure of the Catholic King: besides that, it is thought that he receives more profit thence in gifts and presents, by letting it stand as it is; than it would yield (considering the charge of keeping it) if it were his own. As for the Government thereof, the principal Magistrature is called the Gonfalonere, changeable every second month; assisted by a certain and determinate number of Citizens, whom they change every sixth month also; during which time they live together in the Palace, or Common Hall. Other inferior Officers I insist not on. And for the Government of the Church, they have two Bishops only, which acknowledge the Archbishop of Florence for their Metropolitane.

The Commonwealth of GENOA.

Directly West of Tuscany, from which it is divided by the River Macra, lyeth the Country anciently called Liguria, now Riviera di Genoa, the coast of Genoa, because it lyeth all along the Sea of Genoa; and by some Il Genovesate, from Genoa the Metropolis of this Country and Commonwealth. A Commonwealth once of a larger reputation and authority, than it is at the present; commanding heretofore the Islands of Corfica, Sardinia, and the Baleares, in the Mediterranean; Lesbos, and Chio, with some others in the Greekish Seas; the Town of Capha, or Theodosia, in the Taurican Chersonese; Pera, on the other side of Constantinople; and a good part of Tuscany.

It was also then so strong both in men and shipping, that they sent seven several Armies to the Wars of

of the Holy Land: and in the space of three dayes only armed once upon occasion of present service, eight and fifty Gallies, and eight Pamphyli (being vessels of one hundred and forty, or one hundred and sixty Oars apiece;) and at another time, one hundred and sixty six Gallies, at a sudden pinch. By the advantage of this strength, they beat the Pisans out of Sardinia, Corfica, and the Baleares; compelling them to pay 135000 Crowns for their peace; they got a good share in the division of the Empire of Constantinople, when that City was taken by the Latins; and held a very strong hand over the Venetians. These last they had once in so great an exigence, having vanquished their Fleet at Sea, and taken the Island of Chioggia, not far from Venice; that the Senate sent them a blank Charter, bidding them write down what conditions they pleased, which should be readily condescended to. But Peter Doria, Admiral of the Genoan Fleet, unreasonably proud of his advantage, would have the City of Venice wholly at his own disposal. Whereupon the Venetians now made desperate, assailed the secure Genoese, and took an hundred of their Boats and Gallies. After which they always had the worst, losing their Islands in the Mediterranean to the Kings of Aragon; Capha, and Pera, with their Islands in the Greek Seas, to the Great Turk; most of their holds in Tuscany, to the Florentines: their power at the last being so broke by the Venetians, that in the end they were not able to set out a Navy fit for any enterprise. But these misfortunes were occasioned principally by their own divisions; the City being miserably torn in pieces by continual factions: first betwixt the Doria and Spinoli, on the one side, the Filigi and Grimaldi on the other, Anno 1174. Secondly, of the Negri and Mollani, against the Salvatici and Embrici, Anno 1289. Thirdly, between the Spinoli and Doria themselves, Anno 1336. And fourthly, between the Nobility and the Commons, 1339. Which Factions did so weaken them both at home and abroad, that having lost the greatest part of their Estate, they were fain to put themselves on the protection of their Neighbours to defend the rest; having now nothing left them but Liguria, and the Isle of Corfica.

LIGURIA hath on the West, the River Varus, rising about the edge of Provence in France; on the East, the River Macra, by which parted from Tuscany: on the North, the Apennine hills; and on the South, the Ligurian or Tyrrhenian Seas. It is in length an hundred and forty miles; that is to say, from the Port of Luna in the East, to that of Monaco in the West, which lyeth near to Provence; but the breadth not answerable to the length: and is divided generally into two parts or Provinces, the East, and the West, both centring upon Genoa the principal City.

The old Ligurians were a stout and Warlike Nation, light and swift of body, well practised in laying Ambushes, and not discouraged by any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight again: to which the Nature of their Country served them very well, being rough, mountainous, and woody, and full of straight and dangerous passages; and in this Tract few open Towns, but many well-fortified Castles, so that without much labour they could neither be taken nor besieged. And if at any time they were vanquished in the open field, they had recourse unto these Castles, and other Fastnesses, hemmed round about with Woods and Mountains; in which they plaid their after-game, and tired out their Enemies and Invaders. The principal of their Tribes were the Decenti, Oxili, Eubariades, and Inganni; all at last vanquished by the Romans, after the second Punic War: but not without much labour and pains, by reason of the Woods, Marshes, and Mountains, within and behind which they retired and saved themselves. Inasmuch that it was held a matter of more difficulty to find than to conquer them; Aliquanto major erat labor invenire quam vincere, are the words of my Author. They did divers times after this much molest the Romans, till at last Posthumius so disarmed them, that he scarce left them instruments to plough the Earth. So in the end they grew obedient to their Masters. In the division of whose large Territories by Augustus Cæsar, Liguria was made one of the eleven Regions of Italy; as it was also one of the seventeen Provinces, into which Italy was divided by the Emperour Constantine: Millain at that time the Metropolis or Head-City of it. What kind of men they were in the breaking of the Western Empire, may be known by their actions both by Sea and Land, spoken of before: now more added to Merchandize than War, but most of all to Usury. A Vice which the Christians learned of the Jews, and are now thought to equal, if not exceed their Teachers. It was the saying of a merry fellow, that in Christendom there were neither Scholars enough, Gentlemen enough, nor Jews enough. And when Answer was made, that of all these there was rather too great a plenty than any scarcity; he replied, that if there were Scholars enough, so many would not be double or treble benefited; if Gentlemen enough, so many Peasants would not be ranked among the Gentry; and if Jews enough, so many Christians would not profess Usury. The women are very fair and comely, wearing for the most their hair in tresses which they call over their backs: they wear no upper Garments but of cloth, as being only allowed by the Laws; but their under Garments of the purest stuff. The women here are privileged above all in Italy, having free leave to talk with whom they will, and be courted by any that will, both privately and publicly. Which liberty it is likely they gained at such time as the French were Masters of this Estate; who do allow their wives such excess of liberty, as no Italian would allow of in a common Cortezan. And though it cannot be affirmed, that the women of the Country or the City it self, do abuse this liberty, yet the Italians being generally of a different humour, reckon them to be past all shame; as they esteem the Genoan Merchants, (who make little reckoning of their promises, if not bound by writing) to be men without faith. Of which and other things concerning this Estate, they have made this Proverb, Montagne senza legni, &c. that is to say, Mountains without wood, Seas without fish, Men without faith, and Women without shame.

The Country, as before said, is very mountainous in the In-lands, and full of craggy rocks towards the Sea: so that by Sea and Land it is very ill travelling. But amidst those Hills are Vallies as rich a vein, as most others in Italy, abounding in Citrons, Limons, Olives, Oranges, and the like fruits; with such variety of Flowers at all times of the year, that the Markets are seldom unfurnished of them in the month of December. It yieldeth also great plenty of most pleasant wines, which the Inhabitants call La Vermazza; and another which they call Le lagrime di Christo, or Lachryma Christi: this last so pleasing to the taste, that it is said, a Dutchman tasting of it as he travelled in these parts, fetcht a great sigh, and brake out into this expression; How happy had it been with us, Si Christus lachrymatu esset in nostris Regionibus, if CHRIST had shed some of his tears in the Country of Germany! Their greatest want is that of Corn, and therewith they do supply themselves out of other places.

The principal Towns and Cities of it in the Eastern part, are, 1 Savona, a strong Fortrefs against the Florentines, and one of the best pieces of this Republick. 2 Pontremuli (Pons Remuli, as the Latins call it) of as great consequence as that, but possessed by the Spaniards. 3 Lerici, an Haven in the Tuscan or Tyrrhenian Sea. 4 Sestri, a reasonable good place, remarkable for as white bread, and as pleasant wine, as any in Italy. 5 Fino, a Haven or Port Town, not far from Genoa, anciently called Portus Delphinus. Few of the Towns in this part are of any greatness: but they are set so thick, and intermingled with so many goodly houses both on the hills and the vallies, that for the space of twenty miles, the whole Country seems to be one continual building.

In the west part the Towns of most importance are, 1 Monaco, of old called Monocem, and Portus Herculis, beautified with a commodious Haven: belonging not long since to the Spaniards, who bought it for 100000 Crowns of the Grimaldi then its proper Owners, but of late gotten by the French under colour of a later contract. 2 Ventimiglia, a good Town, and sweetly seated. 3 Savona, taken by the Genoese, Anno 1250. before which time it had a Prince of its own. Remarkable for the interview betwixt Ferdinand the Catholic, and Lewis the 12th. of France, Anno 1507. Who having been deadly enemies, upon the taking of the Realm of Naples from the French by the Spaniards, met at this Town, and here most strangely relied upon one another: Lewis first boarding Ferdinand's Gallie; and Ferdinand for divers days feasting with Lewis in this Town then in his possession, as Protector of the Estate of Genoa. Which kind of interviews (I note this only by the way) as they chance but seldom; so when they do, they prove for the most part dangerous unto one of the parties: great enmities not being easily forgot by persons of a publick Interest. Nay, that notable Statesman Philip de Comines utterly disliked all such meetings of Princes, though in amity and good correspondence with one another; as many times producing effects quite contrary to their expectations. And this he proveth by the example of Lewis the 11th. of France, and Henry of Castile; who meeting purposely, Anno 1463. to change some friendly words together, took such dislike at each others person and behaviour, that they never loved one another after it. The like example he bringeth of an interview betwixt Edward the fourth of England, and the same King Lewis: and betwixt Fredrick the Emperour, and Charles Duke of Burgundy; with divers others. His reasons I purposely omit, as not pertinent to my present undertaking, and make haste again unto the Town; which is about a mile and an half in circuit, and hath many stately buildings in it. It was called anciently Sabate or Sabatia, and hath been under the command of divers Lords: being taken from the Genoese by the Visconti, and the Sforzas, Dukes of Milain, from them by the French, and at last recovered again by those of Genoa. I further note, that this one Town hath yielded to the Church of Rome three Popes, viz. Gregory the 7th. Julio the 2d. and Sixtus the 4th. which is as much as Genoa it self can brag of. 4 Nola, upon the Sea side, a commodious Haven. 5 Finali, a goodly Port Town also, and very well fortified; honoured a long time with the title of a Marquise, one of the seven founded by the Emperour Otho, (of which more hereafter;) but taken from the last Marquess by the Count of Fuenter, then Governour of Milain for the King of Spain, and garrisoned immediately with 200 Spaniards, the poor Marquess being put off with an Annual Pension, Anno 1602. 6 Milefino, a small Town adjoining upon the same right by the Spaniards also; who by these pieces hath a strong command on the Trade of Genoa. 7 But the great Ornament of those parts of Italy, is the City of Genoa, first built, say some, by Jannus the son of Saturn; as others say, by Jannus Genius Priscus, an Italian or Tuscan King. But by whomsoever it was built, certain it is, that it was miserably destroyed by Mago the brother of Annibal, repaired by Lucretius Sulpicius, at the command of the Senate of Rome, for whose cause and quarrel it was ruined: once again spoiled and wasted by Rotharis a great Prince of the Lombards, Anno 660. or thereabouts; but built more beautiful than before by Charles the Great. On his Foundation it now stands, situate on the shore of the Ligurian or Ligurian Seas, to which, being partly built on the declivity of an hill, full of stately Palaces, it giveth a most pleasant and magnificent prospect. It is in compass six miles, of an orbicular form, fortified towards the Sea by Art; towards the Land by Art and Nature, there being but one way to come to it by Land, and that over steep and craggy Rocks. The streets are narrow, paved with Flint, and most of them on the sides of the hill; which is the reason that they use Horse-litters here in stead of Coaches, and most of the better sort are carried on mens shoulders in Sedans or Chairs: which from hence came hither into England. But that which they call La Strada Nuova, or the New-street, reaching from the West to North-east, is of a very fair breadth: each house whereof is built with such Kingly magnificence, that it is thought to be the fairest street in the World. In all the rest the buildings for the height of two stories are made of Marble, curiously wrought; but the Laws forbid Marble to be used any higher. The Haven of it is very fair and capacious, safe from the violence of Tempests, and well fortified: so that the Spaniards use to say, that were the Catholic King absolute Lord of Marseilles in Provence, and Genoa in Italy, he might command the whole world. After the re-edifying of it by Charles the Great, the people here continued subject to his Successors; till the Berengarii, as Kings of Italy, made them free, Anno 899. in which condition they remained till the year 1318. when being shrewdly weakened in their Estate, they were fain to give themselves to Pope John the 2d. after to Robert King of Naples. But being being soon weary of a foreign Government, the people in a popular tumult made choice of one Simon Bocca Negra, to be their Duke, Anno 1339. which Government continued till the French were called in by the Guelfian Faction, in the reign of Charles the 7th. under whom they continued thirteen years; and then expelling thence the French for their many insolencies, they put themselves under the protection of the Dukes of Milain, Anno 1403. Long time they lived under the protection of those Princes, in great tranquility, who never carried towards them any rigorous hand; save that once D. Lodowick Sforza exacted of them a great mass of money. But as the tale goeth, his Agent being invited to the house of a Genoese, and walking in a Garden with him, was shewed an herb growing there called Basil, which stroaking gently, he smelt thence a most pleasing savour, but as unfavourable a smell when he strained it hard. The Genoese hereupon inferred, Sir, if our Lord Duke Lodowick will gently stroke the hand of his puissance over this City, it will prove pliant to him by obedience; but may chance to prove rebellious, if he do oppress it. But Lodowick being taken prisoner by King Lewis the 12th. they first came under the command of the French, and then of the Spaniards; according as those Nations had possession of the State of Milain; and after many changes and alterations, obtained again their freedom of King Francis the first. Which being not able to preserve by their proper strength, they finally put themselves under the shelter of the Spaniards, who is now their Protector, and that not for nought; he being indebted to them, Anno 1600. a Million and a half of Gold; that being the remainder of 18 Millions, cut off by the Popes Authority; that so the King might be indebted to that See; for most of his Lands were formerly engaged to the Money-Masters of this City. The same course of non-payment the King took with the rest of his Creditors in Florence, Ausburg, and the rest, insomuch that it was commonly said in Italy, that the King of Spain had made more ill faces upon the Exchange in one day, than Michael Angelo the famous Painter, had ever made good in all his life. And thus you see this great City which commanded the Ocean, the Lady of so many Islands, and a great Moderator of the affairs of Italy, fain to put her self into the protection of a foreign Prince; and that too at the charge of a great deal of Treasure; which he continually raiseth from them in the way of Loan, of which he often proves but a sorry Pay-master. And if the Wars he had with England did so drain their purses (for it was that War, and the War which he had in the Netherlands, that made him so indebted to the Banks of Genoa) no question but the revolt of Catalogne, and the lasting Wars made against him by the French in so many places, have plunged him in as deep as ever. Which notwithstanding this people do so thrive under his protection, and draw so great commodity from their Trade with Spain, that it is thought their private men were never richer, the publick Treasury never fuller then it is at the present.

CORSICA is an Island in the Ligurian or Ligurian Sea, opposite to the City of Genoa, from whence it is distant about sixty miles; and lying just North of the Isle of Sardinia, from which it is distant seven miles. It comprehends in length an hundred and twenty miles, seventy in breadth, and three hundred twenty five in circuit; and lyeth under the fifth Climate, the longest day being almost fifteen hours.

The people are stubborn, poor, unlearned; supposed to be more cruel than other Nations, and so affirmed to be by Cesar his Book of Commentaries; the Progeny, as some say, of the 52 daughters of Thespius, who being all got with child in one night by Hercules, were by their Father put to the mercy of the Sea; by which they were brought unto this Island, after peopled by them. From one of these sons named Cyrnus, the Island had the name of Cyrnos, by which it oftentimes occurreth in some old Greek Writers. This is the conceit of Fabius Pictor, one of Annian his Authors. And that of Eusebius, a far more credible Writer, is not much unlike, who will have it called Corsica from a woman so named, dwelling in the coast of Liguria; who following her Bull hither, was the first that discovered it. But these Originals I look on, the first especially, as the worst kind of Romances: the name of Cyrnos being more like to be derived from the Punic Keranos, which signifies a horn or corner, by reason of the many Promontories with which it shoots into the Sea. Corsica insula multis promontoriis angulosa est, as it is in Isidore, Lib. 15. cap. 6. And for the name of Corsica, I should derive it rather from the Corfi (by which name the Inhabitants hereof are called in most Latin Writers) one of the two Nations of most note in the neighbouring Island of Sardinia. Celeberrimi in ea populi Balari, & Corfi, as we find in Pliny. Which Corfi, or some of them, being overborn by some new Invaders (which the Island of Sardinia was seldom free of) were fain to shift their seat, and came over hither.

This Country yieldeth excellent Dogs for game, good Horses, fierce Mastiffs; and a beast called Mus-fol, not found in Europe, excepting in this Island, and Sardinia only, but there called Alufones, or Alufriances, (for I conceive they are the same under divers names) said to be horned like Rams, and skinned like Stags; which skin is of such incredible hardness, that the beast being cast headlong against a Rock, receives no hurt, but nimble flies from his Enemy to his den.

The soil by reason of the mountains (which every where are too thick and barren in it) is not very fruitful; producing Corn in less plenty, but the best Wines, and such as the old Romans well relished, in good measure. It produceth also Oyl, Figs, Raisins, and Honey: the first three in a mediocrity of goodness, the last somewhat bitter, and by many deemed unwholesome. It aboundeth also with Alum, Box-tree, Iron Mines, and the Tree called Taxus, whose poisonous Berries, though in taste pleasing, are much fed on by Bees; and therefore thought to be the cause of the bitterness of the Honey. In some few places where the Rivers have their currents, especially towards Liguria; it recompenseth by its fertility in bearing all manner of grain, the barrenness of the mountains. Which mountains cutting through the midst it, divide the whole Island into Cismontanum, being that towards Genoa; and Transmontanum, lying towards Sardinia; yet so, that the people on each side call themselves the Cis- montanes, and the other the Tramontanes. Both of them speak a corrupt Italian, in which there is not a little mixture of French and Spanish.

For Rivers, there are none of note, the principal of those which the Island yields, being called Gelo, and Travignano. And as for Cities, some of the Ancients reckoned 33, which Strabo doth conceive to be Castles only; there being but four Towns or Cities in it in his time: of which four, two were Roman Colonies, the one planted by Marinus, called Mariana; the other by L. Sylla, in the Town called Alleria; a place of some Antiquity before that time, and at this day a Bishops See. But now the place of most importance, is the Town of Bastia, seated in the North-east part of the Island, opposite almost unto Alleria; with a commodious Haven to it, and a strong Garrison to defend it: as being the ordinary seat of the Governour sent thither from Genoa; and of the Bishop of Alleria, who makes there his residence. 2. Aiazze, a reasonable strong Town, and a Bishops See; and so is also 3. Nebbia, called Cheridenza. 2. Aiazze, a reasonable strong Town, and a Bishops See; and so is also 3. Nebbia, called Cheridenza. Then there is 4. Porto Vecchio, built not long since in the place of an old decayed Haven, and peopled by a Colony sent from Genoa. 5. St. Florence, a Port-town in the Northern part in the midst betwixt Nebbia and Mariana: and 6. St. Boniface, called by Ptolomy, Portus Syracusanus, just opposite unto it in the South corner of the Isle; both of them places of good safety, and capable of the greatest vessels that frequent those Seas.

Who were the first Inhabitants is not easily known. That the Phœnicians or Tyrians had some footing here, is manifest by that of Callimachus an old Greek Poet, who calleth it Ἰσολία Κίπῳ, the Phœnician Cymus; and by that of Diodorus Siculus, affirming that the Carthaginians and Tyrrheni (which questionless he mistook for Tyrii) call the Phœnices out of this Island. But whether these Phœnices did first inhabit it, or only had a Colony in some part thereof, is not demonstrable from those Authors. The Carthaginians after this made a conquest of it, and held it till the time of the first Punic War; when they were driven thence by the valour of Cornelius Scipio. Yet was it not totally subdued, nor brought into the form of a Roman Province, till some time after; when it was fully conquered by C. Papirius, A.P.C. 541. This Island and Sardinia at the first being joyned together, and governed by one Prætor only; but afterwards made two distinct Provinces, immediately subject to the Præfect of the City of Rome, and consequently members of the Roman Patriarchate. In the falling of the Roman Empire, it became a prey unto the Vandals, who used to send their condemned persons out of Africa thither, to fell Timber for shipping; the Country even till then being very much over-grown with woods. Afterwards with the rest of the Islands of the Mediterranean, it was under the power of the Saracens, against whom Ademar the Count or Governour of Genoa armed a Fleet of Gallies, and vanquished them in a fight at Sea, but lost his life in the action: which notwithstanding the Genoese followed their good fortune, seized on the Island, and carried thence 13 of the Enemies Ships. The Pisans after this got possession of it, but being vanquished by the Genoese in the fight near Giglio (before mentioned) they were fain to leave it to the Conquerours. Since that it hath always followed the fortune of Genoa, save that it remained somewhat longer than that City did in the hand of the French, who in the year 1554, seized on it by the aid of the Turks, whom (to the great dishonour of Christianity) they entertained in their wars against Charles the fifth; but in the end, restored it to the Common-wealth, upon the peace made betwixt France and Spain, Anno 1559. And for securing of this Island to the State of Genoa, they fell upon this handsome project: employing none but natural Genoese to serve in the Garrisons of the Island, the better to keep under this untractable people; and filling all their Garrisons upon the Continent with natural Corficans, whereby the Island is unfurnished of its ablest men, who also serve for hostages of the publick faith.

Having thus took a brief view of the several parts and members of this Common-wealth, let us next look upon the whole, as to the Government, Forces, and Revenue of it. First for the Government, the principal of their Magistracies hath the name of Duke; as titular as the Duke of Venice, but of less esteem: that Duke continuing in his Office for term of life, but this being alterable and removed at the two years end. So that he may be called most properly the Mayor of Genoa. For these two years he dwells in the publick Palace, and hath 500 Germans for the Guard of his person; in nothing like a Prince but that: and for that time, he alone hath the power of propounding any thing to the Senate, which carrieth some resemblance of a Negative voice. His time expired, he returns unto his house as a private person, but so, that during life he hath the office of a Procurator in the Common-wealth. To him there are assistant eight principal Officers, who sit upon the same Form with him, and continue in their Office for two years also; which eight, together with the Duke, are called the Signeury: but he and they in matters of most weight and moment, subordinate to the General Council, consisting of 400 persons, all of them Gentlemen of the City; who with the nine before remembered do constitute the body of the Common-wealth. Under this form they have continued ever since by the power and goodness of Andreas Doria (who might have made himself their Prince) they were discharged of their subjection to the French, Anno 1528. never in danger of relapsing to their former servitude, but in the reasonable practice of the Elischi, a remarkable Family of the City; who hoping to possess themselves of the Principality under protection of the French, had so laid their plot, that Augustine di Elischi, who was designed to be their Duke, had in the night time seized on the Navy, and slain John Doria who had the command thereof. But leaping from one Gallie to another to make sure of all, stumbled and fell into the Sea, where he and his ambitious treasons were both drowned together.

As for their Forces, there are within the Signeury 10000 men ready to arm at any time, as they see occasion; 25 Gallies always ready in the publick Arsenal, and four continually at Sea for defence of their Trading. Sufficient strength to save them from a petty force, though not to guard them from the power of a strong Invader. But the chief strength which they rely on, is the King of Spain; whose whose protection, though it costs them dear, is worth their money; and they have prospered so well by it, that notwithstanding all the losses which they have sustained, it is supposed that the Revenue of the Common-wealth (besides the Treasury of S. George, which is very rich, and managed as a distinct body from the Publick, by its own Officers) amounteth to no less than 430000 Crowns per annum.

As for the Treasury of S. George, though it contain no part of the publick Patrimony, but be governed by its own Officers, as a State distinct: yet is it of such ready use, so able at all times to furnish the Republick with vast sums of money; that the security and preservation of this Common-wealth depends much upon it. The Institution and Administration whereof, together with the benefit which from hence redoundeth unto this Estate, I cannot better present to the Readers view, than in the words of Machiavel the greatest Politick of his times; who in his History of Florence hath expressed it thus. "Post distinsum illud bellum quod Genoveses multis abhinc annis cum Venetis gesserunt, &c. After that tedious War between the Genoese and Venetians was ended in the year 1381. and that the Genoese found themselves unable to repay those moneys, which they had taken up of their private Citizens in pursuance thereof, they thought it best to assign their ordinary Taxes over to them, that so in tract of time the whole debt might be satisfied; and for that end allotted them a Common Hall, there to deliberate and determine of their affairs. These men thus made the Masters of the publick Taxes, elect among themselves a Common-Council of an hundred; and over them eight Officers of especial power, to order and direct the rest, and to dispose of the Intrade: which Corporation so established, they entitled St. Georges Bank. It happened afterward, that the Republick wanting more moneys, was glad to have recourse unto St. George; who growing wealthy by the orderly managing of his stock, was best able to relieve them in their necessities: and as before they assigned their Taxes over to him, so now, ditionem suam oppignorabant, they Mortgaged all their Deniain. So that St. George continually waxing richer, and the State poorer, this Corporation became possessed at last, of almost all the Towns and Territories of the Common-wealth: all which they governed by their own Magistrates, chosen by common suffrage from among themselves. It followed hereupon, that the common People bearing less respect unto the Publick, applied themselves unto St. George: this being always orderly and prudently governed, that many times inclining to Tyranny: this never changing Officers, or form of Government, that subject to the proud ambitious lusts of each Usurper, whether Domestical or Foreign. Inasmuch that when the two potent Families of the Fregosi and Adorni, contended for the Sovereignty in this Estate, most of the People looked upon it as a Quarrel which concerned them not: St. George not meddling more in it, than to take an Oath of the prevailing Faction, to preserve his liberties. Rarissimo sane exemplo, &c. A most excellent and rare thing (saith he) never found out by any of the old Philosophers in their imaginary Forms of a Common-wealth: that in the same State, and the same People, one may see at the same time, both Tyranny and Liberty, Justice and Oppression, Civility and Misgovernments: This only Corporation preserving in the Common-wealth its ancient lustre. So that in case St. George should in the end become possessed of the remainder of the Patrimony and Estate thereof, as it is possible it may; the State of Genoa might not alone be equalled with that of Venice, but preferred before it. So far, and to this purpose that great Master of State-craft; a man of less impiety, and more regular life, than some of those who have traduced him for an Atheist.

The Estates of LOMBARDIE.

LOMBARDIE is bounded on the East with Romandiola, and the Estate or Territory of Ferrara; on the West, with that part of the Alpes, which divides Italy from France; on the North; (reckoning Marca Trevigiana within the bounds hereof) with that part of the Alpes which lyeth towards Germany; and on the South, with the Apennine, which parteth it from Liguria, or the State of Genoa.

It was called anciently Gallia Cisalpina, whereof we shall speak more anon; and took this new name from the Lombards, or Longobardi, a people of Germany (of whom we have already spoken, but shall speak more at large when we come to Hungary;) who coming out of Pannonia possessed themselves of a great part of Italy, but left their name to this Tract only. A tract of ground of which it may be truly said, that as Italy is the garden of Europe, so Lombardy is the garden of Italy, or the fairest flower in all that garden. A Country of so rich a mixture, that such another piece of ground for beautiful Cities, goodly Rivers, for Fields and Pastures shaded with such excellent fruits, for plenty of Fowl, Fish, Corn, and Wine, cannot be found again in our Western World. So that it is no wonder, that the two great Kings of France and Spain, have strived so eagerly and with such an effusion of Christian blood for the Dutchy of Milain, a part only (though the richest part) of this goodly Country; and but a poor of Earth compared to their own Dominions.

Anciently it was of more extent than now it is, containing besides the Principalities hereafter mentioned, the Provinces of Romandiola, and Trevigiana; even all, which in the infancy and growth of the Roman Empire, had the name of Gallia Cisalpina: called Gallia from the Galls, who being drawn over over the Alpes by the taste of the sweet Italian Wines, in the time of Tarquinius Priscus King of Rome, under the conduct and command of Belovesus son of Ambigatus Kings of the Celte, subdued the Natives, and possessed themselves of all the Country, from the West parts of the Tuscan Sea and Apennine hills to the Adriatick; and from the Alpes to the River Rubicon on the North-east, and the River Arno on the South-east. Cisalpine was called because it lay on that side of the Alpes which was next to Rome, to difference it from Gallia on the other side of the Mountains, which had the name of Transalpine. It was also called Gallia Togata, because the people of it being civilized, conformed themselves to the Roman habit: that on the other side of the Alpes being called Braccata, because they kept themselves to their former Mantles (resembling those now worn by the vulgar Irish) which by the Latines were called Bracca. For though the word Bracca in some of our common Dictionaries be rendered Gally-slops or Breeches (and possibly the word Breeches may be thence derived) which made me conceive that the habit heretofore of those Galls was a kind of Trowsers, such as those usually worn by the Irish Foot-men: yet when I find in approved Authors, that it was Tunica Sago imposita, a Garment which they wore over their Coats and Cassocks, I conceive I had good reason to translate it otherwise.

They were generally divided into four great Nations, that is to say, 1. The Insulres, inhabiting from the Alpes to the River Arno, and consequently spreading over the Dukedoms of Millaine, Parma, Modena, Adrianus, Piemont, and some part of the Dukedom of Florence: 2. The Cenomani who lay next the Insulres possessing the greatest part of Trevigiana: 3. The Boii, taking up the rest of Trevigiana, with the Dukedom of Ferrara, and so much of Romandiola as lyeth on the North-west side of the River Rubicon: 4. The Senones who passing over the Rubicon inhabited the rest of Romandiola and the Dukedom of Urbine. Of these the Senones (or Sennones as Ptolomie calls them) were of greatest fame. These were the men that under the conduct of Brennus, having defeated the Roman Armies at the battle of Allia, followed their victory unto Rome, which they sacked and burned: nothing made good in all the City but the Capitol only, which also had been taken by them, ni Anseres diis dormientibus vigilassent, as S. Augustine scoffs it, if the Geese had not been more watchful than their Gods, or Guards. Failing herein they compounded for 1000 pound weight of Gold to forsake the City: but before the money was received, they were assaulted by Camillus, driven out of the Town and vanquished in a set battle, about eight miles off; who is therefore called Romes second Founder. This happened, Anno V.C. 364. Vanquished again at the River Aniene, by T. Quintius the Dictator; and after that Anno V.C. 404. by the said Camillus, being then 80 years of age, in the Pontine fields: they got the Boii to assist them, and after joyned with the Samites, Tuscans, and other Nations in a common War. But being for the most part beaten, and the War carried to their own doors a little before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italy, by M. Curius, the Consul: they were by him driven out of their own Country; and finally so slaughtered by Dolabella at the Lake of Adimion, Anno V.C. 470. that there was scarce any left of all that Nation, to brag that any of their Ancestors had set fire on Rome.

The Senones being thus destroyed, the Romans suffered the rest of the Gallick Nations to remain in quiet till the end of the first Punic War, when being grown of more strength, and at very good leisure, they took up Arms against the Boii, who fearing the like fortune as the Senones had found before, called to their aid both the Insulrians and Transalpines; making in all an Army of 50000 Foot, and 20000 Horse. Anno V.C. 528. Discomfited by Emilius the Roman Consul, near Telamon a City of Tuscany, with the slaughter of 40000 of their men; they were set upon in their own Country shortly after by the Consul Flaminius, vanquished and mulcted with the loss of one half thereof: most of them after this disaster passing into Germany, where we are like to hear more of them. And for the Insulres and the Cenomani, being thus left unto themselves (the remainders of the Transalpines excepted only) they were invaded the next year after, (Anno V.C. 431.) under the Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus and Cornelius Scipio: to whom upon the loss of their Armies, and some of their best Towns, they did yield themselves: the Romans so becoming Masters of all this Country. And yet it was accomplished as a Province distinct from Italy, until the settling of the Empire in Augustus Caesar, who dividing Italy into eleven Regions, made three of them out of this Cisalpine; that is to say, Gallia, Venetia, and Italia Transpadana: as afterwards it made up four of the seven Provinces of the Diocesi of Italy, according to the distribution of it which was made by Constantine. How it came with the rest of Italy into the power of the Lombards, and how from them taken by the French, with the rest of that Kingdom, hath been shewn already. Won by the French, and from the French transferred with the Empire to the Kings of Germany; it did so far preserve the reputation of a Kingdom, that the Emperours were sometimes Crowned at Millain with an Iron Crown for the Kingdom of Lombardy: as at Aken (a Town of Cleveland) with a silver Crown for the Realm of Germany: and with a golden Crown at Rome, for the sacred Empire. But the Emperour being weakened by the Artifices of the Popes of Rome, this goodly Country was torn from it; and parcelled in conclusion, amongst many Princes, as it still continueth.

The Lombards being Masters of it, and having given it their own name, divided it by the River Po, into Longobardia Cispadana, lying betwixt the Po and the Apennine Mountains: and Transpadana, lying betwixt the Po and the Alpes: the first of which the old Romans called Emilia, from Emilius Lepidus, the Founder of the City of Reggio (then called Regium Lepidi) once Proconsul of it. In the division of Italy by Augustus Caesar it had the name of Gallia. The other was by him honoured with the name of Italia Transpadana, by which name it was known in the times of Tacitus; and by him called, Florentissimum Italia latus, the most flourishing part of all Italy. But this division being long since worn out of use, and the whole Country being cantoned into many Estates, as before was said; we we will consider it at the present as it stands divided into the Dukedoms of Millain and Mantua, which with Trevigiana, described already, make up Transpadana: and those of Modena, Parma, and Monteferrat, which with the Principate of Piemont, make up Cispadana.

W Millain.

The Dukedom of MILLAIN.

THE Dukedom of MILLAIN hath on the East, the Estates of Mantua and Parma; on the West, Piemont, and some part of Switzerland, one of the Provinces of the Alpes; on the North, Marca Trivigiana; and on the South, the Apennine which parteth it from Liguria, or the State of Genoa. In elder times the habitation of the Insulres, originally a Tribe of the Hedui inhabiting in those parts of the Gallia beyond the Alpes, which now make up the Dukedom of Burgundie: but crossing the Mountains with the rest of the Gallick Nation spoken of before, they settled here, built the City of Millain, and finally became one of the greatest Tribes of the Cisalpine Galls: from thence this Country hath the name of Insulbria Ducatus in some of the nearer Modern Writers; but commonly is called Ducatus Mediolanensis, from Mediolanum, or Millain, the chief City of it.

Principal Rivers of it, 1. Padus, 2. Addua, 3. Ollus, and 4. Ticino; of which somewhat hath been said already; and besides those it hath also in it the Lake called anciently Lacus Larius, but now Lago di Como (from the City of Como which it neighboureth) 60 miles in length.

The chief Cities and places of note are, 1. Modocum, not far from Millain, of more fame than greatness; the fame thereof arising from the Iron Crown (kept in a Monastery here) wherewith some of the Emperours have been crowned by the Archbishops of Millain. A custom taken up from the Kings of the Ostrogothes, who are said to have first used the same, in testimony that they had won their Estates by Iron. 2. Pavia, or Papia, seated on the Flood Ticino, united to Millain by John Galeazzo, the first Duke thereof; made an University by Charles the fourth, Anno 1361. and famous for the battle, in which Francis the first of France was taken prisoner by Charles the fifth, Anno 1525. It is seated, as before was said, on the Flood Ticino, about four miles from the Po, or Padus: the River carrying at this City so great a breadth, that the Bridge over it is no less than 200 walking paces long; built of Free-stone, and covered over head with a roof supported all along with Pillars. From this River the City it self was anciently called Ticinum; and took the name of Papia from its great affection to the Popes; or as some say, quasi Patria piorum (the two first syllables of those words being joyned together) by reason of the many godly men it did produce. It lyeth in length from East to West, a new fair street dividing it in the very midst: on the West side whereof are two handsome Market-places, and a strong Castle built by Valentius the first Duke of Millain; whose Tomb, together with that of Luithprandus King of the Lombards, are here still remaining; the Kings of Lombardy being so pleased with the situation of the place, that they made it the Seat-royal of their Kingdom. The Cathedral here is one of the best endowed in Italy, if not in Europe; the Revenues of it amounting to 300000 Crowns per annum. 3. Como, the Birth-place of both the Plinies; a rich and handsome Town situate on the South side of the Lacus Larius, which from this Town hath now the name of Lago di Como: into which Lake and through it runs the Addua, and yet the waters do not mingle: that of the River passing over those of the Lake. About this Lake are many fair houses and handsome Villages, which do much beautify the place; and in the midst thereof an Island called Comacina, in which there was a strong Fortrefs in former times, wherein the Longobardian Kings did preserve their Treasury. 4. Lodi, or Lauda in the Latin, seated in a prosperous soyl, and blessed with a painful and industrious people. 5. Novara, situate upon an high hill, in which live many ancient and noble Families: of right belonging to the Spaniard, as Dukes of Millain; but at the time when Maginus wrote, consigned over upon some conditions to the Dukes of Parma. But this Town though it appertained to the Dukes of Millain, is situate within the Dukedom of Montferat; and so is 6. Alexandria also, once a poor small Village, known by the name of Roboretum, from a Grove of Oaks adjoining to it: afterwards being raised to its present greatness, by the joyned purses of the Citizens of Cremona, Millain, and Placentia, in honour of the Emperour it was called Cæsarea. But in short time these people siding with the Popes, drew on themselves the anger of the Emperour Frederick Barbarossa: who having in a manner desolated the City of Millain, the people thereof at the destruction of the City; retired to this Town; calling it in honour of Pope Alexander the third, whose part they then took against the Emperour, by the name of Alexandria, which it still retaineth. It is now the strongest outwork of the whole Duchy, well fortified against all assaults and batteries, which may come from France. 7. Marignano, situate South from Millain, remarkable for the great defeat here given the Switzers, by King Francis the first; and now the title of a Marquess. 8. Cremona, situate on the Banks of the River Po, in a very rich and healthy soyl; an ancient Colony of the Romans, but a beautiful City to this day; and of such fidelity to its Prince, that it hath got the name of Cremona the faithful. It was built in the first year of the second Punic War, and burnt to the ground by Vespasian Souldiers, after the defeat of Pitellius his Forces: which defeat was given under the Walls of this Town. For when Antoninus Vespasian General, first after his Victory entred into it, he went into a Bath to wash away the sweat and blood from his body: where finding the water somewhat too cold, he said by chance, that it should anon be made hotter. Which words the Souldiers applying to their greedy desires, set fire on the Town; and spent four days in the pillage of it. By the encouragement of Vespasian it was again

Millain. again re-edified, and is now grown famous for the high Tower; from which the by-word, Una turris in Cremona, unus Petrus in Roma, unus portus in Ancona. 9 Millain, a fair Town, once the Metropolis of the Province of Liguria, and afterwards of the whole Diocese of Italy; called therefore Milvianus & Imilias, the Metropolis or Mother City of Italy, as Dionysius one of the B Shops hereof is called the Metropolis of Italy by St. Athanasius. At this time the fairest and the biggest of all Lombardy, having a Castle so strongly fortified, with natural and artificial Ramparts, that it is deemed impregnable. A City very populous, containing 200000 persons; and of great trade, here being private shops equalling the publick Store-houses of other places; the people consequently so rich, that the wife of every mechanic will flant it in her silks and taffeties. This City is said to have been built by the Galls, 359 years before Christ. It is seven miles in circuit, and honoured with an University, wherein flourished Hermolani Barbarus, Calius Rhodiginus, and Cardanus. Seated it is in as commodious a soyl as any in Italy, environed with water by two great channels; the one drawn from the River of Addua, the other from the Tesio or Athesio; which run hard by it, and convey all things to the City in so great abundance, that things there are at very cheap rates; and add much also to the industry of the Inhabitants in the vending and dispersing of their Manufactures, which are of great esteem in most parts of the World. The buildings of the City generally are fair and stately, but three especially commended for their magnificence; that is to say, the Castle, the Hospital, and the Cathedral. For matter of Religion it doth use to glory, that Barnabas the Apostle was its first Bishop, and St. Ambrose one of his Successors; that formerly their Bishop stood on even terms with the Popes of Rome, and their Church as much privileged as that; and that since those times they have given unto the World four Popes, that is to say, Alexander the 2^d. Urban the 3^d. Celestine the 5th. and of late, Gregory the 14th.

As for the fortunes of it, it continued in the power of the French, and the Kings of Italy of that Nation, from the destruction of the Lombards, till the Kingdom of Italy fell from the house of Charles the Great, and came at last into the hands of the German Emperours. Under them it continued till the time of Frederick Barbarossa, from whose obedience it revolted Anno 1161. in behalf of Pope Alexander the third; the Emperour divers times defacing the City, and the people still ministring fresh occasions of dislike and quarrel. Beatrice the wife of Frederick, coming to see the City, without any ill intentions to it; was by the irreverent people first imprisoned, and then most barbarously used. For setting her upon a Mule, they turned her face towards the tail, which they made her hold in stead of a bridle; and having thus shewed her up and down the City, they brought her unto one of the gates, and there kicked her out. To revenge this horrible affront, the Emperour besieged and forced the Town; adjudging all the people to die without mercy, but such as would undergo this ransom. Between the buttocks of a skittish and kicking Mule, there was fattened a bunch of Figs; one or more of which, such as desired to live must snatch out with their teeth, their hands bound behind them, as the Mule was pacing through the streets. A condition which most of them accepted; and thereupon gave occasion to the custom used among the Italians: who when they intend to scoff or disgrace a man, are wont to put their thumb betwixt two of their fingers, saying Ecco la Fico; a disgrace answerable to that of making Horns (in England) to him that is suspected to be a Cuckold. The City after this, rebelling and again taken by the Emperour, he levelled it unto the ground, pulled down the walls; and caused the whole ground on which it stood, to be ploughed up, and sowed with salt; seeming to threaten by that Emblem, that it should never be re-edified. Which notwithstanding, the City was not only new built again, but the Pope with the help of these Millanese and the Venetians, had at last the better of the Emperour; whom he enjoyed, after a vile submission, to undertake a journey to the Holy Land. Freed from the Emperour, they began to live after the form of a Republick; in which condition they continued about 56 years: when Otho, surnamed Vesconti (quasi his Comes, because he was Lord of Millain and Angerona) assumed the title to himself, and settled it upon that Family after his decease; but so that for the most part they were under the command of the German Emperours, and to them accountable. Galeaz the first, so called (as some write) because the Cocks crowed more then ordinarily at the time of his birth, added to the Estate hereof the Cities of Crema, and Cremona. In the person of John Galeaz it was advanced unto a Dukedom by the Emperour Wenceslaus, for 100000 Crowns in ready money; which John increased so mightily in wealth and power, that he had 29 Cities under his Command; and died as he was going to Florence to be crowned King of Tuscany. To him succeeded John Maria, and after him his brother Philip: who in his life had married his only daughter (but illegitimate) to Francisco Sforza, the best Commander of his times; and at his death appointed Alfonso of Aragon, King of Naples for his Heir and Successor. Before Alfonso could take any benefit of this designation, Sforza was quietly possessed both of the City and the loves of the people. This Francis Sforza (I must needs crave leave to tell this story) was the son of James Attendulo, a plain Country-man, who going to his labour with his Axe in his hand, whilst a great Army was passing by him, compared the misery and unpleasingness of his present condition, with those fair probabilities which a Martial life did present unto him. And being in a great dispute within himself what were best to do, he presently fell upon a resolution of putting the question to the determination of the Heavenly Providence; by calling his Axe unto the top of a tree next to him: conditioning with himself, that if the Axe came down again, he would contentedly apply himself to his wonted labour; but if it hung upon the boughs, he would betake himself unto higher hopes, and follow the Army then in passage. He did so, the Axe hung upon the boughs, he went after the Army, and thrived so well in that employment, that he became one of the best Captains of his time; surnamed de Cotoniogla from the place of his dwelling, and Sforza from the greatness of his noble courage. By Antonia the Daughter of Francis di Casale, the Lord of Cortona, he was the Father of this Francis Sforza.

Sforza whom now we speak of; who was so fortunate a Commander in the wars of Italy, that to oblige him to his party, Philip the Duke of Millain bestowed his daughter upon him, and thereby a fair title to this great Estate, which he successively obtained against all pretenders. In his line it continued till the coming of Lewis the twelfth of France, the son of Charles, and nephew of Lewis, Dukes of Orleans, by Valentina the sole daughter of John Galeaz the first Duke: who getting Duke Lodowick Sforza (be trayed by the Switzers) into his hands, carried him prisoner into France, and possessed himself of the estate. Outed not long after by the confederate Princes of Italy, who were jealous of so great a neighbour; he left the cause and quarrel unto Francis the first, his next successor in that Kingdom: in pursuance whereof, it is said by Bellay a French Writer, that the use of Muskets was first known. But Francis being in conclusion taken at the battle of Pavia, and carried prisoner into Spain; for his release, was forced to release all claim unto this Estate. A release long before endeavoured by some French Politicians, because the pretensions hereunto had brought such damage to that Crown: and no less eagerly opposed by Chancellor Prat (on the same reason that Scipio Nasica did oppose the destruction of Carthage, that is to say) because it did not only keep the French Nation in continual discipline of War; but served for a purgation of idle and superfluous people. Yet notwithstanding this release, Francis renewed the War again; and laid siege to Millain, then under the command of Antonio di Leva, and a Spanish Garrison: during which war, the wretched Millanese endured the worst of miseries. For first the Governor, under colour of Providing pay for his souldiers, got all the victuals of the Town into the Castle, to be sold again at his own price: which many of the poorer sort not able to pay, perished of famine in the streets. And on the other side, his souldiers which were quartered in most parts of the City, used when they wanted money, to chain up their Hosts, and then to put them to a ransom. Such as upon this barbarous usage fled out of the City, had their Goods confiscate: on which there followed such a disconsolate defolation, that the chief streets were over-grown with nettles and brambles. In this miserable estate it continued, till Charles the Emperour having totally driven out the French, restored it to Francis Sforza; brother to the last Duke Maximilian, and son of that Lodowick, who to advance himself unto this Estate, had most improvidently taught the French the way into Italy. But this Francis dying without issue, and the house of Sforza failing in him; the Emperour entred on the Dukedom as right Lord thereof, and left the same to his successors in the Realm of Spain. This said, we will sum up the whole story of this Estate, in the ensuing Catalogue of

The Lords and Dukes of Millain.

- 1277 1 Otho Visconti Archbishop of Millain.
- 1295 2 Matthew, Brothers son to Otho, confirmed in his command of Millain by Albertus the Emperour.
- 1323 3 Galeaz Visconti, son of Matthew, disseized of his command by Lewis of Bavaria Emperour.
- 1329 4 Attilio Visconti, son of Galeaz, confirmed in his Fathers power by the same Lewis the Emperour.
- 1339 5 Luchino Visconti, brother to Galeaz.
- 1349 6 John Visconti, the brother of Luchino.
- 1354 7 Galeaz II. son of Stephen, the brother of John.
- 1378 8 John Galeaz, son of the first Galeaz, created by the Emperour Wenceslaus, the first Duke of Millain, An. 1395.
- 1402 9 John Maria, son of John Galeaz, slain by the people for his horrible tyrannies.
- 1412 10 Philip Maria, the last of the Visconti, which commanded in Millain; a Prince of great power in swaying the affairs in Italy. He died An. 1446; the Millanese for some years resuming their former liberty.
- 1446 11 Francis Sforza, in right of his wife Blanch the base daughter of Philip, seconded by the power of the sword, admitted Duke by the general consent of the people of Millain; one of the Knights of the noble Order of the Garter.
- 1461 12 Galeaz Sforza, a valiant, but libidinous Prince, cruelly murdered by his own Subjects.
- 1477 13 John Galeaz Sforza, privately made way (as it was supposed) by his Uncle Lodowick.
- 1494 14 Lodowick Sforza, the son of Francis, and brother of Galeaz, who to secure himself of his ill-got Dukedom, drew the French into Italy.
- 1501 15 Lewis the XII. of France; son unto Charles, and nephew to Lewis Duke of Orleans; by Valentina daughter to John the first Duke of Millain; vanquished Lodowick, carried him prisoner into France, and took the Dukedom to himself.
- 1513 16 Maximilian Sforza, the son of Lodowick, restored to the Dukedom by the power of the Switzers, and Venetians; but again outed of it by Francis the first, Son-in-law and Successor to King Lewis the 12th in the Kingdom of France.
- 1529 17 Francis Sforza, brother of Maximilian, restored to the Estate, and the French expelled by the puissance of Charles the 5th; who after the death of this Duke Francis (the last of the Sforzas) Anno 1535, united it for ever to the Crown of Spain.

This Dukedom is not now of such great extent, and power, as in former times; there being but nine Cities remaining of those 29, which were once under the command of the Dukes hereof; the rest being gotten in by the State of Venice, the Florentines, the Dukes of Atantha, and Parma. And yet is this accounted the prime Dukedom of Christendom (as Flanders was accounted the prime Barlond of it) affording the Annual Revenue of 800000 Ducats to the King of Spain. A good Revenue, might it come come clear unto his Coffers. But what with the discharge of his Garrison-souldiers, the defraying of his Vice-roy, the Salaries of Judges and inferior Ministers; it is conceived that he spends more on it than he getteth.

The Arms hereof are Argent, a Serpent Azure, Crowned Or; in his Gorge an Infant Gules. Which was the Coat-Armour of a Saracen, vanquished by Otho the first of the Visconti in the Holy-land.

The Dukedom of MANTUA.

THE Dukedom of MANTUA, is bounded on the West, with Millain; on the East, with Romandi-ala; on the North, with Marca Trevigiana; and on the South, with the Dukedom of Parma.

The Country about Mantua is reasonably good, and yieldeth all sorts of Fruits being well manured: plentiful in Corn and Pastures, the very High-ways by the fields being planted with Elms, to train up the Vines which grow there intermingled in every place, as generally it is in all parts of Lombardy. But the Inhabitants are conceived not to be so civil, and well-bred, as the rest of Italy; childlike in their apparel, without manly gravity, poor in the entertainment of their friends, and exacting all they can from strangers.

The places in it of most note are, 1 Mercaria, bordering next to Millain. 2 Bozilia, a small, but pleasant habitation, belonging to some Princes of the Ducal family; built with fair Cloysters towards the street, in which passengers may walk dry in the greatest rain. 3 Petula, a small Village, but as famous as any, in regard it was the place wherein Virgil was born: but generally said to be born in Mantua (Mantua Virgilio gaudet, as the old Verse is) because this Village is so near the City of Mantua (being but two miles distant) that his birth might very well be ascribed unto it. 4 Mantua, seated on the River Nincius, now called Sarca; which coming out of Lago di garda falleth not far off into the Po, from whence there is a passage unto Venice. By nature strong, environed on three sides with a running water, half a mile in breadth; and on the fourth side with a wall. The Dukes to take their pleasure on the Lakes and Rivers, have a Barge called the Bucantore, five stories high, and capable of two hundred persons (whence it had the name) furnished very richly both for state and pleasure. Ocnus the son of Manto the Prophetess, the daughter of Tiresias, is said to have been the founder of it, and to have given unto it his Mothers name; but I more than doubt it, though Virgil a Native of those parts do report it so; this City being one of those which the *Tuscan*s built beyond the Apennine, as the foundest Antiquaries do affirm. Made memorable (by whomsoever built at first) in the declining times of Christian purity, for a Council holden in it, Anno 1061. wherein it was decreed, that the choosing of the Pope should from thenceforth belong unto the Cardinals. A Prerogative which of old belonging to the Emperors, was first by Constantine the third surnamed Pogonatus, given to the Clergy and people of Rome, in the time of Pope Benedict the second, Anno 684. resumed by Charles the Great, when he came to the Empire; and now appropriated only to the Colledge of Cardinals. But to return unto the Town, on the East-side of a bridge of about 500 paces long, covered over head, and born up with Arches, stands the Dukes Palace for the City; and not far thence the Domo, or Cathedral Church of St. Peter. The Palace very fair and stately, but far short for the pleasures and delights thereof, of his Palace at Mirmirolo, five miles from the City: which though it be of a low roof (after the manner of ancient buildings) yet it is very richly furnished, and adorned with very beautiful Gardens; able to lodge, and give content to the best Prince in Christendom. Here are also many other Towns, as 5 Caprara, and 6 Lucera, of which nothing memorable.

As for the fortunes of this Dukedom, it is to be observed that Mantua followed for long time the fortunes of the Western Empire; till given by Otho the second son to Theobald Earl of Canosse for the many good services he had done him. Boniface who succeeded him, had to Wife Beatrice the sister of Henry the second; and by her was the Father of Matilda, that famous Warriouress, who carried so great a stroke in the state of Italy. Being dispossessed of her Estate by Henry the third, she joyned in faction with the Popes, recovered all her own again, and dismembred from the Empire many goodly Territories, which at her death (having had three husbands, but no issue) she gave in fee for ever to the See of Rome, Anno 1115. After her death Mantua continued under the protection of the Empire. But that protection failing them, by little and little it was brought under by the family of the Bonacelsi: who Lording it over a Free-people with too great severity, contracted such a general hatred, that Passarino the last of them, was slain in the Market-place by the people, under the command and conduct of Lewis de Gonzaga, a noble Gentleman; who presently with great applause took to himself the Government of the Estate, Anno 1328. which hath continued in his house to this very day, with a great deal of lustre. Who successors take here as followeth, under the several titles of

The Lords, Marquesses, and Dukes of Mantua.

Modena.

- 1369 3 Ludowick, or Lewis II. son of Guido.
1382 4 Francis Gonzaga, son of Lewis 2^d, highly extolled by Pagio the Florentine for his Wisdom and Learning; who valiantly repulsed the attempts made against his Estate, by John Galeaze, the first Duke of Millain.
1407 5 John Francisco Gonzaga, created the first Marquess of Mantua, by the Emperor Sigismund.
1444 6 Lodowick, or Lewis III. son of John Francisco, who entertained the Emperor Frederick, and the King of Danemark, with great magnificence.
1478 7 Frederick son of Lewis the third.
1484 8 Francis II. son of Frederick.
1519 9 Frederick II. Commander of the Armies of the Pope, and Florentines, entertained Charles the fifth with great solemnity; by whom he was made Duke of Mantua, 1530, and declared Marquess of Montferrat, in right of his wife.
1540 10 Francis III. son of Frederick the second Duke of Mantua, and Marquess of Montferrat.
1550 11 William the brother of Francis the third, created the first Duke of Montferrat.
1587 12 Vincent, son of William. Duke of Mantua, and Montferrat.
13 Francis IV. son of Vincent, had to wife Margaret the Daughter of Charles Emanuel Duke of Savoy, and by her a daughter named Mary; in whose behalf, the Duke of Savoy undertook the war against her Uncle, for Montferrat.
1613 14 Ferdinand, the brother of Francis the fourth, succeeded him in both Estates, notwithstanding the opposition of the Duke of Savoy.
15 Vincent II. the brother of Ferdinand and of Francis the fourth.
1628 16 Charles Gonzaga, Duke of Nevers in France, by his Mothers line; and of Mantua and Montferrat by his Father Lewis Gonzaga, the third Son of Frederick the first Duke of Mantua; succeeded on the death of Vincent the second: but not without great opposition of the Spanish Faction, who sacked Mantua, distressed Casal, and much impoverished both Estates. But the business was at last composed by the power of the French, and the investiture conferred upon him, by the hands of the Emperor.

The Territories of this Duke (reckoning in that of Montferrat also) are in circuit nigh unto those of Florence; but his Revenues fall much short, which amount to about 500000 Ducats only; but might be greater, if either the Duke would be burdensome to his subjects, as Florence is; or if he were not on all sides land-locked from navigation and traffick.

The chief order of Knighthood in these Dukedoms, is, of The blood of our Lord JESUS Christ, instituted An. 1608. The Author of it was Duke Vincent Gonzaga, when the Marriage was solemnized between his son Francis, and the Lady Margaret daughter to the Duke of Savoy. It consisteth of twenty Knights, whereof the Mantua Dukes are Sovereigns; and was allowed by Pope Paul the fifth. The Collar hath threads of Gold laid on fire, and inter-woven with these words, Domine probasti. To the Collar are pendent two Angels, supporting three drops of blood, and circumscribed with, Nihil ista tristique recepto. It took this name, because in St. Andrews Church in Mantua, are said to be kept as a most precious Relique, certain drops of our Saviours Blood (thou canst not, O Reader, but believe it) with a piece of the sponge.

The Arms of Mantua are Argent, a Cross Patee Gules, between four Eagles Sable, membred of the second, under an Escoccheon in Fesse, charged quarterly with Gules a Lion Or, and Or three Bars Sable.

There are in this Dukedom
Archbishops 1. Bishops 4.

The Dukedom of MODENA.

THE Dukedom of MODENA containeth the Cities of Modena and Reggio, with the Territories adjoining to them: both of them situate in that part of Lombardy which is called Cispadana; and consequently partake of the pleasures and commodities of it.

The people of this Dukedom are said to be better-natured than most of Italy: those of Modena being quick in their resolution; easie to be pacified when wronged; and friendly in their entertainment of Strangers: the Reggians being affable, of present wits, and fit for any thing they can be employed in: the women in both Towns of a milde disposition, neither too courtly, nor too forward, as in other places.

The first principal City is that of Modena, anciently better known by the name of Mutina, and famous in those times for the first battel betwixt Antony and Augustus Caesar; this latter being then not above eighteen years of age, and yet made head of a new League against Antonius, whom the Senate and people looked upon as a common Enemy. The managing of the War was left to Hirtius and Pansa then Consuls; the fortune of the day so equal, that Antony left the field, and the Consuls their lives; leaving Augustus the absolute command of a powerful Army, into whose favours he so cunning did work himself, that he made them the foundation of his future greatness. It was at that time a Roman Colony, but being ruined by the fury of the Goths and Lombards, was afterwards new built at the charge of the Citizens, situate near the Apennine in a very good foyl, and of indifferent fair buildings. In the distractions of Italy betwixt the Emperors and the Popes, Guido the Popes Legat, and then Bishop thereof, consigned it over to Azo of the house of Este, Lord of Ferrara, Anno 1304. the Pope himself consenting to it, upon the payment of a yearly tribute of 10000 Crowns: since which time it hath been for the most part in the power of that house: Borfius the Marquess of Ferrara, being by Frederick the third made Duke of Modena. 2 Reggio, the second Town of note, hath tasted much of the same fortune; at first a Roman Colony called Regium Lepidi, afterwards ruined by the Gothes when they came first into Italy; repaired and compassed with a Wall by its own inhabitants, and for a time under the command of the Earls of Canossa. But being weary of that yoke, they recovered their liberty; which being unable to maintain in those bustling times, they gave themselves unto Obizzo the Father of Azo, Anno 1292, and after that in the year 1326, to the See of Rome. Passing through many other hands, it was at last sold for 60000 Ducats to the Visconti, Lords of Millain, Anno 1370, and in the end recovered by the house of Este, Anno 1409, and gave the title of a Duke to the aforesaid Borfius, whom Frederick the third made Duke of Modena, and Reggio, 1452.

The successors of this Borfius are before laid down in the succession of Ferrara; who held the whole estate together till the death of Alphonso the last Duke. He dying without lawful issue, Anno 1595. left his estate to Cesar de Este, his Nephew by a base son, called Alphonso also; betwixt whom and Pope Clement the 8th. a war was threatened for the whole: but at last compromised upon these conditions, that the Church of Rome should have Ferrara, with all the Lands and Territories appertaining to it, as an Estate anciently holden of that See; and that Modena, and Reggio, being Imperial Feifer, should remain to Cesar; but to be held in fee of the Papal Throne. Duke Cesar to have leave to carry away all his movable goods, to sell such of his lands as were not of the ancient domain of the Dukedom; and to have one half of the Ordinance and Artillery. By which agreement the Cities of Modena and Reggio, became a new erected State, distinct, and independent of any other: each City being well fortified, and garrisoned, and furnished with Ordinance for defence thereof. But what they yield unto the Prince in the way of Revenue, and what Forces he is able to raise out of his Estates, I cannot positively determin: but by the Tribute formerly paid unto the Popes for the City of Modena, and the rich Territory of both Towns, and the great Revenues of the Dukes of Ferrara; I conceive they cannot yield less than 100000 Crowns of yearly In-come. The Arms of this Duke the same with those of Ferrara, before blazoned.

The Dukedom of PARMA.

THE Dukedom of PARMA hath on the North the Dukedoms of Millain and Mantua, from which it is parted by the Po; on the South, the Apennine, which divideth it from Liguria; on the East, the Countrey of Modena, and Romandiola, from which last parted by the River Scultenna now called Panaro; on the West, Montferrat: situate, as Modena is, in Lombardia Cispadana; and much of the same nature both for soyl, and air, and other the commodities of those parts of Italy.

The principal Cities of it are, 1 Parma, an ancient City, and made a Colony of the Romans at the end of the second Punic War; as Mutina and Aquileia at the same time were. It is seated on a small River of the same name, which runneth almost through the midst of it; beautified with very handsome buildings, and peopled by a race of ingenious men, whether they do betake themselves unto Arts or Arms. The grounds about this City are of excellent pasture, and yield great plenty of the Cheese which is called Parmesan. 2 Placentia, seated on the Po, one of the first Colonies which the Romans planted amongst the Cisalpine Galls; and famous for the resistance which it made both to Annibal, and Asdrubal, who severally in vain besieged it: made afterwards the Metropolis, of the Province of Emilia, yet nothing the less beautiful for so great an age. The fields adjoining have the same commendation with those of Parma, for most excellent Cheese; but go beyond for Salt-pits and Mines of Iron, which the other wanteth. 3 Mirandola, a proper Town built in the time of Constant the son of Constantine the Great: the Patrimony of the noble Family of the Pici (of which was Picus de Mirandola that renowned Scholar) but held by them as Feudatories to the Dukes of Parma. 4 Briscello, called anciently Briscellum, not far from the chief City Parma; of no great note at the present time, but memorable in the Roman story for the death of the Emperor Otho, who here killed himself. For hearing here that his Forces were overthrown by Valens, and Cecina, Commanders of the Forces of Vitellius, then his Competitor for the Empire; he rather chose to fall by his own sword, than that the Romans should be forced, for his sake, to renew the war. And this he did with so much honour to himself, that many of his souldiers flew themselves at his Funeral Pile; not out of consciousness of crime, or for fear of punishment, but to testify their affections to him, and to follow such a brave example as was laid before them. So as we may truly say of him, as he is said by Tacitus to have said of himself, viz. Alii divinus imperium tenuerunt, nemo tam fortiter reliquit. 5 Monticella, in the middle way almost between Parma and Placentia, and opposite unto Cremona, a chief Town of the Duchy of Millain, from which parted by the River Po.

These Towns (as others in these parts) have been partakers of the diversities of fortune, as being (after the declining of the Western Empire) sometimes under the Venetians, most times under the Millanoy; and at last conquered by Pope Julius the 2d in the confusions and distractions of the Dukedom dom of Millain, under the two last Princes of the house of Sforza. By Paul the third, being of the house of the Farnesis, the Cities of Parma and Placentia with their Appendices, were given unto his son Petro Aleigi (or Petrus Aloysius, as the Latins call him) with the title of Duke, Anno 1549. The Signeury of Camerine, which he had lately taken from the Dukes of Urbino, being given in recompence to the Church. This Petro being a man of most vicious life, had amongst other villanies committed an unspeakable violence, on the person of Cosmus Chirini the Bishop of Fano; and soon after poysoned him. For which most detestable fact, he received no other chastisement of his Father than this, Hec vitia me non committantore didici, that he was sure he had not learnt those vices by his example. But going on in these wicked courses, he was slain at last by Count John Aguzzola; and Placentia, after a short siege, yielded to Ferdinand Gonzaga (Vice-roy in Millain for the Emperor Charles the fifth) conceived to be privy to the murder. Octavian the son of Petro Luigi, hearing what had hapned, fortified himself in Parma as well as he could: but being hated by the new Pope, and distrustful, not without good cause, of the Emperors purposes, he had quite lost all, if Henry the second of France, had not taken him into his protection. For the Emperor Charles fully determined (notwithstanding that Octavian had married his base daughter) to have made himself Lord of the Town: and the French King was loth to see so great a strength added to the Emperors possessions in Italy. When the war had now lasted four years, Philip the second (who afterwards succeeded Charles) considering how necessary it was for his affairs in Italy, to have this Octavian his friend, restored unto him the City of Plaisance or Placentia, and so withdrew him from the French faction, Anno 1557. Yet because he would be sure to keep his house in a perpetual dependence on Spain, he restored it not absolutely at the present, but held the Citadel thereof with a Spanish Garrison, till the year 1583: when in regard of the good services, which Alexander Prince of Parma had done him in his Wars against the Hollanders, and others of the revolted Provinces; he caused it to be surrendered into the hands of his Father Octavian. By which, and by his settling upon this house the Town and Territory of Novara, in the Dukedom of Millain, and other personal favours which they have conferred on the Princes of it; the Kings of Spain seem to have given some satisfaction to this house for stepping betwixt them and the Kingdom of Portugal; to which they might have made such a probable title, as would have troubled his Estate, had they stood upon it.

The Dukes of Parma.

- 1549 1 Petro Luigi Farnesis, son to Paul the third, made by the Pope, his Father, the first Duke of Parma.
- 1550 2 Octavian Farnesis, son to Petro Luigi, married Margaret base daughter to Charles the fifth; afterwards Governours of the Netherlands.
- 3 Alexander, son of Octavian and Margaret of Austria, one of the most renowned Souldiers of his time, Governor of the Netherlands for King Philip the second.
- 1592 4 Rainutio Farnesis, son of Alexander and Mary of Portugal, eldest daughter of Edward son to King Emanuel; one of the competitors for that Crown.
- 5 Odoardo Farnesis, son of Rainutio.

Of the Revenues and Forces of these Princes I have little to say, but think them to be of good consideration in both respects: their Territories lying in the best and richest part of Italy, and their Estates, environed by more puissant neighbours; which both necessitate and enable them, to defend their own.

The Dukedom of MONTFERRAT.

THE Dukedom of MONTFERRAT, is situate betwixt Lombardy and Piemont, on the Rivers of Tenarus and Po, on the East, and West: extended North, and South, in a line or branch, from the Alpes to the borders of Liguria; of which last it was sometimes counted part, and called Liguria Cisalpennina for distinction sake.

It took this name either à Monte ferrato; from some Mountain of it stored with Iron; or else à Monte feraci, as some rather think, from the fertility of the Mountains. And to say truth, though the whole Countrey seem to be nothing else than a continual heap of Mountains; yet are they Mountains of such wonderful fruitfulness, that they will hardly give place to any Valley in Europe.

The principal River of it is the Tenarus, above mentioned, which springing out of the hills about Barceis, a Town of the Marquissate of Saluzzes, falleth into the Po not far from Pavie. The principal Cities of it are; 1 Alba, called by Pliny, Alba Pompeia, situate on the banks of the said River, in a rich and fertile soyl, but a very bad air: near to which, in a poor village called Zobia, the Emperor Pertinax was born. Who being of mean and obscure Parents, after the death of Commodus, was called by the Conspirators to the Roman Empire. But being over-zealous to reform the corruptions of the Souldiers, he was by the Praetorian Guards (hating their Princes for their virtues, as much as formerly for their vices) most cruelly murdered; and the Imperial dignity sold to Julianus, for 25 Sester-Montferrat. tium a man. 2 Casul, vulgarly called Saint Vus, from the Church there dedicated to Saint Evafius (or Saint Vus, as they speak it commonly) the strongest Town in all this Countrey; well built, and peopled with many ancient and noble Families, of which the Family of St. George is one of the principal; and made a Bishops See by Pope Sixtus the fourth, Anno 1474. It was in former times, the chief seat of the house of Montferrat, and for that cause compassed with a strong wall, and a fair Castle: but of late fortified after the modern manner of Fortifications, and strengthened with an impregnable Citadel by Duke Vincent Gonzago, as the surest Key of his estate; in which new Citadel the Governor of the Province holds his usual residence. 3 Aigue, in Latin Aquensis, famous for its Baths or Fountains of hot and medicinal waters. 4 Saint Savours, where there is a very strong Fortrefs, as there is also in 5 Ponfure, or Pont di Stura, so called of the River Stura. 6 Osoniano, anciently Occimianum, the old seat of the first Marquesses of this Montferrat. 7 Villanova. 8 Belzale, 9 Liburn, and many others of less note.

Here are also within the limits of this Dukedom, the Towns of Asti, Cherim, and Chivasso, belonging to the Dukes of Savoy, in the description of whose Countrey we may speak more of them; together with Novara and Alexandria, appertaining to the Dukedom of Milain, which we have spoken of already. And hereunto also I refer the strong (and in those times) impregnable Fortrefs, by the Latin Historians called Fraxinetum, from some Grove of Ashes near unto it: situate in the advantages of the Mountains, and not far from the Sea, by consequence better able to defend itself and admit relief; and therefore made the receptacle or retreat of the Saracens, at such time as they had footing in these parts of Italy. First took and fortified by them in the year 891. recovered afterwards by the prowess and good fortune of Otho the Emperor, deservedly surnamed the Great, about sixty years after. Of great note in the stories of those middle times. By Luiprandus placed near the borders of Provence, by Blondus, and Leander near the River Po, and the Town of Valenza, once called Forum Fulvii; and finally by Sigonius in the Coftian Alpes: and so most fit to be referred unto this Countrey, though now so desolated that there is no remainders of the ruins of it.

This Countrey was made a Marquifare by Otho the second, Anno 985. one of the seven by him erected and given to the seven sons of Waleran of Saxony, who had married his daughter Adelheide. A Military Family, conspicuously eminent in the Wars of Greece, and the Holy-land; where they did many acts of singular merit: inasmuch as Baldwin and Conrade, issuing from a second branch hereof, were made Kings of Hiernusalem; and Boniface one of the Marquesses, got the Kingdom of Thessaly, and many fair Estates in Greece. But the Male-iffue failing in Marquess John, the Estate fell to Iohannus Paleologus, of the Imperial family of Constantinople, who had married the Heir-general of the house; continuing in his name till the year 1534. when it fell into the hands of the Dukes of Mantua. In the person of Duke William Gonzaga raised to the honour of a Dukedom, as it still continueth; the best and richest part of that Dukes Estate, and the fairest flower in all his Garden. The residue of the story may be best collected out of the following Catalogue of held but four years. After whose death, Anno 1534, this Marquifare was adjudged to Frederick the first Montferrat. Duke of Mantua, who had married Margaret daughter of William the fifth, and next heir to George. Whose successors may be seen in the former Catalogue of the Dukes of Mantua. The Arms hereof are Gules, a Chief Argent.

And now according to my method, I should proceed to the description and story of the Principality of Piemont, the last and most Western part of Italy. But being it lieth partly in, and partly at the foot of the Alpes, was anciently a part of the Province called Alpes Cottie, and is now part of the Estate of the Duke of Savoy: we will defer till we come to those Alpine Provinces, which are next to follow. And so much shall suffice for Italy, in which there are, besides those of Piemont,

OF THE ALPES.

BEfore we can come out of Italy into France, we must cross the Alpes; a ridge of Hills where-with (as with a strong and defensible Rampart) Italy is assured against France and Germany. They are said to be five dayes journey high, covered continually with snow from the whiteness whereof they took this name: that in the Sabine Dialect being called Alpum, which in the Latine was called Album.

They begin about the Mediterranean or Liguistick Seas, and crossing all along the borders of France and Germany, extend as far as to the Gulf of Cornero, in the Province of Istria; and are in several parts called by several names, which we will muster up as they lie in order from the Mediterranean to the Adriatick. And first those which lie nearest to the Mediterranean, are for that cause called Maritima, from the nearness to Liguria, called by some Liguistica. 2 Then follow those called Cottia, from Cottius, a King of the Allobroges: And 3 those named Graia, from the passage of Hercules and his Gracian followers; of which, both amongst the Poets and Historians, there is very good evidence. 4 After we come to the Panina, so named from the march of Annibal and his Carthaginians, whom the Latine Writers call by the name of Pani; or from the Mountain-God Paninus, worshipped by the Veragri, the Inhabitants of it. 5 Next come we to the Lepontia, so named from Lepontii, who did there inhabit: As 6 the Rhetica, which lie next to them, from the Rhati, once a powerful people of that mountainous tract. 7 Then follow those called Julia, from the passage of Julius Caesar over them, in his march towards Gaul: and so at last we come unto those called Carnica, extending to the shores of the Adriatick; denominated from the Carni who did here inhabit, and who gave name also to Carniola, an adjoining Province.

The ancient Inhabitants of these mountainous Countreys, besides the Allobroges, Veragri, Lepontii, Rhati, and Carni, spoken of before; were the Sedani, Salii, Valenses, Vacontii, and divers others of less note and estimation: all vanquished by the indefatigable industry of the Romans. After whose subjugation, and the settlement of the Roman Empire, these Mountains, and some part of the vales adjoining, made five several Provinces; viz. The Province of the Cottian Alpes, containing Wallisland, and Piemont. Secondly, of Rhetia Prima, comprehending the Grisons, and part of the Dukedom of Millain, now in possession of the Switzers; both which were members of the Diocese of Italy. Thirdly, of the Alpes Maritima, now part of Dauphine and Provence. Fourthly, of the Graia and Panina Alpes, and the greatest part of Maxima Sequanorum, including some part of Savoy, and most part of Switzerland; both which were members of the Diocese of Gaul. And fifthly, of Noricum Mediterraneum; comprehending Carniola, Carinthia, and the parts neer hand; which were members of the Diocese of Illyricum Occidentale. The people antiently, as now, by reason of their drinking snow-water, dissolving from the tops of the hills, and sometimes falling thence with as great a violence as the Cataracts of Nilus are said to do; were generally troubled with a swelling in the throat, which the Latines call Struma: being the same with that, which we call the Kings Evil; because by special privilege curable by the Kings of France, and England. Quis tumidum guttur miratur in Alpibus? as the Poet hath it.

Of these vast hills, the lowest are the Carnica and Maritima, lying neere to the several Seas before remembered: The Cottia and the Graia not so high, but that the passages lie open for the most part of the year. The rest, by reason of their deep and dreadful precipices, their tedious and steep ascents, narrow wayes, dangerous craggy Rocks, fierce whirlwinds, and huge balls of snow, tumbling with an incredible violence from the tops of the Mountains; are hardly passable by Horse, not at all by Waggon. And yet amongst these dreadful hills, there are observed to be some Vallies of great fertility, not giving ground for fruitfulness to the best in Europe; and for the sweetness of the temperature going much beyond them. With such an equal hand, doth the heavenly providence dispense the benefits of Nature to his whole Creation; that plenty bordereth upon want, and pain on pleasure.

And

And yet for all the difficulty and danger of these Alpine passages, coverousness, or curiosity, or desire of conquest, have found a way to make them passable in many places; and that not only for private and particular passengers, but for vast multitudes and numerous Armies, such as those led by Annibal and Julius Caesar. But especially the barbarous people found out five wayes to break into Italy, which have been since much travelled by divers Nations; of which three be out of France, and two out of Germany. The first from France is through Provence, and so close to the Liguistick Seas; easiest for private Passengers, but too strait and narrow for great Armies: there being many passages in the Countrey of Nizza, so narrow, that ten men may make head against ten thousand: as in that called the Pace of the Virgin, for one. The second is over the hills called Genevre, into the Marquisate of Saluzzes, and so to the other parts of Lombardie; which was the way that Charles the eighth marched towards Naples; and by the Italians is called commonly Strada Romana, because the ordinary passage betwixt France and Rome. The third way is over the greater Cenis, (which some call the lesser S. Bernard) so to Aost, or Tuoin; which (if we may believe Antiquity) was first opened by Hercules, and after followed by Annibal: who found the passages so closed up, that he was forced to break his way (as Plutarch telleth us) with fire and vinegar; whence that so memorable saying, Viam Annibal aut inveniet aut faciet. From the passage of those Worthies, this tract, and that adjoining were called Alpes Graia, and Panina. Or if (as others think) Annibal took the former way, and came directly upon Turin, which Town it is most certain that he took in his march; then these Panina must take name from the passage of Aidubal, or of some part of Annibals Army, which probably was too great to go all one way: or else from the Mountain-God Paninus, as before was said.

The first way out of Germany into Italy, is through the Countrey of the Grisons, by the Valtolin, which the Spaniard seized into his hands. So that by the keeping of the Velllyn, or Valtolin, and manning of the Fort Fuentes, which he also erected; he was in this manner the Lord of this passage: not only to the discontent of the Natives, but to the distast of his neighbours the Savoyards, and Venetians. The other way out of Germany into Italy, is through the Countrey of Tirolis, by the Towns of Innspruck and Trent. This passage is commanded by the Castle and Fort of Eresberg, seated on the confines of this Countrey towards Suevia, and from Innspruck, is two dayes journey distant. Which Fort, in the War which the Protestant Princes made against Charles the fifth, was surprized by Captain Schersteline, so to hinder the coming of the Popes Forces into Germany: for which the Emperor so hated him, that when all the rest of that faction were pardoned, he only continued a Proscript, his head being valued at 4000 Crowns. The taking also of this Fort, and the Castle adjoining, by D. Maurice of Saxony, made the said Charles then being in Innspruck, to fly out of Germany; and shortly after to resign his Empire to his brother Ferdinand.

Out of these Mountains rise the springs of many of the most renowned Rivers of these West parts of the world; as, 1 The Rhene, which springeth from two several Fountains, the one which they call the Neerer Rhine, out of the Lepontia; and the other which they term the Fordar, or further Rhine, out of the Rhetica; which meet together about a Dutch mile from Chur the chief Town of the Grisons, and so go on by Constance to Germany. 2 Rhofne, which riseth in that part of the Lepontia, which is called Die Furche, about two Dutch miles from the head of the Neerer or Hinder Rhine, and so through Wallisland into France. 3 Padus, or Po, which hath his head in a branch of the Cottian or Celtian Alpes, heretofore called Mons Vesulus, and so through Piemont into Italy. Out of them also spring the Rivers of Rasse, Durance, and Achevis; the first a Dutch, the second a French, and the third an Italian River also; not to say any thing of others of inferior note. The great Lakes which are found in this mountainous Tract, we shall hereafter meet with in their proper places.

Let us next look upon the Countreys and Eitates here situate, which bordering upon Italy, France, and Germany, and partaking somewhat of them all, do belong to neither; but reckon themselves to be free and absolute Eitates, Supreme, and independent upon any others, as indeed they are. Such other of these Alpine Countreys, which are under the command of the German Princes, as some parts of Schwaben and Bavaria, together with Tirol, Carniola, and the rest which belong to Austria, shall be considered in the History of those States and Princes, to which of right they do belong. But for the rest, which as they lie intire together without intermixture, so they are absolute in themselves, and owe nor suit nor service unto any other; we will consider them in this place, under the name of the Alpes, or the Alpine Provinces.

The ALPES then, or the Alpine Provinces, call them which you will, are bound on the East with Tirol in Germany, and the Dukedom of Millain and Montferrat in Italy; on the West with Provence, Dauphine, and La Bresse, parts of the Continent of France; on the North with the County of Burgundy in France, and Suevia, or Schwaben in High Germany; and on the South with Lombardy, and a branch of the Mediterranean Sea. Called in the middle times by the name of Burgundia Transjurana, because it contained that part of the Kingdom of Burgundy, which lay beyond the Mountain Jour. A Mountain which beginning near the City of Basle, and not far from the Rhene, passeth South-westward by the Lakes of Biel, Zee, Nuwenburger-Zee, and that called Lemane, till it come almost unto the Rhofne: dividing by that means the Provinces of Switzerland, and Savoy, from the County of Burgundy.

It lieth under the sixth Climate, and some part of the seventh, so that the longest day in Summer is fifteen hours, and three quarters. Of different nature in regard both of Soil and People; which will best shew it self in the Survey of the several Provinces, into which divided; that is to say, 1 the Dukedom of Savoy, 2 the Signeury of Geneva, 3 the Resorts of Wallisland, 4 the Cantons of the Switzers, and 5 the Leagues of the Grison. Which several States, though they be reckoned to be-belong to the German Empire, and that the B^{ish}ops of Chur, Sion, and Basil are generally accounted for Princes of it : yet they neither come unto the Diets , nor are subject to the publick Taxes ; nor comprehended within any of those ten Circles into which the Empire is divided.

The Language herein spoken, partakes somewhat of all three, as before was said : the French being wholly spoke in Savoy, the lower Wallisland, and generally by the Switzers bordering on the Lake Lemane ; the Dutch being common to the greatest part of the Switzers, the Grifons about Chur, and the upper Wallisland : and finally the Italian, used by the generality of the Grifons, the Præfectures appertaining unto them and the Switzers both in Piemont, and those parts of Savoy which lie next unto it.

The principal Souldiers of these mountainous Provinces, 1 Rodolph, Earl of Halspurg, the Founder of the present Austrian Family. 2 Thomas, and 3 Peter, Earls of Savoy, this last surnamed Charlemain the second. 4 Emanuel Philibert, one of the later Dukes hereof, Commander of the Armies of the King of Spain. 5 John Tzerclas, commonly called Count Tilly, General of the Imperial Armies in the War of Germany. For Scholars of more special note for which we are beholding to these Countreys, we have 1 Philip Theophrastus Bombasius à Buebnam, commonly called Paracelsus, the Author, or Instaurator of Chymical Physick; born in the Mountains of Helvetia, as he saith himself: a man of most prodigious parts, and of no mean vices. 2 Zwinglius one of the chief Agents in the Reformation. 3 Musculus, and 4 Oecolampadius, two Divines, his seconds. 5 Henry Bullinger, one of the same profession also. 6 Sebastian Castilio, of as much learning as the best of them; though of different judgement. 7 Dan. Tossanus the Hebrician. To which we may adde 8 Calvin also, who though he had his birth in France, had his being here; and never grew to any enmity in Fame or Learning, till he was felled in Geneva.

For matter of Religion, it is of a very mixt condition also, in all these Countreys: that of the Romish only having publick countenance in the Dukedom of Savoy, and Piemont; but so that the Reformed is tolerated in some parts thereof, especially in the next parts Dauphine, to which the neighbourhood of Geneva gives a great encrease. In Switzerland there are four Cantons which are wholly for the Reformation, viz. Zurich, Bern, Basle, and Schaffhausen: Seven that stand wholly for the Doctrine of the Church of Rome, i. e. Uren, Switz, Underwalden, Lucern, Zug, Friburg, and Solothurn: in Apenzel, and Glaris, they allow of both. The Grisons are confusedly divided betwixt both Religions; but the Italian Praefectures admit no other but the Romish. The cause of which division came upon the preaching of Zuinglius, a Canon of the Church of Zurich: who being animated with Luther's good success in Germany, began about the year 1519 to preach against the Masse, and Images, and other the ceremonies of the Church of Rome. In which, his party so increased, that on a publick Disputation which was held at Zurich, the Masse was abrogated in that Canton by the authority of the Senate, Anno 1526. and Images destroyed at Bern, 1528. After which prosperous beginnings, the Reformation began to spread it self amongst the Confederates; and had prevailed further both in France, and Germany, but for a difference which arose betwixt him and Luther about the Sacrament of the Supper: in which Luther did not only maintain a Real presence, but a Consubstantiation also in the sacred Elements; which Zuinglius maintained to be only a bare sign and representation of Christs blessed body, For reconciling of this difference, wherein the enemies of both did extremely triumph; a conference was held between them at Mompurg, a Town of Hassia, by the procurement of that Lantgrave, but without success: Luther professing that he durst not agree in that point with Zuinglius, ne Principes suos interpretatione tantopere Pontificis exosa, magis in suis redderet; for fear of drawing too great hatred, on the Princes of his own profession. From this time forwards all brake out into open flames, the names of Ubiquitarians, and Sacramentarians, being reciprocally callt upon one another; to the great hinderance of the cause, which they had in hand: yet so that the Lutheran opinions got ground in Germany, the Zuinglians amongst these Mountains, and in France it self; and finally prevailed by the means of Calvin in many parts in Germany also. But hereof more hereafter in convenient place.

As for the story of those Countreys, before they were divided into so many hands, we are to know that the old Inhabitants hereof (mentioned before) were conquered severally by the Romans: as shall be shewn in the description of the several Provinces. Won from the Romans by the Burgundians, in the time of Honorius the Western Emperour, they became a member of their Kingdom; except the Country of the Grisons, and some parts of Switzerland, which fell under the Alems: united afterwards in the new Kingdom of Burgundy, of the French erection, when subdued by that Nation. But Charles the Bald, the last of the French Kings of Burgundy, having united it to the Kingdom of France, divided that Kingdom into three Estates; that is to say, the Dukedom of Burgundy on this side of the Saône, the Dukedom of Burgundy beyond the Saône, and the Dukedom of Burgundy beyond the Jour. This last containing the greatest part of all these Alpine Provinces (except Piemont only) was by the said Charles given to Conrade a Saxon Prince: the son of Wiskind the third, and younger brother of Robert, the first Earl of Anjou; by the name of Earl of Burgundy Transjuran or Burgundy beyond the Jour. Rodolph his son and successor, by Eudes the King of France, his Cousin German, was honoured with the title of King: to make him equal at the least, with Boson Earl of Burgundy, beyond the Saône, whom Charles the Grasse, about the same time had made King of Arles. But Rodolph finding it offensive to the German Emperours, abandoned it on the death of Eudes, and took to himself the title of Duke. The residue of the story we shall have in the following Catalogue of

The Earls, Dukes, and Kings of Burgundy Transjurane.

- 1 Conrade the first Earl of Burgundy Transjurane.
 890 2 Rodolph, Earl, King, and Duke of Burgundy Transjurane.
 912 3 Rodolph II. elected King of Italy against Berengarius; which title he exchanged with Hugh de Arles, who was chosen by another Faction, for the possession of the Kingdom of Arles and Burgundy; on the assuming of which Crown, he resigned this Dukedom to his Brother Boson.
 4 Boson the Brother of Rodolph the second, succeeded his brother in the Dukedom of Burgundy, beyond the Joux; as afterwards he succeeded Rodolph, his Brothers son, in the Kingdom of Arles and Burgundy.
 965 5 Conrade II. son of Boson, King of Arles and Burgundy, and Duke of Burgundy Transjurane.
 990 6 Rodolph III. son of Conrade, who dying without issue, left his estates to Henry surnamed the Great, who was afterwards Emperor and King of Germany.

Black, the son of his sister Gisela, by Conrad the second Emperour and King of Germany: united so unto the Empire, till by the bounty and providence of some following Emperours, it was cantoned into many parts; of which more anon. It is now time to lay aside this discourse as to the general condition and affairs of these Alpine Provinces; and to look over the particulars: beginning first with the estate of the Duke of Savoy, situate wholly in these Mountains, and lying next to Italy, where before we left.

The Dukedom of SAVOY.

THE Dukedom of SAVOR is bounded on the East, with Millain and Monferrat in Italy; on the West, with Dauphine in France; on the North, with Switzerland, and the Lake of Geneva; and on the South, with Provence, and the Mediterranean. The Countrey of so different nature, that it cannot be reduced under any one character: and therefore we must look upon it in the several parts into which divided; that is to say, 1 the Principality of Piemont, and 2 Savoy, especially so called.

called. 1 PIEMONTE, in Latine called Regio Pedemontana, because situate at the foot of the Mountains (as the name in both Languages imports) is bounded on the East, with Milain, and Montferrat; on the West, with Savoy, on the North, with the Switzers; and on the South, it runneth in a narrow valley, to the Mediterranean, having Montferrat on the one side, Provence and a part of the Alpes upon the other. The Countrey wonderfully fertile compared with Switzerland, and Savoy, which lie next unto it; but thought to be inferior to the rest of Italy. It containeth, besides Baronies, and Lordships, 15 Marquissates, 52 Earldoms, 160 Castles or walled places: and is so populous wihal, that once a Piemontese being demanded the extent of his Countrey, made answer, that it was a City of 300 miles compass.

The principal Cities of it are, 1 Turin, called of old Augusta Taurinorum, because the head City of the Taurini, once the Inhabitants of this Tract : from which Taurini it deriveth the name of Turin; and not as some conceive from the River Duria, on whose banks it standeth. In this City is the Court and Palace of the Duke of Savoy, (who is the Lord of this Countrey) the See of an Archbishop, and an University, in which the renowned Scholar Erasmus took his degrees in Divinity. It is situate on the River Po, in a place very important for the guard of Italy; for which cause the Romans sent a Colony hither; and the Lombards made it one of their four Dukedoms. Adjoining to it is a Park of the Dukes of Savoy, watered with the Duria, Sture, and Po, six miles in circuit, full of Woods, Lakes, and pleasant Fountains; which make it one of the sweetest situations in Europe. 2 Mondenti, seated on the swelling of a little hill, with very fair Suburbs round about it; in one of which the Dukes of Savoy built a Church and Chappel to the blessed Virgin; intended for the burial place of the Ducal Family. It is the best peopled Town, for the bigness of it, of any in Italy. 3 Angusta Pratorial, now called Aost, situate in the furthest corner of Italy to the North and West. 4 Vercelli, a strong Town bordering upon Millain, to which it formerly belonged; and was given first in Dower with Blanch the daughter of Philip Maria Duke of Millain, to Amadee the third Duke of Savoy; and antiently the chief Town of the Lilyci, who together with the Salassi and Taurini, were the old Inhabitants of this Countrey. 5 Inuria called by Polomy Eparodia, situate at the very jaws of the Alpes, an Episcopal City. 6 Nicea, or Nizze, an Haven on the Mediterranean, at the influx of the River Varus, which divides it from Provence; beautified with a Cathedral Church, the Bishops Palace, a Monastery of Nuns, and an impregnable Citadel. A place so naturally strong, that when at lace, a Monastery of Nuns, and an impregnable Citadel. A place so naturally strong, that when at lace, yet the Fortifications were imperfect, it resisted the whole Forces of Barbarossa the Turkish Admiral, An. 1543. lying before it with a Navy of two hundred sayl, and battering it continually with incredible fury. First fortified by Duke Charles, upon occasion of some words of the Duke of Burbon, who passing this way with his Army, Behold, saith he, a situation of which they know not the importance: who passing this way with his Army, Behold, saith he, a situation of which they know not the importance: the Citadel being after added by Emanuel Philibert, and garrisoned for the most part with 400 soldiers. 7 Suse, seated in the ordinary thorough-fare betwixt France and Italy, called of old Sigovio; and honoured in those times with a stately Sepulchre of K. Cottius, King of the Allobroges: one

Savoy. one of the seven Marquises in the middle times erected by the Emperour Otho. 8 Pignarolle, fortified with a Cattle of great importance, which commandeth all the adjoining valleys; sold by Duke Charles Emanuel to Levis the 13th of France, together with the Fort and valley of Peronsa, (and in them both to the number of ten or twelve Towns and Villages) for the sum of 494000 Crowns, to be for ever in the propriety and Sovereignty of the Kings of France; and thereby giving to the French commodious pass from Dauphine into Italy upon all occasions, and no small influence and command on his own Estates. 9 Quier, adorned with many goodly Churches, fair Convents, and noble Families. 10 Ville Franche, a place of great strength, more towards the sea. 11 Savillan, seated in so pleasant a Country, that Duke Emanuel Philibert had once a purpose to settle his abode in it, and make it the chief of his Estate. 12 Buigne, a Marquise, another of the seven erected for the sons of Waleran. 13 Hereunto we may add the City of Ast (though properly within the limits of Montferrat) antiently a Colony of the Romans; and now to be compared, for the greatness and beauty of her Palaces, to the most stately Cities of Lombardy; situate betwixt the two Rivers of Po and Tenarius, very rich, and populous.

Here is also in this Country the Marquise of Saluzzes, (of the same erection as the former, but a greater Estate) the cause of so many differences betwixt France and Savoy. The principal Town whereof is called also Saluzzes (from the Salassi questionless who dwelt hereabouts) seated about the Spring of the River Po: reasonably big, and fortified with a very large Castle, fitted with rooms for all uses, and for every season. 2 Courmayoula, which gave name to that famous Captain who carried so great a sway in the Wars of Italy. A Town so fortified and stored with all sorts of Ammunition, that it is thought impregnable. 3 Ravalle, a well-fortified place. 4 Doglian, the thorough-fare for the greatest part of the trade which is driven betwixt Piemont, and the River of Genoa. The Arms hereof Argent, a Chief Gules.

The antient Inhabitants of this Country were the Salassi, Libyici, and Taurini, as before is said; all vanquished by the Romans, and their Country made a Province of that Empire, by the name of the Province of Alpes Cottie, in the time of Nero; of which Genoa was the Metropolis or principal City. The present are descended, for the most part, of the Heruli, who under the Conduct of Odoacer conquered Italy; whereof he was proclaimed King by the Romans themselves, but Odoacer being vanquished near Verona, by Theodoric King of the Goths, the Heruli had this Country allotted to them by the Conqueror, for their habitation. They had not held it long when subdued by the Lombards, of whose Kingdom it remained a part, till given by Aripert the seventeenth King of the Lombards, to the Church of Rome; affirmed by some to be the first temporal Estate that ever the Popes of Rome had possession of. But lying far off, and the donation not confirmed by the Kings succeeding, the Popes got little by the gift: so that in the subverting of the Kingdom of the Lombards, it was at the devotion of the Kings of Italy, of the house of Charles the Great; and afterwards of his successors in the Empire, by whom distracted into several Estates and Principalities. Thomas, and Peter, Earls of Savoy, made themselves Masters of the greatest part of it, by force of Arms: the former in the year 1210. the later in the year 1256. Since that time the first son of Savoy is styled Prince of Piemont. The Marquise of Saluzzes, containing almost all the rest, was added by the marriage of a daughter of this Marquise, with Charles Duke of Savoy, An. 1481. Of which marriage though there was no issue, yet the Savoyards always held it as their own; till the French upon as good a title possessed themselves of it: Recovered by the Savoyards, An. 1588. the Civil Wars then hot in France. But finding that he was not able to hold it against Henry the fourth (who looked upon it as a door to let his forces into Italy) he compounded with him, An. 1600. the Country of Bresse being given in exchange for his Marquise: Of which, together with the residue of Piemont, and some pieces of importance in the Dukedom of Montferrat, that noble Family of Savoy doth now stand possessed.

The Arms of this Principality are Gules, a Croffe Argent, charged with a Label of three points Azure.

2 S A V O Y, strictly and specially so called, is bounded on the East with Wallisland, and part of Piemont; on the West, with Dauphine, and La Bresse; on the South, with some parts of Dauphine only; and on the North with Switzerland, and the Lake of Geneva.

The Country is for the most part hilly and Mountainous, overspread with the branches of the Alpes, healthy enough, as commonly all Hill-countries are, but not very fruitful; except some of the vallies which lie nearest to the Western Sun, and the plain tract about the Lemanian Lake, lying towards Geneva. By reason of the difficult and narrow wayes, and those full of Theeves, it was once called Malvoy: but the passages being opened by the cost and industry of the people, and purged of theeves by good Laws and exemplary justice, it gained the name of Savoy, or Salvoy, quasi salva via: as Maleventum, a Town of the Realm of Naples, on the like considerations got the name of Benevent. By the Latines of these later times it is called Sabaudia, a name not known to any of the antient Writers; who knew it by no other name than that of the Allobroges, or Allobrogum Regio.

The common people are naturally very dull and simple, so grofs of understanding for all their continual converse with other Nations, who take this Country in their way to Italy; that they believe the Duke of Savoy to be the greatest Prince in the World: and so unwarlike, that a few men of another Nation well trained and disciplined, will make a great number of them flee. But on the other side, the Gentry are of a very pleasing conversation, civil, ingenious, and affecting all good exercise: so as there may be dayly seen in Chambéry as much good company, and as well appointed and behaved, as in many of the best Towns of France or Italy. The number of both sorts taking in Piemont (who are not interested in the first part of this character) are thought to be 800000.

The

Savoy. The chief Cities are, 1 Chambéry, situate on the banks of the River L'Arch, in a very pleasant valley, compassed round with Mountains; the principal of the Dukedom on that side of the Alpes: honoured with the Dukes Court when he resideth in this Country, the ordinary seat of Justice, and many neat houses which belong to the Gentry: fortified of late with a strong Castle and sufficient Outworks; but not recovered of the damage it received An. 1600. when it was forced by King Henry the fourth of France, in his Wars with Savoy. 2 Tarentaise, an Arch-bishops See, situate in the midst of the Mountains; heretofore the Metropolis of the Province of the Alpes Graie, and Pennine, and called by Antoninus, Civitas Centronum, from the Centrones who inhabited about this Tract. 3 Lunenburg, in the Country of the old Medulli; betwixt which and Suse, a Town of Piemont, lyeth the most ordinary road betwixt France and Italy. 4 Ague belle, situate at the foot of a craggy Rock. 5 Rapaille, a sweet and fruitful situation, on the South-side of the Lake Lemmanus, the chief Town of the Signeury of Fossigny: were Amadee the first Duke of Savoy, having given over his Estate, lived a Monastick life, and was thence chosen Pope by the Fathers of Basil, An. 1440. 6 Nun or Nevidum (by some of the old Latins called Noviodunum) an antient City, layd desolate, in, or before the time of Julius Caesar, repaired again in the Empire of Vespasian; the seat of late times of the Bishops of Geneva, since their expulsion out of that City. 7 Bele, on the Rhodanus, or Rhofne. 8 Albon, founded about the year 456. 9 Conflans, fortified by the late Dukes of Savoy, but otherwise of small importance. 10 Anneciana, not much observable, but for being the seat or place of Solemnities, for an order of Knights called by that name. 11 Maurienne, or St. John de Maurienne, an Arch-bishops See, situate in a Valley of the Alpes so called; the chief City of the old Medulli, who dwelt hereabouts; from whence the Princes of this house were first entituled Earls of Maurienne only. 12 Charbonnery, a well-fortified place. Here is also the strong Town and Fort of Montmelian, which held out four months against Henry the fourth, and many thousand shot of French Cannon, An. 1600. and the impregnable Forts of St. Catharines, which yet submitted to that King; the Government whereof being denyed to the Duke of Byron, plunged him in discontent and treason, to the loss of his head.

The many Tribes in and about this mountainous Country, of which we have mentioned some before, pass generally in most antient Writers, by the name of Allobroges; because the most powerful of them all. Of whom the first mention which we find in story, is the Atroement made by Annibal in his passage this way, between Bruncus and his Brother, about the succession of the Kingdom. Afterwards siding with the Salii a Gallick Nation, in a War against Marselles, then a confederate of the Romans, they drew that people on their backs: by whom they were in fine subdued, with the loss of no less then 120000 Galls, under the several conducts of Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus, and Qu. Fabius Maximus; by which last, Bituitus, or Bitultus King of the Auverni, one of the confederates, was led in triumph unto Rome. The Country and people at that time were much alike, Columi atroci præcaci ingenio, a sharp air, and a stubborn people, as it is in Florus: not without commendation in the following Ages, for discovering Catiline's conspiracy, by which the whole Roman State was in danger of ruin. After which we find Cottius one of the Kings of these Allobroges, to have been in special favour with Augustus Caesar: affirmed to be the founder of twelve Cities in this mountainous tract, whence it had the name of Alpes Cottie; and by that name reduced into the form of a Province, by the Emperor Nero. In the declining of that Empire, this Province became a part of the Kingdom of Burgundy; and passed with other rights of that falling Kingdom, to the Emperors of Germany, by the gift of Rodolph the last King. To them it did continue subject till the year 999. in which Berard of Saxony, son of Hugh of Saxony (which Hugh was son of Otho, and brother to Otho the third) for killing Mary the lascivious Wife of his Uncle, fled from Germany; and settled himself here, near France. His son Humbert, (surnamed Blanchmanis, that is White-hand) was by the special favour of the Emperor Conradus Salicus, made Earl of Maurienne; which is a Town of this Country, An. 1027. And by this marriage with Adela, the daughter and heir of the Marquise of Suse, added that noble Marquise (one of the seven erected by Otho the second, and given amongst the sons of Waleran) unto his estate. Humbert the second gained by conquest the Town and Territory of Tarentaise; as Ame, or Amadee the third did the Counties of Vaulx, and Chablais, An. 1240. or thereabouts. Ame, or Amadee the fourth, by the Marriage of Sibille daughter and sole heir of Ulric Earl of Bresse, added that Earldom to his house: as Ame, or Amadee the ninth, did the town and Territory of Vercelli; upon the contract betwixt Philibert his son and Successor, with Blanch the base daughter of Philip Maria Duke of Millain, who afterwards was married unto Francis Sforza. Ame, or Amadee the second Earl of Maurienne was by the Emperor Henry the fifth, invested with the title of Earl of Savoy; and Amadee the eighth, created the first Duke, by the Emperor Sigismund, An. 1397. But the main improvement of the power and patrimony of this House, came by the valour and good success of the two Earls, Thomas, who in the year 1210. and Peter one of his sons and successors (for his manifold Conquests, surnamed Charlemaine the Junior) An. 1256. by conquest got a great part of Piedmont; to which the Marquise of Saluzzes, containing almost all the rest, was united by a Marriage of the daughter of the Marquise, to Charles Duke of Savoy: and though he dyed without issue by her, An. 1489. yet his successors still kept the possession of it, till Francis the first, pretending some title to it in the right of his Mother (a daughter of the house of Savoy) laid it unto the Crown of France: from which it was again recovered by the Savoyard, during the French Civil Wars; An. 1588. and now is peaceably possessed. The Country of Bresse being given to the French, for their pretension to this Marquise, An. 1600. These Dukes of Savoy have a long time been devoted to the faction of Spain, especially since the French Kings took in the lesser states bordering bordering of them, as Burgundy, Bretagne, &c. Charles the third sided so constantly with the Emperor Charles the fifth, that denying Francis the first a passage for his Army through the Countrey into Italy; he was by the said King dispoyle of his Estates, An. 1536. The Emperor to recover it left nothing undone, but in vain; for the French encountering his force in the open field, vanquished them, with the slaughter of fifteen thousand of his men. In the year 1558. peace being made between Henry; and Philip, successors to those great Princes: Emanuel Philibert, son to Duke Charles, was restored to all his Rights. His son and successor having married Catharine the daughter of King Philip the second, depended wholly upon Spain, notwithstanding many quarrels which did grow betwixt them; his sons receiving thence many great pensions and preferments. For at the same time Prince Amadee Victorio the second son, during the life of Philip his elder Brother, was chief Commander of that Kings Gallies; and had in pension a hundred thousand Crowns per annum; Philibert the third son, was Vice-roy of Sicily: Maurice the fourth a Cardinal had a moiety of the Revenues of the Arch bishoprick of Toledo; and Don Thomas, though then young, had his pensions also. But Amadee Victorio, who succeeded him, marrying Madam Christiane, a daughter of King Henry the fourth of France, changed his dependences; and held more close to France than any of his Predecessors: but whether to the hurt or benefit of his Estates, future times will shew. For leaving his Heir a Minor, in the hands of his Mother; the French upon pretence of preserving the Countrey for him, against the incroachments of the Spaniards, have made themselves matters of the greatest parts of it: which when they will restore to the proper owner, is beyond my cunning to determine. But now behold the Catalogue of the

The Forces of this Duke consist especially in his Forts, and Garrisons, whereof he hath good store in Savoy, and Piedmont, well fortified and plentifully furnished with all manner of Ammunition. And it concerneth him so to have, considering what dangerous neighbours he hath near him, and that his Countrey is a continual thorow-fare, for the Armies both of France, and Spain, upon all occasions. Nor doth it less conduce to his preservation, that he hath so many retreats of natural strength, as are not easily accessible by a conquering Army: of which last fort is, amongst many others, the valley of Aost (which some reckon for a part of Savoy, and some of Piedmont) so strong by reason of the narrow entries, the uneasy passages, and the great multitudes of the people which inhabit in it; that those who have made themselves matters of the rest of the Countrey, durst never attempt it. And of the first, besides those formerly described, is the Town of Nizze, so fortified and flanked upon all accesses, that it seems rather to be an assembly of Forts, than a single Fortress. Out of which Garrisons, the Duke is able to draw great Forces for present service; service, besides the readiness of the Piedmontese upon all occasions, which are for the most part given to Arms.

The ordinary Revenue, of this Dukedom (taking Piedmont in) are said to be above a Million of Crowns per annum. But his extraordinary is so great, that Duke Charles Emanuel, during his Wars with Henry the fourth, in a very few years drew out of Piedmont only eleven Millions of Crowns; besides the charge which they were put to in quartering of Souldiers. By which it may appear, that the Dukes are not like to want money to serve their turns, when they shall desire it of the Subject; and yet not charge them more then they are able to bear.

The only Order of Knighthood in this Dukes Estate is that of the Annunciada ordained by Amadee the first Duke, at what time he defended Rhodes from the Turks, An. 1409. Their Collar is of fifteen Links, to shew the fifteen myseries of the Virgin: at the end is the portraiture of our Lady, with the history of the Annunciation. In stead of a Motto, these letters, F. E. R. T. id est, Fortitudo Ejus Rhodum Tenet, are engraven in every plate or link of the Collar: each link being interwoven one within the other, in form of a True-lovers knot. The number of the Knights is fourteen, besides the Duke, who is the Sovereign of the Order: the solemnity was held anciently on our Lady-day, in the Castle of Saint Peter in Turin: But of late time in the Town of Annunciada, from hence so denominated. So from this victory (for every repulse of the besieger, is a victory to the besieged) there arose a double effect; first, the institution of this Order; secondly the assumption of the present Arms of this Dutchy, where are G. a Cross, & A. This being the Cross of Saint John of Jerusalem, whose Knights at that time were owners of the Rhodes. Whereas before, the Arms were Or, an Eagle displayed with two heads, Sable, Armed Gules supporting in Fesse, an Escutcheon of Saxony, that is Barrowise six pieces Sable and Or, a Bend flowred Vert: A Coat belonging to the Emperors of the house of Saxony, from whom the first Earls of Savoy did derive themselves.

3. The Signeury of GENEVA.

GENEVA is a City in the Dukedom of Savoy, formerly subjects to its Bishops, acknowledging the Dukes of Savoy for the Lord in chief: now reckoned as a Free-Estate, bordering close upon the Switzers, and with them confederate; and so more properly within the course and compass of the Alpine Provinces. It is situate on the South-side of the Lake Lemane, opposite to the City of Lozanne in the Canton of Bern, from which it is distant six Dutch miles: the River Rhosne (having passed through the Lake with so clear a colour, that it seemeth not at all to mingle with the waters of it) runneth through the lower part thereof, over which there is a passage by two fair Bridges. This lower part is seated on a flat or level, the rest on the ascent of an hill: the buildings fair and of freestone, well fortified on both sides both by Art and Nature; in regard of the pretensions of the Duke of Savoy (whom they suffer not to arm any Gallies upon the Lake) and other jealousies of State. The compass of the whole City is about two miles, in which there are supposed to be about sixteen or seventeen thousand souls. One of their Bridges is more antient, and better fortified than the other, belonging antiently to the Switzers (or Helvetians, the old inhabitants of that tract) but broken down by Julius Caesar, to hinder them from passing that way into Gallia.

The people of the Town are generally of good wits in the managery of publick businefs, but not very courteous towards strangers, of whom they exact as much as may be; modest and thrifty in apparel, and speak for the most part the Savoyard, or worst kind of French. So that the great resort of young Gentlemen thither, is not so much to learn that Language (which is nowhere worse taught) as out of an opinion which their parents have, that the Reformed Religion is nowhere so purely practised and professed as there. By means whereof, the free or seminary of our Gentry being seasoned in their youth with Genevan Principles; have many times proved disaffected to the forms of Government (as well Monarchical as Episcopal) which they found established here at home: to the great imbroilment of the State, in matters of most near concernment. The women are said to be more chaste (or at least more reserved) than in any other place in the World: which possibly may be ascribed to that severity, with which they punish all offenders in that kind. Dancing by no means tolerated in publick, or private; Adultery expiated by no less than death: Fornication, for the first offence with nine days fasting upon bread and water in prison; for the second, with whipping; for the third with banishment. But notwithstanding this severity, they make love in secret, and are as amorous in their dalliances, as in other places.

The Territories of it are very small, extending not above two Leagues and an half from any part of the Town: but the soyl, if well manured, bringeth Grain of all sorts; and great store of Wine: There is likewise plenty of pasture and feeding grounds, which furnish the City with flesh-meats, butter and cheese, at very reasonable rates: the nearness of the Lake affording them both Fish, and Wild-fowl in good measure; and amongst others (as some say) the best Carps in Europe.

But the main improvement of this State is by the industry of the people, and the convenient situation of the City it self: the City being situated very well for the trade of Merchandise, in regard it is the ordinary passage, for transporting Commodities out of Germany, to the Marts at Lyon; and from thence back again to Germany, Switzerland, and some parts of Italy; And for the industry.

ner of Ammunition appertaining to them; and on the Lake some Gallies in continual readiness, against the dangers threatned them by the Dukes of Savoy. And for the greater safety of their Estate, and the preservation of their Religion, they joyned themselves in a constant and perpetual League with the Canton of Bern, Anno 1528, communicating to each other the Freedom of their several Cities; and by that means, are reckoned for a member of the Common-wealth of the Switzers, which is no small security to their affairs. But their chief strength, as I conceive, is that neighbouring Princes are not willing to have it fall into the hands of that Duke; or any other Potentate of more strength than he. Inasmuch that when that Duke besieged it, Anno 1589, they were aided from Venice with four and twenty thousand, and from England, with thirteen thousand Crowns, from Florence with Intelligence of the Enemies purposes. Another time, when the Pope, the French King, the Spaniard, and Savoyard had designs upon it; the Emperor offered them assistance both of Men and Money: yea and sometimes the Dukes of Savoy have assisted them against the others, as being more delicious that the Town should remain as it doth, than fall into any other hands than his own. So ordinary a thing it is for such petit States, to be more safe by the interests of their jealous neighbours, than any forces of their own.

The Armies of Geneva, when under the command of the Earls thereof, were Or, a Cross Azure. But for the title of Geneva after it had been born a while by the Earls of Savoy, it was given to Philip youngest son of Anne or Amadee the first Duke, to Janus the third son of Lewis the second Duke; and finally to Philip Duke of Nemours, the fourth son of Philip the seventh Duke of Savoy, in whose posterity (Dukes of Nemours) it doth still continue.

4. WALLISLAND.

EASTWARD from Savoy, in a long and deep bottom of the Alpes Penina, lyeth the Country of WALLISLAND: so called either quasi Wallensland, or the land of the Valenses, once the inhabitants of the Country about Martinacht, a chief town hereof; or quasi Vallisland, or the Land of Vallies, of which it totally consists. It reacheth from the Mountain de Furken, to the Town of St. Maurice, where again the hills do close, and shut up the valley; which is so narrow in that place, that a bridge laid from one hill to another (under which the River Rhosne doth pass) is capable of no more than one Arch only, and that defended with a Castle and two strong Gates. On other parts it is environed with a continual wall of steep and horrid Mountains, covered all the year long with a crust of Ice; not passable at all by Armies, and not without much difficulty by single passengers; so that having but that one entrance to it, which before we spake of, no Citadel can be made so strong by Art, as this whole Country is by Nature. But in the bottom of those craggy and impassable Rocks, lies a pleasant Valley, fruitful in Saffron, Corn, Wine, and most delicate fruits; and happily enriched with Meadows, and most excellent Pastures, which yeeld a notable increase of Cheese and Butter: And in the Country about Sion they discovered in the year 1544. a Fountain of Salt: and have also many hot Bathes, and medicinal waters very wholesome. Of Springs, and River-water, they are very destitute; having scarce any but what they fetch from the Rhosne, with a great deal both of charge and trouble (the common people using snow-water for the most part for domestick uses): which made one pleasantly observe, that they pay dearer for their Water, than they do for their Wine. Cattel they have sufficient to serve their turn, and amongst others, a wild Buck, equal to a Stag in bigness, footed like a Goat, and horned like a fallow Deer, leaping with wonderful agility from one precipice to another, and so not easily caught but in Summer time; for then the heat of that season makes him blinde.

It is divided into the Upper and the Lower Wallisland: the Upper lying towards the Mountain de Furken, in the very bottom of the Valley; and the Lower stretching out to the Town of St. Maurice, which is at the opening of the same: the length of both said to be five ordinary dayes journey, but the breadth not answerable. The Upper Wallisland containeth the seven Resorts of 1 Sion, or Sedune; 2 Lenck; 3 Brig; 4 Nies; 5 Rawren; 6 Sider; 7 Gomber; in which are reckoned thirty Parishes: the Lower comprehending the six Resorts of 1 Gurdis; 2 Ardoz; 3 Sallien; 4 Martinacht; 5 Turemont; and 6 St. Maurice: in which are 24 Parishes. The people in both parts said to be courteous towards strangers, but very rough and churlish towards one another.

The several resorts before mentioned, are named according to the names of their principal Towns: which according to their reckoning are thirteen in number. The chief of which are 1 Sedunum, Sition or Sion, a Bishops See, suffragan to the Metropolitan of Tarentinise; the chief of all this little Country: of no great beauty in it self, but neat and gallant in respect of the Towns about it. Situate in a Plain on the River of Rhosne, under a Mountain of two tops; on the one of which being the lower, is seated the Cathedral Church, and the Canons houses; and on the other, looking downwards with a dreadful precipice, a very strong Castle, the dwelling place of the Bishop in the heats of Summer: which being built upon an hill of so great an height, and so hazardous an ascent, is impossible almost to be took by force; the sharpness of the Rocks keeping it from the danger of assaults, and the highness of the hill from the reach of the Gun-shot. 2 Marchinacht, by Cesar called Obedurus, and Civitas Valensium by Antonius, remarkable for its antiquity only. 3 Saint Maurice, or Saint Moritz, anciently Auganum, the Key of the whole Country; but in Winter especially, when all the other passages are frozen up, that there is no other entrance but by the Bridge at this Town; which for that cause is very well manned and fortified to avoid surprisal; and therefore also chosen for the seat of the Governour of the Lower Wallisland.

This Country now called Wallisland, is in most Latin Writers called by the name of Valesia, but corruptly, as I think, for Valensia, as the Dutch or English name for Wallensland: which name I should conceive it took from the Valenses, the old inhabitants of this valley, of whom Obedurus (now called Marchinacht) is by Antonius made to be the Metropolis, or principal City. It was made subject to the Romans by Julius Cesar, at such time as the Helvetians were conquered by him: and falling with the Western parts of the Roman Empire unto Charles the great, was by him given to Theodulus Bishop of Sion, Anno 805. Under his successors they continue to this very day; but so, as that the Deputies of the seven Resorts have not only voices with the Canons in his Election, but being chosen and invested unto the place, they joyn with him also in the Diets for choosing Magistrates, redressing grievances, and determining matters of the State. The Lower Wallisland obeyeth the upper, made subject by long War, and the chance of Victory, and hath no sway in the publick Government, but takes for Law that which their Governours agree of. The same Religion is in both, being that of Rome. For maintenance whereof they combined themselves with the seven Popish Cantons of Switzerland, Anno 1572, or thereabouts: as also for their mutual defence and preservation against Foreign Enemies, and keeping amity and concord amongst one another.

5. SWITZERLAND.

NEXT unto Wallisland lyeth the Country of the SWITZERS, having on the East, the Grisons, and some part of the Tirol, in Germany; on the West, the Mountain Jura, and the Lake of Geneva; which parts it from Savoy, and Burgundy; on the North, Suevia or Swabens, another Province also of the upper Germany; and on the South, Wallisland and the Alpes, which border on the Dukedom of Millain.

The whole Country heretofore divided into three parts only, that is to say, 1 Argow, so called from the River Aaz, whose chief Town was Lucern: 2 Wistisburgergow, so called from Wistisburg an old Town thereof, the chief City whereof is Bern: And 3 Zurichgow, so named from Zurich, both formerly and at this present the Town of most note in all this Tract; but since the falling of these Countreys from the house of Austria, divided into many Cantons, and other members; of which more anon.

It is wholly in a manner over-grown with craggy Mountains, but such as for the most part have grassie tops, and in their bottoms afford rich Meadows, and nourishing pastures, which breed them a great stock of Cattel, their greatest wealth. And in some places yeelds plenty of very good Wines, and a fair increase of Corn also, if care and industry be not wanting on the Husband-mans part; but neither in so great abundance, as to serve all necessary uses, which want they do supply from their neighbouring Countreys. And though it stand upon as high ground as any in Christendom, yet is no place more stored with Rivers, and capacious Lakes; which do not only yeeld them great abundance of Fish, but serve the people very well in the way of Traffick, to disperse their several Commodities from one Canton to another. Of which the principal are, Bodensee, and the Lake of Cell, made by the Rhene; Genfer-see, or the Lake of Geneve, by the Rhosne; Walldster-see, and the Lake of Lucern, made by the Russe; Namunburgur and Bieter-see, by the Orbe; and Zurich-see, by the River of Limat, or Lima-chus.

It is in length two hundred and forty miles, an hundred and eighty in breadth; conceived to be the highest Country in Europe (as before is said) the Rivers which do issue from it running through all quarters of the same; as Rhene, through France and Belgium, North; Po, through Italy to the South; Rhodanus, through part of France, to the Western Ocean; and the Imm, which falling into the Danubius passeth through Germany, and Hungary, into Pontus Euxinus.

And as the Country is, such are the Inhabitants, of rude and rugged dispositions, more fit for Armes than any civil occupations; capable of toyl and labour, which the necessities of their Country do inure them to, notable otherwise to afford them an hungry livelihood: the poverty whereof makes them seek for service, which they shift and change according as they like the conditions of their entertainment; and having no way to vent their superfluous numbers by Navigation, are able to spare greater multitudes to a Foreign War, than a man would easily imagine. In a word, the people are naturally honest, frugal and industrious, impartial in the administration of Justice, and great lovers of Liberty.

In matters of War, they were once of such a reputation, on the defeats given by them to Charles of Burgundy, that no Prince thought himself able to take the field, or stand his own ground in defence of his Dominions if he had not Switzers in his Army: And to advance their reputation, the Wars which followed in Italy about the Dutchy of Millain, served exceeding fitly. For being borderers on that Country, they could be hired better cheap by the French, or Spaniards, than any Army could be brought out of France, or Spain. And having had some good successes to increase their fame, they grew so terrible at last; that the Spaniards in the War of Guien were more afraid of one band of Switzers, than of all the rest of the French Army. But being found withall to be false and treacherous, and calily bought off by the better purse (which they most evidently discovered in betraying Duke Lodovick Sforze, who had put himself and his estate into their hands); and those Italian Wars growing into an end, they did decay so fast in their reputation, that first the neighbouring Princes could do well without them; and at last used them not at all, or at least very sparingly. And now it is their honour that they are chosen of the Guard to the French King, and the Popes of Rome, and the Dukes of Genoa; and that the greatest Princes of Europe give them yearly pensions. Which pensions were given heretofore to be assured of their aid upon all occasions, but now to keep them from engaging on the other side.

For matter of Religion it is proportionably mixt; some of the Cantons being wholly Popish, some wholly Protestant; in others both Religions used promiscuously. At first the differences were so eagerly pursued on both sides, that notwithstanding the mediation of some potent neighbours, it broke out into a Civil War; the Cantons of Switz, Uren, Underwald, Lucern, and Zug (which the Latin Writers of this story call the Quinquagici) arming against Zurich, Bern, and others which adhered to Zuinglius. In the beginning of which War, the Protestant party was discomfited, Zuinglius himself slain in the head of the battle, and his body burnt: his heart remaining in the midst of the fire, whole and untouched (as Archbishop Trammes also did) when all the rest of his body was consumed to ashes. But those of the Reformed party would not so give over. Another field they fought for it, and therein had the better of the adverse party. Wearied at last with reciprocal defeats, they agreed the business, indulging each to other the free exercise of their own Religions. So it continueth at this day, diversity of opinions not drawing them from a due care of the publick interests, nor giving any interruption to that bond of peace which was so firmly knit amongst them in their first confederacies.

Now for the body of their State, it consists of three distinct parts, or members, which are to be considered in this discourse; viz. the Swisse themselves, the Præfectures which are subject to them, and the States that are confederate with them. The Swisse are subdivided into thirteen Cantons, that is to say, Switz, Uren, Underwald, Lucern, Zug, Bern, Zurich, Basle, Friburg, Solothurn, Apenzel, Glaris and Schaffhausen. These properly make the body of that Common-wealth, enjoying many rights, privileges and preeminences which the others do not; as power to determine of war and peace, to dispose of the Præfectures, and divide amongst themselves the spoil of the Enemy. The first confederacy was made betwixt the Cantons of Switz, and Underwald, Anno 1315. Of which the Switz being the most potent, the most exasperated, and that which did most hotly prosecute the combination, gave to the rest the name of Switzers, first made for ten years only, in defence of themselves against the violence of Albert the first, Emperor and Duke of Austria; intending to alienate them from the Empire, and add them by strong hand to his own Estates, Anno 1309. but made perpetual after their great victory obtained against Duke Leopold, the son of Albert, in the fields of Mortgarten, of which more anon. Lucern was added to the three, Anno 1332. Zug, Zurich, and Glaris, came not into the confederacy till the year 1352; nor Bern until the year next after. Friburg and Solothurn came in Anno 1481. Basle and Schaffhausen united with them in the year 1501. and Apenzel, which was the last which was admitted into their confederacy, Anno 1513. So that there passed within little of two hundred years, from the first beginning of these Leagues, to the finishing of them.

The second Member of this body, are the Towns and States, Confederates with them, for the preservation of their common Liberties, viz. the Town and Abbot of Saint Gall, the Towns of Rotwel, Mulhausen, Nuenburg, and Biel, situate on the Lake thence named: (of which the first belonged heretofore to the Earls of Longeville in France, the latter to the Bishops of Basle) with the City and Signeury of Geneva: And of these, Rotwel and Mulhausen are confederate with all the Cantons; the rest, with some particulars only. The Abbot of St. Gall first entered into League with Zurich, Lucern, Switz, and Glaris, for the preservation of his Lands and Towns then revolting from him: and the Town following his example, confederated with Zurich, Bern, Switz, Lucern, Zug, and Glaris, the better to preserve themselves from the power of their Abbot, who was before their natural and immediate Lord. This was in Anno 1452. Rotwel, and Mulhausen, two Imperial Towns in the Province of Schawlen, confederated in a perpetual League with all the Cantons; the first, Anno 1515. the other, Anno 1519. Neuenberg, Biel, and Geneva, with Bern only.

As for the Præfectures of the Switzers, they are such lesser parcels and additaments, as have accrewed to their Estate, and are subject unto their authority; either by gift, purchase, or the chance of war: some lying in Switzerland itself, some amongst other parts of the Alpes, and some in Italy. These are the Towns and Countreys of Baden, Brengarten, Mellingen, Rappenswill, Wagenhall, interposed here and there amongst the Switzers: the Town and Countrey of Sargans, lying amongst the Rhetian Alpes, not far from the Grifons; and Rhineck, lying in a valley of the Alpes, on the left shore of the Rhene, near the Lake of Constance; and finally the valleys of Lucarno, Magia, and Lugano, Mendrisio, and Belinzana, situate in and amongst the Alpes, near the Dukedom of Millain, to which they formerly belonged. Of which the Præfectures of Baden and Mellingen appertain to the eight first Cantons: Wagenhall, the Sargans, and Rhineck to the seven first Cantons; Rappenswill to Uren, Switz, Underwald, and Glaris; and Thurgow, unto the ten first Cantons: Belinzana to the three first only; and all the rest of the Italian Præfectures to the Cantons generally, excepting Apenzel, which was not entred into the confederacy when these Præfectures were given unto the Switzers by Maximilian Sforza Duke of Millain; which was in Anno 1513. some months before the taking in of Apenzel to the rest of the Cantons.

Such is the number of the Cantons, Præfectures, and States confederate, amongst all which there are few Towns or Cities of any note: there being no City nor walled Town in the Cantons of Switz, Uren, Underwalden, Glaris Apenzel, nor in any of the States confederate situate amongst the Switzers, but Saint Gall only; nor in any of the Præfectures but that of Baden. So that the places worthy of con- sideration are not like to be many.

Of those that are, the principal are, 1. Zurich, a large City, and a renowned University, situate on both sides of the River Liman, where it issueth out of the Lake called Zurich-See. It had anciently two Monasteries in it, in one of which Huldrych Zuinglius was a Canon, slain near this Town in the battle spoken of before, Anno 1531. now giving name to the most honourable of the Cantons, to which belongeth the authority of summoning the general Diet as of those also of the Protestants; the Legats thereof presiding in both assemblies. 2. Friburg, situate on the River Sane, on the declivity of an uneven and rocky hill, founded by Berthold the fourth Duke of Zeringen. 3. Solothurn, (the Solothurnum of Antoninus) on the River Aar, famous for the Martyr-Zeringen. 4. Basle, so called either of a Baslik slain at the building of the City, or of the time of Abraham. 5. Lucern, situate on both sides of the Russe, where it issueth and the lesser lying towards Germany. 6. Bern, compassed almost round with the River Aar, and whosoever seeth him shall die that year. 7. Lausanna, the only Town of all the Cantons, which the East side only, which is towards Italy. 8. Schaffhausen, the only Town of all the Cantons, which lyeth on the other side of the Rhene; of right belonging unto Suevia, or Schwaben, a Province of Germany, and reckoned as a part thereof, before it was incorporated into this confederacy. Next for the Præfectures, and confederate States, they have not many Towns of note (excepting Rotwel, and Mulhausen, two Imperial Cities, which properly belong to another place.) Of those which be, the principal amongst the Confederates, lying within the bounds of this Countrey, is the Town of Saint Gall (Sengall as they corruptly call it) an Imperial City, situate amongst the Mountains near the Boden-See. A rich, populous, and well-governed Town, taking name from the Monastery of S. Gall, a famous Scott, and the Apostle of those parts, Anno 630, or thereabouts; the Abbot of which having great possessions in this tract (before Apenzel, and this Town revolted from him) was a Prince of the Empire. The Anabaptists were once very prevalent here, in so much that one of them cut off his brother's head in the presence of his Father and Mother; and said (according to the humor of that sect, who boast much of dreams, visions, and Enthusiasms) that God commanded him so to do. The principal amongst the Præfectures is the Town of Baden, or (to difference it from Baden a Marquisite in the middle Germany) the Upper Baden; seated on a little Mountain near the River Limat, almost in the middle of the Countrey: and for that cause the place of meeting for the Council of Estate of all the Confederates. It taketh name from the Baths here being, two of which only are publick, the rest in private houses: conscious, as it is thought, to much lasciviousness. For whereas it is said of Adrian, that Lucas vacra pro sexibus separavit; here men and women promiscuously bathe together; and which is worst, in private: where, as Monaster telleth us, Cernunt viri uxoribus tractari, cernunt cum alienis loqui, & quidem solam cum solo; and yet are not any of them disturbed with jealousy. The Baths are much frequented, yet not so much for health as pleasure. Their chiefest vertue is the quickning power they have upon barren women. But as the Friers use to send men whose wives are fruitless, in pilgrimage to Saint Joyce, the Patroness of fruitfulness; and in the meantime to lie with their Wives: so it may be with good reason thought, that in a place of such Liberty as this is, the lusty young gallants that haunt this place, produce greater operation of barren women, than the waters of the Bath itself. No other Town of eminent note amongst the Præfectures of the Swissers, except Rhineck, itself, the seat of the Governour for the Switzers, situate near the Lake of Constance: and none of any note at all amongst the Italian Præfectures, except Belinzana, and Lucarno; neither of them containing 400 Houses; and those none of the handomest.

land;

Within the limits of this Country, and in that part thereof which was called Argow, containing the now Cantons of Aargau, Schwyz, Unterwald, Glarona, and Lucern; with some of the adjoining parts of Germany, and some part of the Dukedom of Savoy; did sometimes stand the famous and renowned Castle of HABSPURG: from the Lords whereof the house of Austria, and most of the Kings and Princes of the Christian World do derive themselves. First founded, as some say, by Ottobert the third Prince of this line, at or before the year 700; as other say, by Rapato the son of Betzeline, about the year 1000. Situate on the River Aar (by the Latins called Arula) near a Town called Bruck; now decayed, that there is no tracing of the ruins. Preserved in memory by the Lords and Princes of it, descended in a direct line from Sigibert the eldest son of Theodebert King of Metz, or Austrasia; first seated in these parts by Clotaire the second, King of the French, with the title, as some say, of Duke of Upper Almain (the Lower Almain being that which is now called Saxony or Schwaben, an adjoining Province of Germany). Being soon weary of that empty, but invidious title, they were sometimes called Barks of Habsburg, by the name of this Castle; sometimes Earls of Altemburg, another Castle not far off of their own foundation. And after closing in with the Kings of Burgundy Transjurane, and the German Emperors, they received of them a great part of the Country of Argow; from which some of them were called Earls of Argow. Not known distinctly by the title of Earls of Habsburg, till the time of Rapato above-mentioned; when those of Altemburg and Argow became discontinued. However we will here lay down the whole succession of this famous family, either Earls, or the Progenitors of

The Earls of Habsburg.

635. 1. Sigibert, son of Theodebert King of Metz, by Clotaire the second of that name, French King, dispossessed of the Kingdom of his Father; and afterwards by him endowed with a great part of those Countreys, which are now called Switzerland, with the title of Duke of Upper Almain.
2. Sigibert II. son of Sigibert the first, Duke of Upper Almain.
3. Ottobert, or Othert, the son of Sigibert the second, the founder, as some say, of the Castle of Altemburg and Habsburg, of which promiscuously called Earl.
4. Beho, the son of Ottobert, the last Duke of Upper Almain; which title he exchanged for that of Earl of Altemburg, and Habsburg.
5. Robert, or Rotber, as some call him, the son of Beho, Earl of Altemburg.
766. 6. Hertbert, the son of Robert, who added unto his Estate that part of Schwaben, or Suevia, which is called Brissgau.
7. Rampert, the son of Hertbert, who flourished Anno 814, at what time he procured the Canonization of S. Trutpertus.
8. Guntram, the son of Rampert, Earl of Altemburg.
9. Luitbard, the son of Guntram.
909. 10. Luitfride, the son of Luitbard.
929. 11. Hunifride, the son of Luitfride, who added unto his Estates the Territory now called Sun-gow, bordering on Alsacia, a Province of Germany; recovered after his decease by the Dukes of Schwaben.
950. 12. Guntram II. son of Hunifride, the first who took unto himself the title of Earl of Argow: from whose second son named Berthilo, descended the Dukes or Earls of Zeringen, possessed of almost all Brissgau, and good part of Switzerland, which they inherited from Berthold, the son of Gebiro the third son of Guntram; Who having founded the Castle of Zeringen, and acquired great possessions in the adjoining parts of Schwaben, left them at his decease (being childless) to Berthold the son of Berthilo, and his Cousen German.
13. Betzo, or Betzeline, the eldest son of Guntram the second, Earl of Argow.
14. Rapato, son of Betzeline, the founder or repairer of the Castle of Habsburg, from whence both he and his successors were constantly called Earls of Habsburg. Great Grand-father by Theodorick, his youngest son, of Rodolph Earl of Rhinefelden, and Duke of Schwaben, elected Emperor (at the instigation of the Pope) against Henry the fourth.
15. Warner, by some called Berenger, or Berengarius, the son of Rapato.
1096. 16. Otho, the son of Warner or Berenger.
1108. 17. Warner II. son of Otho, enriched by the Emperor Henry the fourth, with some fair Estates belonging to the Dukes of Schwaben.
18. Albert, the son of Warner the second, surnamed the Rich.
19. Albert II. surnamed the Wise, son of Albert the first, added to his Estates a great part of the Upper Alsacia; which he had by the right of Hedwigis his wife, one of the daughters and heir of Simon the last Earl thereof.
1238. 20. Rodolph, the fortunate son of Albert the second, added to his estate the rest of the Upper Estate, elected Emperor of the Romans, Anno 1273. Of which he made to good advantage, that he added unto his Estates the great Dukedom of Austria, with all the incorporate Provinces thereunto belonging, and laid the first foundation of the Austrian greatness; of which more in Germany. Here only note, that besides the following Princes of the house of Austria, those of the line Collateral still retained the title of Earls of Habsburg (according to the ill custom of Germany) increased with the addition of the Earl-

Earldom of Kyburg, of which more hereafter: and so continued till the expiring of that line in the person of Rodolph the fourth, the last that bare the title of Earl of Habsburg, Anno 1356. by whose death many fair Estates were added to the Austrian Family.

Having on the occasion of these Earls of Habsburg, beheld so much of the affairs of this Country, as related unto that puissant and illustrious family, let us go forward to the rest: first taking in our way the ancient estate hereof in the time of the Romans. At what time this whole mountainous tract, containing many several Nations (some of them spoken of before) was comprehended under the general name and notion of the Helvetii; the greatest and most populous of all the rest: so called, as Versegan will have it, Quasi Hil-vites, or the Vites of the Mountains, to difference them from the Vites of the lower parts, inhabiting in that part of Cimbrick Chersonneft, which is now called Switzerland; and from those dwelling in the middle, betwixt both extremes in the little Province still called Vosland. Grown by long peace, and want of opportunity by traffick into foreign parts, to so great a multitude, that the Country barren of it self, was no longer able to maintain them; they set fire on their Towns and Houses, and with a general resolution went to seek new dwellings. The total number of men, women and children, which went upon this desperate action, are said to have amounted to the number of 368000, whereof 90000 were fighting men. They had not long before overthrown L. Cassius a Roman Consul, slain the Consul himself, and sold his Souldiers for Bond-slaves: upon the apprehension of which good success, they thought no body able to withstand them. But they found Cassius of a stronger metal than L. Cassius. Who having stopped their passage by hewing down the bridge of Geneva, till he was grown strong enough to bid them battle; so waited them in several skirmishes and defeats, that they were forced to crave leave of him to go home again, and to rebuild those Towns and Villages which they had destroyed before this enterprise: which he upon delivery of Hostages, did vouchsafe to grant. It is conceived, that at the least two Millions of them perished in this journey, and not so much by the sword (though that spared them not) as for want of necessities. After this they continued Members of the Roman Empire, till conquered in the times of Honorius and Valentinian the third, by the Burgundians and Almans, betwixt whom divided; the River Rust parting their dominions. From them being taken by the Frank, it was made a part of the Kingdom of Burgundy; some parts first taken out, and given to the Progenitors of the Earls of Habsburg, as before was noted. Given with the rest of that Kingdom to the Emperor Conrade the second, by Rodolph the last King thereof: parcelled out by the German Emperors (as their custom was) into divers States; most of the which were drawn in by the Dukes of Schwaben, the Earls of Habsburg, Kyburg, Werdenberg, &c. and the Dukes of Zeringen; as afterwards in the fall of the one, and as heirs to many of the other, by the Dukes of Austria. By means of which united titles the Austrian family was possessed of so much of this Country, as now makes up five Cantons, and as many of the principal Prefectures; that is to say, the Cantons of Zug, Glarona, Lucern, Friburg, and Schaffhausen; the Prefectures of Baden, Brengarten, Mellingen, Wagonshall, Rapperswyll; together with a great part of the Country of Targow, wherein stands the City of S. Gall, now a Confederate with the Switzer; some of the rest, as Uren, Switz, Underwalden, being brought under by the power of the Emperor Albert, the son of Rodolph of Habsburg, who had a purpose to unite them to the house of Austria; because obnoxious also to the power of those Princes. But the people being at last over-burthened by the tyranny of those Governors, whom the Dukes of Austria and their other Lords had sent among them; seeing withall the Empire by the Popes Fulminations distracted into many Factions, and the Austrian Family weakened by a sub-division of that great Estate into many parcels; they contracted an Offensive and Defensive League amongst themselves, for defence of their Liberty: into which first entred those of Switz, Oren and Underwald, Anno 1385. Not all united into one Confederation till the year 1513, as before was noted. At their first beginning to take Arms, Frederick, one of the many Dukes of Austria (to whose share they fell) sent his Brother Leopold against them with a puissant Army which they encountered near Morigarten a village of the now Canton of Underwalden; and there overthrew him: but more by the convenience of those narrow passages, through which his Army was to march, than by any valour. In which it was no small help to them, that the ways were all so filled with Ice, that he was able to do no service with his Horse; and his Souldiers so amazed at the present difficulties, that the Confederates only casting stones on them from the tops of the Mountains, made them leap into the Lakes adjoining. This hapned in the year 1315. Grown confident by this success, they brought the new Canton of Lucern into their confederacy by the force of Arms, Anno 1332. and that of Zurich by their reputation and like hope of Liberty, Anno 1351. in which year those of Zug, and Glaris invaded by the former five, and willing to discharge themselves of their Lordly Masters, were united to them, as was the new Canton of Bern in the year next following. In the year 1381. the Towns of Solothurn and Friburg, descended from the house of Zeringen, (at the expiration of that line) upon those of Habsburg, revolted from their natural Lords and admitted Cantons; occasioned Lepold son of Albert the fourth, and brother of Albert the fourth, Dukes of Austria, to make War upon them: in which War being vanquished and slain near Sempach a village of the Canton of Lucern, with the Flower of his Nobility and Gentry, Anno 1386, and the succeeding Dukes not venturing any more against them, the residue of the Cantons and Confederates were in time made up.

Having thus cleared themselves of the House of Austria, they continued free and unmolested, but never came to any reputation for their valour, till the War made upon them by Charles Duke of Burgundy, whom they discomfited in three great batels, and slew him also in the third. A war commenced by him at the first on small occasions, and less hopes: the Country being so barren and the people

The Leagues of the GRISONS.

THE Country of the GRISONS comprehendeth all that part of the Alpes, which lieth between the Springs of the Rivers Rhene, Inn, Adice or Athesia, and Adna: being bounded on the East, with the Country of Tirol; on the West, with Switzerland; on the North, with Suevia or Schwaben, and a part of the Switzers; on the South, with Lombardy. A Country far more mountainous than any of this Alpine tract, and having less natural commodities to boast it self of, more than the Fountains of those Rivers before mentioned.

The People of it by most Latin Writers of these times, are called by the name of Rheti, the Country Rhetia: and so far properly enough, as that the ancient Rheti did inhabit all the lands possessed by the Grisons: though the Grisons do not inhabit a fourth part of those Lands, which were possessed heretofore by the ancient Rheti: For anciently the Rheti did extend their dwellings as far as from the Alpes of Italy, to the River of Danow; comprehending besides this of the Grisons, a great part of Suevia or Schwaben, Tirol, Bavaria, and so much also of the Switzers, as was not in possession of the old Helvetii. Within which Tract there were not only many rich valleys and fruitful fields; but a most pleasant race of Wines called Vina Rhetica, much drank of by Augustus Caesar, and by him preferred before all others; which no man can conceive to grow in this barren Country. More properly Ammianus Marcellinus calleth this Tract by the name of Campi Canini, Mountainous Fields, which the continual Snow made look of an hoary hue: and by allusion thereunto, the Dutchmen call this Nation at the present by the name of Grampuntner, that is to say, the hoary or gray Confederates.

As for the Rheti, take them in the former latitude, they were subdued by Drusus and Tiberius the Sons-in-law and adopted children of Augustus Caesar, A.V. C. 739. And in the time of Antoninus made up two Provinces of the Empire, viz. Rhetia prima, and Rhetia secunda, both of them appertaining by Constantine's new model, to the Dioecesis of Italy. A Nation in the first Original, of Italian race, and so more properly to be assigned to that Dioecesis; but had inhabited this tract, from the time that Bellovesus the Gall seized on part of Tuscany, expelling thence the ancient inhabitants thereof: who under the conduct of Rhemus, a great man amongst them, possessed themselves of these Mountains, and afterwards of the Vales adjoining, which they called Rhetia, by the name of their Captain General. This happened in the time of Tarquinius Priscus, in the first cradle, as it were, of the Roman Empire: in the declining age whereof, during the reign of Valentinian the third, and Anastasius, those parts which lay nearest unto Germany, and were worth the conquering, were subdued by the Almaini, and Boiarians; by them incorporated with the rest of their several States. The residue of this Mountainous Tract, as not worth the looking after, continued a member of the Empire; till given by Charles the Great to the Bishop of Chur; whose successors, being several ways molested by their potent neighbours, confederate with the Switzers for their mutual aid and preservation, Anno 1497. By whose aid they so valiantly made good their ground against the Austrians, that at the last, after the loss of 20000 men on both sides, the points in difference were accorded, and a peace concluded.

This is the substance of this story, as to former times; to which there cannot much be added in the way of History; little or no alteration happening in their affairs, but a more perfect settling of them in a form of Government. Concerning which we must observe that this whole Tract is cast into three Divisions; that is to say, the Upper League or Liga Grisa; 2 Liga Cadi Dio, or the League of the house of God; 3 The Lower League, called also Liga Distura, or the League of the ten Communalities. The eight Italian Prefectures will make a fourth. Their buildings generally in the three first being cold and mountainous, are of free-stone, but low, and for three parts of the year covered with Snow: the windows thereof glazed and large, of which for the said three parts of the year they only open a little quarry of Glafs, and presently shut it close again; the outside of the windows having leaves of wood, to keep the heat of their Stoves from going out, or any cold from coming in. And as for travelling, the ways are for the most part unsafe and dangerous, by reason of the straight passages, dreadful precipices, and those almost continual Bridges which hang over the terrible falls and Cataracts of the River Rhene, descending with great violence from the highest Mountains: huge hills of Snow tumbling into the Valleys, with a noise as hideous as if it were a clap of thunder.

For the particulars, the Upper League lieth in the highest and most mountainous parts of the Alpes of Italy, having therein those vast Mountains of Locknannier, and Der Vogel; out of which the two streams of the Rhene have their first Original. By the French it is called Liga Grise, or the Gray League, (the word Grise, or Grift, in that Language, being Gray in ours) in the same sense as the Dutch call it Grampuntner, that is, Confederati cani, which we may render properly the Confederate Gristle-pates: either because the mountains are continually covered with a perriwig of hoary Isicles, or from the heads of the people, Gray before their time. It consisteth of nineteen Resorts or Communalities, according to the number of their Vales and Villages; of which four only speak the Dutch, all the rest a corrupt Italian: and was the first which did confederate with the Switzers, from whence the name of Grisons came unto the rest, who after joyned with them in the same confederacy.

confederacy. It hath no City nor Town of note. The principal of those that be, are 1 Flanzer, the place sometimes of the General Diets for these Leagues. 2 Diferntis, where is a very rich Monastery. 3 Saint Bernardino, situate at the foot of the Mountain Vogel. 4 Mafox, sometimes an Earldom, giving name to the Valley of Mafoxer-tal. 5 Galanckter, whence the Vale fo named, inhabited by none but Basket-makers. 6 Ruffla, situate on the River Muesfa, near Belinzano, on the skirts of Italy.

2 The second League, is Liga Cadi Dio, or the League of the house of God, so called because it was the proper Patrimony of the Bishop and Church of Chur: and may be called the middle League, as being situate between the Upper League on the West, and the Lower League upon the East. It is the greatest of the three, containing twenty one Resorts or Communalities: of which nine lie on this side the tops of the Mountains towards Germany, the rest towards Italy: and yet two only speak the Dutch, the others a corrupt Italian. The places of most note are, 1 Tintzen, the Tinnetio of Antoninus, seated amongst high and inaccessible Mountains, betwixt Chur and the Valley of Bergel. 2 Mur, (called Murus by the same Antoninus) in the Valley of Bergel; a valley extending from the head of the River Maira, towards Chiavenna, one of the Italian Prefectures. 3 Stalla, called Revis by the Italians, because the way doth in that place divide it self. 4 St. Jacomo (in the valley of Compolschin) called Travafede by Antoninus. 5 Sinnada, in the valley of Engadin. And 6 Chur, by some Coira, but more truly Curia, so called from the long stay that Constantine the Great made here with his Court and Army, in a War intended against the Germans; built afterwards by some part of his Forces which continued here, Anno 357. about half a Dutch mile from the meeting of the two streams of the Rhene, in form triangular, the buildings indifferent in themselves, but not uniform with one another. High on a Hill, in one corner of which itandeth the Clofe, and therein the Cathedral Church, a stately Edifice, but more in account of the Natives who have seen no fairer, then it is with strangers: and near the Church the Bishops Palace, and the houses of the Canons, all well built, and handsomely adorned. The Bishop of this City, and of all the Country of these Leagues (for they received their Bishop and the Faith together, Anno 489.) acknowledgeth the Archbishop of Meyra for their Metropolitan; is reckoned for a Prince of the Empire, and the rightful Lord both of this City and the whole League: but on the introduction of the Reformed Religion, which they had from the Switzers and Genevians, the Citizens withdrew themselves from their obedience to the Bishop, and govern the City in the manner of a Free State. So far conformable to him, for their own preservation, that as the Bishop and his Canons, with the rest of this League, upon occasion of the wrongs done them by the House of Austria; Lords of the neighbouring Tirol; joyned in confederacy with the seven first Cantons of the Switzers (which was in the year 1498.) So did the Citizens of Chur, after they had withdrawn themselves from the command of their Bishops, concur with them at last in that mutual League.

3 The third League of these Grisons, is the Lower League, called also Liga Distura, or the League of the ten Jurisdiccions; situate close upon Tirol, in the North-east part of the whole Country. Of all the ten, two only, which are those of Malans and Meienfeld, obey the joyned commands of the three Leagues of the Grisons: the other eight being subject to the Arch-Duke of Austria, under whom they are suffered to enjoy their ancient privileges, for fear of uniting with the Switzers; which hitherto they have not done. Only they did unite together in one common League, Anno 1436. conditioning their mutual defence against all Enemies, preservation of their peace, and maintenance of their privileges; reserving notwithstanding their obedience to their natural Lords. In which respect, and by reason of the interests and society which they have with the rest of the Grisons, they are in friendship with the Swiss, but in no confederacy. City or Walled-Town they have none. The chief of those they have, are 1 Castels, the seat of the Governour for the Arch-Duke of Austria. 2 Malans, and 3 Meienfeld, both bordering upon the Rhene. 4 Tanaas, giving name to the first and greatest of the ten Jurisdiccions, the chief Town of this League, in which are held the General Diets for the same; and where are kept Muniments and Records which concern their Priviledges. In this League is the Mountain called Rhetico-mons, by Pomponius Mela, but now Prettigower-berg, because it is at the end of the valley which the Dutch call Prettigow.

4 As for the Italian Prefectures, they are eight in number, and were given unto the Grisons by Maximilian Sforze Duke of Milain, Anno 1513. at such time as he gave the like present to the Cantons of Switzerland. Of these the first is called Plura, so called from the chief Town of the same name, in Latine Plura, once seated in a Plain at the foot of the Alpes, near the River Maira, the chief of sundry Villages lying in the same bottom; now nothing but a deep and bottomless Gulf. For on the 26 of August 1617. an huge Rock falling from the top of the Mountains, overwhelmed the Town, killed in the twinkling of an eye 1500 people, and left no sign or ruine of a Town there standing; but in the place thereof a great Lake of some two miles length. 2 Chiarama, situate in a pleasant valley so called, near the River Maira, and ten Italian miles from the Lake of Como. Antoninus calleth it Clavenna, and the Dutch, Clewmer-tal, or the valley of Cleven, more near unto the ancient name. 3 The Valtolina, Valia Telina in the Latine, a pleasant valley, extending threescore miles in length, from the head of the River Aada, unto the fall thereof in the Lake of Como: the Wines thereof are much commended, and frequently transported on this side the Alpes. It is divided into six Prefectures, according to the names of the principal Towns. The chief whereof, are 1 Bormio, seated near the head of the River Aada. 2 Telo, the chief Fortrefs of the whole valley. 3 Sondrio, the chief Town, and the Seat of the Governour, or Lieutenant General of the whole Country. This valley lying opportunely for the passage of the King of Spain's Forces, out of Milain into Germany, by the practices and treasons of Radolphus Planta, one of the Natives of it, and of the Romish Religion; was delivered to the Duke of Feria, being then Governour of Millain, Anno 1622. the whole Country brought under the obedience of that King, Chur it self forced and taken by them, and the Religion of Rome settled in all parts thereof. But two years after, by the joynt Forces of the French, Venetians, and Savoyard, the whole Valley was recovered from the Spaniards, and after a long treaty between France and Spain, the Grifons re-estated in their just possessions, Anno 1630. save that the Spaniard still holds the Fort of Fuentes, for the safer passage of his Forces, if occasion be.

Grifons.

Such is the state of the three Leagues, considered severally and apart from one another. In reference to the whole, they make up one Government, or Common-wealth; for ordering whereof they hold a General Diet, once in every year, consisting of threescore and three Commissioners: that is to say, 28 from the Upper League, 23 from the League of the House of God, and 14 from the League of the Jurisdictions. These have authority to determine of Appeals from the common Præfectures, to conclude of Peace and War, Confederacies, Ambassies, and Lawes, which concern the publick: yet so, that in a point of Judicature, it is lawful to appeal unto the Commonalties of every League, who have authority if need be, to reverse the sentence; the causes being severally proposed, and passed by the major part of voyces. The Government of each League, popular, as amongst the Switzers.

OF FRANCE.

Having thus crossed the Alpes, we may indifferently dispose our selves for France or Germany. But we will follow the course and fortunes of the Roman Empire, which first passed into France, before it medled with the Germans; and had brought Spain and Britain under the form of Roman Provinces, when Germany was looked on at a greater distance.

FRANCE then according to the present dimenions of it, is bounded on the East with a branch of the Alpes, which divide Dauphine from Piemont; as also with the Countries of Savoy, Switzerland, and some parts of Germany and the Netherlands; on the West with the Aquitain Ocean, and a branch of the Pyrenean Mountains, which divide it from Spain; on the North with the English Ocean, and some parts of Belgium; and on the South, with the rest of the Pyrenean Mountains, and the Mediterranean.

The Figure of it is almost square, each side of the Quadrature being reckoned 600 miles in length. But they that go more exactly to work upon it, make the length hereof to be 660 Italian miles, the breadth 570 only, the whole Circumference to amount to 2040. Seated in the Northern temperate Zone, between the middle Parallel of the fifth Clime, where the longest day is 15 hours, and the middle Parallel of the eighth Clime, where the longest day is 16 hours, and an half.

It hath this present name of France, from the Franci or Franks, a people of Germany, who seized upon those parts of it which lay nearest to the Rhene, in the time of Valentinian the third; and having afterwards subdued Paris, and made it the Seat-Royal of their growing Empire, they caused the Country thereabouts to be called France. Which name, as they enlarged their borders, they imposed on, or communicated rather, to the rest of this Country; and to those parts of Germany also which were conquered by them. At which time, for distinction sake, they called the East parts of their whole Empire by the name of Ostern-reich or Austrasia, lying now wholly out of France, in Germany, and that part of Belgium which is subject to the King of Spain: and for the West parts thereof, they had the name of Westen-reich, or Westrasia, (in the barbarous Latin of that Age) West France, or Francia Occidentalis; to which the name of France was at last appropriated, according to the limits before laid down.

Anciently it was called Gallia, and the people Galli, and by that name occurs most commonly in the Writers of the Roman story; and Gallia Transalpina, because situate on the further side of the Alpes from Italy, to difference it from the Country of those Gauls which being planted in those parts which we now call Lombardy, was called Cisalpine. Sometimes it was called Galatia also, and by that name known amongst the Greeks: by Ptolomy called Celto-Galatia, or the Galatia of the Celts, a potent nation of old Gaul; to distinguish it from Galatia, one of the Provinces of Asia minor, denominated from the Galatians or Gauls of this Country. Whence it became so named, is not yet determined. Some think it was called Gallia, from the Greek word Γαλα, (Gala) signifying milk, quia Lacteos, i. e. albos homines producebant, for the milky and white complexion of the people, compared to the Greeks and Romans who first imposed it. Others, and amongst them Diodorus Siculus, derive the name from Galata, a son of Hercules; to which that of Galatia comes as near as may be. That Hercules was sometimes in this Country, is affirmed also by Ammianus Marcellinus; who further adds, That after he had suppressed those Tyrants which oppressed the People, he begat many Children on the principal Women; Et eos, partes quibus imperitabant, nominibus suis appellasse, Lib. XL. Who gave their own names to those parts over which they ruled. But in another place acknowledging that the Grecians call this People Galata (ita enim Gallos sermo Græcus appellat) he telleth us from Timogenes an ancient Author, one very diligent in the search of the Gallick Antiquities, that the Aborigines or first Inhabitants hereof, called themselves Celts, by the name of one of their Kings, whom they highly honoured. Et matris ejus vocabulo Galatas, et Galata from the name of his mother Galata: who probably enough might be a daughter of Hercules, mistook by Diodorus for one of his sons.

Of the Original of this People more anon. In the mean time we may take so much notice of the ancient Gauls, as to affirm him (out of Cæsar and other Authors) to be quick witted, of a sudden and nimble apprehension, but withal very rash and hair-brained, (ut sunt subita Gallorum ingenia, is a note set upon them by the pen of Cæsar:) so full of Law-suits and contentions, that their Lawyers never wanted work.

work. Gallia Cisalpinus, &c. this Poet hath it: of vehement affections, and precipitate in all their actions, as well Military as Civil; falling on like a Clap of Thunder, and presently going off in Smoke. Primus impetus major quam virorum, secundus minor quam feminarum, was a part also of their Character in the time of Florus the Historian. And though the present French be generally of another Original; yet there is so much of the old Gaul still left among them, either by the Impression of the Heavenly Bodies, or by inter-marriages with the Gauls, as they overcame them, that all these qualities are still predominant in the French, not differing from the ancient Gaul, but in Name and Habit. For further evidence whereof, take with you a Comparison, homely I must confess, but to the life expressing the nature of the French, compared with the Dutch and Spanish, in matters of War. The French is said to be like a Flea, quickly skipping into a Country, and soon leaping out of it, as was the Expedition of Charles the eighth into Italy. The Dutch is said to be like a Louse, slowly mastering a place, and as slowly (yet at last) driven out of their hold, as was their taking and losing of Ostend and Gulick. The Spaniard is said to be like a Crab, or Pediculus inguinalis, which being once crept into a place, is so rooted there, that nothing but the extremity of violence can fetch him out again. In which I think I need not instance, it being generally observed, that the Spaniards will endure all possible hardship, before they will part with any thing that they are possessed of. It is used also for a By-word, that the Italian is wise before hand, the Dutch in the time of action, and the French after it is done; a wisdom much like that of the ancient Gauls. Nor are they less Litigious than the old Gauls were: Inasmuch as it is thought that there are more Law-suits tried among them in seven years, than have been in England from the Conquest till the time of King James. They are great Scoffers, yea even in matters of Religion, as appeareth by the story of a Gentleman lying sick on his death-bed; who when the Priest had perswaded him that the Sacrament of the Altar was the very Body and Blood of CHRIST, refused to eat thereof because it was Friday. Nor can I forget another in the same extremity, who seeing the Host (for so they call the Consecrated Elements) brought unto him by a lubberly Priest, said that CHRIST came to him, as he entered into Hierusalem, riding upon an Ass. As for the Women, they are said to be witty, but apish, wanton, and incontinent: where a man at his first entrance may find acquaintance, and at his first acquaintance may find an entrance. So Dallington in his View of France, describeth them. But I have since heard this Confure condemned of some uncharitableness, and the French Gentlemen highly magnified for all those graces which may beautify and adorn that Sex. And it is possible enough that it may be so in some particulars, though it be more than any man would guess at, that cometh amongst them. For generally at the first sight, you shall have them as familiar with you, as if they had known you from your Cradle; and are so full of Chat and Tattle, even with those they know not, as if they were resolved sooner to want breath than words, and never to be silent but in the Grave.

As to the persons of this People, they are commonly of a middle stature, and for the most part of a slight making; their complexion being generally hot and moist, which makes them very subject to the heats of lust, and easily inclinable unto those diseases which are concomitants thereof. Their constitution somewhat tender, if not delicate, which rendreth them impatient of Toil and Labour; and is in part the cause of those ill successes which have hapned to them in the Wars; in which they have lost as much for want of constancy and perseverance in their Enterprizes, as they have gained by their courage in the undertaking. And for the Women, they are for the most part very personable, of frail bodies, slender waists, and a fit Symmetry of proportion in all the rest; their hands white, long, and slender, and easily discernable to be so; for either they wear no Gloves at all, or else so short, as if they were cut off at the hand-wrist. To these the Complexion of their faces, and the colour of their hair, too much inclining to the black, holds no true Decorum. 'Tis true the Poets commend Leda for her black hair, and not unworthily; Leda fuit nigris conspicienda comis, as it is in Ovid. But this was specially, because it set off with the greater luitre, the amiable sweetness of her Complexion: for in that case the Hair doth set forth the Face, as shadows commonly do a picture; and the Face so becometh the Hair, as a Field Argent doth a Sable bearing, which kind of Coat our Critical Heralds call the most fair. But when a Black Hair meets with a Brown or Swarthy Complexion, it falls short of that attractiveness of Beauty, which Ovid being to great a Crafts-Master in the Art of Love, did commend in Leda.

The chief exercises they use, are 1 Tennis; every Village having a Tennis-court, Orleans 60. Paris many hundreds. 2 Dancing, a sport to which they are so generally affected, that were it not so much enveighed against by their trait-laced Ministers, it is thought that many more of the French Catholics had been of the Reformed Religion. For so extremely are they bent upon this sport, that neither Age nor Sickness, nor poverty it self, can make them keep their heels still, when they hear the Musick. Such as can hardly walk abroad without their Crutches, or go as if they were troubled all day with a Sciatica, and perchance have their raggs hang so loose about them, that one would think a swift Galliard might shake them into their nakedness, will to the Dancing Green howsoever, and be there as eager at the sport, as if they had left their several infirmities and wants behind them. What makes their Ministers (and indeed all that follow the Genevian Discipline) enveigh so bitterly against Dancing, and punish it with such severity when they find it used; I am not able to determine, nor doth it any way belong unto this discourse. But being it is a Recreation which this people are so given unto, and such a one as cannot be followed but in a great deal of company, and before many witnesses and spectators of their carriage in it; I must needs think the Ministers of the French Church more nice than wife, if they choose rather to deter men from their Congregations by so strict a Stoicism, than indulge any thing unto the jollity and natural gaiety of this people, in matters not offensive, but by accident only.

The Language of this people is very voluble and pleasant, but rather Elegant than Copious, and there-therefore much troubled for want of proper words to find out Periphrases; besides that very much of it is expressed in the action; the head and shoulders move as significantly toward it, as the lips and tongue; and he that hopeth to speak it with any good grace, must have somewhat in him of the Mimick. A Language enriched with great plenty of Proverbs, consequently a great help to the French humour of Scoffing; and so naturally disposed for Courtship, as makes all the people complementary; the poorest Candler in the Parish hath his Court-crings, and his Eau de vie de Cour, his Court-holy-water (as they call it) as perfectly as the best Gentleman-Huissier in Paris. Compared with that of other Nations, the Language of the Spaniards is said to be Manly, the Italian Courty, and the French Amorous. A sweet Language it is without question, the people leaving out in their pronunciation many of their Consonants, and thereby giving occasion to this By-word, that the Frenchman pronounceth not as he writes, singeth not as he pricketh, nor speaks as he thinketh. In the Original thereof it is a compound of the old Gallick, German, and Latin Tongues: the old Gallick being questionless the same with the Welsh or British, as appeareth clearly by these reasons: 1 The Latin words are known to have been received from the Romans; and the German words at the coming in of the Franks and Burgundians; but of the Welch words which they have, we can give no reason, but that they are the remainder of their ancient Language; of which Welch words which still continue in that Language, Camden in his Britannia reckoneth not a few. 2 It is said by Tacitus that the Britans were the Descendants of the Gauls, and this he proveth as by other Arguments, so from the identity or near resemblance of the Language which both Nations speak. Utinsque sermo haud multum diversus, as his own words are. And 3 it is said by Cæsar, That the Gauls used to pass into Britain, to be instructed in the Rites and Learning of the Druides; which sheweth that both People spake but one common Tongue, there being in those times no one learned Language which other Nations studied besides their own.

The soyl is extraordinary fruitful, and hath three Load-stones to draw riches out of other Countries, Corn, Wine, and Salt; in exchange for which, there is yearly brought into France 1200000 li. Sterling, the Custom of Salt only to the King being estimated at 700000 Crowns per annum. And indeed the benefit arising on this one commodity is almost incredible; it being constituted by the Kings Edict (which is all in all) that no man shall have any Salt for Domestick uses (except by special privilege, and that dearly paid for) but what he must buy of the Kings Officers; and that upon such prices too as they please to sell it. Nor can it but be very well stored with Fish; for besides the benefit of the Seas, their Lakes and Ponds belonging to the Clergy only, are said to be 135000. Their other Merchandises are Bees, Hogs, Nuts, Woad, Skins, vast quantites of all sorts of Linnen. And to say truly, there are not many Countries in the Christian World, to which Nature hath been so prodigal of her choicest blessings, as she hath to this; the fields thereof being large and open, and those so intermingled with Corn and Vines; and every hedge-row so beset with choice of Fruits, that never any covetous or curious eye had a fairer object. And yet so miserable is the condition of the common Peasant, partly by reason of the intolerable Taxes laid upon him by the King, and partly by those great, but uncertain Rents which are set upon him by his Landlord (for the poor Husbandman is Tenant only at the will of his Lord) that there is many one amongst them, who farmeth yearly thirty or forty Acres of Wheat and Vines, that never drinks Wine, nor eats good Bread, from one end of the year unto the other.

The Christian Faith was planted first amongst the Gauls, by some of St. Peters Disciples, sent hither by him at his first coming to Rome: Xystus, Fronto, and Julianus, the first Bishops of Rhemes, Perigord, and Mantz, (Cenomanensium in the Latine) being said to be of his ordaining in the Martyrologies. The like may be affirmed (but on surer grounds) of Trophimus the first Bishop of Arles. For on a controversy betwixt the Archbishops of Vienna and Arles, for the dignity of Metropolitan, in the time of Pope Leo the first; it was thus pleaded in behalf of the Bishop of Arles, quod prima inter Gallias, &c. That Arles of all the Cities of Gaul, did first obtain the happiness of having Trophimus, ordained Bishop thereof by the hands of St. Peter. Nor is St. Paul to be denied the honour of sending some of his Disciples thither also to preach the Gospel: Crescens sent by him, as he telleth us 2 Tim. 4. into Galatia, being the first Bishop of Vienna, spoken of before; as not the Martyrologies only, but Ado Viennensis, an ancient Writer of that Church, doth expressly say. And that it was into this Country that he sent that Crescens at that time, and not unto Galatia in Asia minor; the testimonies of Epiphanius and Theodoret which affirm the same, and that which hath been said before of this name of Galatia, may confirm sufficiently. But Christianity being destroyed by the French at their first coming hither, was again planted by the industry of S. Remigius the first Bishop of Rhemes; Clovis or Clodivus the fifth King of the French; giving way unto it for his Wives sake, who was zealous in it; and after taking on himself that holy calling, on a great victory which he won against the Alemanni: By whom being overlaid in the day of Battle, he made his prayers to CHRIST, whom his Wife Clothilda worshipped; vowing to be of that Religion if he gat the Victory; which vow he had no sooner made (as the Story telleth us) but Alemanni invasse timor, a sudden fear fell upon the Alemanni, and the French were Conquerours.

At this time they are divided in Religion, as in other places; some following the Doctrine of the Church of Rome, and others that of those Reformed Churches which adhere to Calvin. But this division is more ancient than Calvin's dayes; the same opinions (as they relate unto the Errors in the Romish Church) being maintained formerly by the Albigenses, the Waldenses, or Pawperes de Lugduno (the Vandoyes, as the French Writers call them) of whom we shall speak more when we come to Lyons. Suffice it in this place to note, that the Doctrine of the Reformed Churches was not new in France, when Zuinglius first preached against the superstitions of the Mass; and the worship of Images; and Calvin the French in time to come should conquer, and consequently unto France when once conquered by them: I would then ask, Whether it did extend to the Crown alone, or to all subordinate Estates which were holden of it. If unto all Estates holden of that Crown, I would fain know with what pretence they could give sentence in behalf of Charles of Blais, against John de Montfort, in the succession to the Dukedom of Bretagne: Charles of Blais claiming by his mother, the Niece of Arthur the second, by his second son Guy: whereas John de Montfort was the third son (and the next Heir-male) of the said Duke Arthur. If only to the Crown of France, it would be known by what right they detain that Dukedom from the true heirs of Anne the Dutchess: whose Daughter and Heir the Lady Claude, being married unto Francis the first, had issue Henry the second, and other Children. Which Claude, besides Francis the second, Charles the ninth, Henry the third, and Francis Duke of Anjou, all dying without issue, had a Daughter named Isabel or Elizabeth married to Philip the second King of Spain, by whom she was made the mother of Isabella, the late Arch-Dutchess, and of Katharine the Wife of Charles Emmanuel the late Duke of Savoy. Not to say any thing of the pretensions of the house of Lorraine, descending from the Lady Claude, the second Daughter of King Henry the second, and sister of Isabel, or Elizabeth Queen of Spain. Nor do we find that the French to stand upon this Law, as not to think that a Succession by and from the Females, is in some cases their best Title. For thus we read, That Pepin having thrust his Master Childerick into a Monastery, to make good his Title to the Crown (or some colour for it) derived his Pedegree from Plythild, one of the Daughters of Clovis the first, married to Ansbert the Grandfather of that Arnulphus, who was the first Mayre of the Palace of Pepin: Family. As also how Hugh Capet, putting aside Charles of Lorraine the right Heir of this Pepin, to make his lawless Action the more seemingly lawful, drew his descent from some of the Heirs General of Charles the Great; his Mother Adelheid, being the Daughter of the Emperour Henry the first, surnamed the Fowler; who was the son of Otto Duke of Saxony by Luitgarde the Daughter of the Emperour Arnulph, the last Emperour of the Romans (or Germans) of the house of Charles. And it is said of Lewis the ninth, so renowned for sanctity amongst them, that he never enjoyed the Crown with a quiet conscience, till it was proved unto him that by his Grandmother, the Lady Isabel of Hainault, he was descended from Hermingrade the Daughter of Charles of Lorraine. Adde here, that this supposed Salique Law not only crossthe received Laws of all Nations else, which admit of Women to the succession in their Kingdoms, where the Crown descends in a succession: and have a great respect both unto their persons and posterities in such Kingdoms also, where the Kings are said to be Elective, as in Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia: but that even France it self hath submitted to the Imperious command of two Women of the Medices; and at the present to the Government of a Spanish Princess. So that it is evident that this Law, by whomsoever made, and how far soever it extended, is of no such force, but that the Labels of it may be easily cut in pieces by an English sword well whetted; if there were no other bar to the title of England, then the authority and antiquity of the Salique Law.

Law. But for my part (if it be lawful for me to dispute this point) I am not satisfied in the right of the English title; supposing the Salique Law to be of no fuch force, as the French pretended; and meafuring the fucceffion in the Crown of France, to be according to fucceffions in the Realm of England, on which King Edward the third feemed to ground his claim. For if there were no Salique Law to exclude fucceffion by the Females, as the English did pretend there was not: yet could not Edward coming from a fifter of the three laft Kings, which reigned fucceffively before Philip of Valois, againft whom he claimed, be ferved in court, before the daughters of thofe Kings (or the Males at leaft defending of them) had had their turns in the fucceffion of that Kingdom. Of the three Brethren, two left ifue, viz. Lewis, and Philip. Lewis firmed Hutin, fon of Philip the fair, and Joan Queen of Navarre, had a Daughter named Joan, married to Philip Earl of Encreux, who was King of Navarre in right of his wife; from which marriage ifued all the fucceeding Kings of that Realm, the rights whereof are now in the houfe of Burbon. Philip, the fecond brother, firmed the Long, by Joan the daughter of Othelin Earl of Burgundy, had a daughter named Marguerite, married to Lewis Earl of Flanders; from whom defended thofe great Princes of the race of Burgundy, the rights whereof are now in the houfe of Spain. If then there were no Salique Law to exclude the Women and their fons, Charles King of Navarre the fon of Queen Joan and of Philip de Encreux, defended from Lewis Hutin the elder brother; and Lewis de Malaine Earl of Flanders and Burgundy, the fon of Lewis Earl of Flanders, and of Marguerite the daughter of Philip the Long, the fecond brother, muft have precedence of title before King Edward the third of England defended from a fifter of the faid two Kings; their ifue, feverally and refpectively, before any claiming or defending from the faid King Edward. So that K. Edward the third had fome other claim than what is commonly alledged for him in our English Hiftories; or elfe he had no claim to that Crown at all: and I conceive fo wife a King, would not have ventured on a bufinefs of fo great confequence, without fome colourable title; though what this title was is not declared for ought I know, by any Writers of our Nation. I believe therefore that he went upon fome other grounds, than that of ordinary fucceffion by the Law of England, and claimed that Crown, as the eldeft heir-male and neareft Kinfman to the laft King. For being fifters fon to the King deceased, he was a degree nearer to him than either the King of Navarre, or the Earl of Flanders, who were the Grandchildren of his Brethren: and having priority of either in refpect of age, had a fair title before either, to the Crown of that Kingdom. And on thefe grounds King Edward might the rather go, becaufe he found it a ruled cafe, in the difpute about the fucceffion in the Kingdom of Scotland. For though King Edward the firft meafuring the order of fucceffion by the Laws of England, and perhaps willing to adjudge the Crown to one who fhould hold it of him; gave fentence in behalf of John Baliol, the Grandchild of the eldeft daughter of the Earl of Huntingdon:

foxes, that all the Rhetorick in the world cannot get it out of him. Next in their Fashion and Apparel, the French wears his hair long, the Spaniard short; the French goes thin and open to the very shirt, as if there were continual Summer, the Spaniard so wrapt up and close, as if all were Winter; the French begins to burton downward, and the Spaniard upwards; the last always constant to his Fashion, the first intent so much on nothing as on new fancies of Apparel. Then for their Gait, the French walk fast, as if pursued on an Arrest, the Spaniard slowly, as if newly come out of a Quagmire; the French go up and down in clusters, the Spaniards but by two and two at the most; the French walk the march in the Rere, and the Spaniards always in the Van; the French sings and danceth as he walks the streets, the Spaniard in a grave and solemn posture, as if he were going a Procession. The like might be observed of their Tune, their Speech, and almost every passage in the life of Man: for which I rather chuse to refer the Reader to the ingenious James Howell's Book of Instructions for Travel, than insist longer on it here. Only I add, that of the two so different humours, that of the Spaniard seems to be the more approvable. Inasmuch as the Neapolitans, Milanese, and Sicilians, who have had trial of both Nations, chuse rather to submit themselves to the proud and severe yoke of the Spaniards, than the lust and insolencies of the French, not sufferable by men of even and well-balanced spirits. And possible enough it is, that such of the Netherlands, as have of late been won to the Crown of France, will find so little comfort in the change of their Matters; as may confirm the residue to the Crown of Spain, to which they naturally belong.

The chief Mountains of this Country, next to the Pyrenees which part France from Spain; the Jura or Jura, which separates it from Savoy and Switzerland; and the Vange or Voges, which divides it from Lorren; are those which Caesar calleth Gebenna, Ptolomy Cimmeni; being the same which separate Auvergne from Languedoc, called therefore the Mountains of Auvergne; the only ones of note which are peculiar to this Continent of France, which for the most part is plain and champaign; the others before mentioned, being common unto this, with the bordering Provinces.

This Country is wonderfully stored with Rivers, the chief whereof, 1. Sequana or Seine, which arising in Burgundy, watering the Cities of Paris and Roan, and receiving into it nine navigable streams, disburdeneth it self into the British Ocean. 2. Some, in Latine called Samona, which rising near the Town of St. Quintin, first cutteth between Picardy and Artoys, afterwards passeth through the fair City of Amiens, and the goodly Town of Albeville, and finally having received eight lesser streams, loseth it self in the same Sea also. 3. Legeris or Loire, on which are seated Nantes, and Orleans. It riseth about the Mountains of Auvergne, (being the greatest in France) and having run 600 miles, and augmented his channel with the entertainment of 72 lesser rivulets, minglenth his sweet waters with the brackish Aquitane Ocean. 4. Rhodanus, or the Rhosne, which springeth from the Alpes, three Dutch miles from the head of the Rhene, passeth by Lyons and Avignon; and having taken in thirteen lesser Brooks, falleth into the Mediterranean Sea, not far from Arles. 5. The Saone, by the old Latins called Araris, which rising out of the Mountain Vogesus or Vange, in the borders of Lorren and Alsatia, divideth the two Burgundies from each other; and falleth into the Rhosne at the City of Lyons. 6. Garumna or the Garonne, which issuing out of the Pyrenean Mountains, passing by Tholose and Bourdeaux, and having swallowed up sixteen lesser Rivers (of which the Dordonne is the chief) disburdeneth it self into the Aquitane Ocean, near the Town of Blay: that part hereof which is betwixt the main Ocean, and the influx of the River Dordonne, being called the Gironne. Of these it is said proverbially, that the Seine is the richest, the Rhosne the swiftest, the Garonne the greatest, and the Loire the sweetest. And by these and many other Rivers this Kingdom is enriched with 34 excellent Havens, having all the properties of a good Harbour; that is to say, 1. Room, 2. Safety, 3. Easiness of defence, 4. Resort of Merchants.

As for so much of the Story hereof as concerneth the whole, it was first peopled, if we may give credit to Annius, (as I think we may not in this point) by Samothres the sixth son of Japhet (affirmed by them, and such as adhere unto them, to be that son of his, who in the Scripture is called Mesech) in the year of the World 1806. But those which are better conversant in the course of History, have utterly laid aside this device of Annius. Even Funetius, though a great Berossian, doth confess ingenuously, Quis hic Samothres sit incertum est, that it is unresolved who this Samothres was. And Vignier a French Antiquary doth confess with Funetius, Mais on ne sçay qui il estoit, that nobody can tell us who he was. They who have better studied this point than Annius, derive the Gauls from Gomer, Japhet's eldest son, whose off-spring were first called Gomerians, afterwards Cimmerians, at last Cimbr: first planted (as before was said) in the Mountainous places of Albania, where the Mountains called Cimmerii long preserved his memory; and after changing that unfruitful and unpleasant dwelling for the Plains of Phrygia, wherein the City Cimmeria did retain somewhat of his name, in the times of Pliny. Afterwards his posterity proceeded further in the lesser Asia, and in long tract of time filled Germany, and Gaul, and Britain, with his numerous issues: the Gauls and Cimbr being clearly of the same Original, though known amongst the Romans by two different names. From whence they had the names of Gauls, and Celtae, and Galata, hath been shewn before. It shall suffice us now to add, that being originally of the Cimbr, and having somewhat in them of the blood of Hercules; they proved a very valiant and warlike Nation, without whose love, no King could secure himself from imminent dangers. They were very sparing in their diet, and used to fine any one that out-grew his girdle. With these men the Romans fought at first for their own preservation, rather than out of any hope by the conquest of them to improve either their fame or their dominions. Inasmuch that when they had invaded Italy with a numerous Army, in favour of the Cisalpine Gauls, under the conduct of Ambracius and Congelanus, two of their Kings, and pierced as far as Telamon a City of Tuscany; the Romans thought they had had done enough in discomfiting their Forces, and clearing their own Provinces of them; not holding it for a point of wisdom to pursue them, or invade their Country; though by the conquest of Liguria but few years before, they had enlarged their Dominions to the borders of it. But to enumerate more particularly their great achievements in the Wars, these were they who under the conduct of Bellovesus passing over the Alpes, conquered the nearest parts of Italy, called afterwards Gallia Cisalpina; and under that of Segovesus, over-run all Germany; and following their successes as far as Scythia, founded the potent Nation of the Celto-Scythae. These were the men, whose issue under the command of Brennus, discomfited the Romans, at the River Allia; sacked the City, and besieged the Capitol. An. M. 3577. V. C. 365. In which action they so terrified the Romans, that after their expulsion from Rome by Camillus, there was a Law made, that the Priests, though at all other times exempted from Military employments, should be compelled to the War, if ever the Gauls came again. And finally these were the men, who under the command of Belgus and another Brennus, ransacked Illyricum, Pannonia, Thrace, and Greece, in which they spoiled and plundered the Temple of Delphos; for which Sacrilege they were visited with the Pestilence. Such as survived this Plague, went into Asia, and there gave name to that Country now called Galatia; of whom thus Du Bartas:

The ancient Gaul in roving every way,
As far as Phœbus darts his Golden Ray;
Seiz'd Italy: The Worlds proud Mistress sackt;
Which rather Mars than Romulus compact.
Then spoils Pisidia, Mysia doth intral;
And mid'st of Asia plants another Gaul.

Yet at last the Romans undertook the War, but not till they had conquered almost all the residue of the (then known) World. Attempted first by Fulvius Flaccus, a Roman Consul, called in by the Massiliens to assist them against the Salii their unquiet Neighbours, A. V. C. 628. that part hereof which afterwards was called Narbonensis, being brought into the form of a Roman Province at the conclusion of the War against the Allobroges, and Arverni (undertaken on the like complaint of the Hædus) about five years after. Not totally subdued until the time of Julius Caesar, and not easily then. For though the War was managed then by the ablest Captain that ever the State of Rome gave life to; yet was it not more easily vanquished, by the valour and fortune of the Romans, than by want of good intelligence and correspondence amongst themselves. Nor did they sell their liberty so good cheap, as those other Nations, with whom the Romans had to deal; Caesar himself affirming, That he had slain 1192000 of them, before they would submit to the Roman Yoke. But at the last they were brought under the power of Rome, by whom the whole Country was divided into these four parts, viz. 1. Narbonensis, called so from the City of Narbon, then a Roman Colony, containing Languedoc, Provence, Dauphine, and some part of Savoy; called also Braccata at the first conquest by the Romans, from the usual habit of the People (resembling the Mantles used by the Wild Irish) called in Latin Bracca: attempted first by Fulvius Flaccus, in his War against the Salii, as before is said; and finally subdued, A. V. C. 633. by Fabius Maximus, and Cn. Domitius Enobarbus, in their War against the Allobroges, and their Confederates, before mentioned, about 70 years after the coming in of Julius Caesar. 2. Aquitanica, so called from the City of Aqua Augustæ (now D'Agen, in Guienne) lying upon the Pyrenees; and the wide Ocean; which comprehended the Provinces of Gascony, Guienne, Xaintonge, Limosin, Quercy, Perigord, Berry, Burbonnoys, and Auvergne; extending from the Pyrenees to the River of Loire, and consequently stretching over all the middle of Gaul. 3. Celtica, so named from the valiant Nation of the Celte; (called also Lugdunensis, from the City of Lyons; and Comata from the long hair worn amongst this people) extending from the Loire to the British Ocean, and comprehending the Provinces of Britagne, Normandy, Anjou, Tourin, Main, La Beausse, the Isle of France, part of Champagne, the Dukedom of Burgundy, and the County of Lyonnoys. 4. Belgica, from the Belge, a potent Nation of that tract, taking up all the East parts of Gaul, viz. Picardy, the rest of Champagne, the County of Burgundy, together with so much of Germany and the Netherlands, as lyeth on this side of the Rhene, belonging now unto the Empire and the Kings of Spain. In the new modelling of the Empire by Constantine the Great, Gaul was appointed for the seat of one of the four Præfetti Pretorio, designed for the four Quarters of it. His Title Præfictus Pretorio Galliarum; his Government extending over the Dioceses of Gaul, Spain, and Britain: this Diocese of Gaul being cast into seventeen Provinces, that is to say, Lugdunensis Prima, 2. Secunda, 3. Tertia, 4. Quarta, 5. Belgica Prima, 6. Secunda, 7. Germanica Prima, 8. Secunda, 9. Narbonensis Prima, 10. Secunda, 11. Aquitania Prima, 12. Secunda, 13. Novempopulonia, 14. Viennensis, 15. Maxima Sequanorum, 16. Alpes Graia & Pennina, 17. Alpes Maritimæ. Of these seventeen, Germanica Prima & Secunda, all Belgica Prima, and a great part of Secunda, all that of the Alpes Graia & Pennina, and so much of Maxima Sequanorum, as lyeth in Switzerland; are now dismembered from the name and account of France. What principal Nations of the Gauls, and what Provinces of the present France, the rest contained; shall be declared in our Survey of the particulars.

But long it stood not in this state: For within sixty years after the death of Constantine, during the Reigns of Honorius and Theodosius, the Burgundians, a great and populous Nation, were called in by Stilico, Lieutenant to Honorius the Western Emperour, to keep the borders of the Empire against the French; then ready with some other of the Barbarous Nations to invade the same. The Goths not long long after by agreement with the same Honorius, leaving their hold in Italy, were vested in Gaul Narbonensis, by the gift of that Emperour; with a good part of Tarracensis, one of the Provinces of Spain: Aquitain being after added, in regard of the service they had done the Empire, in driving the Alani out of Spain, then likely to have made a great impression on that Countrey. And in the reign of Valentinian the third, the French who had long hovered on the banks of the Rhene, taking advantage of the distractions of the Empire, ventured over the River; first made themselves Masters of Gaul-Belgick; and after spread themselves over all the rest of the Provinces which had not been subdued by the Goths, and Burgundians: excepting a small corner of Armorica, then possessed by the Britanni. So that the Romans being ousted of all the Countrey, it was divided between the Nations above mentioned, and that with more equality than could be imagined: The Goths possessing all Aquidain, and Narbonensis, containing now the Provinces of Provence, Languedock, Gascoigne, Guenne, Xaintoigne, Poitou, Berry, Limousin, Perigord, Quercu, and Auvergne; the Burgundians having for their share the Alpine Provinces, together with Nivernois, Bourbon, Beau-Jolais, Forrest, the Countreys of Lyonnais, La Bresse, Daulphine, and both the Burgundies, from them so denominated. The rest (except that part thereof which we now call Bretagne) was possessed by the French, who in short time repulsed the Visigoths or Western Goths (then busie in the Conquest of Spain) out of all the Provinces of the Roman Aquitain, by the valour of Clovis the Great, their first Christian King, before they could challenge a Prescription of 60 years. Nor was it long before Provence also was resigned to Theodorick the French King, of Mets by Amalsunta, Qu. of the Ostro-Goths, or Goths of Italy, nothing being left unto that Nation of all their Gallick Conquests but Languedock only. In which respect, the Gothish Provinces of Gall (except Provence only) together with so much of the Burgundians which was after layd to West France, shall pass in the account of this Countrey; the rest of the Burgundian Conquests which lie within the bounds of the modern France, (having Provence added to them) shall be considered by themselves in the description and affairs of the Kingdom of Burgundy; a distinct Realm from that of France, and not reduced but piece-meal, and by several titles (and yet not wholly so neither) to the Crown thereof. Finally, of the French themselves, and the succession of their Kings, we will speak at last, when we have brought all the chief parts and Provinces of this flourishing Countrey, into their possession. The principal Provinces are, 1 France, specially so called, 2 Champagne, 3 Picardy, 4 Normandy, 5 Bretagne, 6 The Estates of Anjou, with its members, 7 La Beaulle, 8 Nivernois, 9 The Dukedom of Bourbon, with the Provinces dependent on it, being all (excepting Bretagne) the first acquets of the French. Then follow the chief Provinces of the Gothish Kingdom, that is to say, 10 Berry, 11 Poitou, 12 Limousin, 13 Perigord; and 14 Quercu, 15 Aquitain, with the members of it, and 16 Languedoc: And last of all the Burgundian Kingdom, of which there now remain in France, the Counties of 17 Provence, 18 Daulphine, 19 La Bresse, 20 Lionnois, 21 The Dutchy, and 22 the County of Burgundy, 23 The Islands in the Aquitain, and Gallick Ocean, in the close of all. Of some of which La Nove, a French Author hath passed this censure: The men of Berry are Leachers, they of Tourein Thieves, they of Languedoc Traytors, they of Provence Atheists, they of Rhemes (or Champagne) superstitious, they of Normandy insolent, they of Picardy proud, & sic de ceteris. But here we are to understand, that all these Provinces (though passing by the name and account of France) are not under the command of the French King; the Isles of Jersey and Guernsey being possessed by the English; the Counties of Burgundy, and Charolois by the King of Spain; the Dutchy of Bar, belonging to the Dukes of Lorraine; the Principality of Orange, to the House of Nassau; and Avignon, to the Popes of Rome. And on the other side, the French Kings are possessed of some Towns and Cities, not lying within the bounds of France, as the Imperial Cities of Mets, Toul, and Verdun; lying within the Dukedom of Lorraine, the Fort and Pass of Pignerolle in the Dukedom of Savoy: and the Port of Monaco, in Liguria; Bast Navarre, in Spain: not to say anything of their late acquets in Spain, and Flanders; which I look not on as parts of the French Dominions.

FRANCE, specially so called.

THE first place which the Franks or French had for their first habitation, was by that people honoured with the name of FRANCE; the first green turf of Gallick ground, by which they took livery and seisin of all the rest. A Province now bounded on the East with Champagne, on the North with Normandy, on the West and South with La Beaulle. To difference it from the main Continent of France, it is called the Isle of France; as being circled almost round with several Rivers: that is to say, the Oise on the North, the Eure on the West, the Seine on the East, and a vein-river of the Seine, towards the South. A Countrey not so large as many of the French Provinces, but such as hath given name unto all the rest; it being the Fate of many small, but puissant Provinces, to give their name to others others which are greater then they, if conquered and brought under by them. For thus we see the little Province of Poland, to have mastered and given name to the Mazovii, Pruteni, and other Nations of Sarmatia Europea; as that of Mosco, to the Provinces of Asiatica. And thus have those of Sweden conquered and denominated almost all the great Peninsula of Scandia, whereof it is one of the smallest Provinces. And thus this Island being the seat Royal of the French, in Gallia, gave name to all the residue of it, as they made it theirs. A Countrey generally so fruitful and delectable, (except in Gastinois) that the very Hills thereof are equal to the Vallies in most places of Europe; but the vale of Montmorency (wherein Paris standeth) scarce to be followed in the world. An argument whereof may be, that when the Dukes of Berry, Burgundy, and their Confederates, besieged that City with an Army of 100000 men; neither the Assailants without, nor the Citizens within, found any scarcity of victuals; and yet the Citizens, besides Souldiers, were reckoned at 50000.

It was formerly part of the Province of Belgica secunda, and Lugdunensis quarta, the chief inhabitants thereof being the Parisi, the Bellocaci, and the Silvanctes: and is now divided into four parts, that is to say, the Dukedom of Valois, 2 Gastinois, 3 Hennepin, and that which is properly called the Isle of France, by some the Prevostie, or County of Paris.

The Dukedom or County of VALOIS, lyeth towards Picardy, the principal Cities of it, 1 Senlis, (in Latin Silvanctium) a Bishops Sec. 2 Compeigne (Compendium) seated on the River Oise, a retiring place of the French Kings for hunting, and other Countrey pleasures. 3 Beauvois, the chief City of the Bellocaci, by Prology called Cesaromagus, a fair, large, well-traded Town, from which the Countrey round about hath the name of Beauvoisin. The Patrimony in former times of Rogery, the third Son of Theobald, the second Earl of Blais, and younger Brother of Odon the first Earl of Champagne, who enjoyed it with the Title of Earl of Beauvois: and at his death gave it for ever to the Bishops hereof; for antiently this City was a See Episcopall; the Bishop whereof is one of the twelve Peers of France. Philip one of the Bishops here in times succeeding, a Military man, and one that had much damnified the English Borders, was fortunately taken by King Richard the first. The Pope being made acquainted with his imprisonment, but not the cause of it, wrote in his behalf unto the King, as for an Ecclesiastical person, and one of his beloved Sons: The King returned unto the Pope the Armour which the Bishop was taken in, and these words engraven on the same, Vide an hac sit tunicia filii tui, vel non; being the words which Jacobs children spake unto him, when they presented him with the Coat of their Brother Joseph: which the Pope viewing, swore, That it was rather the Coat of a Son of Marr, than a Son of the Church; and so left him wholly to the Kings pleasure. 4 Clermont, a Town of good note in the County Beauvoisin: memorable for giving the Title of Earl of Clermont, to Robert the fifth Son of the King St. Lewis, before his marriage with the Daughter and Heir of Bourbon; afterwards to the eldest Sons of that Princely Family: and finally to Catharine de Medices, created Countess of Clermont and Boulogne, at her marriage with Henry Duke of Orleans, Successor to King Francis the first in the Realm of France. 5 Luxarch, a Town belonging to the Count of Seissons. 6 Brenouville. 7 St. Loap, on the Confines of Picardy, so called from a Monastery dedicated to S. Leger, Bishop of Troy; in Champagne, sent into Britain with St. Germanus to suppress the Pelagian Heresies, which were there beginning. But of this part of France nothing more observable, then that it gave denomination to the Royal Family of the French Kings (13 in number) from hence entituled de Valois: beginning in Philip de Valois, An. 1328. and ending in Henry the third, An. 1589. As for the Earls hereof (from whom that Adjunct or denomination had its first Original) the first who had the Title of Earl of Valois, was Charles, the second Son of Philip the third, in right of his Wife, Earl of Anjou also: After whose death it descended upon Philip de Valois his eldest Son, who carried the Crown of France from our Edward the third. On his assuming of the Crown, it fell to Lewis his second Brother: and he deceasing without issue, An. 1391. to Lewis Duke of Orleans, Son of Charles the fifth, amongst the Titles of which house he lay dormant, till the expiring of that Line in King Lewis the twelfth; and lately given unto the Monseigneur, or Duke of Orleans, Brother to Lewis the 13th, and Uncle to K. Lewis the 14th, now reigning, upon the first reconciliation made betwixt him and his Brother: adding thereby to his Estate no less than 100000 pounds Sterling of yearly Rents, which make up 100000 *Frank*s or Livres in the French account. I only add that Charles the first Earl of this Family, as he was the Son of Philip the third, Brother of Philip the fourth, surnamed the Fair; and Father of Philip de Valois: So was he Uncle to Lewis Hutin, Philip the Long, and Charles the Fair, all in their other Kings of France. In which regard, it was said of him, That he was the Son, Brother, Father, and Uncle of Kings; yet no King himself.

2 The second part of this Province is called HEUREPOIX, beginning at the little Bridge of Paris on the River of Seine, and going up along the River, as far as the River of Verine, which divides it from Gastinois. The chief Towns of it are, 1 Charenton, three miles from Paris, where the French Protestants of that City have their Church for Religious exercises, it being not permitted them to hold their Assemblies in any Walled Cities, or Garrison Towns, for fear of any sudden surprize, which so great a multitude might easily make. Which Church (or Temple, as they call it) being burnt down by the hot-headed Parisians, on the news of the Duke of *Mayenne*s death, slain at the siege of Montalban, Anno 1622. was presently re-edified by the command of the Duke of Mombazon; then Governor of the Isle of France, at the charge of the State: to let those of the Reformed party understand, that it was their disobedience and not their Religion, which caused the King to arm against them. 2 Corbeil, seated on the confluence of Seine, and Essons. 3 Morris, which gives the Title of an Earl to one of the natural sons of Henry the Fourth, begotten on the Daughter and Heir of the former Earl. 4 Melun, by Cesar called Melodunum, and the seat of the Bailif for this Tract. Here is also in this part the Royal Palace of Fountain-bel-eau, so called from the many fair Springs and Fountains amongst which it standeth; but otherwise seated in a solitary and woody Country, fit for hunting only: and for that cause much visited by the French Kings in their times of leisure; and beautified with so much cost by King Henry the fourth, that it is absolutely the statelyest and most magnificent pile of building in all France.

3 GASTINOIS, the most drie and barren part of this Province, but rich enough if compared with other places; lieth between Paris and the Countrey of Orleans. The chief places of it are, 1 Estampes, in the middle way betwixt Paris and Orleans, on the very edge of it towards La Beaulle, a fair large Town, having in it five Churches, and one of them a Colledge of Chanoins, with the ruins of an ancient Castle: which together with the Walls and demolished Fortifications of it, shew it to have been of great importance in the former times. Given with the title of an Earl by Charles Duke of Orleans, then Lord thereof, to Richard the third Son of John of Montford, Duke of Bretagne, in marriage with his Sister the Lady Marguerite; from which marriage issued Francis Earl of Estampes, the last Duke of Bretagne. 2 Montcherri, famous for the battle betwixt King Lewis the eleventh, and Charles Earl of Charolois (after Duke of Burgundy) in which both sides ran out of the field, and each proclaimed it self the Victor. It standeth in the road betwixt Paris and Estampes. And so doth 3 Castres, of the bigness of an ordinary Market-Town; not to be mentioned in this place, but for a Chamber or Branch of the Court of Parliament, here settled by King Henry the 4th, for the use and benefit of his Subjects of the Reformed Religion; in Latin called Camera Castellensis. 4 Nemours upon the River of Loyre, the chief of Gassinois in name, but not in beauty, (wherein inferior to Estampes) a Town which hath given the title of Duke to many eminent persons of France. Here is also in this part the County of Rochford, and the Towns of Milly, 2 Montargis, &c. More there occurreth not worth the noting, in this part of the Countrey, but that being part of the possessions of Hugh the Great, Constable of France, and Earl of Paris: it was given by him together with the Earldom of Anjou, to Geoffrey surnamed Gryffogonelle, a right Noble Warrior, and a great stickler in behalf of the house of Anjou, then aiming at the Crown it self, which at last they carried. Continued in his line till the time of Fulk the second (the fifth Earl of Anjou of this Family) who gave it back again to King Philip the first; that by his help he might possess himself of the Earldom of Anjou, from his part wherein he was excluded by his elder Brother. Never since that dismembred from the Crown of France, in Fact or Title.

4 But the great glory of this Province, is that which is more properly called the ISLE OF FRANCE, and sometimes l'Île de France, the Isle, caused by the Circlings and embracements of the Rivers of Sein and Marn; the abstract of the whole beauties, and glories of France, which in this rich and pleasant Valley are summed up together.

Chief places in it, S. German, seated on the ascent of an hill, seven miles from Paris, down the water: a pretty neat and handfom Town, honoured with one of the fairest Palaces of the French Kings; which being built (like Windsor) on the top of a fine mountaine on the Rivers side, affordeth an excellent prospect over all the Countrey. The excellent water-works herein, have been described on occasion of those of Trevi, a Town of the Popes in Champaigna di Roma, so much extolled by the Italians. It was first built by Charles the fifth, surnamed the Wise; beautified by the English when they were possessed of this Countrey; but finally re-edified and enlarged by King Henry the Fourth, who brought it into that magnificence in which now we see it. It took name from S. German Bishop of Auxerre, companion with S. Lupus before mentioned, in the British journey against Pelagius. 2 Poissie upon the same River, or rather on the confluence of it, and the Marn which falleth into the Sein; situate not far from S. German, a Bayliwick belonging to the Provost of Paris, and one of his seven daughters, as they use to call them. 3 Chantilly, the chief seat of the Dukes of Montmorency, the ancientest and most noble Family of all Christendom: whose Ancestors were the first fruits of the Gospel in this part of Gaul, and used to style themselves Les premiers Chrétiens et plus vieilles Barons de la France, i. e. The first Christians and most ancient Barons of France. A Family that hath yielded unto France, more Admirals, Constables, Marshals, and other like Officers of power, than any three in all the Kingdom: now most unhappily extinct in the person of Henry the last Duke, executed by the command of the late Cardinal of Richelieu, for siding with the Monsieur (now Duke of Orleans) against King Lewis the 13th, his Brother. The Arms of which illustrious and most noble Family (for I cannot let it pass without this honour) were Or, a Crofs Gules, cantonné with sixteen Allions Azure, four in every Canton. What these Allions are, we shall see in Lorraine; take we notice now, that from the great possessions which this noble Family had in all this tract, it was, and is still called the Vale of Montmorency. 4 S. Denis, some three miles from Paris, so called of a Monastery built here by Dagobert King of France, about the year 640. in memory of S. Denis, or Dionysie, the first Bishop of Paris, martyred (on Mont-martyr an hill adjoining) in the time of Domitian. Some of the French Kings because it lay so neer to Paris, bestowed a Wall upon the Town, now not defensible: nor otherwise of any consideration, but for a very fair Abby of Benedictines, and therein the Sepulchres of many of the French Kings and Princes; neither for workmanship, nor cost, able to hold comparison with those at Westminster. But being the sepulture of their Kings, the Frenchmen use to say facetiously, that to this place none of their Kings do ever go with a good will. In this Town also is the Church of S. Maclon, where the Kings with a Fast of nine days and other Penances, use to receive the famous Gift of healing the Kings-Evil, with nothing but a Touch: a priviledge enjoyed only by those Kings, and the Kings of England. 5 St. Cloud (or the Town of St. Claudus) un-unfortunately memorable for the murder of King Henry the third: who lying here at a siege of Paris, from whence he was compelled to flee by the Guisian Faction, was wretchedly assassinated by Jacques Clement a Monk, employed in that service by the heads of the Holy League. 6 P A R I S, the chief City not of this Isle alone, but of all the Kingdom. By Cesar, and Ammianus Marcellinus, called Civitas Parisiorum, from the Parisians, a Nation of Gaul-Celtick, whose chief City it was: by Strabo called Lutetia, Lucotetia by Ptolomy, quæ in Luto sita, as some conjecture from the dirtiness of the soyl in which it standeth. A soyl so dirty (as commonly all rich Countreys are) that though the streets hereof are paved, (which they affirm to be the work of King Philip Augustus) yet every little dash of rain makes them very slippery; and worse than so, yields an ill savour to the nose. The Proverb is, Il deslains comme la fange de Paris, it stineth like the dirt of Paris: but the Author of the Proverb might have changed the word, and turned it to Il pent, &c. It stinks like the dirt of Paris; no stink being more offensive than those streets in Summer. It is in compass about eight miles, of an Orbicular form, pleasantly seated on the divisions of the Sein: a fair, large, and capacious City, but far short of the brags which the French make of it. It was thought in the time of King Lewis the eleventh to containt 500000 people of all sorts and Ages; which must be the least: the same King at the entertainement of the Spanish Ambassadors, shewing 140000 of this City in Arms, all in a Livery of red Caslocks with white Crosses. A gallant sight, though possibly the one half of them were not fit for service: The Parisians being for the most part an effeminate people, wanton enough, and apt to mutiny upon all occasions, but little addicted to the Wars, as appears plainly by their suffering K. Henry the 4th to hold S. Dennis so long against them, with no considerable Garrison, and by that means to shut them up from all relief on that side of their City. And yet their multitudes, which since the time of that King, must needs be very much encreased, are the chief strength of the Town; the fortifications being weak and of ill assurance: Insomuch, that when once a Parisian bragged that their Town was never took by force; an English man returned this Answer, That it was, because on the least distress it did use to capitulate. It is seated (as before was said) on the River Sein, which serveth it with Boats and Barges (as the Thames weitward doth London) the River ebbing and flowing no higher than Pont del Arche, 75 miles distant from the City.

We may divide it into four parts, the Town, the City, the University, and the Suburbs. La Ville, or that part of it which is called The Town, is situate on the North side of the River; the biggest, but poorest part of the four, inhabited by Artizans and Tradesmen of the meaner sort. In this part are the Hôtel de Ville, or the Guild-hall for the use of the Citizens; the Arsenal, or Armory for the use of the King; and that magnificent building called the Place Royal, new built and beautified at the charges of King Henry the fourth for Tilts and Turnements, and such solemnities of State. And in this also neer the banks of the River, stands the Kings Palace of the Louvre, a place of more fame than beauty, and nothing answerable to the report which goes commonly of it. A building of no elegance or uniformity, nor otherwise remarkable but for the vast Gallery begun by King Henry the 4th, and the fine Gardens of the Tuileries adjoining to it. The City is that part of it which takes up the circumference of a little Island, made by the embracements of the Sein; joynted to the other parts on both sides, by several Bridges. The Paris or Lutetia of the old Gauls was no more than this: the Town on the one side, and the University on the other, being added since. This is the richest part, and best built of the whole Compostum. And herein stand the Palace, or Courts of Parliament; the Chapel of the Holy Ghost, and the Church of Nostre-dame, being the Cathedral; of ancient times a Bishops See, but of late raised unto the dignity of a Metropolitan. On the South-side of the River lyeth that part which is called the University, from an University here founded by Charles the Great, An. 792. at the perswasion of Alcuinus an Englishman, the Scholar of Venerable Bede, and the first Professor of Divinity here. It consisteth of 52 Colleges or places for study, whereof 40 are of little use; and in the rest the Students live at their own charges, as in the Halls at Oxon, or Innes of Court or Chancery at London; there being no endowment laid unto any of them, except the Sorbonne, and the Colledge of Navarre. Which possibly may be the reason why the Scholars here are generally so debauched and insolent: a ruder rabble than the which are hardly to be found in the Christian World. Sensible of this mischief and the cause thereof, Francis the first, whom the French call the Father of the Muses; at the perswasion of Reuchline and Budant, those great restorers of the Greek and Hebrew Languages, intended to have built a Colledge for 600 Students; and therein to have placed Professors for all Arts and Sciences, endowing it with 50000 Crowns of yearly Revenue, for their constant maintenance. But it went no further than the purpose; prevented by the inevitable stroak of death from pursuance of it. In bigness this is little inferior to the Town or Ville, and not superior to it for wealth and beauty; few men of any wealth and credit, affecting to inhabit in a place of so little Government. The fourth and last part is the Suburbs, (or the Faux-bourgs as the French call them) the principal whereof is that of S. German (so called from an ancient Abby of that name:) the best part of the whole body of Paris, for large Streets, sweet Air, choice of the best Company, magnificent Houses, pleasant Gardens; and finally, for all those contentments which are wanting commonly in the throngs of most populous Cities.

Here are also in this Isle the Royal House of Madrid, a retiring place of the Kings, built by King Francis the first, at his return from his imprisonment in Spain. 2 Ruall, a sweet Countrey house of the late Queen Mothers: And 3 Bois de Vincennes, remarkable for the untimely death of our Henry the 5th. I add this only and so end, That this Isle hath always followed the Fortune of the Crown of France; never dismembred from the Sovereignty of the same, though sometimes out of the possession of the French Kings; as when the English kept it against Charles the 7th, and the League against Henry the Champagne. the 4th. A thing which hardly can be said of any other of the Provinces of this flourishing Country: the French Kings of the race of Merovee, and Charles the great, alienating from the Crown many goodly Territories; contented only with a bare and titular Homage from them. By means whereof, more than three parts of the whole Kingdom was shared first amongst the great Princes of the French: which afterwards by inter-marriages, and other titles fell into the hands of strangers; most of them enemies of this Crown, and jealous of the Grandeur and power thereof. Which kept the French Kings generally very low and poor, till by Arms, Confiscations, Marriages, and such other means, they reduced all these Rivulets to their first and original Channel; as shall be shewn in the pursuance of this work.

2. CHAMPAGNE.

CHAMPAGNE is bounded on the North, with Picardie; on the South with the Dukedom of Burgundie; on the East, with Lorraine; on the West, with France specially so called.

The Country for the most part very plain and pleasant (whence it had the name) adorned with shady Woods and delectable Meadows, fruitful in Corn, and not deficient in Wines. The Seat in elder times of the Tricasses, Catalauni, Rhemi, the Lingones, and Senones (of which last Tribe or Nation were those Cisalpine Gauls who sacked Rome under the conduct of Brennus;) part of them Celts, and part Belgians, and so accordingly disposed of: the Belgians into the Province of Belgica secunda, the Metropolis whereof was Rhemes; the Celts into Lugdunensis quarta, of which the Metropolis was Sens; both Cities seated in this Country. The chief Rivers of it Bloise, 2 Marne, 3 Tonne, 4 Sault.

Chief places of that part hereof which belonged to Belgica secunda, or the Province of Rhemes, are 1 Chalon on the River Marne, an Episcopal See, Suffragan to the Archbishop of Rhemes; called anciently Civitas Catalaunorum. 2 Joinville, situate on the same River, belonging to the house of Guise; the eldest Son of which Family is called Prince of Joinville: in the Castle whereof seated upon an high and inaccessible Hill, is to be seen the Tomb of Claude the first Duke of Guise; the richest Monument of that kinde, in all France. The Barony of William Lord Joinville, third Son of Enſace Earl of Boulogne, and of Ida his wife, who brought the Dukedom of Bouillon, for her Dowry or portion; and brother of Godfrey and Baldwin Dukes of Lorraine and Kings of Hierusalem. But whether it came to him by the gift of his Mother, as part of the Dukedom of Bouillon, or that he had it by his Wife, a daughter of Theobald Earl of Champagne, I am not able to determine. Left by him after his decease to Godfrey his youngest son (Thierry the eldest son succeeding his Uncle Baldwin in the Dukedom of Lorraine): upon the failure of whose line, it fell unto the Dukes of Lorraine as next heirs thereof, and so unto the Dukes of Guise, as descended from them. 3 St. Urban, a Town of the Territory of Joinville, from which it is about two leagues distance. 4 Pierre-Fort, defended with a Castle of so great strength, that in the civil Wars of France, Anno 1614, it endured 1100 shot of Canon, and yet was not taken. 5 Vassy, upon the River Bloise, a Town of as sweet a situation as most in France. These last situate in that part of Champagne which is called Vallage: so named, as I conceive, from the River Vasle. 6 Vitrey, upon the confluence of the Sault and Marne, the chief Town and Balliage of that part which is named Parthois (Ager Perienſis in the Latine); so called of 7 Perie another Town thereof, but now not so eminent. 8 Chaumont upon the Marne, the chief Town of Bassigni; and strengthened with a Castle mounted on a craggy Rock. 9 Desier, or St. Desier (Fanum Sancti Desiderii) royally fortified after it had been ruined, Anno 1544. 10 Rhemes (Durcoriorum Rhemorum) an Archbishop's See, who is one of the Twelve Peers of France, situate on the River of Vasle. At this City the Kings of France are most commonly crowned, that so they may enjoy the Union of a sacred Oyl, kept in the Cathedral Church hereof, which, as they say, came down from Heaven, and never decreaseth. How true this is may be easily seen, in that Gregory of Tours, who is so prodigal of his Miracles, makes no mention of it: but specially (for Argumentum ab autoritate negativè parum valet) since the Legend informeth us that this holy Oyl was sent from Heaven, at the anointing of Clodius, the first Christian King of the French. Whereas Du Haillan, one of their most judicious Writers, affirmeth Pepin, the Father of Charles the great, to have been their first anointed King; and that there was none of la premiere lignee oint, ny sacré à Rhemes, ny ailleurs, none of the first or Merovingian line of Kings, had been anointed at Rhemes or elsewhere. But sure it is (let it be true or false, no matter) that the French do wonderfully reverence this (their sacred) Oyl; and fetch it with great solemnity from the Church in which it is kept. For it is brought by the Prior, sitting on a white ambling Palfrey, and attended by his whole Convent: the Archbishop hereof (who by his place is to perform the Ceremonies of the Coronation) and such Bishops as are present, going to the Church-doors, to meet it, and leaving for it with the Prior, some competent pawn; and on the other side, the King when it is brought unto the Altar, bowing himself before it with great humility. But to return unto the Town: it took this name from the Rhemi, once a potent Nation of these parts, whose chief City it was; and now an University of no small esteem: in which among other Colleges there is one appointed for the education of young English Fugitives. The first Seminary for which purpose (I note this only by the way) was erected at Doway, Anno 1568. A second at Rome, by Pope Gregory the thirteenth. A third at Valladolid in Spain, by K. Philip the second; A fourth in Louvain, a Town of Brabant; and a fifth, here (so much do they affect the gaining of the English to the Romish Church) by the Dukes of Guise. 11 Ligni, upon the River Sault.

In that part of it which belonged to Lugdunensis quarta, or the Province of Sens, the places of chief

note

Champagne. note are, 1 Sens, Civitas Senonum in Antoninus, anciently the Metropolis of that Province, by consequence the See of an Archbishop alſo. The Country hereabouts called Le Pais Senonis, was part of the habitation of the ancient Senones, some of which passing over the Alpes with other nations of the Gauls, planted those parts which afterwards were for long time called Gallia Cisalpine. Of which the Senones were the most valiant, though far less in numbers: as those which had not only the honour of sacking Rome, but of managing an offensive War against that State for the space of 100 years and upwards. What afterwards became of them hath been shewn already, when we were in Lombardy. 2 Langres, or Civitas Lingunum, (by Polonius, called Automatunum) situate in the confines of Burgundy, not far from the fountain or spring-head of the Seine: the See of a Bishop, who is one of the Twelve Peers of France. 3 Troy, Civitas Tricassinum, seated on the Seine, a fair, strong, and well traded City, honoured with the title of the Daughter of Paris; See Episcopal, and counted the chief of Champagne, next Rhemes. A City of great note in our French and English Histories, for the meeting of Charles the sixth, and Henry the fifth, Kings of France, and England; in which it was agreed, That the said King Henry espousing Katharine Daughter of that King, should be proclaimed Heir apparent of the Kingdom of France; into which he should succeed on the said Kings death, and be the Regent of the Realm for the time of his life: with divers other Articles, best suiting with the will and honour of the Conqueror. 4 Provins (by Cæſar called Agendicum) seated upon the Seine, in a pleasant Country, abounding in all fragrant flowers; but especially with the sweetest Roses, which being transplanted into other Countreys are called Province Roses. 5 Meaux, seated on the River Marne, anciently the chief City of the Meldi, whom Pliny and others of the old Writers mention in this tract: now honoured with a Bishops See, and neighboured by 6 Montecaux, beautified with a magnificent Palace built by Katharine de Medices, Queen Mother of the three last Kings of the house of Valois. 7 Montereau, a strong Town on the confluence of the Seine and the Yonne. 8 Chasteau-Thierry, (Caſtrum Theodorici, as the Latins call it) situate on the River Marne. These five last situate in that part of Champagne, which lieth next to France specially so called, known of long time by the name of Brie: which being the first or chief possession of the Earls of Champagne, occasioned them to be sometimes called Earls of Brie, and sometimes Earls of Brie and Champagne. Add here, 9 Auxerre, in former time a City of the Dukedom of Burgundy, but now part of Champagne, of which more hereafter. And 10 Fontenay, a small Town in Auxerrois in the very borders of this Province; memorable for the great battle fought near unto it, Anno 841. between the sons and Nephews of Lotharius Pius, for their Fathers Kingdoms. In which so many thousands were slain on both sides, that the forces of the French Empire were extremely weakened; and had been utterly destroyed in pursuit of this unnatural War, if the Princes of the Empire had not mediated a peace between them; allotting unto each some part of that vast estate, dismembered by that means into the Kingdoms of Italy, France, Germany, Lorraine, and Burgundy; never since brought into one hand, as they were before.

Adjoining unto Champagne alſo where it looks towards Lorraine, lies the Country and Duchy of BAR; belonging to the Dukes of Lorraine, but held by them in chief of the Kings of France. The Country commonly called BARRAIS, environed for the most part with the two streams of the River Marne; of which the one rising in the edge of Burgundy, and the other in the Borders of Lorraine, do meet together at Chalons a City of Champagne. Places of most importance in it, 1 Bar le Duc, so called to distinguish it from Bar on the River Seine, and Bar upon the River Alli; a well fortified Town. 2 La Motte. 3 Ligni. 4 Argu, of which nothing memorable, but that they are the chief of this little Dukedom. Of what Antiquity this Dukedom is, and by whom first founded and made an absolute Estate, I am yet to seek, though probable it is that it might take its first rise (as many other petit Signeuries did) out of the ruin and dismembering of the Kingdom of Lorraine; or otherwise might be erected by the Earls Palatines of Champagne, out of some part of that Estate. But whether it were so or not, certain it is that it came first to the present house of Lorraine, by the gift of Rene Duke of Anjou, and titular King of Naples, Sicily, &c. who succeeded in it in the right of Toland or Violant his Mother, Daughter of Don John the first King of Aragon and of Toland or Violant the Heir of Bar: and dying gave the same, together with the Towns of Lambesque and Orgon, to Rene Duke of Lorraine his Nephew, by the Lady Violant his Daughter. From this Rene, it was taken by Lewis the eleventh, who having put a Garrison into Bar, repaired the Walls, and caused the Arms of France to be set on the Gates thereof. Restored again by Charles the eighth, at his going to the Conquest of Naples: to buy him out by that means (if I guess aright) of his pretensions to that Kingdom, which were fair and specious; since which time quietly enjoyed by the Dukes of Lorraine, till the year 1633. when seized on by Lewis the thirteenth, upon a Judgement and Arrest of the Court of Parliament in Paris, in regard the present Duke had not done his Homage to the King, as he ought to have done.

The Arms hereof are Azure, two Barbels back to back, Or; Seme of Croſſe Croſſets Fitché, of the second.

But to return again to Champagne, it pleased Hugh Capet at his coming to the Crown of France, to give the same to Eudes or Odon, Earl of Blais, (whose Daughter he had married in his private fortunes, before he had attained the Kingdom) with all the rights and privileges of a County Palatine. Which Eudes, or Odon, was the Son of Theobald Earl of Blais, and Nephew of that Gerlon, a noble Dane, to whom Charles the Simple gave the Town and Earldom of Blais, about the year 920. and not long after the time, that he conferred the Country of Neustria upon Rolla the Norman, whose Kinsman and assistant this Gerlon was in harassing and waſting the coasts of France. In the person of Theobald the third, the Earls hereof became Kings of Navarre, descended on him in right of the Lady Blanch his Mother, Sister and Heir of King Sancho the eighth. Anno 1234. By the Marriage of Joan Queen of Navarre, and Countess of Champagne, to Philip the fourth of France, surnamed the Fair, both these Estates were added to the the Crown of France: enjoyed by him and his three Sons one after another, though not without some prejudice to the Lady Joan, Daughter and Heir of Lewis Hutin. But the three Brethren being dead, and Philip of Valois succeeding in the Crown of France, he restored the Kingdom of Navarre to the said Lady Joan: and for the County of Champagne (which lay too near the City of Paris to be trusted in a foreign hand) he gave unto her and her Posterity, as in the way of exchange, some certain Towns and Lands in other places; though not of equal value to so rich a Patrimony.

Count Palatines of Champagne.

 1315 12 Philip the Long, Brother of Lewis Hutin, King of France and Navarre, and Earl of Champagne.
 1320 13 Charles the Fair, Brother of Philip King of France and Navarre, and the last Earl of Champagne; united after his decease by Philip de Valois to the Crown of France: the Earldom of March, near Angouleme, being given for it in exchange to the Lady Joan, Daughter of King Lewis Hutin, and Queen of Navarre married to Philip Earl of Evreux, in her right honoured with that Crown, from whom descend the Kings of France and Navarre of the House of Bourbon.

The Arms of these Palatines of Champagne, were Argent, two Bends cotized, potencee and counter-potencee of three pieces, Or.

3. PICARDIE.

PICARDIE hath on the East, the Dukedoms of Luxemburg, and Lorrein; on the West, some part of Normandy, and the English Ocean; on the North, the Counties of Artois, and Hainal; and on the South, Champagne, and France strictly and specially so called. A Countrey so well stored with Corn, that it is accounted the Granary or Store-house of Paris; but the few Wines which it produceth are but harsh, and of no good relish, especially in the Northern and colder parts of it.

The ancient Inhabitants of it were the Sueffiones, Ambiani and Veromandani, considerable Nations of the Belge; and therefore reckoned into the Province of Belgica secunda: but why they had the name of Picards, I am yet to seek. Omitting therefore the conjectures of other men, some of the which are groundless, and the rest ridiculous; I only say, as Robert Bishop of Avranches hath affirmed before me, Quos itaq; atq; nostra Picardos appellat, verè Belgæ dicendi sunt, qui postmodum in Picardorum nomen transfugerunt.

The whole Countrey as it lieth from Calais to the Borders of Lorrein, is divided into the Higher and the Lower: the Lower subdivided into Sainterree, Ponthieu, Boulognois, and Guisnes; the Higher into the Vidamates of Amiens, Veromandois, Rethelois, and Terafche; in every of which there are some places of importance and consideration.

In LOWER PICARDIE and the County of GUISNES, the chief Towns, 1 Calais, by Cesar called Portus Ictius (as the adjoining Promontory, Promontorium Ictius, by Ptolomy) a strong Town close upon Artois, at the entrance of the English Channel: taken by Edward the third after the siege of 11 moneths, Anno 1347. and lost again by Queen Mary in less than a fortnight, Anno 1557. So that had Monsieur de Cordes then lived, he had had his wish; who used to say, that he would be content to lie seven years in Hell, on condition that Calais were taken from the English. The loss of which Town was a great blow to our Estate, for till that time we had the Keyes of France at our Girdles: and as great a grief unto Q. Mary, who sickning presently upon it, said to those which attended her, that if she were opened, they should finde Calais next her heart. 2 Hamme, a strong piece, one of the best Out-works of Calais. 3 Fiennes, on the borders toward Artois, which with the Countrey joyning to it made an ancient Barony; the Patrimony in times past of the Earls of S. Paul, by whom given to Theobald the younger Brother of Lewis Earl of S. Paul and Constable of France, (of whom more hereafter) and from that Family conveyed to the house of Egmond by the marriage of Francis heir hereof to John Earl of Egmond, who died in the year 1548. and was the Father of that Earl, who after was beheaded by the Duke of

Alva,

Picardie.

Alva, Anno 1568. 4 Ardres, more towards the Borders of Boulognois, memorable for the interview of Henry the eighth, and Francis the first; and many meetings of the English and French Commissioners. 5 Guisnes, which gives name to this Division, called the County of Guisnes (of which the Land of Oye whereon Calice stood (by the French called commonly Pais de Calais) was esteemed a part.) The Earldom anciently of the illustrious house of Craie, of which more anon.

2. In BOULOGNOIS, neighbouring on the Countrey of Guisnes, the places of most note, 1 Black-nest, a strong Fort on the Sea-side, betwixt Calice and Boulogne. 2 Chastillon, opposite to Boulogne on the other side of the water. 3 Boullenberg, more within the Land, an Out-work to Boulogne. 4 Boulogne, by Pliny called Portus Gesforiacus, part of the Countrey of the Morini, spoken of by Cesar; divided into the Base or Low Town lying on the shore side, well built, and much frequented by Passengers, going to, or coming out of England; and the High Town standing on the rise of an Hill, well garrisoned for defence of the Port beneath it, and honoured with a Bishops See, translated hither from Tournay when that City was taken by the English. The Town and Countrey taken by King Henry the eighth, with infinite expence of treasure, Anno 1544. but yielded not long after by K. Edward the sixth: the French redeeming it at less than a fourth part of the money, which the gaining of it had cost the Crown of England. As for the fortunes of this Countrey, it was once an Earldom of it self, during which time it gave one King unto Hierusalem, and another to England. The first Earl of it which we meet with, was that Eustace, who by his marriage with Ida, the Daughter of Geoffrey or Godfrey the second, Duke of Lorrein, added the Duchy of Bovillon in Gaul-Belgick to his Earldom of Boulogne. To him succeeded in both these Titles and Estates, Godfrey, surnamed of Bovillon his eldest son: who after the death of Godfrey the third his Cousen-german attained unto the Dukedom of Lorrein, and finally was the first and most renowned King of the Western Christians reigning in Hierusalem. Godfrey being dead, Eustace the youngest of his Brethren became Earl of Boulogne: whose daughter Maund brought this Estate and Title to Steven of Blais, who afterwards was King of England. Eustace the only Son of Steven dying without issue, the rights hereof remained in his sister Mary, the Abbess of Ramsey, married to Matthew Brother of Philip of Elstet Earl of Flanders. And though Matthew was commanded by the Pope to restore her again unto the Abbey out of which he had taken her; yet he kept this Countrey for her children. Conveyed to Philip second son of Philip Augustus K. of France, by another Maund (he dying without issue) to Alfonso of Portugal, who succeeding after in that Kingdom, sent her back to Boulogne: and finally by Joan daughter and heir of William, this Alfonso Grandchilde to Philip Earl of Artois, the son of Eudes Duke and Earl of Burgundy; to whom she brought Philip their only son, successor to his Grandfather in the said Estates, and to his Mother in this Earldom. But he deceasing without issue, Anno 1361. and Joan not leaving any children by King John of France, whom she married after the death of her first Husband, it fell by some other of the Heirs General to the De la Tour of Avern (the Ancestors of the now Dukes of Bovillon) continuing in that Family till the year 1477. when bought by Lewis the 11th of France of Bertrand de la Tour, the better to assure his Kingdom on that side against the English then possessed of the Countrey of Guisnes. The purchase being made, Lewis the now Proprietar, did Homage for it to the Virgin Mary, in the chief Church thereof called Nostre Dame, bare-headed, on his knees, without spurs or girdle: and offered to her Image a massie Heart of gold of 2000 ounces; capitulating that from thenceforth he and his Successors would hold that Earldom of her only, in perpetual Homage; and at the change of every Vassal present her with the golden heart of the same weight. Since which time never aliened from the Crown of France; nor giving title unto any but to Katharine de Medices wife of Henry the 2d, created Countess of Boulogne and Clermont, when first married to him, he being then Duke of Orleans only.

The Arms hereof under the ancient Earls of Boulogne were Or, a Banner Gules, tufted Purple: those of De la Tour, being a Tower embattell'd Sable; but the colour of the Field I do no where finde.

3 PONTHEU, so called from the River Some, upon the River Some, for conveniency of passage over the moorish Flats thereof, belonged formerly to the English; to whom it came by the Marriage of Eleanor, Daughter of Ferdinand of Castile, by Joan the daughter and Heir of Simon the last Earl hereof, to King Edward the first. Towns of most note in it, 1 Abbeville, seated on the Some, well fortified, and as strongly garrisoned, as a Frontier Town upon Artois: on one side unsailable by reason of a deep and moorish Fen, which comes up close to it; beautified with a fair Abbey, whence it had the name (Abbatia Villa in Latin) and the See of a Bishop. 2 Montreuille, a well fortified Town, in the way betwixt Abbeville and Boulogne, and a strong out-work unto Paris. 3 Crecie, where King Edward the 3d defeated the great Army of Philip de Valois, in the first onsets for that Kingdom, Anno 1343. And 4 Treport, a small Haven on the East of S. Valerius. Some place the Earldom of S. Paul in this Countrey of Ponthieu; others more rightly in Artois, where we mean to meet with it. The Arms hereof were Or, three Bends Azure.

4. And as for the Countrey of SAINTERREE, which is the fourth part of the Lower Picardie, the chief Towns of it are 1 Peronne, upon the River Some, where Lewis the 11th, the greatest Master of Statecraft for the times he lived in, put himself most improvidently into the hands of Charles of Burgundy, who as improvidently dismissed him. 2 Roy, and 3 Mont Didier, (Mons Didierii in Latin) both of them strong Towns upon the Frontier; but otherwise of little fame in former Stories.

In the Higher Picardie being that part of this Countrey which lieth furthest from the Sea, the first division which occurreth, is the Vidamate of AMIENS, so called of the fair City of Amiens, and the Vidame or chief Governour of it. Which honour as it is peculiar to the French only; so Miles in his Edition of Glovers Catalogue of Honour, will have but four at all in France, viz. this of Amiens, Chalons, Gerbecroy, Picardie. heroy, and that of Chartres. But certainly in France there are many more of them; as at Rhemes, Mans, &c. and formerly as many as it had Bishops; the Vice-dominus or Vice-dame, being to the Bishop in his Temporals, as the Chancellor in his Spirituals; or as the Vice-comites (Vicounts) were anciently to the Provincial Earls in their Courts of Judicature; or to give you an example nearer home and of more resemblance, these French Vidames were unto their several and respective Bishops, as the Temporal Chancellor (in this Realm) of the Bishoprick of Durham, or the High Steward of the Bishoprick of Ely, to those several Bishops.

Places of most note herein, 1 Corbie, a Town of great importance, and strongly Garrisoned, situate on the Frontier towards the Netherlands; 2 Chaume, on the same Frontier also, but of less consideration, the Honorary seat and Title of the present Vidame; 3 Piquigni, situate on a pretty ascent of ground overlooking the Some, on the left hand of the River betwixt Amiens and Abbeville, the ordinary seat of the former Vidames; more famous for the interview of Edward the 4th of England, and Lewis the 12th, than for giving the name of Picardie to all the Province; which Mercator only of all Writers, doth ascribe unto it. 4 Crouy, an obscure Village now, but formerly of special note for a goodly Castle, commanding over the adjoining Territory, and giving name to the illustrious Family, hence surname of Crouy, descended from the Kings of Hungary, and the Progenitors of the Dukes of Archoburg, and Princes of Chimay in the Netherlands; before their translating to which Countreys by the Dukes of Burgundy, they were entituled Earls of Guise. 5 Amiens it self, seated upon the Some above Piquigni, the River being there divided into many Streams for the use and service of the Town; well built, with very strong walls and deep ditches: the loss whereof, when taken by Archduke Albert, much hazarded the affairs and reputation of King Henry the 4th; and therefore when he had regained it, he added to the former Works an impregnable Citadel. But the chief glory of this City is in the Cathedral, the fairest and most lovely structure in the West of Europe: so beautified within and adorned without, that all the excellencies of Cost and Architecture, seem to be met together in the composition. The Fronts of our Cathedrals of Wells and Peterburgh, the rich Glass in the Quire at Canterbury, the costly Imagery, and arched Buttresses in the Chappel at Westminster (before the late defacements of those Cathedrals) might serve as helps to set forth the full beauties of it. The Town and Territories anciently under the command of the Bishops of it, whose Officers for the Temporal government hereof called Vice-dominus or Vidames, were at first eligible by the Bishops, and accountable to them, but by degrees engrossing all power unto themselves, they became Hereditary, and gave the name of the Vidames to this part of Picardie. The present Vidame of it is the Duke of Chaume, who being one of the younger Brothers of Monseigneur de Luynes (chief favourite to King Lewis the 13th) obtained in marriage the daughter and heir of the former Vidames, with whom he had the Town and Castle of Piquigni, the chief command of these parts, and a rent of 9000*l.* per annum, honoured thereupon by the power and favours of his Brother with the title of the Duke of Chaume and Peer of France, Anno 1620. or thereabouts.

II. But not to dwell on this place too long, pass we on next to VEROMANDOIS, the ancient habitant on of the Veromandui: the fairest and largest part of both Picardies; and not a whit inferior to the best of France, in the number of neat and populous Cities.

The principal Towns hereof are, 1 Soissons, called anciently Augusta Sueffonum, the chief City of the Sueffones or Sueffones: and the last Hold which the Romans had in all Gaul; lost by Sigisunt, Governor for the Western Emperor, to Clovis the fifth King of the French. In the division of his Kingdom, made the Seat Royal of Clovis the son of this Clovis; and of Aripert, and Chilperick, the sons of Clovis, from hence entituled Kings of Soissons; their Kingdom containing the whole Province of Belgica secunda, or the Provinces of Artois, Picardy and Champagne, as we call them now. But Soissons having long since lost the honour of a Regal Seat, hath of late times been made the honorary Title of the Counts of Soissons, a branch of the Royal stock of Bourbon; a Bishops See, and situate on the River of Aisne. 2 Laon, a Bishops See also, the Bishop whereof is one of the Twelve Peers of France, and Earl of Laon; the Town in Latine, Laodunum. 3 Noyon, in Latine, Noviodunum, an Episcopal See also. 4 Chapelle, a strong piece, one of the best out-works of Paris against the Netherlands. 5 D'Ourlans, 6 La Fere and Han, places of great strength also, but more near the Frontiers. And 7 S. Quintin, anciently the chief City of the Veromandui, then called Augusta Veromandurum: called afterwards S. Quintin, from that Saint here worshipped, as the Patron and Deus Tutelar of it. A place of great importance for the Realm of France; and so esteemed in the opinion of the Earl of Charolois, (after Duke of Burgundy) and King Lewis the 11th: the first of which never digested the restoring of it to that King, being pawned unto his Father (together with Corbie, Amiens, and Abbeville) for no less than 400000 Crowns; the later never would forgive the Earl of S. Paul for detaining it from him, though under colour of his service. A Town of greater note in succeeding times, for the famous batel of S. Quintin, Anno 1557. wherein King Philip the second of Spain, with the help of the English, under command of the Earl of Pembroke; overthrew the whole Forces of the French, made themselves Masters of the Town, and thereby grew so formidable to the French King, that the Duke of Guise was in post hast sent for out of Italy, (where his affairs began to prosper) to look unto the safety of France it self. As for the Fortunes of this part, it was once an Earldom of it self, and an Earldom of as great Antiquity as the most in France; it being one Herbert or Edmont Earl of Veromandois, who in pursuance of the quarrel of the house of Anjou surprized Charles the Simple, and carried him prisoner to Peronne, where he after dyed; for which deservedly hanged by Lewis surname Transmarine the son of Charles, when he became possessed of his Fathers Kingdom; by the daughter and heir of another Herbert, conveyed in marriage unto Hugh surname the Great, one of the younger sons of King Henry the first of France, succeeding in her right into into the title and estate of Earl of Veromandois, and by that name renowned in the first wars for the Holy Land. By Elizabeth the Niece of this Hugh, the daughter of Rodolphus his eldest son married to Philip of Alsace Earl of Flanders, it was added unto that estate; but shortly after given by the same Philip (having no children of his own) in Dower with Isabel his Niece, daughter of Baldwin Earl of Hainault, unto Philip Augustus King of France, and since united to that Crown, not giving since that time the title of Earl or Duke to any, for ought I can find.

III. More towards Hainault and Lorraine lyeth the Country of RETHELOIS, so called of Reisel the chief Town: well fortified as the rest of the Frontier places; but of most note amongst the French, in that the eldest sons of the Dukes of Nevers, have usually been intituled Earls and Dukes of Reisel; united to that Family by the marriage of Lewis of Flanders, Earl of Nevers, with the daughter and heir of James Earl of Reisel, An. 1312, or thereabouts. 2 St. Monband, a Town of consequence and strength. 3 Sygnis, a strong piece belonging to the Marquess of Vienville. 4 Chasteau-Portion, of more beauty, but of like importance. The Armes of the Earls and Dukes of Reisel were Gules, three Rakes-heads indented Or.

IV. Finally in the Dutchy of TERASCHE, the last part of the higher Picardy, we have the Town of Guise, of some note for the Castle, but of more for the Lords thereof, of the Ducal Family of Lorraine (on the borders whereof it standeth) from hence entituled Dukes of Guise. A Family which within a little compass of time produced two Cardinals, the one entituled Guise, the other of Lorraine; six Dukes, that is to say, the Dukes of Guise, Mayenne, Amal, Elbeuf, Aguillon, and Chevreuse; the Earl of Samarive; and besides many daughters married into the best houses in France, one married to James the fifth King of the Scots. The first, and he that gave the rise unto all the rest of this potent Family, was Cland, son to Rene the second Duke of Lorraine, who passing into France to take possession of the Patrimony allotted to him, followed King Henry the first in the war of Italy, where he behaved himself so valiantly at the batle of Marignano, in which he had the chief command of the German Auxiliaries, that the King always after held him in a great esteem, and married him to Anto Rette of Burbon, daughter of Francis, Earl of Vendome; in respect of which alliance, and his other merits, he was honoured with the title of Duke of Guise. The Father (amongst other children) of Mary Qu. of Scots, wife of James the fifth, and Grandmother of James the sixth, the first Monarch of Brittain. The second was Francis, who endangered the Realm of Naples, resisted the siege of the Emperor Charles at Metz, drove him out of Provence, took Calice from Q. Mary, and was at last treacherously slain at the siege of Orleans, by one of the Hugonots named Poltro. (On the instigation of some of the chiefs of that faction) Anno 1463. The third was Henry that great enemy of the Protestants, who contrived the great Massacre at Paris, and almost dispossessed Henry the third of all France; He began the holy league, and was finally slain at Blis, by the command of King Henry the third. But we must know that this Town did anciently belong to the Dukes of Lorraine: and had given the title of Earl of Guise to Frederick the second son of John, and Charles the third son of Rene, both the first of those names; before Cland of Lorraine was advanced to the title of Duke: as being part of the Estate and Patrimony of the Barons of Joinville, of whom we spake before when we were in Champagne. Of most note next to Guise it self, is 2 Ripemont on the South of Guise. 3 Chastelet upon the border towards Luxembourg, a strong Town, and one of the best out-works of France. 4 Mexiers, upon the Mas or Messe, a place of great strength and like importance; belonging properly to the Dukes of Nevers (as chief Lords thereof) in right of their descent from the house of Reisel: fortified with a strong Citadel for defence of the place, and that Citadel well garrisoned by the French King, for defence of this border: layed to the Government of Champagne though a Town of Picardy, and therefore made by some to belong to that Province also.

As for the state of this whole Province, I do not find that it was ever passed over by the French Kings unto any one hand: as almost all the rest of France had been at some time or other, but distracted into divers Seigneuries and several Lordships (all of them absolute in themselves, and scarce affording to the French King the slight tribute of Homage) the particulars whereof we have seen before: some of which fell to the Crown of France by confiscations, some by lawful marriages, and others by conquest; some held of England, some of the Earls of Artois, and others of Flanders, and lastly of the Dukes of Burgundy, as Lords of those Provinces: those which depended upon England, being seized on by Charles the 7th. on the loss of Normandy by the English; as those which held of Burgundy, were by Lewis his son, immediately on the death of Duke Charles, at the batel of Nancie, Anno 1476.

4. NORMANDIE.

NORMANDIE is bounded on the East with the River Some and part of Picardy; on the West with Bretagne and some part of the Ocean; on the North, with the English channel, by which divided from England; and on the South, with France specially so called, and the County of Main. It made up the whole Province of Lugdunensis secunda, in the time of the Romans; the Metropolis whereof was Reven: and in the greatness of the French Empire had the name of Neustria, corruptly so called for Westria; the name of Westria or Westenrich, being given by some to this part of the Realm of West-France, as that of Austria or Osternich to that part of East France. Afterwards being bestowed upon the Normans by Charles the Simple, it was called Normandie.

This flourishing and rich Dukedom of Normandy, for largeness of Extent, multitudes of People, number and stateliness of Cities, fertility of Soyl, and the commodiousness of the Seas, may worthily be accounted the chief Province of France. Well watered with the River Seine which runneth quite through through it; as do also the Orne, and 3 the Aven: not to say any thing of 4 Robee, 5 Antes, and 6 Reinelle, and many others of less note. In length it reacheth about 170 miles, and about 60 in breadth, where it is narrowest: containing in that round the largest and fairest Corn-fields that are to be seen in all France. Of all other natural commodities it is extrem plentiful, excepting Wines; which the Northern coldness of the Climate admits not of, or sparingly at the best, and of no perfection. The people of it formerly renowned for fears of Armes, the Conquerours of England, Naples, Sicily, and the Kingdom of Antioch in the East: at this time thought to be of a more sharp and subtil wit, than the rest of the French; Scavans an possible en procesces & plaideries (saith Ortelius of them) especially in the quilliers and quirks of Law.

It is divided into the Higher and the Lower, the Lower containing the Sea-coasts, and the Higher, the more In-land parts. Principal Cities of the whole, 1 Constance a Bishops See, the Spire or Steeple of whose Cathedral, is easily discernable afar off, both by Sea and Land; and serveth Saylers for a Land-mark. From hence the Countrey hercabouts hath the name of Constance. 2 Auranches, situate on a Rock with a fair prospect over the English Channel, but more near to Bretagne, than the other; the chief City of the Abrincantes, called Ingena by Pisomy; now a Bishops See. 3 Caen, (Cadomum in Latin) an Episcopal See, as the other; strong, populous, and well built, seated upon the River Orne, second in reputation of the whole Province: but more especially famous for the Sepulchre of William the Conquerour, the University founded here by King Henry the fifth of England, and for the long resistance which it made against him, in his Conquest of Normandy. 4 Baieux (the Civitas Baiocassium of Antoninus) from whence the Countrey round about hath the name of Bessin. Memorable of a long time for a See Episcopal. One of the Bishops whereof, called Odo, Brother unto William the Conquerour, by the Mothers side, was by him created Earl of Kent; and afterwards on some just displeasure committed prisoner. For which, when quarrelled by the Pope, (the Clergie being then exempted from the Secular Powers) he returned this answer, That he had committed the Earl of Kent; not the Bishop of Bayeux: By which distinction he avoided the Popes displeasure. 5 Rouen, of old Rotomagus, pleasantly seated on the Seine, and watered with the two little Riverets of Robee, and Reinelle, which keep it very sweet and clean. The City for the most part well built, of large circuit and great trading; the second for bigness, wealth, and beauty, in all France: anciently the Metropolis of this Province, and an Archbishops See; and honoured of late times with a Court of Parliament, erected here by Lewis the twelfth, Anno 1501. In the Cathedral Church hereof (a Reverend, but no beautiful Fabrick) is to be seen the Sepulchre of John Duke of Bedford, and Regent of France for King Henry the sixth: which when an envious Courtier perswaded Charles the eighth to deface; God forbid (said he) that I should wrong him, being dead, whom living, all the power of France was not able to withstand; adding withal, That he deserved a better Monument than the English had bestowed upon him. And to say truth, the Tomb is but mean and poor, short of the merits of the man, and carrying no proportion to so great a vertue. 6 Falaise, upon the River Ante, once of strength and note; the dwelling place of Arlesius, a Skinners daughter, and the mother of William the Conquerour: whom Duke Robert, passing through the Town took such notice of, (as he beheld her in a Dance amongst other Damozels) that he sent for her to accompany him that night in bed, and begot on her William the Bastard, Duke of Normandy, and King of England. Her immodesty that night laid to be so great, that either in regard thereof, or in spite to her Son, the English called all Strumpets by the name of Harlots, the word continuing to this day. 7 Vernonville (Vernodium in Latin) in former times accepted one of the Bulwarks of Normandy, against the French. Of which it is reported, that when news was brought to Richard the first, that Philip (sur-named Augustus, the French King had laid siege unto it, he should say these words; I will never turn my back till I have confronted those cowardly French-men. For performance of which Princely word, he caused a passage to be broken through the Palace of Westminster, and came so unexpectedly upon his enemies, that they raised their siege, and hastened homwards. 8 Alanson, of most note for giving the title of Earl and Duke, to many Princes of the Royal Family of Valois; beginning in Charles de Valois, the father of Philip de Valois, French King, and continuing for eight successions till the death of Charles the fourth Duke of this line: conferred occasionally after that, on many of the younger Princes of the Royal Family. 9 Lysieux, on the North-east of Alanson, a Bishops See, the chief Town of the Lexovii; as 10 Caux, of the Caletes, both placed by Cæsar in these parts. 11 Eureux, an Episcopal See also, by Pisomy called Mediolanium, the chief city anciently of the Eburones, and still a rich and flourishing Town: the third in estimation of all this Province, and made an Earldom in the person of Lewis a younger son of Philip the third; whose son called Philip by his marriage with Joan daughter of Lewis Hutin, attained unto the Crown of Navarre. But this Town with many fair Estates in this Countrey which depend on it, being seized on by the French in the time of Charles the son of this Philip, for some practices against that Kingdom; there was after given to Charles the third and last King of this house in compensation for the same, Anno 1406. the title of Duke of Nemours, with a good sum of ready money, and a pension of 1200 l. sterling yearly, issuing out of the Revenues of Brie and Champagne. 12 Guifors, a strong Frontier Town towards France, whilst Normandy was in the hands of the English, or under its own Dukes and Princes; notable for the many repulses given unto the French: And 13 Pontyfe, another Frontier Town upon France, so called of the Bridge on the River of Oyfe, (which divides France from Normandy) on which the Town is situate, and by which well fortified on that side, but taken at the second coming of Charles the 7th. after an ignominious flight hence, upon the noise onely of the coming of the Duke of Tork, Commander at that time of the Province, and the English Forces. 14 Albemarl, contraſtably Aumerl, most memorable for giving the Title of Earl to the Noble Family De Forſibus, Lords of Holdernes in England; and of Duke, to Edward Earl of Rutland after after Duke of Tork. More towards the Sea, 15 S. Valeris, seated on a small but secure Bay, betwixt Dieppe and New-Haven. 16 Dieppe, at the mouth of a little River so named, opening into a large and capacious Bay; a Town of Trade, especially for the Newfound-Land: remarkable for its fidelity to Henry the 4th in the midst of his troubles; When the Confederates of the Guisian faction called the Holy League, had outed him of almost all the rest of his Cities, compelled him to betake himself hither, (from whence he might more easily hoist Saile for England) and called him in derision the King of Dieppe. 17 New-Haven, the Port Town to Rouen and Paris, situate at the mouth of the River Seine, from hence by great Ships navigable as far as Rouen; by lesser unto Pont de l'Arch, 70 miles from Paris: the Bridge of Rouen formerly broken down by the English, to secure the Town, lying unprepared to this day by means of the Parisians, for the better trading of their City. By the French it is called Havre de grace, and Franciscopolis by the Latines; repaired and fortified (the better to confront the English) by King Francis the first, and from thence so named. Delivered by the Prince of Conde and his faction into the hands of Q. Elizabeth of England, as a Town of caution, for the landing of such forces as she was to send to their relief, in the first civil War of France about Religion: and by the help of the same faction taken from her again, as soon as their differences were compounded. By means whereof, the Hugonots were not only weakened for the present, but made incapable of any succours out of England for the time to come: and the next year were again warred on by their King; with more heat than formerly. 18 Hanſew, and 19 Honſew, both situate on the banks of the Seine, but of little notice at the present, because not capable of any great shipping, nor useful in the way of Trade by reason of the interposition of New-Haven, betwixt them and the Sea; the former famous notwithstanding in our English Stories; as the first Town which that victorious Prince K. Henry the fifth attempted and took in, in France. 20 Cherbourg (the Latines call it Cæsaria Burgum) on the Sea-side also, the last Town which the English held in the Dukedom of Normandy: belonging properly and naturally to the Earls of Burenx, advanced unto the Crown of Navarre; till aliened by Charles the third of Navarre, on the composition before mentioned; but being garrisoned by the English for K. Henry the sixth, it held out a siege of seven months against the forces of France.

Here are also in this Dukedom, the Towns of 21 Tankerville, and 22 Ewe, which have given the title of Earls, to the Noble Families of the Greyes, and Bourchiers in England: as also those of 23 Harcourt, 25 Longueville, and 25 Amal, which have given the title of Duke and Earl, to some of the best Houses in France.

In this Countrey also is the little Seigneury of IVIDOT, heretofore said to be a free and absolute Kingdom; advanced to that high dignity by Clotaire, the seventh King of the French; Who having abused the wife of one Gautier de IVIDOT (so called because of his dwelling here) and afterward (to prevent revenge) killed the man himself; to make some satisfaction to his Family for so great an injury, erected the Lordship of IVIDOT to the estate of a Kingdom; and gave unto the heirs of this Gautier (or Walter) all the prerogative of a free and absolute Monarch; as to make Laws, coyn Money, and the like. From hence the French call a man that hath but small demains to maintain a great title, a Roy d'IVIDOT. At last, but at what time I know not, fell again to a Lordship, and belongeth now to the house of Bellay, in Bretagne.

There belonged also to this Dukedom, but rather as subject to the Dukes of Normandy than part of Normandy itself the County of PERCH, situate betwixt it and the Province of La Beausse, of which now reckoned for a part: and was divided into the higher, and the lower. The chief Towns of it, 1 Nogent le Rotrou, of which little memorable, but that it is the principal of Perch Gouet, or the lower Perch, and that it took that adjunct from Rotrou the second Earl of this County, the Founder or repairer of it; to difference it from another of that name, called Nogent le Roy, a Town of Champagne. 2 Mortaigne, or Moriton, of most note in the higher Perch, especially for giving the title of an Earl, to John, the youngest Son of K. Henry the second, after King of England; as in the times succeeding to the Lord Edmond Beaufort, after Duke of Somerset. The whole first made a distinct estate, in the person of Arnulph of Heslin the first Earl hereof. Whose son and successor named Rotrou (of great note in the wars of Spain against the *Moor*s in behalf of Alfonso King of Navarre and Aragon, An. 1110) by Maud the natural daughter of Henry the first of England, unfortunately drowned with her Brother William as they crossed the Seas, had one only daughter named Magdalen, (or as some say Margarite) the wife of Garcia the seventh King of Navarre; and Mother of K. Sancho furnished the Wife, from whom all the Kings of Navarre have since descended. But this Family being extinct in a short time after, the Estate fell unto the English as Dukes of Normandy, and so continued till the seizure of Normandy by the French in the time of K. John. After which time the title of Earl of Perch was given to Charles Earl of Valois and Alonso, Father of Philip de Valois, French King, of Lewis Earl of Anjou, and of Charles de Valois Earl of Alanson; in which house of Alanson it continued, and was commonly the title of the eldest sons of the Dukes thereof.

But to return again to the Countrey of Normandy, the ancient Inhabitants thereof were the Caletes, Eburones, Lexovii, Abrimantes, spoken of before; the Bellocaſsi, or Fewlocaſsi, about Rouen; the Salares and Baiocenses about Sees and Baieux: all conquered first by the powerful Romans, the Romans after by the French, and the French by the Normans. These last a people of the North, inhabiting those Countreys which now make up the Kingdoms of Denmark, Swethland, and Norway: united in the name of Normans; in regard of their Northernly situation; as in our History and description of those Kingdoms we shall shew more fully. Out of those parts they made their first irruptions about the year 700. when they so ransacked and plagued the Maritime Towns of France and Belgium, that it was inserted in the Lettins, From Plague, Pestilence, and the fury of the Normans, good Lord, &c. To quiet these people; and to secure himself, Charles the Simple, gave them a part of Nemfria (from them since called Normannia) or Normandie. Normandie, together with the Sovereignty of Bretagne, enjoyed by them and their posterity for many ages. Their first Duke was Rollo, An. 912. from whom in a direct line, the sixth was William the Bastard, Conqueror, and King of England, An. 1067. After this, Normandie continued English till the dayes of King John: when Philip Augustus seized on all Estates in France, as forfeitures, An. 1202. The English then possessing the Dukedoms of Normandie and Aquitaine; the Earldoms of Anjou, Tourene, Maine, Poitou, and Limousin; being in all a far greater and better portion of the Countrey, than the Kings of France themselves possessed. The English after this recovered the Dukedom by the valour of King Henry the sixth: the fifth, and having held it 30 years, lost it again in the unfortunate Reign of King Henry the sixth: the English then distracted with domestick factions. After which double Conquest of it from the Crown of England, the French distrusting the affections of the Normans, and finding them withal a stubborn and untractable people, have miserably oppressed them with tolls and taxes, keeping them alwayes poor and in low condition: in somuch as it may be said of them, that they are the most beggerly people that ever had the luck to live in so rich a Countrey. But it is time to look on

The Dukes of Normandie.

- 912 1 Rollo of Norway, made first Duke of Normandie, by Charles the Simple; by whose perswasion baptized, and called Robert.
- 917 2 William surnamed Longespee, from the length of his Sword.
- 942 3 Richard the Son of Longespee.
- 980 4 Richard the II. Son of the former.
- 1026 5 Richard the III. Son of Richard the second.
- 1028 6 Robert the Brother of Richard the third.
- 1035 7 William the bafe Son of Robert, subdued the Realm of England; from thence called the Conqueror.
- 1093 8 Robert II. eldest Son of William the Conqueror, put by the Kingdom of England by his two Brothers, William and Henry, in hope whereof he had refused the Crown of Hierusalem, then newly conquered by the forces of the Christian Princes of the West. Outed at last, imprisoned and deprived of sight by his Brother Henry; he lived a miserable life in the Cattle of Cardiffe, and lieth buried in the Cathedral Church of Glocester.
- 1102 9 Henry the first King of England.
- 1135 10 Stephen King of England, and D. of Normandie.
- 1161 11 Henry Plantagenet D. of Normandie, and after King of England, of that name the second.
- 1161 12 Henry the III. surnamed Court-mantle, Son of Henry the second, made D. of Normandie by his Father.
- 1189 13 Richard IV. surnamed Coeur de Lyon, King of England and D. of Normandie, Son of Henry the second.
- 1199 14 John the Brother of Richard, King of England, and D. of Normandie, outed of his estates in France by King Philip Augustus, An. 1202. before whom he was accused of the murder of his Nephew Arthur, found dead in the ditches of the Castle of Rowen, where he was imprisoned; but sentenced causa inaudita, for his not appearing. After this Normandie still remained united to the Crown of France (the title only being born by John de Valois, afterwards King, and Charles the 5th (during the life time of his Father) till the Conquest of it by the valour of K. Henry the 5th, An. 1420. which was 218 years after it had been seized on by King Philip Augustus; and having been holden by the English but 30 years, was lost again, An. 1450. in the unfortunate reign of King Henry the 6th. Never since that dismembered from the Crown of France; saving that Lewis the 11th, the better to content the confederate Princes, conferred it in Appennage on his Brother Charles Duke of Berry, An. 1465. but within two Moneths after took it from him again, and gave him in exchange for it the Dukedom of Guyenne, which lay further off from his Associates.

What the Revenues of this Dukedom were in former times, I can hardly say. That they were very fair and great, appears by that which is affirmed by Philip de Comines; who saith, that he had seen raised in Normandie, 95000 l. sterling money, which was a vast sum of money in those times. As also by this testimony of the D. of Burgundie, who held King Lewis the 11th to be weakened a whole third part in his estate, by giving Normandie in portion to the D. of Berry. Now they amount unto as much, as the Kings Treasurers and Tollmasters are pleased to draw out of it.

The Arms of Normandie were Gules, two Leopards Or, which with the single Leopard, or Lyon, being added for the Dutchy of Aquitaine, make the Arms of England.

5. BRETAGNE.

BRETAGNE is bounded on the East with Normandie, and the County of Maine; on the South with Anjou, and Poitou; on all other parts with the English, or Gallick Ocean. Watered upon the South side with the Loir, which divides it from Anjou; but so as part of this Dukedom, called the County of Raiz, lieth on the South side of that River, betwixt it and Poitou.

It was first called Armorica from its situation on the Sea, as the word importeth in the old Language of that People. But how it came by this new name, is not well agreed on. The general opinion is is, that it took this name from the neighbouring Britans, broug it over hither by the Tyrant Maximus, rebelling against the Emperor Gratian, Anno 385. by whom this Province was subdued, and from them named Britannia Minor, Little Britain. An Argument whereof may be, that the Language of this people hath still no small affinity with the Welsh or British; there being a tradition also, that the Britans who first came over hither and married the Women of this Countrey, cut out their tongues for fear they should corrupt the Language of their Posterity. And to this Conquest by the Britans, these old Verses give some further countenance.

Vicit Aremoricas animosa Britannia Gentes,
Et dedit impostis, nomina prisca, jugo.

That is to say,

Gaul-Armorick, the Britans overcame,
And to the conquered Province gave their name.

Notwithstanding, the most probable opinion seemeth to be, that it took this name from the Britanni; an old Gallick People, mentioned by Plinie in Gaul-Belgick; retiring hither on the invasions and incursions of the barbarous Nations: though possibly those Britanni of Gallia-Belgica might be as well some Colony of the Island-Britans, as the Belge a great Nation in the Isle of Britain, are said to have been a People of Gallia-Belgica. The reason is, because there was no Author before Geoffrey of Monmouth who takes notice of this transporting of the Insular-Britans by the Tyrant Maximus; no ancient Author Greek or Latin making mention of it. And for the Welsh or British words which are still remaining in the language, they are conceived to be no other than a remainder of the old Gallick tongue; which was originally the same with the ancient British, as is elsewhere proved.

The Province is in compass 200 French Leagues: Pleasant and fruitful, beautified with many shady Woods, and spacious Downs; sufficiently well stored with all manner of grain, but destitute of Wine and the choicer fruits, by reason of the Northerly situation of it. Divided commonly into Hault or High Bretagne, and Basse or Low Bretagne: the first containing the more Eastern, and the last the Western parts hereof. Neither of the two much furnished with navigable or notable Rivers; the defect of which, the neighbourhood of the Sea supplieth, affording more capacious Havens, and convenient Ports, than any one Province in this Kingdom.

To begin therefore with the Havens, those of most note in the Higher Bretagne, are 1 S. Malo, built on a Rock within the Sea, wherewith at every high-water it is incompassed. A Bishops See, and a Port very much frequented by the French, and Spanish, who use here to barter their Commodities; oftentimes spoyled by the English, in the Wars with France, especially since the time of King Henry the seventh. 2 Blavet, a safe but little Haven, on the mouth of a little River of the same name also. Impregably fortified by the Spaniard, An. 1590. when taking opportunity of the broil in France, and pretending a good title to this Dukedom, on the expiring of the male issue of King Henry the second, he thought by this door to have entred on the whole Estate, but quitted it again on the general peace made between the Crowns. 3 S. Briens, (by the Latines called Fannus Sancti Briaci) a Bishops See, and a well-traded Port, seated upon the English Channel. 4 Vannes, a Bishop: See also, situate on a capacious Bay, at the mouth of the Vilain; the chief Town of the Peniti, whom Cesar placeth in this tract; and makes them to be the mightiest People of all the Americans, strongest in shipping, and best seen in Affairs at Sea. 5 Croissie, a little Haven at the mouth of the Loir, and the only Haven of this part on the Gallick Ocean. Then in Low Bretagne, or the more Western parts hereof, there is 6 Brest, seated upon a spacious Bay of the Western Ocean; the Key and Bulwark of this Countrey, and the goodliest Harbour of all France. 7 Morlais, a convenient Port, and well frequented. 8 S. Pol de Leon, and 9 Triguier, both Bishops Sees, both situate on the Sea-shore, and both the chief Towns of the Ossismi, whom Ptolomy and Strabo place upon this Coast: the first of them neighbored by the Promontory which they call Le Four, the Gouven of Ptolomy. 10 Kemper Corentin, a Bishops See also, the chief Town of that part hereof which is called Cornouaille (and called so for the same reason as Cornwall in England is) situate not far from the Foreland which they call Penmarch, opposite to Le Four spoken of before. A Sea Town this, but not much talked of for the Haven, for ought I can find. 11 Conquet, a well-frequented Road, not far from Brest.

Chief places in the Midlands, 1 Nantes, the principal City of the Nunetes (by Ptolomy called Condivincinum) a large, fair, strong, and populous City, seated upon the Loir; a Bishops See, and the M. tropalis of Bretagne. 2 Rene, anciently the chief Town of the Rhedones, (called Cadute by Ptolomy) now a Bishops See, and the Parliament City for this County, established here An. 1553. which maketh it very populous, and of great Resort, though not fully two miles in compass. 3 Dol, an Episcopal City also, but unwholly seated amongst Marshes. 4 Dinan, a rich and pleasant Town on the River Rance. 5 L' Amballe, the chief Town of the Ambiliates, spoken of by Cesar. 6 Rohan, the title and inheritance of the Dukes of Rohan, descended from a branch of the Ducal Family of Bretagne, by Mary the second Daughter of Duke Francis the first, and Wife of John then Viscount of Rohan. 7 Ansis, the chief Seat of the now Duke of Vendosme, and the head of his Estates in Bretagne. Of which possessed in the right of his Wife, the Daughter of the Duke of Mencour by the Heir of Maritignies, another of the branches of this Ducal Family. 8 Chasteau-Briant, a strong piece on the borders of Normandie. 9 Cliffon, the chief Town of the Dutchy of Raiz, being that part of Bretagne which lieth on the South side of the Loir; a strong Town, and fortified with a very good Cattle.

Bretagne.

The Britons, who ever they were in their first Original, were unquestionably one of the first Nations that possessed any part of Gaul, after the Conquest of the Romans. Governed at first by their own Kings, the most considerable of which was that Aldroenus or Auldran, the Son of Solomon; who at the time of the Insular Britons, then distressed by the Scots and Picts, as (Geoffrey of Monmouth telleth the story) sent over Constantine his Brother with a complete Army to their aid; who having valiantly repulsed the Enemy, was made King of Britain, An. 433. Of whose posterity more there. Those of Armorica being broken by the puissance of Charles the Great, abandoned the name of Kings, and satisfied themselves with the title of Earls; assumed first by Alain le Rebre, An. 874. but as some say, An. 859. which was somewhat sooner. By Peter of Dreux, the sixteenth Earl, challenging his Estate in right of Alice his Wife, and the half Sister of Arthur, and Daughter of Constance, by Guy of Thouars her third Husband, the better to secure his title, this Earldom was made subject to the Vassallage of the Crown of France, in the time of Lewis the ninth; by whom John called the Red, the Son of this Peter, was created the first Duke of Bretagne; as being of the Blood Royal of France, descended lineally from Robert the first Earl of Dreux, one of the younger Sons of King Lewis the Gross. Yet notwithstanding this subjection to the Kings of France, the Dukes hereof reserved to themselves the Sovereign power, as to write themselves, By the Grace of God, the privilege of coining Gold, &c. and stood so high upon their terms, that Francis the last Duke, denied to do his homage to Charles the seventh, either upon his Knees, or without his Sword, according to the former custom. For which being quarrelled by Lewis the eleventh, the Son of Charles, who was at better leisure to pursue the business than his Father was, he joyned himself with Charles Duke of Berry, and Charles Duke of Burgundie in a War against him; and thereby drew upon himself that ruin, which he endeavoured to avoid. For in conclusion, Charles of Berry, as it was thought, was poisoned; Charles of Burgundie lost his life at the Battel of Nancie, 1476. and a great part of his Estate was conquered by the French King. And Francis this Duke having embarked himself in the same troublous Ocean, must needs suffer shipwrack with his Copartners. The French King invadeth Bretagne; The Duke overcharged with melancholy, dies, 1488. leaving Anne his Daughter and Heir, in the power of Charles the eighth, the Son and Successor of Lewis: who contracts a marriage with the Orphan, and uniteth Bretagne to France. There were many impediments which might have hindered this marriage, but Charles breaketh through them all. First, Charles himself had been formerly contracted to the Archduke Maximilian Daughter; but this he held void, because the young Lady was not of age, at the time of the Contract. 2 Anne the Dutchess was also contracted to Maximilian; and this he held invalid also, because that being his Homager, she could not bestow her self without his consent. 3 Maximilian had by proxy married her, which marriage he consummated by a Ceremony in those daies unusual. For his Ambassador attended with a great Train of Lords and Ladies, bared his Leg unto the Knee, and put the same within the Sheets of the Dutchess, taking possession thereby of her Bed and Body. But Charles consulting with his Divines, was told, That this pretended Consummation was rather an invention of Court, than any way firm by the Laws of the Church, and therefore of no power to hinder his pursuit of this marriage, so advantageous to his Crown. What else remains touching the union of this Dukedom to the Realm of France, we shall see anon: having first looked over the Succession of those Princes, who under several Titles have governed the Estate thereof; according to the best light we can get from Story.

6. The Dukedom and Estates of ANJOU.

THE Dukedom and Estates of ANJOU, taking them in the full latitude and extent thereof, bounded on the East with La Beausse; on the West, with Bretagne, and part of Poitou; on the North, with Normandie; and on the South, with part of Berry, and Poitou. In which circumference are comprehended the three small Provinces of Anjou, Touren, and Maine; most commonly accounted of as parts and members of La Beausse, the ancient Inhabitants whereof, in the times of the Romans, were the Andes, as Cesar (or the Andegavi, as P.iny) calls them; the Turon, and the Cenomani, accounted afterwards a part of the Province of Lugdunensis Tertia.

The Countrey for the most part is very fruitful and pleasant, especially in Touren; as is the whole tract upon the Loire. Anjou is somewhat the more hilly, but otherwise little inferior to Touren, affording plenty of white Wines, the best in France; and yielding from those Hills above 40 Riverets, falling into the Loire from thence; the chief whereof are Mayenne, 2 Vienne, 3 Dive, and 4 Sartre.

1 ANJOU, called Andegavia by the Latins, is situate in the midst betwixt Maine and Touren, so called from the Andegavi, the old Inhabitants of these parts. Principal Cities are, 1 Angiers, (by Protonie call Juliomagus) of a large circuit, and well built, the See of a Bishop, reckoning in it 15 Parishes besides the Cathedral. It is seated on the River Sartre in a very good air, and therefore chosen for the seat of an University, founded here by Lewis the second Duke of Anjou, the Son of King John, Anno 1388. 2 Beaufort, a Town belonging formerly to the Dukes of Lancaster, in which John of Gaunt so much delighted, that he caused all the Children that he had by Katharine Swinford, his third Wife, to be called Beauforts: which Beauforts were afterwards Dukes of Somerset, and Exeter, and Earls of Dorset. This Town came to the house of Lancaster, by the marriage of Blanch of Artois, unto Edmund surnamed Crouchback, second Son to our Henry the third; created by his Father, the first Earl of Lancaster. Memorable in these latter times for giving the Title of a Dutchess to Madam Katharine, the beloved Mistress of K. Henry the 4th, by whom she was mother of Cesar now Duke of Vendosme, and of Alexander, not long since the Grand Prior of France. With reference to which, the second son of the Duke of Vendosme is honoured at this present with the title of Duke of Beaufort: as the eldest with relation to his Mother was made Duke of Mercoeur. 3 Baugie, near which was fought that memorable Battel betwixt the English and the French, wherein the English lost the day, and Thomas Duke of Clarence, Brother to Henry the fifth, was there unfortunately slain, Anno 1422. 4 Saumur, pleasantly situate on the Loire, and for long time one of the Cautionary Towns in the hands of those of the Reformed Religion; of whom it is the only entire University in this Kingdom; especially famous for the learned Philip du Morney, Lord of Plessis, sometimes the Governor hereof. 5 Loches, seated on the River Indre, the Castle whereof being mounted on a steep high Rock, is thought to be one of the strongest pieces pieces of all France. 6 La Fleche, of special name at the present for a Colledge of Jesuites, one of the fairest in this Kingdom. The word in the French tongue signifieth an Arrow (whence those who make Bows and Arrows have the name of Flechers.) At Nola in the Realm of Naples, there is another Colledge of them, called D' Arque, the Bow: on which one wittily composed this ensuing Distich;

*Arcum Nola dedit, dedit illis alma Sagittam
Gallia: quis Funem, quoniam mernere, dabit?*

That is to say,

*Nola the Bow, and France the Shaft did bring:
But who shall help them to the Hempo-istring?*

2 On the South-east of Anjou, lieth the Countrey of TOUREIN, the ancient Seat of the Turones: which, for the wholsomness of the Air, the pleasantness of the Countrey, and admirable plenty of all Commodities, is by some called The Garden of France. Principal Cities in it, 1 Amboise, pleasantly seated on the Loire, and beautified with one of the fairest Castles in France, both for the gallantry of the Building, and beautifulnes of the Prospekt. 2 Tours, by Ptolomy called Casaro-dunum, and the Turonum Civitas Antoninus; the Metropolis of Lugdunensis tertia, and an Archbishops See: a fair, rich, and well-traded Town, situate on the banks of the Loire, in a most sweet and pleasing Countrey. Famous in that those of the Reformed Religion, from the Gate of S. Hugo, at which they used to issue out to their Assemblies in the Fields, had the name of Hugonots. Given to them, as some others think, as the Disciples of the night-walking Spirit (or Robin Goodfellow) which they call S. Hugo, in regard they had their first meetings, for the most part, in the nights; as had the Primitive Christians in the times of their Persecutions. Some, more improbably, (and indeed ridiculously) derive the name from the first words of an Apologie which they are fabled to have made to the King; which were Huc nos venimus: fancying, that as the Protestants did derive that Appellation from the words Protestants, and Protestantur, so often used by them in their Apologie to Charles the fifth; so from those words Huc nos, came the name of Hugonots, or Hucnots. But more assuredly famous for the great Battel fought near it by Charles Martell, Mayre of the Palace, and Father of Pepin King of France, against an Army of 400000 *Moor*s, led by Alderamen, Lieutenant General in Spain, for Evelid or Iscam the great Caliph: of which 370000 lost their lives in the place, Anno 734. 3 Landun, 4 Richelieu, pleasantly seated in a rich and flourishing Soil, as the name importeth. Of no great note till the time of the late great Cardinal of Richelieu, who took name from hence; by whom it was made one of the neatest Towns (for the bigness of it) in all this Kingdom, and honoured with the titles of a Dukedom and Pairie of France.

As for the Fortunes of this Province (for of Anjou we shall speak more at large anon) it had a while its own Proprietary Earls, of the house of Blais; conferred by Hugh Capet upon Odon Earl of Blais and Champagne: and by him given, together with the Earldom of Blais, to Theobald or Thibault his eldest Son, (his second Son named Stephen succeeding in Champagne); who in the year 1043. was vanquished and slain by Charles Martell Earl of Anjou, and this Province seized on by the Victor, who afterwards made Tours his ordinary Seat and Residence. Part of which Earldom it continued, till the seizure of Anjou, and all the rest of the English Provinces in France, on the sentence passed upon King John. After which time dismembred from it, it was conferred on John, the fourth Son of King Charles the sixth, with the stile and title of Duke of Touren; and he decealing without Issue, it was bestowed with the same title, on Charles the eldest Son of Lewis Duke of Orleans (in the life of his Father); the same who afterwards succeeding in the Dukedom of Orleans, was taken Prisoner by the English at the Battel of Agincourt, kept prisoner 25 years in England, and finally was the Father of King Lewis the twelfth.

3 On the North side of Anjou, betwixt it and Normandy, lieth the Province of MAINE; Comitatus Cenomannensis in our Latine writers. So called of the Cenomanni the old Inhabitants of this tract in the time of Cesar; some of which, with the Boii, Senones, and other Nations of the Galls had in the former time passed over the Alpes, and there possessed themselves of those Countreys, which now pass under the name and account of Lombardie. The chief Towns whereof are, 1 Mans, Cenomannensium Civitas Antoninus, by Ptolomie called Vindinum; seated on the meeting of Haine and Sarve; the principal of the Province, and a Bishops See: most memorable in the elder times for giving the title of an Earl to that famous Rowland, the Sitters Son of Charlemagne, one of the Twelve Peers of France; (the Subject of many notable Poems, under the name of Orlando Inamorato, Orlando Furioso, besides many of the old Romances) who was Earl of Mans. 2 Meyne, on the Banks of a River of the same name, (Meduana in Latine) the title of the second branch of the house of Guisse: famous for Charles Duke of Mayenne, who held out for the League against Henry the 4th; A Prince not to be equalled in the Art of War, only unfortunate in employing it in so ill a cause. 3 Vitru, upon the edge of Bretagne, of which little memorable. 4 La Val, not far from the head of the River Mayenne; of note for giving both name and title to the Earls of La val, an ancient Family, allied unto the houses of Vendosme, Bretagne, Anjou, and other the best of France. Few else of any note in this little County; which once submitting of it self under its own natural Lords and Princes, was at last united to the Earldom of Anjou, by the marriage of the Lady Gulberge, Daughter and Heir of Helie, the last Earl hereof, to Foulk Earl Anjou.

Earl of Anjou, Anno 1083. or thereabouts: the Fortunes of which great Estate it hath always followed, since that time.

But as for Anjou it self, the principal part of this goodly Patrimony, it was by Charles the Bald conferred on Robert a Saxon Prince, for his valour shewn against the Normans, Anno 870. Which Robert was Father of Eudes King of France, of Richard Duke of Burgundie, and of Robert who succeeded in the Earldom of Anjou; Competitor with Charles the Simple for the Crown it self, as the next heir to his Brother Eudes, who died King thereof. Slain in the pursuit of this great quarrel, he left this Earldom, with the title of Earl of Paris, and his pretensions to the Crown, unto Hugh his Son, surnamed the Great: who to make good his claim to the Crown, against Lewis the 4th, Son of Charles the Simple, conferred the Earldom of Anjou, and the Countrey of Gastinois, on Geofry surnamed Gryfagonelle, a renowned Warriour, and a great stickler in his cause in whose race it continued near 300 years. How the two Countreys of Main and Touren were joyned to it, hath been shewn before. Geofry the Son of Foulk the third, married Maud, Daughter to Henry the first of England, and Widow of Henry the fourth Emperor: from whom proceeded Henry the second, King of England, and Earl of Anjou. But John his Son, forfeiting his Estates in France (as the French pretended) Anjou returned unto the Crown: and afterwards was conferred by King Lewis the ninth on his Brother Charles; who in right of Beatrice his Wife was Earl of Provence, and by Pope Urban the fourth, was made King of Naples and Sicilie. Afterwards it was made a Dukedom by King Charles the fifth, (Touren being first dismembred from it) in the person of Lewis of France his second Brother, to whom this fair Estate was given, as second Son of King John of France, the Son of Philip de Valois, and consequently the next heir to Charles de Valois, the last Earl hereof (the King his Brother yielding up all his right unto him) Finally it returned again unto the Crown in the time of Lewis the eleventh. The Earls and Dukes hereof having been vested with the Diadems of several Countreys, following in this order, 1480 8 Wife of Henry the sixth; and Duke of Bar, in right of Violant his Mother. Charles Earl of Maine, Nephew to René by his third Brother Charles, at his decease left Anjou, and all the rest of his Estates to King Lewis the 11th, An. 1481. Since which never otherwise aliened, than as an honourary title of the third Son of France.

It is to be observed here (according to our method in other places) that René King of Sicil, &c. and Duke of Anjou, instituted an Order of Knight-hood, called of the Croissant: the Knights whereof carryed a Crescent, or Half-moon, on their right Arms, with this Motto, L'Or en Croissant; encouraging them thereby to seek the increase of valour and reputation.

The Arms of this Dukedome, were France, a Border Gules.

7. LA BEAUSSE.

LA BEAUSSE (not reckoning in the Provinces last before described) is bounded on the East with France specially and primarily so called; on the West, with Anjou, Maine, Tourain, and some part of Berry; on the North, with Normandy; and on the South, with Nivernois, and the rest of Berry. It is called Belsia in Latine Writers; both names derived from the pleasantness and beauties of it; this Countrey being not only looked on as the Garden of France, but the Nurse of the great City of Paris, which from the breasts thereof receiveth the best part of its sustenance.

The principal Nations of the whole in the time of the Romans, were the Carnutes, which inhabited the greatest part, and the Samniti neer the Loire; part of Gallia Celtica, and cast into the Province of Lugdunensis quarta by the Emperour Constantine. Divided by the French into the Higher, the Lower, and the Intermediate.

1 The HIGHER BEAUSSE is that part which lyeth next to Normandy, of which the principal Towns are, 1 Dreux, seated upon the River Eureux, supposed to be the seat of the ancient Druides, who held here their Parliaments or Sessions for administration of Justice. The title and inheritance of Robert, one of the younger sons of King Lewis the Groesse, and Grandfather of that Peter of Dreux, who succeeded Arthur, the Son of Geoffry Plantagenet, in the Earldom of Bretagne. 2 Montfort, an Earldom, the title and Estate of John Earl of Montfort, surnamed the Valiant, who succeeded in the Dukedom of Bretagne, by the aid of the English, An. 1341. 3 Chartres, called antiently Carnutum Civitas, (but by Ptolemy, Aricum) from whence the Countrey hereabouts was called Le Pais Chartrain: seated in an uneven place, varied with fertile rising Hills, so that the East side stands upon the top of an Hill, and the West spreads it self in the bottom of a Plain, through the midst whereof runs the River Eure, which as soon as it comes to the Walls of the City, on the South-side, divides it self into three branches, two whereof encompass the City round about, and the third running thorough the middle thereof, serveth the Town with many Mills for the use of the people; doth afterwards unite it self with the rest into one main Channel. A very fair and goodly City, a Bishops See, and one of the Vidamates of France; antiently giving the title of an Earldom also to the house of Blois, from the time that Theobald the second Earl of Blois extorted it by strong hand from the Bishops hereof, about the year 950. continuing in the possession of that Family till the year 1300. or thereabouts, when sold by Maubault or Maud, the Heir Proprietar hereof, Wife of Hugh de Chastillon, in her right called Earl of Blois, to King Philip the Fair, for an Annual pension of 4000 Livres. 4 Anneau, a Town of the territory of Chartres, memorable for the great slaughter made here by Henry Duke of Guise, of the Germ. in Auxiliaries, invading France with a right formidable Army in behalf of the Hugonots, An. 1587.

2 The LOWER BEAUSSE is that which lyeth towards Nivernois and Berry; and is subdivided into Sologne, and Orleans. In SOLOGNE, which lyeth close to Berry, the chief places of note, are, 1 Romorantin, seated on the Souldre, the chief Town of this Tract. 2 Mallenzay. 3 La Ferte, or La Ferte S. Bernard, of which nothing memorable. In ORLEANOIS, which lyeth more Northwards upon the River of Loyre, are, 1 Lareau, a Town once of very great strength, and one of the out-works of Orleans. 2 Cleri, called also Cleri of Notre-dame, from the Church there built unto our Lady. 3 Tury; and 4 Angerville, both in the ordinary Road betwixt Paris and Orleans, the principal City of all Beausse, called Genabum in the time of Caesar; repaired, or rather new built by the Emperour Aurelius, An. 276. from thence named Aurelia, the Countrey round about it Aurelianensis, now Orleans, and Orleans. The Countrey generally very fruitful and yielding a most excellent and delicious Wine; which for the strength, and intoxicating power thereof, is banished the French Kings Cellar by especial Edict. The City very pleasantly seated on the River Loyre, well built, situate in a sweet Air, and planted with a Civil and ingenious People; who are said to speak the best Language of any in France. For a time it was the chief Seat of a distinct Kingdom, (according to the unprovident humour of the Merovingians) the lot of Clodomire Son of Clovis the Great, and of Guntram Son of Clovis, both Kings of Orleans; as also was Theodorick, the second Son of Childbert King of Metz, on the death of Guntram. But Sigibert his son being vanquished by Clovis the second, this Kingdom extending to the shores of the Aquitain Ocean, was added unto that of France. Orleans since that time content with a lower title, hath of late oftentimes with greater prudence, been made the honourary title of the second Sons of France called Dukes hereof; the first who had the title being Philip the 2d. son of Philip de Valois, from a Base son of whose,

Earls

Berry.

Earls of Dunnois, and Dukes of Longeville do derive themselves, and Lewis the second son of Charles the first, Grandfather of Lewis the 11th. French King. It is a See Episcopal, a Bailiwick, or Seige Præfidal, and an University. The See Episcopal founded in the Church of St. Croisse, miserably ruined by the Hugonots in the civil Wars, out of meer hatred to the name. The Seige Præfidal settled here by King Henry the 2d. 1551. for the ease of his Subjects of these parts, in sutes not worth the troubling of the Courts of Paris. The University erected by King Philip le Bel, An. 1312. though, to speak properly, it be an Hall only for the reading of the Civil Laws, the only learning there professed, and for that considerable. A Town now not of so great strength as in former times, when for some months it held out against the whole power of the English; rescued from them at last by the valour of Joan the Virgin, whose Statue (like a man of Arms) is still preserved on the Bridge-gate of this City; near which great Monks-earl of Salisbury had his fatal blow.

The MIDDLE or intermediate BEAUSSE lieth betwixt the former; in which the places of chief note are, 1 Blois, seated also on the Loire, in a sound Air, and fruitful Countrey; the Nursery for the most part of the Kings Children, for that cause much resorted to by the Nobility; and honoured sometimes with the residence of the Kings themselves: it being in the Council-chamber of the Kings house here, that Henry of Lorrein, Duke of Guise, the chief contriver of the terrible Massacre at Paris, and Author of the Holy League, was slain by the command of King Henry the 3d. An. 1589. 2 Chateaufort, the chief Town of the Earldom of Dunnois, (the honour and Estate of John Earl of Dunnois, commonly called the Bassard of Orleans, one of the best Souldiers of his time, and so approved by his exploits against the English) mounted upon the top of an high Hill, at the confluence of the Loire; and Aigre. 3 Lavardin, most remarkable for giving name and honour to a noble Family; which depending on the house of Vendosme (to the Signeury whereof it doth belong) brought forth that valiant Commander, Monsieur de Tardin, a faithful and courageous follower of King Henry the fourth, in his long War against the Leaguers. 4 Vendosme (Vindocinum in Latine) the chief Town of the Dukedom of Vendosme; not otherwise of note than for the Earls and Dukes which have born th's Title: of which as being the Progenitors of the Kings now regnant, I have thought fit to adde the ensuing Catalogue; premising first, that this Earldom came to the house of France by the marriage of Katharine daughter and Heir of John, the last Earl of the former Race, to John the first, the Earl of the other Family.

|------|--|---|
| 1386 | 1 John of Bourbon, Grandchild of Lewis the first Duke of Bourbon, the first Earl of Vendosme of this Family. | Vendosme, from whose youngest son called Lodowick, or Lewis, descend the now Princes of Conde, and Earls of Soissons. |
| 1432 | 2 Lewis of Bourbon a confederate with Joan the Virgin, in her actions against the English. | 1532 6 Antony of Bourbon, Duke of Vendosme; and King of Navarre. |
| 1446 | 3 John of Bourbon II. from whom descended the Princes of Rochefort, and the Dukes of Montpensier. | 1562 7 Henry of Bourbon, Duke of Vendosme; and King of Navarre; afterwards King of France also, by the name of Henry the 4th. |
| 1472 | 4 Francis of Bourbon. | 8 Caesar de Vendosme, one of the Sons of Henry the 4th, by the Dutches of |

The Arms of the Earls and Dukes of Vendosme, were and are, Azure, six Flower de Lyces, Or, 3. 2. 1. Those of the former Family affirmed by Bars to have been France, on a Bend Gules, three Lyons Or.

But the great Lords of this Countrey, were the Earls of Blois, possessed not only of the Earldom of Chartres (a fair and goodly Signeury) in the higher Beausse; but also of the whole Countrey of Tourain, a better Patrimony and Estate then that; which how they were alienated from this House, we have seen before. And as for the Earldom of Blois it self, it contained a large and gallant Patrimony in the middle Beausse; thereunto belonging; which being after sold to the Dukes of Orleans, gave the first greatness to that House. As for the Earls of Blois themselves, they fetch their Pedigree from one Gerlon a noble Dane (companion in Arms unto Rollo the first Duke of Normandie) in his acquiring of that Dukedom, by Charles the Simple created the first Earl hereof, An. 920. or thereabouts, branching it self into the houses of Blois and Champagne; sometimes united in one person, but for the most part, and at last, divided into two great Families; Stephen King of England, commonly called Stephen of Blois, derived both his name and parentage from the Earls of this house, as being son of Theobald, the fifth Earl of Blois, by Maud one of the daughters of Williams, Duke of Normandie, and King of England, surnamed the Conquerour. From this Theobald the Earls of Blois continued in the masculine Line, till the year 1219. under nine Princes in the total, of the house of Gerlon: And then it fell by the Heirs General, to the noble Family of Chastillon, continuing theirs till the year 1391. when sold by Guy de Chastillon the last Earl of that House, to Lewis Duke of Orleans; he being then Namur. then Childless, and wholly governed by his Wife (a Daughter of the house of Namur) who could not otherwise maintain her great prodigality, but by ready money. United finally to the Crown, by Levis the Grand-son of this Levis, on his succession to the Kingdom, after Charles the 8th.

The Arms of these great Earls were, Gules, three Palis, Vaire, a Chief, Or.

8. NIVERNOIS.

NIVERNOIS is bounded on the North with La Beauce, on the South with Bourbonois, on the East with Champagne, and on the West with Berry; so called from Nivernum, or Nevers, the chief Town thereof.

This is the smallest Province in all this Continent, but to be handled here apart, because not easily reducible unto any other, as all the rest of the lesser Provinces may be. The Soil not very fruitful of Corn or Wine, but plentifully stored with rich Pastures, and well shaded with Woods, in which are found some Mines of Iron, interpersed with Silver, and many quarries of good Stone, of much use for building. The territory being but small, we cannot look for many Towns of note, and consequence. Of those that be, the principal are, 1 Pontigni, remarkable for an ancient Abby, the burial place of some of the old Earls of Nevers. 2 Nevers it self upon the Loire, beautified with a Bridge of 20 Arches, but otherwise not great or fair, though the chief of this small Country, and the seat of the Dukes. The reputation which it hath proceeding specially from the Antiquity thereof, and the Earls and Dukes from thence denominated.

Once part of the Burgundian Conquests, and from them won by the French, it came to have Princes of its own, almost as early as any other Country in the Realm of France. Who was the first that had the title of Earl of Nevers, and therewithal the Lordship of this Estate, I can nowhere find; but sure I am, that in the year 1001. both the Estate and Title were enjoyed by Landin a noble man of the Burgundian race, who on the death of Henry the 4th. Duke of Burgundy, was like to have seized on that Estate, in despite of Robert King of France, who pretended to it. Passing through many Families, it came at last to the house of Burgogne, in the person of Odo, son of Hugh the fourth of that name, Duke of Burgundy, by the Heir General of Nevers, and from that to the house of Flanders, by the marriage of Toland of Burgogne, to Robert of Bethune Earl of Flanders, 1312. whose son named Levis, married the Heir of Rethell, uniting by that marriage these Estates under his command. Together with the rest of the rights of Flanders, it came again by marriage to Philip the Hardy Duke of Burgundy; who with the liking and content of his elder Sons (otherwise well provided for) conferred both it and Rethell, on his third Son Philip, whose Niece Elizabeth, daughter and Heir of John of Burgogne, brought it in marriage to Adolph of Cleve her Husband, An. 1484. In the person of Francis, the 4th Earl of this House, it was made a Dukedom, and by his Daughter Henrietta, sister and Heir of Francis the last Prince of this Family, was brought in Dower to Levis de Gonzaga, second son of Frederick Duke of Mantua, An. 1563. whose son Charles succeeded his Father and Mother in the Dukedom of Nevers; and Vincent of Gonzaga, his Cousin German, in the Dukedom of Mantua. And here it is to be observed, that though this Estate hath passed through so many Families, yet the rights and Regalities thereof, have been still continued; not being hitherto reduced (for ought I can find) under any of the Parliaments of France, as all the rest of that Kingdom is, but such parts thereof as are either under other Princes, or else enjoy the Privileges of a free Estate.

The Arms hereof are, Azure, within a Border Compoze, Gules and Argent, three Flower de Lys, Or.

9. The Dukedom of BOURBON.

THE Dukedom of BOURBON, in the full power and extent thereof, comprehended Bourbonois, Forrest, Beau-jolois, and Auvergne; all now reverted to the Crown.

1 BOURBONIS hath on the East, the Dukedom of Burgundy; on the West, Berry; on the North, Nivernois, and a corner of Gastinois; on the South, Auvergne. So called from Bourbon (for distinction sake, called Bourbon Archenbauld) the chief Town thereof. The Country very well wooded, and of excellent pasturage; which makes the people more intent to grazing and feeding Cattel, than they are to Tillage; and is watered with the Rivers of Loir, Tonne, and Allier, which are counted navigable; besides Aron, Acolin, Lixentes, Lanbois, and some lesser streams.

It is divided into the Higher, and the Lower. In the Higher which is more mountainous and hilly, there is no other Town of note, than that of Montaigne, situate in the Country of Combraille; the Signatory, as I take it, of Michael de Montaigne, the Author of the Book of Essais. But in the Lower Bourbon are, 1 Molins, esteemed the Center of all France, situate on the Allier, a Baillage, and the chief Town of this Country: the River yielding great plenty of Fish, but of Salmons specially; the Town adorned with a fair Cattle, and that beautified with one of the finest Gardens in France, in which are many Trees of Limmons and Oranges. 2 Bourbon Archenbauld, and 3 Bourbon Auzie: the former of the two seated upon the Loir, and giving name to the whole Province; of great resort by reason of of its medicinal waters. 4 S. Porcin, and 5 Varennes Ganat upon the Frontiers of Auvergne, 6 Chancelles, 7 Charroux, 8 Palisse, 9 Sonvigni, 10 St. Amand.

The antient Inhabitants were part of the Hedui, who being wasted in their warres against the Romans, a great part of their Country was by Julius Caesar, conferred on the Boii, a German Nation, who coming with the Helvetians into Gaul, and unwilling upon their defeat to go home again, were by him planted in this Tract, at the request of the Hedui, who desired it of him: and possibly the Hedui might be willing to have these Boii dwell amongst them, not only to fill up their numbers, and manure the waste Grounds of their Country, but in regard of some nearer tie, that was between them: it being conceived by many learned men, that these Boii, which together with these Genomanni, Senones, and other Gallick Nations crossed over the Alpes, had been originally of these parts; and being driven out of Italy by the conquering Romans, fell into Germany, and from thence sent those Auxiliaries to attend the Helvetians in their journey spoken of before. Made subject to the Romans, with the rest of Gallia, and by them reckoned as a part of Aquitania, it continued under their command; till the coming of the Burgundians, by whom it was subdued and made a part of their Kingdom, in the subverting of which Kingdom, it was (together with Beau-jolois) subdued by the more powerful French; and how disposed of afterwards, we shall see anon, having first taken a view of the other Provinces.

2 FORREST, is bounded on the East, with Beau-jolois; on the West, with Auvergne; on the North, with Bourbonois; and on the South, with a part of Languedoc. The Country populous and large, but not very fruitful; hilly and mountainous, much of the nature of the Wood-lands. The Air a little of the coldest to afford good Wines, but that sufficiently recompensed by abundance of Pit-coal; by which they have very good fires at a cheap rate. The people are conceived to be none of the wisest, but withal very greedy and covetous of gain.

The chief Towns in it are, 1 Mont-brison, seated on the Loir. 2 Fours, seated on the same River, called antiently Forum Segusianorum, the chief Town of the Segusiani, or Secusiani, whom Caesar and others mention in this part of Gaul. 3 St. Stephen, (or Estienne) in Feurien, near the head of that River. 4 St. Germans. 5 St. Rimberg. 6 St. Bennet le Chasteau. 7 St. Guermier, &c. of which little memorable.

This Country of Forrest was antiently a part of the Earldom of Lyons, dismembred from it at or about the same time with Beau-jolois; and was held by a long succession of Earls Proprietaries of it, as a State distinct: till Regnaud Lord of Forrest, the Son of Earl Guy, by the marriage of Isabel Daughter and Heir of Humbert Earl of Beau-jeu, joyned them both together, which was about the year 1265; parted again after his decease, An. 1280. Guy being his eldest Son succeeding in Forrest; and Levis his second son in Beau-jeu. How they became united in the house of Bourbon, we shall see anon.

3 BEAU-JOLOIS, so called from Beau-jeu, the chief Town hereof, taketh up the tract of ground betwixt the Loir and the Soasne, and betwixt Lionnois, and Forrest. A Country of no great extent, but very remarkable for the Lords and Princes of it: who have been men of great eminence in their several times. The chief Town of it is Beau-jeu, beautified with a goodly Cattle, pleasantly seated on the brow of a rising Mountain, from whence perhaps it took the name; as the great Keep in Farnham Castle, was in the same sense, and for the same pleasant situation, called Joyous Guards, in the time of Lancelot du Lake, whose that Cattle was. Which appears further by a Tower built at Constantinople, by Guiscard the third of that name Lord hereof (being then Ambassador to the Emperour from King Philip Augustus) with this inscription, Turris Bellijocensis; which there continued to be seen, a long time after. 2 Belle-ville, where is an Abby founded by Humbert the second, An. 1158. 3 Ville Franche, environed with Walls by Humbert the fourth; whose Son Guiscard the third above mentioned, founded here a Convent of Franciscans called to this day Minorette. 4 Noironte. 5 St. Maurice. 6 Ulse. 7 Olches, concerning which there have been long and many Wars betwixt the Earls of Forrest; and these Lords of Beau-jeu.

This Country, as that other of Forrest, was once part of the Earldom of Lyons; in the partage of which Estate it fell to Omphroy one of the Brothers of Earl Artand, An. 989. whose Successors had no other title than Lords of Beau-jeu. They were most of them men of great piety, founders of many Collegiate and conventual Churches; some of them men of action also: Humbert the second and the fifth, Adventurers in the Wars of the Holy Land; Richard the second, in those against the English; Guiscard the fourth, made Constable of France, by King Levis the ninth. But the house failing in this Guiscard, it was united unto that of the Earls of Forrest, as before is said, in the person of Regnaud Earl thereof: whose Son and Successor called Levis, was also Constable of France; as Edward the Grand-child of this Levis, a Marshall of it. But at the last it fell into the hands of a lewd and wicked Prince, Edward the second: who being imprisoned at Paris for his great offences, and overlaid with Wars by the Dukes of Savoy; made a donation or free gift of all his Signories to Levis Duke of Bourbon, furnished the good; the direct Heir of Guy Earl of Forrest, the eldest Son of Regnaud Earl of Forrest and Lord of Beau-jeu above mentioned, and consequently of next Kin to him. An. 1400.

4 AUVERGNE hath on the East Forrest, and Lyonnois; on the West, Limosin, Perigot, and Quercu; on the South, part of Languedoc; and on the North, Berry and Bourbonois. It is divided into the Higher, and Lower. The Lower being called Limaigne, is fruitful in a very eminent degree; the Higher mountainous and barren. In this last the Towns of chief note are, 1 St. Flour a Bishops See; of of an impregnable situation. 2 Arilla, on the River Jourdain, defended with a strong Castle on the top of a Rock. 3 Beauregard, on the River Gardon. 4 Carlat. 5 Murat. 6 Billon, of which little observable in ancient stories. In the Lower called Limaigne, from a River of that name which falls into the Allier; there is, 1 Clermont, a Bishops See, fair and pleasing for the situation, and Fountains descending from the Hills of the higher Auvergn, the chief City of the whole Province. Most memorable in these later Ages for the Council here called by Pope Urban the second, An 1067. in which, by the artifice of the Pope, the Christian Princes of the West engaged themselves in the Wars of the Holy Land; giving thereby the better opportunity to the Popes, to enlarge both their Territories, and their power. It was first raised out of the ruins of Gergovia, the head City of the Auverni, in the time of Cæsar, and the seat Royal of Vercingetorix King of that Nation, who so long put him to his trumps with an Army of 138000 men; now a small Village called Gergeau. 2 Rion, in which resides the Seneschal or chief Governour of the Lower Auvergn. 3 Montpensier, of great note for the Princes of the house of Bourbon, once Dukes hereof: beginning in Lewis the first Earl, Son of John Duke of Bourbon, An 1415. and ending in Henry the last Duke; whose Daughter and Heir was married to the Duke of Orleans, Brother of Lewis the thirteenth. 4 Montferrant. 5 Tiffière. 6 Brionde. 7 Aigueperse. 8 Turenne, the ancient Seat and Patrimony of the *De La Tour*s, heretofore Earls of Boulogne, now Sovereigns of Sedan, and Dukes of Bonillon; to whom it hath for some Ages since given the title of Viscount. A Family descended from the Heirs general of Enfance Earl of Boulogne in Picardy, Father to Godfrey of Bonillon Duke of Lorraine, and King of Hiernsalem.

The Country first inhabited in the times of the Romans, by the potent Nation of the Auverni; whose King Bituitus, was taken Prisoner, and led in triumph unto Rome, in the war against the Salii, the Allobroges, and others of their Confederates: Not fully conquered, till Cæsar had subdued their King Vercingetorix. They were afterwards part of the Province of Aquitania prima, retaining in the often changes of the Empire, its old name of Auvergn. Heretofore part of the great Dutchy of Aquitain, remaining subject to those Dukes, till William the eighth Duke, and the fourth of that name, gave it in portion with one of his Daughters, whose name I find not, nor the name of her Husband neither, of whom there is nothing on record, but that he took up Arms against Lewis the sixth, who began his Reign, An 1110. By the Heir general of this house it was conveyed in marriage to John the second son of Guigne the 4th, and Beatrix, Dauphin of Viennois; in whose Line it continued under the title of the Dauphins of Auvergn, till Berauld, the last Earl or Dauphin of it. Who having married the Heir of Gay Earl of Forreft, the son of Regnaud above mentioned; had by her a Daughter named Anne, Heir of both Estates, married to Lewis the Good, the third Duke of Bourbon: to whom Edward the last Lord of Beaujeu made a Donation or furrendry of that Signeury also; uniting in his person the distinct Estates of Bourbon, Beaujeu, Forreft, and Auvergne.

And as for Bourbonnois it self, in the distractions of the French Empire, by the posterity of Charles the Great, who most improvidently cautions it into many great Estates, and petit Signeuries: it fell unto the share of the potent Family of the Dampierre, descended from the ancient house of Burgogne, who held it till the year 1308. At what time Lewis the ninth, for the advancement of Robert Earl of Clermont (in Beauvoisin) his fifth Son; married him to Beatrix Daughter and Heir of Archenbald Dampierre the last of that house. Lewis the son of this Robert was the first Duke of this Line; whose successors and their achievements follow in this Catalogue of used customarily by the eldest sons of the Earls and Dukes of Montpensier; till given to Charles, natural Son of King Charles the ninth, called from hence the Count or Earl of Auvergne: who being a Confederate of Charles Duke of Biron, was in the year 1604. made Prisoner by King Henry the fourth, released by King Lewis the thirteenth, Anno 1616. and within two years after made Duke of Angoulême; in whose posterity it remaineth.

The Armes of these Dukes were 1 France, a Baston Gules, for the Dukedom of Bourbon; 2 Or, a Dauphin Palme, Azure, for the County of Auvergne; 3 Or, a Lion Sable, armed Gules, under a Labell of fine pieces of the same, for the Signeury of Beaujeu. The Armes of the Earldom of Forreft I am yet to seek. But antiently the Armes of Bourbon when under the Dampierres, were Or, a Lion Rampant Gules, environed with Cockle-shells of Azure.

10. BERRIE.

HAVING thus taken a survey of those several Provinces, which (except Bretagne) were the first purchases of the French in the modern France, and so much of the Burgundian Conquests, as were either layed to the Kingdom of West France, or else were necessarily to be passed over in the course of our Journey, let us next look on those which were possessed by the Goths. And first we will begin with BERRIE, (as next in situation unto those before described) bounded on the East with Bourbonnois and Nivernois; on the West, with Poitou and part of Touraine; on the North, with La Beaumelle; on the South with Limosin, in Latin called Bituricum regio, from the Bituriges, the old inhabitants of this Tract, by Pliny, Strabo, and some others called the Bituriges Cubi, to difference them from the Bituriges Ubisci dwelling about Bordeaux.

The Country watred in the East with the River Loire; in the South, with the Fage; in the North, with the Cher; and in the Inland parts with Indre, Arnon, Theo, Eure, and others which we shall meet withall anon: of no great note, but such as much conduce to the fruitfulness of it; affording it the benefit of far pastures, and flourishing meadows; which breed great multitudes of cattel, and such flocks of Sheep, that when they tax a man for lying in excess of numbers, they use to say, Fie sir, there are not so many sheep in Berrie.

It containeth in it 33 walled Towns, the chief whereof are, 1 Bourges, a Town of great strength by nature, and as well fortified by Art; situate in a low Flat, amongst deep impassable Bogs and Marshes, caused by the overflowing of the Auron, Yeuze, Malon, and Aurette, small Riverets, but of great waters when they meet together. By means whereof it may be easily drowned, at the approach of an Enemy; for that cause made the faintness and retreat of Charles the seventh, in his long wars against the English, possessed at that time of Paris, and the greatest part of the Kingdom. The poor Prince in the mean time, fain to feast it here with a Rump of Mutton, and a Chick, and that but upon high daies neither: from his constant abode here, and that withall he had been Duke of this Country, in the life of his three elder brethren, by the English in derision called King of Berrie. A large, fair, and rich town it is, the Seat of an Archbishop; a Siege prelidial, and one of the best Universities in France, especially for the study of the Civil Lawes, first founded by King Lewis the ninth, and afterwards restored and perfected by Charles Duke of Berrie, the Brother of King Lewis the eleventh. Some fabulous Founders, and ridiculous Originations, have been thought of for it; as that it was built by Ogyges, a Grandchilde of Noah, by whom called Bytognes, which in the corruption of the following times, came (forsooth) unto Bituriges: which Etymologic, were it as dear bought as it is far fetcht, might be good for Ladies; and then it would be good for somewhat. Others no less absurdly, will have it called Bituris, quasi Bi-turris, from two fair Towers which formerly (as they pretend) were erected here; one of the two, in part still standing: and unto this, they say, alludeth an old *Grammari*n, thus:

Turribus à binis inde vocor Bituris.

From two Towers which were builded here;
The name of Bituris I bear.

But the truth is, it was thus called from the Bituriges (the Bituricum Civitas of Antoninus) and by that name in the division of old Gaul by the Emperor Constantine, made the Metropolis of the Province of Aquitania prima, of which this Country was a part. 2 Wiarzon, or Viarzon, pleasantly seated amongst Woods, Vines, and Rivers; the Rivers Arnon, Theo, Cher, and Yeuze, meeting hereabouts. Built in or near the place of the old Avarenum, a Town of great note and strength in the time of Cæsar; the revolt whereof gave such a check to his proceedings, that he was fain to stretch his wits, and valour on the very tenterhooks, before it was again recovered. 3 Concreffant, on the River Soulde, beautified with a strong and magnificent Castle. 4 Chasseau-Roux, on the River Indre: of which little memorable. 5 Issandun, on the River Theo; the Balliage for that part of the Country. 6 Montfalcon, an ancient Barony. 7 Argenton, on the River Creuse, the Title and Estate of Philip de Comines; hence called Seigneur de Argenton, who writ the History of France under Lewis the 11th, in which he divided so far into, and writ so plainly of the greatest affairs of State, that Queen Katharine de Medicis used to say, that he had made as many Hereticks in State-policy, as Luther had done in Religion. 8 Sanerrey, seated on a high hill near the River Loire, by some Latin writers called Xantodorum, but most generally rally said to be so called, quasi s. crum Circus, from the Goddess Circis, whom worshipped in the times of Gentilisme. A Town of great consequence and strength, and as such assigned over to the Hugonots, of Gentilisme. A Town of great consequence and strength, and the better keeping of the Articles of Peace An. 1569. as a Town of caution for their security, and the better keeping of the Articles of Peace then agreed upon: Famous not long after for enduring a most desperate and tedious siege, under Charles the 9th, by whom these Articles were almost no sooner made than broken. Before which time, it was not under the command of the French Kings, but under the direct dominion of its own Princes, called the Earls of Sancerre, who had the Sovereignty thereof; but being taken by the Kings Forces, upon this occasion, An. 1573. and the Walls thrown down, a Garrison was put into the Castle, to keep it for the time to come at the Kings devotion, the rents and profits of it still remaining to the true Proprietaries.

Here is also in this Province the Town and Signeury of Amignie, adorned with many privileges, an ample territory, and a beautifull Castle; Bestowed by Charles the sixth on Robert, the second son of Alan Stewart, Earl of Lennox in Scotland, for his many signal services against the English, and is still the honourary title and possession of the second Branch of that noble and illustrious Family, hence called by the name of Lords of Amignie.

But as for Berry it self, and the Fortunes of it, we may please to know that the old Inhabitants of it, were the Bituriges Cubi, (or the Bituriges Livi, as some writers call them) subdued, but not without great difficulty, by the matchless Cesar; in the first division of Gallia, made part of Aquitania, and in the new modelling of that Province by the Emperor Constantine, a part of Aquitania Prima, won from the Romans by the Goths, and from them by the French; it was for long time under the command of Provincial Governours; one of which, called by the name of Godfrey, obtained that dignity from Hugh Capet, and his Posterity enjoyed that Office, under the Kings of France, till the dayes of King Henry the first; of whom the inheritance and Eitate was bought by Harpin, one of the descendants of that Godfrey. But long he had not held it as Proprietary, in his own right, when desirous to make one in the Holy Wars, he sold it back again to King Philip the first (the better to furnish himself for that expedition) An. 1096. to be united to the Crown after his decease. Since which time, the Sovereignty of it hath been always in the Crown of France; but the possession and Revenue sometimes given with the title of Duke, for a portion to some of the Kings younger sons, to be holden of them in Appenage, under the Sovereignty and command of the Donor and his Successors. The first of those that held this title, was John, a younger son of King John of France, and Uncle unto Charles the 6th, during whose Reign, betwixt this Duke, and those of Burgundy and Orleans, the Realm of France was miserably distracted into Broils and Factions. The second was another John son of Charles the 6th, who dying in his minority, was succeeded in this title, by his Brother Charles, successor to his Father in the Crown it self. The fourth and last, (for it had no more then four Dukes in all) was Charles, the youngest son of King Charles the 7th, who siding with the Earl of Charolois, did so much trouble the affairs of France, under Lewis the 11th, by whom he was made Duke of Normandy, and of Guienne afterwards, but held neither long. After whose death it was united to the Crown, never since separated from it; but though it never had Duke since, it hath had three Duchesses: first giving the title of Duchess to the Lady Joan, Daughter of Lewis the 11th, and Wife to Lewis the 12th, then Duke of Orleans, cited herein by her said Husband, when coming to the Crown, he divorced her from him, to make room for the Lady Anne, Duchess of Bretagne, the Widow of Charles the 8th, his Predecessor. Conferred after her decease, but on more honourable grounds, by King Francis the first, on the Lady Margaret his sister, first married to Charles Duke of Alanson, and after his decease to Henry of Albert King of Navarre; the last that had this title, being another Margaret, a Daughter of the said King Francis, married to Philibert Emanuel Duke of Savoy.

II. POICTOU.

POICTOU is bounded on the East, with Taurcin, Berry, and Limosa; on the North, with Bretagne, and Anjou; on the South, with Xaintoigne, a member of the Dukedom of Aquitain; and on the West, with the Aquitain Seas.

It is called in Latin Pictavis, from the Pictones, as Ptolomy, Cesar, and some others; or the Pictavi, as Antoninus calleth them, the old inhabitants hereof: and is a Countrey so great and plentiful, that there are numbered in it 1200 Parishes, and three Bishopricks. A strong argument of the populousness and largeness of it. Besides the goodness of the Soil, it hath many other great helps to enrich it; that is to say, a large Sea coast, some capacious Harbours, not a few navigable Rivers emptying themselves into the sea; besides the benefit which redounds to it from the Clin, or Clavins, the Crevis, and Vienne, three Rivers falling into the Loire; which also glides along on the North hereof.

The principal Towns and Cities of it are, 1 Poitiers, in Latin Pictavis, seated upon the Clin, or Clavins, by Ptolomy called Augustoritum: the largest City for compass of ground within the Walls, next to Paris it self; but containing in that circuit, Meadows, Corn-fields, and other waste grounds. It is an University, especially for the study of the Civil Laws, and a See Episcopal: one of the Bishops hereof being S. Hilarie, surnamed Pictavensis, that renowned Father of the Church, and a stout Champi-

Poitou.

Champion of the Catholic Faith against the Arians, though countenanced in their Heresie by the Emperor Constantius. 2 Saumur, upon the River Charente, near the edge of Xaintoigne. 3 Talmont, upon the shores of the Ocean. 4 Beaumont, a Sea-town also, and a reasonable good Port, near the confines of Bretagne. 5 Roche-sur-yon, so called for its situation on the Ten or John; which gave the title of Prince to one of the Branches of the Royal race of Bourbon. 6 Lusignan, on the River Ion, also denominating the noble Family of Lusignan, sometimes Kings of Jerusalem, and afterwards of Cyprus; which last they had in exchange for the first, by the donation of King Richard the first of England. 7 Lucon, or Luçon, seated upon a navigable Arm of the Sea: sufficiently famous in being the Episcopal See of the renowned Cardinal of Richelieu, who so long managed the affairs of France for King Lewis the thirteenth. 8 Maillefort, a Bishops See also. 9 Thovars, which gives the title of Duke to the ancient Family of Tremouille, from which the Dukes of Bretagne did derive themselves; from the time that Constance the Daughter and Heir of Conan, after the death of Geoffrey Plantagenet her first Husband, had Jay of Thovars for her second. 10 Chastell Herauld, (or Castrum Herauld) on the River Vienne, of which James Hamilton, Earl of Arran in Scotland, by the gift of King Henry the second of France, the better to assure him to the French Faction there, against the English, had the title of Duke.

In the Vine-fields of this Countrey, within two Leagues of Poitiers, was fought that memorable battel, between John of France, and Edward the Son of King Edward the third, surnamed the Black Prince. Who being distressed by the number of the French, would willingly have departed on honourable terms; which the French not accepting, in stead of conquest, found a Fall overthrow. The greatness and particulars whereof we shall hereafter see in the life of King John Fol. 236. For they presuming on their own strength, to their own disadvantage, bereft the enemy of all opportunity of retiring: whereas ordinary policy would instruct the Leader of an Army, to make his enemy, if he would flee, a Bridge of Gold, as Count Petillan used to say. Hereupon Themistocles would not permit the Grecians to break the Bridge made over the Hellepont by Xerxes; lest the Persians should be compelled to fight; and so happen to recover their former losses: and Charles the sixth lost his Army, by intercepting of our Henry the fifth in his march to Calice. For where all way of flight or retreat is stoppt, the basest Souldier will rather die with glory in the Front of his Battel, than flee and be killed with ignominy. So true a Mistris of hardy resolutions is Despair; and no less true this Proverb of ours, Make a Coward fight and he will kill the Devil. On the contrary, it hath been the use of divers politick Captains; to make their own Souldiers fight more resolutely, by taking from them all hope of safety but by battel. So did William the Conquerour; who at his arrival into England, burnt the Ships which transported his Army: thereby giving the Souldiers to understand that their lives lay in the strength of their Arms, and courage of their hearts, not in the nimbleness of their heels. Tariff, the leader of the Moor into Spain, burnt likewise all his Navy, one only Pinnace excepted; which he reserved to carry tydings of his success. So when Charles Martell encountered that infinite host of the Saracens, (of which you have already heard) he commanded the people of Tours to open the Gates only to the Victors. Then he led his Army over the Loire, placing on the banks thereof certain Troops of Horsemen, to kill all such as fled out of the field: Hereby informing his men, that there was to them no more France than what they fought on; unless they were Conquerors. In like manner, the same Themistocles, cunningly working the Persians to enclose the Greek Navy on every side; inflamed the Grecians with such courage, by a necessity of fight, that they gave their enemies the most memorable defeat that ever hapned on those seas.

But to proceed, the people of this Province have more in them of the old Gall, than any in France; as lying so betwixt the borders of the Goths, and French, that it was never thoroughly planted, or possessed by either. An Argument whereof may be, that they are naturally more rude, subtle, crafty; and contentious than the rest of their Countreymen; and have a Dialect by themselves much differing from the common French, having many words mixt with it (questionless some remainders of the ancient Gallick) which the natural French man understands not. In the division of Gaul by the Emperor Constantine, they were reckoned for a part of Aquitania Secunda: and as a part thereof won from the Romans, with Limosin, Perigord, and Quercus, by Euricus King of the Goths in Spain. Of whose Kingdom it continued part, till those Goths were dispossessed of their hold in France, by Clevis the fifth King of the French, surnamed the Great. After which it belonged to the Kings of that People; by the Posterity of Charles the Great; assigned to some Provincial Governours with the title of Earls. One of which being named Ebles (of the old Gothish race, if I guess a right) by the last will and Testament of William the Delonair Duke of Aquitain, and Earl of Auvergne, succeeded in that fair Eitate. Poitou by this means made a part of the Dukedom of Aquitain, came with it at the last to the Kings of England, as shall there be shewn: and being theirs, was given with the title of Earl by King Henry the second, to Richard surnamed Coeur de Lyon, who was after King. Seized upon by the French in the unfortunate reign of King John, with the rest of the English Provinces, An. 1202. Alphonso, brother to Lewis the 9th, is made Earl of Poitou: and being again recovered by King Henry the third, it was by him conferred on his Brother Richard Earl of Cornwall. But Henry being entangled in the Barons Wars, and Richard wholly taken up with the affairs of Germany, of which by some of the Electors he was chosen Emperor: it was fully conquered by the French, and never since dismembered from that Crown, for ought I can find. For though in the more active times of King Edward the third, some of the best Towns and pieces of it were possessed by the English: yet were they lost again soon after, according to the various successes and events of War.

12 LIMOSIN, 13 PERIGORT, 14 QUERCY.

These Provinces I have joyned together, because for the most part they have followed the same fortune; being sometimes French, and sometimes English, according to the successes of either Nation. 1 LIMOSIN, the largest of the three, hath on the East Bourbonnois; on the West Perigort; on the North, and North-west, Poitou, and Berry; on the South, Auvergne. It is divided into the Higher, properly called Limosin; and the lower, commonly called La Marche: both parts, but specially La Marche, which lyeth towards Auvergne, being mountainous and not very fruitful; but of a free and open Air: inhabited by a people of a more staid and sober nature, than the rest of the French; frugal in expence and moderate in diet; only for great devourers of bread, that they are grown into a By-word.

The chief Towns in La Marche, or the Lower Limosin, are 1 Tulle, seated in a rough and hilly Countrey, a Bishops See. 2 Mazarche, seated amongst the Mountains, on the River Vezere, a very fierce and violent current; with which for fortified on all sides, that it is thought be a very strong and secure dwelling. 3 Treignac. 4 Doussenc. 5 Belmont. 6 Meissac. 7 Brive le Gaillard, &c. In the Higher Limosin the chief Towns are, 1 Limoges a Bishops See, the principal of the Lemovices, from whom denominated; by Proton called Ratiastum. A neat, but no large City, rich, populous, and inhabited by a people of so great an industry, that they compell every one to work; and is therefore by the French called the Prison of Beggars; Seated on the Vienne. At the taking of it when revolted, Edward the Black Prince could by no means be allured to pity the distressed Citizens, till pursuing his enemies, he saw three French Gentlemen make head against his Army; the consideration of whose magnanimity drew him to pity, where before he avowed revenge. 2 Chalus, at the besieging of which, our Richard the first was slain by a shot from an Arbalist; the use of which Warlike engine, he first shewed to the French. Whereupon a French Poet made these Verses, in the person of Atropos;

Ut qui Francigenis Balista primitus usum
Tradidit, ipse sui reus primitus experiat:
Quamvis aliis docuit, in se vim sentiat artis.*

It is decreed thus must great Richard die,
As he that first did teach the French to dart
An Arbalist; 'tis just he first should trie
The strength, and taste the fruits of his own Art.

The man that shot him was called Bertram de Gurdon, who being brought before the King (for the King neglecting his wounds, never gave over the Assault till he gained the place) boldly justified his Action, as done in the service of his Countrey, and for revenge of the death of his Father and Brother, whom the King had caused to be slain. Which heard, the King not only caused him to be set at liberty, but gave him an hundred shilling sterling, in reward of his Gallantry. 3 Soubterrein, on the confines of Berry. 4 Confolant. 5 Dorat, on the River Vienne. 6 Boisson. 7 Birat, of which nothing memorable.

2 PERIGORT, hath on the East, Auvergne, and Quercy; on the West, Xaintoigne; on the North, Limosin; and on the South, some part of Gascogne. The Countrey and people are much of the same condition with that of Limosin, saving that Perigort is the more woody; and those woods plentifull of Chesnuts. The chief Towns of it are, 1 Perigoux, the principal City of the Petrocorii, by Proton called Vesenna, now a Bishops See; some footsteps of which name remain in a part of Perigoux; (for the Town it is divided into two parts) which to this day is called Vesune; in which standeth the Cathedral Church, and the Bishops Palace. The whole City seated in a very pleasant Valley, environed with Dunes, affording a most excellent Wine; and having in it as a mark of the Roman greatness, the ruins of a large and spacious Amphitheatre. 2 Bergerac, seated on the great River Dordonne. 3 Sarlat, a Bishops See. 4 Nontron, defended with a very strong Castle. 5 Airamont. 6 La Roche. 7 Marsac, where is a Well which ebbeth and floweth according to the pulse of the River of Bordeaux. And 8 Angouleme, in the North-west, towards Xaintoigne, the seat of the Engilismenses in the time of the Romans, now a Bishops See: seated upon the River of Charente, with which it is almost encompassed; the other side being defended by a steep and rocky Mountain. A Town of great importance, when possessed by the English, being one of their best out-works for defence of Bordeaux: one of the Gates hereof being to this day called Chande, seems to have been the work of Sir John Chandos Banneret, one of the first Founders of the most noble Order of the Garter, then Governour hereof for King Edward the third. Being recovered from the English by Charles the fifth, it was bestowed on John, the third Son of Lewis Duke of Orleans, Grand-father of King Francis the first, with the title of an Earldom only, An. 1468. Afterwards made a Dukedom in the person of the said King Francis, before his coming to the Crown. And for the greater honour of it, as much of the adjoining Countrey was layd unto it, as maketh up a Territory of about 24 French Leagues in length, and 15 in breadth: Within which circuit circuit are the Towns of Chastreauneuf, and Coignac, on the River of Charente. 3 Roche Foulcon, 4 Chahannes. 5 Merville. 6 Villebois, &c. Since that united to the Crown, it hath of late times given the title of Duke to Charles Earl of Auvergne, An. 1618. the Base son of Charles the ninth, consequently extracted from the house of Angouleme.

3 QUERCY, is encompassed about with Limosin, Perigort, Langnedoc, and Auvergne. A populous Countrey for the bigness (being one of the least in all France) and very fruitful withall, though somewhat mountainous. The principal places in it, 1 Cahors, the chief City of the Cadurci, in the times of the Romans; still a great, strong, and well-traded Town, and the See of a Bishop, who is also the Temporal Lord of it; seated upon the River Loch. From hence descended and took name the noble Family of Chaworth de Cadurcis in Latine: out of which by a Daughter of Patrick de Cadurcis, Lord of Ogmore and Kidwelly in the Marches of Wales, married to Henry the third Earl of Lancaster, come the Kings of England, and most of the Royall houses in Europe. 2 Montalban, a Bishops See also, built on the top of an high Mountain, and so well fortified by all advantages of Art, that it is thought to be the most defensible of any in France: of which it gave sufficient proof in that notable resistance which it made to King Lewis the thirteenth, in his Wars against those of the Religion, An. 1622. 3 Soulac, upon the River Dordonne. 4 Nigrepellisse, another of the Towns possessed by the Protestant party, reduced to the obedience of King Lewis the thirteenth, An. 1621. but in Novemb. following, they murdered the Kings Garrison, and the next year denied admission to the King. Taken at last, An. 1622. by the King in person; the punishment did exceed the crime. For the men were not only killed and hanged, as they had deserved; but many of the Women also: some of them having their secret parts rammed with Gun-powder, and so torn in pieces, by the unpattern'd barbarism of the merciless and revengefull Souldiers. 5 Chateau-Sarasin, a strong Town on the Garond. 6 Nazaret. 7 Burette, &c.

The ancient Inhabitants of these three Provinces, were the Lemovices, the Petrocorii, and the Cadurci, before mentioned: of which the Lemovices, and Cadurci, were cast into the Province of Aquitania Prima; the Petrocorii, and Engilismenses, into Aquitania Secunda. In the declining of that Empire, seized on by the Goths, but from them speedily extorted by the conquering French. Afterwards when King Henry the third of England released his right in the Provinces of Normandy, Poitou, Anjou, Touren, and Main; Lewis the ninth to whom this release was made, gave him in satisfaction of all former interests, 300000 l. of Anjouin money, the Dukedom of Guienne, the County of Xaintoigne, as far as to the River of Charent, with the Province of Limosin. And on the Capitulations made betwixt Edward the third of England, and John of France, then Prisoner to him; Perigort and Quercy (among other conditions) were assigned over to the English, discharged of all Refort and Homage to the Crown of France. After which times respectively they remained all three in the possession of the English, until their final expulsion by King Charles the 7th, never since that dismembered from the Crown of France.

15. AQUITAIN.

THE Dukedom of AQUITAIN, the greatest and goodlyest of all France, contained the Provinces of Xaintoigne, 2 Guienne, 3 Gascogne; with the Isles of Oleron and Reer, and other Islands in the Aquitainick or Western Ocean.

XAINTOIGNE is bounded on the East with Limosin, and Perigort; on the West, with the Aquitainick Ocean; on the North, with Poitou; and on the South, with Guienne: So called from Saintes, one of the principal Cities of it; as that from the Santonnes, a Nation here inhabiting in the time of the Romans, whose chief City it was. The River of Charente running through the middle, and so on the North border of it, emptieth it self into the Ocean, just opposite to the Isle of Oleron; having first taken in the Seugne, and the Boutonne, two lesser Rivers.

The chief Towns of it are, Saintes, by Proton called Mediolanum, by Antonine, Civitas Santonorum, seated upon the Charente, a Bishops See, and the Seneschalfe for the County. 2 S. John d'Angelle, situate on the Boutonne, a Town once impregnablely fortified; whereof it hath given sufficient testimony in the Civil Wars of France about Religion, until the Fatal time was come, in which the great power of that party was to be dissolved; at what time, (viz. An. 1621.) after a siege of forty dayes it was taken by King Lewis the 13th. the Fortifications demolished, the Town left open, and commanded from that time forwards to be called by the name of Lewis-Bourg. 3 Bourq sur la mer, upon the Dordonne, which for the wideness of it is here called a Sea. 4 Retraite, seated near the confluence of the two great Rivers, the Garond, and the Dordonne. 5 Blaye, the most Southern Town of all this Countrey, being seated on the very mouth of the River which goeth up to it. 6 Rochelle, Rupella in the present Latine, but anciently called Santonum Portus, as the chief Haven of the Santonnes, a well noted Port in the most Northern part of Xaintoigne; from whence the Countrey hereabouts is called ROCHELOIS. The Town seated in the inner part of a fair and capacious Bay, the entrance of which is well assured by two very strong Forts, betwixt which there is no more space, than for the passage of a good ship; every night closed up with a massive Chain: and the whole Town either environed with deep Marishes, or fortified with such Bulwarks, trenches, and other works of modern Fortification, that it was held to be, as indeed it was, the safest retreat for those of the Reformed Religion in the time of their troubles; as may be seen by the

the story of it, which in brief is thus. At the end of the second Civil Wars, Anno 1568. many Towns considering how ill the former Peace had been observed, refused to take in any of the Kings Garrisons; or permit any of the Papists to bear Arms amongst them; of which Rochel was one: which also, contrary to the Kings command, maintained a Navie for their safety by Sea, and continued their Fortifications for their defence by Land. So that hither the Queen of Navarre and her Son retired, as to a place of safety. Anno 1570, Rochel alone, of all the French Towns held good for the Protestants, and is by Monsieur Joinville on all sides blocked up: but the siege soon raised, and Rochel, Montalban, Sancerre, with others, made cautionary for the peace ensuing. Anno 1575, besieged by Biron the elder, with an Army of 50000 men, and 60 pieces of Artillery; Charles the ninth, Henry Duke of Anjou, the Duke of Anjou, &c. being also present at the service: it held out from the beginning of March, till the seventh of June, and was then freed; the City having in one month endured 13000 shot, and the King lost 20000 men, amongst them the Duke of Anjou for one. Anno 75, & 78, it was attempted by Landerneau, the Isle of Ree taken, but soon recovered: the King of Navarre, and Prince of Conde, after that defeat, being received in, in triumph. Anno 1577, besieged to Sea-ward by Lansac; who being also beaten back, a peace was made, and eight cautionary Towns more added to their former strength. In the troubles of 85, and 88. the Princes above named made it their Retreat; and from thence issued to divert the purposes of the Duke of Mayenne. The next year, Henry the third being slain, and the King of Navarre seated in the Throne, the Protestant party increased exceedingly in power and number; and taking advantage of the minority of Lewis the thirteenth, governed themselves apart as a Free Estate, Rochel being made the head of their Common-wealth; fortified to that end with 12 Royal Bastions of Free Stone, with double ditches, deep and broad in the bottom, abundantly furnished with Powder and Ammunition, 150 pieces of Cannon, besides Culverins and smaller pieces, with victuals, and all other necessities to endure a siege; and grown unto so great wealth, that there were thought to be an hundred or sixscore Merchants, worth 100000 Crowns a piece. This drew upon them the great Wars, in the years 1621, and 1622. Which ended in the loss of all their Garrisons, except Rochel, and Montalban: those to remain in pledge with the Protestant party, but for three years only. Which time expired, the Rochellers were again besieged both by Sea and Land, the Isle of Ree took from them, their Fleet broke at Sea, and the mouth of their Haven so barred up with Ships chained together, and sunk into it, and other works of stupendous greatness, in the very Ocean, that no foreign succours out of England, (howsoever really intended, and bravely followed) had been able to come to their relief. In the end having endured all the extremities of a tedious siege, they yielded themselves to the Kings mercy, Anno 1628. Montalban, Nismes, and other places newly fortified, submitted at the same time also. 7 Marans, a great Town, and of great importance, seated by the Ocean Sea in a low fen-tiny place, as it were in a Peninsula, and so encompassed on every side with marshy watry grounds, that there is no access to the town thereof, but by very few, and those narrow passages. 8 Chastillon; and 9 Saulzay, places of good strength also, but of greater note; the first, for giving surname to a noble Family, out of which issued formerly the Earls of Blois, and of late times Gaspard de Coligny and Monsieur D'Andalos his Brother, much mentioned in the wars of France about Religion; the later giving the title of a Duke to a younger son of the House of Roban, as great a stickler in that cause, as those Brethren were.

II. GUIENNE, the second Province of the Dukedom of Aquitain, is bounded on the North with Xaintoigne, from which parted by the River of Dordonne; on the South, with Gascoigne; on the East, with Perigord; and on the West, with the Aquitainick Ocean, from the Pyrenean hills to the River of Bordeaux. The reason of the name I could never learn. Some think it a corruption of the old name, Aquitain; but not very probably. The Countrey generally plentiful of Corn and Wine; the one being vented into Spain, and the other into England. The people, as those of Xaintoigne also, tall of stature, of able bodies, haters of servitude and baseness, and well practised in armes: which qualities of the minde, and constitution of body, (being therein so different from the rest of France) it is possible enough, they might have from the English; who for 300 years were possessed of the Countrey, and have left many tracks of their language in it.

The principal Rivers of this Province are, the Garond, and the Dordonne, meeting together at Retraite, a Town of Xaintoigne; and thence in one Channel falling into the Ocean: the Countrey betwixt these two Rivers being called Le Pais entre les deux mers, or, The Countrey betwixt the two Seas; the Rivers hereabouts resembling a small Sea in wideness. Of lesser note are, 1 Jearn, 2 Baize, 3 Lot, and 4 Liste, falling into the Garond, in their several places.

Chief Towns whereof are, 1 Bordeaux, seated on the South bank of the Garond, not far from the Sea, amongst the marshes. The chief City of the Bituriges, who possessed this tract; and for distinctions sake, were called Bituriges Ubisci, those of Bourges being called Bituriges Cubi. It was after called Burdigala, and Civitas Burdegalenisium; the Metropolis at that time, of Aquitania secundata; consequently an Archbishops See, as it still continueth. A fair, rich, and populous City, beautified with many good buildings, an University founded here by K. Lewis the 11th, and a large Cathedral: It was made Parliamentary for Aquitain, and the parts adjoining, by K. Charles the 7th. Anno 1453, not long after the expulsion of the English thence; and is one of the most noted Empories in all the Kingdom, frequented very much by the Dutch, and English for Gascoigne wines; over which last the French are so jealous, that they permit them not to come up the River, till they have unladen all their Ordnance at the Port of Blaye. The Countrey hereabouts is, from this Town, called Bourdellois. 2 Fronsac, lying in the Countrey betwixt the two Seas (as they call it,) which gives the title of a Duke to the noble Family of the the Earls of S. Paul, now Dukes of Fronsac; and to the Countrey round about, the name of Fronsada. 3 Libourn, at the confluence of the two great Rivers, opposite to Retraite in Xaintoigne. 4 Soulas at the influx of the Garond, in the Peninsula, or demy-Island: called the Countrey of Medoc. 5 Baïonne a Sea Town, and Episcopal See, fronting on the coast of Spain. 6 S. John de Luz, at the foot of the Pyrenean Mountains, all about which, the people speak the Basquish, or old Gascoigne language, being the same with that of Biscay. 7 D'Acqs, an Episcopal See, by Pytolomy called Aque Augusta, (Civitas Aquensium, by Antoninus) from whence this part of Gaul had the name of Aquitain. These three last being all of them Frontier Towns, are strongly fortified. 8 Bazas, (called Cossum by Pytolomy) the chief City of the Vasates, whom Antoninus placeth in this tract; now a Bishops See, situate on the borders of Gascoigne, in the Countrey from hence called Bazadas. Towns of less note, 1 Espareze, 2 S. Basil, 3 Reule, 4 Chaussean-Moron, 5 Monsegur, 6 Saintterre, &c. Here is also in this Province the Countrey of Buche, lying along the Sea-coast from Baïonne to Medoc, barren, poor, and wretched Countrey, the worst piece of France; only remarkable for the Lords or owners of it, formerly of the house of Foix: of which the most remarkable were Gaston de Foix, for his many signal services against the French, created Earl of Kendall, and Knight of the Garter, by the said King Henry; but better known in English stories by the name of Capitain, or Capdaun de Buche, the Lords hereof having no higher title than that of Captain.

III. GASCOIGNE, the third and largest part of the Dukedom of Aquitain, hath on the East Languedoc, from which parted by the River Garond; on the West, the Pyrenean Mountains, which divide it from Spain; on the North, Perigord, Quercy, and some part of Guienne; and on the South, a main tract of the Pyrenees, running on to Languedoc. The Countrey generally fruitful, but of Wines especially; brought hence to Bordeaux as the staple for that commodity, and thence transported into England in great abundance.

The ancient inhabitants hereof were the Auscii, Lactoraces, Convenares, Conserani, &c. making up a great part of the Province of Novempopulonia: united in this name of Gascoigne on the conquest of it by the Vascones, a Spanish Nation, who fell in here, during the reign of Dagobert the 1st King of the French. And though subdued by Clovis the second, son of Dagobert, yet they left their name unto the Countrey divided afterwards according to the chief Seigneuries and Estates thereof, into 1 the Principality of Bearn, 2 the Earldoms of Foix, 3 Comminges, 4 Begorre, 5 Armignac, 6 Albret, and 7 the Countrey of Agenois.

1 The Principality of BEARN, is situate at the Foot of the Pyrenees, where they joyn to Languedoc; so called from Bearnium, a principal City of this tract, mentioned by Antoninus, and others of the ancient Writers. The Countrey of good pasture, though amongst the mountains, affording plenty of Cartel, butter and cheese, and in some places wines also, little inferior in taste and colour to the best of France; and many medicinal Springs issuing from the hills adjoining.

The Religion here, as generally in all Gascoigne, is that of the Reformed Churches, introduced about the year 1560; or rather then confirmed by public authority of the King and Queen of Navarre: at what time the Mas, Tithes, Church-lands, and the Prelates Votes in Parliament (according to the Genevian way of Reformation) were condemned together. And so it stood till the year 1620, when by the power and authority of Lewis the 13th, King of France and Navarre, the Prelates were restored to their Votes and Lands, the Clergy to their Tithes, and Mas caused also to be paid in some of their Churches: yet so, that those of the Reformed were left unto the free exercise of their own Religion; as in former times.

The principal Towns hereof are, 1 Orthes, the same which antiently was called Bearnium. 2 Lescar, a Bishops See, the ancient seat and habitation of the Princes of Bearn. 3 Oleron, a Bishops See also, mounted upon a high hill, in the more mountainous parts of the Countrey. 4 Saintterre, well garrisoned since the reduction of this Countrey to the Kings obedience. 5 Pau, the principal of all the Province, honoured with a Parliament or Court of Judicature for all the Countrey; and a fair Palace of the Prince, built by Henry of Albret, King of Navarre, and Lord of Bearn; the Seat of him and his Successors, till the coming of King Henry the fourth to the Crown of France. 6 Grenade, upon the Frontier towards Begorre.

This Countrey for a long time followed the fortune of Aquitain; and in the general dismembring of the French Empire, had its own Proprietaries, who were the absolute Lords of it, acknowledging no Superior for ought I can finde. The principal of which was that Gaston (a name very frequent in this Family) who in the year 1118 accompanied with many noble persons of France, assisted Alphonso King of Navarre and Aragon at the siege of Sarragissa; in the course of which action he did so good service, that he was not only much honoured, but liberally rewarded for it; both he and his posterity enjoying many privileges in the conquered City. By the Heir general of this Gaston, married to William de Moncada Seneschall of Catalogne, and of great possessions in that Countrey, the Lordship and Sovereignty of Bearn fell unto that Family about the year 1220. but long it did not tarry in it. For William being slain in the conquest of the Isle of Majorca, Anno 1228. left his Estates to Gaston de Moncada his eldest son: who much increased them by the addition of the Earldom of Begorre, and many other goodly pieces, accreting to him in the right of his Wife Murtha; heir thereof; whereof more anon. Grown by this means to such authority and esteem in the Court of Aragon, that (being without issue male) Constance his eldest daughter was thought a match of great advantage to Alphonso eldest son of King James the first. But dying without issue by her, Anno 1260. the Sovereignty of Bearn with all the Appendices thereof both in France and Spain, became united to the Earldom of Gascogne. Foix (an Estate equal to it both in power and patrimony) by the marriage of Roger Bernard the ninth Earl of Foix, who succeeded in that Earldom, Anno 1262. with Margaret de Moncada another daughter of this Gaston, and Heir of Bearn. Afterwards being much increased both in power and honour (by the addition of the Earldom of Comminges, the Viscounty of Narbonne, and the signeurie of Buche in Guyenne, to this house of Foix) it was added to the Crown of Navarre, by the marriage of Gaston Earl of Foix, and Sovereign of Bearn, with Eleanor the Heir of that Kingdom, Anno 1481: descending with that Crown upon Henry of Bourbon, King of Navarre, and afterwards of France, by the name of Henry the fourth; but governed by him always as a State distinct, without relation or resort to the Crown of France. But Lewis the thirteenth his son, finding some inconvenience in that distinction, incorporated it for ever to the rest of his Dominions, Anno 1620, though not without some opposition from the subjects of Bearn: which he was fain to over-bear by his personal presence, and the advantage of such Forces as he carried with him. Since reckoned as a part of that Kingdom, owed, as the rest of France, by Forts and Garrisons, and governed in Civil matters by the Parliament established at Pau; the Judges and Councillors thereof at the Kings appointing.

2 The Earldom of FOIX, is situate on the West of Languedoc; Comminges interposing betwixt it and Bearn. Chief Towns hereof are, 1. Mazeros, on the Garond, a Bishops See. 2. Parnieres, a Bishops See also, seated on the River Lagiere. 3. Foix, on the same River, called in Latin, Fuxium, and the Earls hereof Comites Fuxienses; the chief seat of the Flussates in the times of the Romans, now giving name to all the Countrey. 4. Mirande, in the County of Esterac, and the chief thereof; but otherwise of no great account. 5. Savardun, and 6. Monthault, two strong pieces. 7. Mirepoix (oppidum Miropense) a Bishops See also, but of no note otherwise. The old Inhabitants of this tract, besides the Flussates above mentioned, were called Vaccet, perhaps of the abundance of Kine bread in the pastures hereof: upon which ground, the Earls of Foix have for their Armes, 3 Cows passant Gules; horned and hooved Azure, in a Field Or.

The first of these Earls was Bernard of Carcaffone, advanced to this honour by Raimond Earl of Tholouse, who had then the sovereignty hereof, Anno 1062. The Patrimony hereof much increased by marriage, (no one Family more) many fair lands in the Marishes of Province being added to it by Estmienne, wife of Roger the second; not a few Signeuries in Catalonia, by Cecile daughter of Earl Raimond, wife of Roger the third; the Earldom of Castelbon, by Brunice wife of Roger-Bernard the first; the Earldom of Comminges by Eleanor the wife of Gaston the second. Besides all which, in or about the year 1262, Roger Bernard, the ninth Earl, united Bearn to his Estate, as before is said; whose Grand-child Isabel (the male issue failing) conveyed the whole Estate to Archembald, Lord or Captain of Buche, in the Province of Guienne. Gaston, the Nephew of this Archembald by his eldest son John, was for his many good services to Charles the seventh, made a Peer of France: and did not only purchase the Viscounty of Narbon, from the Lords whereof he was descended by Maignard, wife of Roger-Bernard the second; but by his marriage with Eleanor or Beauna Daughter and Heir of John King of Navarre, united that Kingdom to his house, though he enjoyed it not in his own person. By means of which Alliances, and other improvements of Estate, his Family grew to so great power and reputation, that there were four Queens at one time descended from it: viz. Katharine Queen of Navarre, German Queen of Aragon, Anne Queen of France, and Anne Queen of Hungary and Bohemia. Before which time (I mean the Addition of Navarre to their other Estates) the Earls of Foix were in so high esteem in the Court of France, that in all publick Ceremonies they took place of the Earls of Vendosme, though extracted from the Royal blood, and lived in a condition equal to most Kings in Christendom. In which regard, as also that the later Kings of Navarre and present Kings of France, are descended of them, it will not be amiss to subjoin here the Catalogue of designed successor to John King of Aragon, whose eldest Daughter he had married, but dispossessed thereof by the Duke of Monlanc.

1399 14 Archembald Captain of Buche, and Isabel Sister and Heir of Matthew, Earls of Foix.

1413 15 John Son of Archembald, a great Enemy to the English in behalf of Charles the seventh of France: his younger Brother Gaston, as great a friend unto the English, succeeding in the estate of Buche. From Peter the second Son of this John, descended Odet de Foix, Lord of Lautrech, so renowned in the wars of Italy.

1436 16 Gaston IV. Son of John a principal Agent in the Conquest of Guienne from the English; by his marriage with Eleanor Daughter and Heir of John King of Navarre, advanced his house unto that Kingdom: Grandfather by John Vic. of Narbonne his second Son to Gaston de Foix Duke of Nemours, slain at the taking of Ravenna, Anno 1512.

1472 17 Francis Phœbus Nephew of Gaston the fourth, and of Eleanor of Navarre by their Son Gaston Prince of Viane, succeeded his said Grandfather in the Earldom of Foix, and his Grandmother in the Realm of Navarre about 7 years after.

1483 18 Katherine the Sister and Heir of Francis, by her marriage with John Earl of Albert, added that Earldom also to the house of Foix.

1517 19 Henry of Albert Son of John and Katherine, King of Navarre, Sovereign of Bearn and Earl of Foix, by his marriage with the Lady Margaret, Sister to King Francis the first, added the greatest part of the lands of Armagnac unto his Estate.

1556 20 Antoine of Bourbon Duke of Vendosme, and Joan his Wife, Daughter and Heir of Henry of Albert, Kings of Navarre, Sovereigns of Bearn, and Earls of Foix.

1572 21 Henry II. Son of Joan and Antony, King of Navarre, Sovereign Lord of Bearn, and Earl of Foix; on the murder of Henry the third of France, succeeded also in that Kingdom by the name of Henry the fourth, Anno 1589, the Father of Lewis the thirteenth, and Grandfather of King Lewis the fourteenth, now reigning, Anno 1648. And so having brought the Earls of Foix to the Crown of France, it is time to leave them. The Arms of these great Earls we have seen before.

3 The Earldom of BEGORRE is situate North of Bearn, at the foot of the Pyrenean mountains: so called from the Begronnes, the old inhabitants hereof in the time of Cæsar. Scattered in which, and the adjoining Principality of Bearn, live a leprous and infectious people, of noysome breaths, deformed bodies, and ghastly villages: in which regard, not suffered to have any commerce with other people, nor to inherit any Lands; but only to apply themselves to drudgery, and the basest of mechanic trades. From their great mishapen heads called Capets or Gabets.

Chief Towns hereof are, 1. Fuigueres, famous for medicinal Bathes. 2. Loude, of which nothing memorable. 3. Tarbe, (by Antoine called Turfaubica) seated upon the River Adour, honoured with a strong Castle, an Episcopal See, and the Seneschallie for all the Countrey of Begorre. Which Countrey having for long time its own Proprietary Earls, under the Sovereignty and Homage of the Crown of Navarre, from the Kings whereof they were extracted, or those Kings from them; was at the last, by the marriage of Petronilla, Daughter and Heir of Esquibat the last Earl, to Bafon Vicount of Mur, San and Gabadan, added to that house. Whose Daughter Matthee, marrying to Gaston Prince of Bearn, increased that Principality with those goodly pieces of Mur, San, Gabadan and Begorre; all brought unto the house of Foix, by Margaret, Daughter of this Gaston, married to Roger Bernard, as before is said.

The Armes hereof were Azure, a Cross Argent; By Inigo Arista the son of Simon, Earl of this Countrey, called to the Crown of Navarre, made the Armes of that Kingdom; whereas before that time, the Armes thereof had been Argent, on a Tree Vert, a Cross in chief, Gules. Which Armes are said to be took by Garcia Ximenes the first King of Navarre, from such a sign appearing to him in the Skie; before his first battel with the Moors.

4 The Earldom of COMMINGES lyeth betwixt Bearn and Foix, running betwixt both as far Northward, as to border Eastward on Begorre. Divided into the Higher, and more mountainous part; situate at the foot of the Pyrenes; and the Lower, which hath somewhat more of the valley in it. The old Inhabitants of both, the Convenes, and Conserani. The principal places at present in the Lower Comminges are, 1. Lombers, a Bishops See, but of late erection, 2. Morces, upon the River Garonne. 3. Sama-than. 4. Liesse en Dordon. And in the Higher, there is 1. Conserans; once the chief Town of the Conserani; now a Bishops See, situate at the foot of the Pyrenean hills. 2. S. Bernard; of old called Civitas Convenarum, a Bishops See also, and the chief City of this Earldom. 3. S. Beat, 4. S. Begon, 5. Monregean, of Mons Regius, 6. Silliers, &c.

Of the estate of this Earldom I have little to say, but that it was united to the house of Foix, by the marriage of Eleanor, the Daughter of an Earl hereof, to Gaston the second of that name, and the eleventh Earl of this House. Given afterwards notwithstanding to a Spaniard called Rodrigo de Villandrada, by Charles the seventh. But in the end restored again to the house of Foix, by the prowess and great services of Gaston the fourth, who caused his uncle Matthew, the youngest son of Archembald, and Isabel Earls of Foix, to be settled in it, according to the will and purpose of his Father Archembald, who had given it to him. But falling to the Crown again, it was conferred on John of Lescon, a Battard of the Earl of Armagnac, who was Earl of Comminges, and one of the Marfals of France in the time of King Lewis the eleventh. The Armes of these Earls were Gules, four Orelles in Saltire, Argent.

5 The Earldom of ARMAGNAC, the greatest of all these Estates considered severally and apart, lieth on the North of Comminges, and so extendeth it self to the banks of the River Garond. Principal Towns are, 1 Aux, upon the River Gez, antiently called Augusta Auscorum; the Metropolis or head City of the Province of Novempopulonia; by consequence an Archbishop's See: The Revenues whereof are said to be the greatest of any Prelates in France, computed at no less than 40000 l. per annum. 2 Lezouze, a Bishops See, called of old Lezocarium, in our modern Latine Lezodurum. A Town so well fortified, when in the power of the Earls of Armagnac, that it held out a siege of three months against the forces of France: but since it came into the hands of the French Kings, so strengthened and embattelled according to the modern Art of Fortifications, that it is held the strongest Bulwark of the Kingdom on this side, and their surest Fortrefs against Spain. 3 Liste de Jourdain, which hath the title of an Earldom, bought at the price of 38000 Crowns, of John Duke of Bourbon, by John the fourth Earl of Armagnac, Anno 1421. 4 Arvillar. 5 Anzan. 6 Chastel-neau. 7 Malbouquer, 8 Nestes, of which little memorable.

The Earls of Armagnac fetch their Original from the Kings of Navarre: Sincho the great, having subdued some Lands in Gascogne, which he conferred on Garsias a younger son of his, with the title of Earl of Armagnac, Anno 1014. On which foundation it increased so fast, both in power and honour, that Bernard the fourth Earl hereof, came to be Constable of France. And so did John the fourth of that name, by the favour of King Charles the seventh: who also writ himself, by the grace of God Earl of Armagnac; according to the title of Sovereign Princes. A man of so considerable power in these parts of France; that the marriage of a Daughter of his to our Henry the sixth, was thought the best means for establishing his Estate in Guienne. And I remember it was charged on the Duke of Suffolk, that by breaking off this alliance for that of Anjou, he had been the cause of the loss of the Kings pieces in France. This greatness made him subject to the jealousy of King Lewis the eleventh, who worried him out of his Estate and his life together. Charles, Brother of this John, succeeded by the favour of King Charles the 8th. After whose death this fair Estate was seized on to the use of the Crown; till given again by Francis the first to Charles Duke of Alanson, (whose Grand-Father had married with a Sister of the said Earl John) and to the Lady Margaret his Wife, the said Kings Sister: who, after the decease of the Duke of Alanson, brought it to Henry of Albert, and King of Navarre, her second Husband; returning so to the Original from whence first it came.

The Armes of these great Princes, were quarterly 1 Argent, a Lyon Azure; 2 Gules, a Leopard-Lyon Or, the 3, &c.

6 The Earldom of ALBRET is situate on the North-west of Armagnac, bordering upon Guienne. The chief Town whereof is 1 Nérac, seated on the River of Baize; the only place of strength and moment in all this estate. 2 Chastell-Jalone, well seated to disturb the Trade betwixt Bordeaux and Gascogne, but not able to endure a siege. 3 Mont de Marsan, and 4 Tertas, both seated on the River Ladour: and all four formerly Towns of Caution for those of the Reformed Religion; of which this Country is so full, that the Popish Religion had hardly any footing in all this Territory. Which, though the smallest of the six, and of least Antiquity, had yet the fortune to incorporate all the rest into it. For John, the son of Alan Earl of Albert, by his marriage with Katharine, Daughter and sole Heir of Gaston, son of Gaston of Foix, and of Leonora Princes of Navarre, added to his estate the Sieureries of Beaun, Foix, and Begorre. And Henry of Albert his son, by marrying the Lady Margaret, Sister of King Francis the first, united to it those of Armagnac, and Comminges. By Jean the Daughter of this Henry, the whole Estate was brought to Antony of Burton, Duke of Vendosme, and Father to King Henry the fourth, becoming so united to the Crown of France, from which it was at first dismembered.

The Armes of these Earls, were Quarterly 1 France; 2 Gules, a Border ingrailed Arg. The third, &c.

7 As for the Countrey of AGENOIS, the last part of Gascogne, it never had other hearts (after it left off to be French) than the Dukes of Aquitaine. The principal Cities of it, 1 Agen, a rich, populous, and well-traded Town, seated on the Garonne, in a fruitful Countrey: A Bishops See, a Seneschallie, and held to be the fairest in Gascogne. 2 Condon, a Bishops See also, from which the parts adjoining are called Condopnois. 3 Villeneuve, 4 Clavac, 5 Marmand, 6 Foy, &c.

Thus having took a brief view of those several members which made up the great body of the Dukedom of Aquitaine; let us next look on the estate of the whole thus brought together: which in the declination of the Roman Empire, was given unto the Goths, before possessed of all Gallia Narbonensis, by Valentinian the third, as a reward for their service in driving the Alani out of Spain. Long the Goths had not held it, when they were outed of it by Clovis, the fifth King of the French, continuing under his Successors, till Ludovicus Pius made it a Kingdom, and gave it unto Pepin his youngest son. But Charles and Pepin, the sons of this Pepin, being dispossessed by Charles the Bald; it was by him conferred on Ranulph, of the house of Burgundy, for his many good services against the Normans, Ann 844. Whose Successors take here in this order following.

Languedock.

The Dukes of Aquitaine.

844	1	Ranulph of Burgundy , first Duke of Aquitaine .	1156	10	Lewis the seventh of France, in right of Eleanor his Wife, sole Heir of William the fifth.
875	2	William , Earl of Auvergne , Nephew of Ranulph .	1152	11	Henry , Duke of Normandy , and Earl of Anjou , &c. in right of Eleanor his Wife, divorced from Lewis on pretence of some consanguinity; after King of England.
902	3	Ebles , Earl of Poitou , succeeded in Aquitaine and Auvergne , by the Will and Testament of Duke William .
911	4	Ebles II. Son of Ebles the first.
935	5	William II. the son of Ebles the second.	1169	12	Richard , King of England, the son of Henry .
970	6	William III. son of William the second.
1019	7	Guy , the son of William the third.	1199	13	John King of England, the Brother of Richard ; who forfeiting his Estates in France, on a judicial sentence pronounced against him for the (supposed) murder of his Nephew Arthur Duke of Bretagne ; Aquitaine and the rest of the English Provinces were seized on by the French, Anno 1202. But not withstanding this Arrest , the English still continued their pretensions to it, till at the last it was agreed betwixt King Lewis the ninth of France, and Henry the third of England, Anno 1259. That the English should rest satisfied with Guienne , the bounds whereof were to be the Pyrenees on the South, and the River of Charente on the North, comprehending therein also the Countrey of Limousin ; and that on his investiture into this Estate, he should relinquish all his rights in Normandy , Anjou , Touren , Main , &c. In consideration whereof, he should have 150000 Crowns in ready money. On this accord the Kings of England became Homagers to the Crown of France, which sometimes they omitted, sometimes did it by Proxy, but never in person, till Philip de Valois required it of Edward the third: and because such duties are not often personally done by Sovereign Princes, Du Serres shall describe the formality of it. The place designed for this exploit was the Church of Amiens , to which Edward came (saith he) with "such a Train, as was intended rather to the honour of himself than the French King. Royally attired "he was, with a long Robe of crimson Velvet, powdered with Leopards of Gold; his Crown upon his "head, his Sword by his side, and golden spurs upon his heels. Philip , attended by the chief Officers of "the Realm, sat upon his Throne, apparelled in a long robe of purple Velvet, powdered with Florets de "Lycies of Gold; his Crown upon his head, and the Scepter in his hand. Vicount Melun , the great "Chamberlain of France, commanded Edward to take off his Crown, sword, and spurs, and to kneel "down: which he did accordingly. Then taking both his hands, and joining them together, he said "unto him; You become a Liege-man to the King my Master, who is here present, as Duke of Guienne, and "Peer of France, and promise to be faithful and loyal to him; say yea : and Edward said yea, and arose. But the Historian notes withal, that Philip paid dearly for this Pageant: the young King never forgetting the indignity which was put upon him, till he had made France a field of blood. And here it is to be observed, that though the Kings of England by this new investiture, were entituled Dukes of Guienne only, yet they had all the power and privileges of Dukes of Aquitaine ; excepting the homage of the great Lords and Earls of Gascogne , which formerly belonged unto them. Inasmuch as Richard the second, though Duke of Guienne only in style and title, invited his Uncle John of Gannet in that brave estate, under the style and title of Duke of Aquitaine ; summoned to Parliament by that name by the said King Richard . From this Accord betwixt the Kings, the English had possession of the Dukedom of Guienne , according to the order of their Successions, from the fortieth of King Henry the third, Anno 1259, to the twenty ninth of King Henry the sixth, Anno 1452 (the intercalation of John of Gannet excepted only:) when outed of all their old rights in France, rather by the good fortune, than by the valour of Charles the seventh; the English then divided in domestick Factions, and not at leisure to look after the affairs of France. Nor do I finde, that Guienne being thus recovered, was ever dismembered from that Crown, but when King Lewis the eleventh assigned it over to his Brother the Duke of Berry , to take him off from joining with the Dukes of Bretagne and Burgundy in a new confederacy; who held it but two years, and died the last Duke of Guienne , Anno 1472.

The Armes of this Dukedom were Gules, a Leopard or Lyon Or; which joyned to the two Lyons of Normandie, make the Armes of England.

LANGUEDOC is bounded with the Pyrenean hills, the Land of Roussillon, and the Mediterranean; on the South; on the North, with Forrest, Quercy, and Auvergne; on the East, with Provence and Dauphine; on the West, with Gascogne. Whereas the other Frenchmen in an affirmation say Ouy, these of this Countrey say Oc; and therefore Ortelius conjectures it was called Languedoc. But others think that it took denomination from the Goths, who reigning long in this Countrey, left behind them a smack of their Language; and therefore it was called Languegotia, and now Euphonia gratia, termed Languedotia, or Languedoc, that is to say, the Countrey which retaineth the Gothic Language. In reference to one or both of which Etymologies this Province is by Paulus Aemilius promiscuously called Gothicana.

Languedoc

cana and Ostitana; and in relation to the rest, the people hereof in one of Calvins Epistles, are given unto us by the name of Populus Lingua Ostitana.

The Countrey on those parts which lie next to Auvergne, is like the higher parts thereof, mountainous and not very fruitful; in all the rest, as rich and pleasant as the best Provinces in France; and having the advantages of Olives, Raisins, Figs, Oranges, and other fruits not ordinary but here, and in the neighbouring Provinces; In that participating the commodities both of France and Spain. The people have somewhat in them of the ancient Goths, and draw nearer to the temper of the Spaniards, than any other of the French; as being accounted very devout, great vaunters of themselves, affecting bravery above their condition and estates; not caring how they pinch it on the working daies, or at home in private, so they may flout it in the street, and be fine on holy-daies; The humour also of the Women, and in them more pardonable.

Principal Rivers of this Province, are 1 Aurance, 2 Lieran, and 3 Orbe, emptying themselves into the Rhone; and Alby which disburdeneth it self into the Ocean. Chief Towns hereof are, 1 Nismes (in Latin Lemanus) anciently a Colony of the Romans, now a Bishops See; where there remain some marks of the Roman greatness, especially the ruins of a spacious Palace built by the Emperor Adrian. 2 Mont-pelier (in Latine Mons Pessulanus) situate on a high Mountain, as the name imports, some twelve miles distant from the Sea; is a University for the study of Physick, and for that very happily seated, the Countrey round about affording great variety of medicinal herbs. An Earldom of it self in the former times, conveyed by Mary Daughter of William the last Lord hereof, to King Peter of Aragon her husband; next, made a member of the Kingdom of Majorca, and finally by James, the last King of Majorca, sold to King Philip of Valois. Of late one of the strongest holds which those of the Reformed Religion had in this Countrey; and memorable for the notable resistance which it made against the whole forces of Lewis the 13th in the last Civil Wars about Religion. 3 Albth, and 4 Carcaissonne, both Bishops Sees, both seated on the River Aude; the people of both speaking a corrupt French, with an intermixture of some Spanish. Which intermixture of Spanish with that broken French they either have originally from the Goths of Spain, of whose Kingdom this was once a part: or from their long subjection to the Earls of Barcelone, to whom they were conveyed, with other fair estates in this part of France, by the marriage of Raymond Borenger the seventh Earl thereof, with Almodia the Daughter of some of the great Lords who then ruled in Languedoc, about the year 1040. And to these Towns, as also unto those of Nismes and Alby, the Earls of Barcelone, and the Kings of Aragon (in their right) did pretend a Sovereignty (though they had lost the possession of them) as those of France did to the Earldom of Barcelone: till mutual releases made on both sides of each others claims, by James the first of Aragon, and the King St. Lewis, Anno 1260, or thereabouts. 5 Alby, commodiously seated on the River so called, the Civitas Albigensis of Antoninus, the chief of this part of Languedoc, called from hence La Paix Albigensis; remarkable in Church-history for the great opposites to the corruptions and errors of the Church of Rome, called the Albigenses. 6 Beziers, upon the River Orbe, the Betura of Ptolomy, and Civitas Beterrima of Antoninus; a Roman Colony of old, now a Bishops See. 7 Agde, called Agatha by ancient writers, remarkable for a Council held there in the year 450, and for a well-frequented Port, at the mouth of the River Eghand. 8 Narbon, seated on the mouth of the River Aude, the Seat of the Phoenices, and the first Roman Colony (next after Carthage) out of Italy. In Italy it self (to observe so much by the way) were no less than 150 Colonies; 57 in Africk, 29 in Spain, 26 in France, in England 4 only, in Syria 20, and in other Countreys some, but very few in respect of the largeness of the Territories. These Colonies were instituted partly to repress Rebellions in the Conquered Countreys; partly to resist a foreign enemy, partly to reward the ancient Soldiers, partly to relieve the poorer sort, and partly to purge and empty the City of the superfluity and redundancy of her people. Now if the question be asked, whether a Colony or a Fortress be more behoovefull, I answer with Boterus in his Raggio de Stato, that a Fortress is more fit for suddain use, and a Colony for continuance: the former are quickly erected, and perhaps as soon lost; the other require some time of settling, and are after of a good sufficiency to defend themselves. As we see in our times, the Spanish Colonies of Centa and Tanger in Africk; and our own of Calais, which was the last Town we lost on the firm land. This Narbon was in the infancy of the Roman Empire, the most populous and greatest Town of all France: inasmuch, as from it all this part of France was called Gallia Narbonensis. A Province, of which Pliny delivered us this censure: Narbonensis Gallia agrorum cultum, morum virorumque dignatione, opum amplitudine, nulli provinciarum posponenda; triviterque Italia potius quam provincia; that is to say, that for fruitfulness of the soil, and the civility of the people, it was inferior to no province in the Roman Empire. But to return unto the Town, being antiently the Metropolis of this Province, it had withall the honour of being an Archbishops See, which it still continueth: well fortified at the present as a Town of war, fronting Catalonia and the land of Roussillon. 9 La Py, the See of a Bishop, who in Latin is called Podiensis; the chief of that part of Languedoc, which is named Pelay, the ancient seat of the Vellani. 10 Viviers, on the River Rhone, (by Pliny named Alba Helviorum) from whence the Countrey adjoining hath the name of Vivarets. 11 Rhodes, or Rutena, the principal City of the Ruteni, now a Bishops See; from whence the Countrey round about hath the name of Rouvergn; though some account this Rouvergn, a distinct Province, and no part of Languedoc. 12 Tholouse, seated on the Garonne, anciently the principal City of the Tectosages, and the Tolosates, placed by old Writers in this tract; now the chief of Languedoc, and one of the greatest in all France. The seat of an Archbishop, and a University: so antient, that some report it to be built when Deborah judged Israel. Here was a Parliamentary Court erected, for the administration of Justice in these parts, 1302. As for the Story of Tholouse, it was observed, that certain Soldiers having stole sacrilegiously some some Gold out of the Temples of Tholouse, (when it was sackt by Cepio a Roman Consul) came all to miserable and unfortunate ends: hence grew that Adage, Aurum habet Tholosumum, applied to unhappy men.

But that which deserves most note in the History of it, are the large and spacious fields about it, called by the Writers of these times by the name of Campi Catalaunici; extending in length 100, in breadth 70 French Leagues. In which fields, An. 435. was fought that terrible Battle between Attila King of the Hunnes, and Etius the Roman Lieutenant in France; Etius was strengthened by the Goths, Frankes, Burgundians, and Germans. Attila's Army consisted of Hunnes, Eruli, Scythes, Sarmatians, Suavians, to the number of 500000, of which 180000 that day lost their lives: Attila himself being driven to that desperate plunge, that making a Funeral pile of Horse Saddles, he would have burned himself. But his Enemies weary of well-doing, or Etius politically fearing, that if Attila were quite destroyed, the Goths, Frankes, and others of the Barbarians then confederate with him, would become too insolent; gave him leave to retire home through Italy: which he harried with Fire and Sword, murdering the People, and ruining the Towns, so that he was then, and long after, called Flagellum Dei. Etius, notwithstanding this good service, was by Valentinian the Emperor of the West, rewarded with the loss of his head: By which act, the Emperor (as one truly told him) had cut off his right hand with his left. And indeed so it happened. For not long after, he himself was by Maximus murdered, and the Empire of Rome irrecoverably destroyed. Now that these Fields lay hereabouts, and not about Chalons in the Province of Champaigne, (as some learned and industrious men have been of opinion) I am assured by these three reasons. First the improbability that Etius having got the victory, should suffer such a vast and numerous Army to pass through the whole length of France from one end to the other, and having waited all the Countrey, to break into Italy. And secondly the testimony of Jornandes an ancient Writer, who telleth us, first, that before this fight, Attila had besieged and distressed the City of Orleans; and therefore was not vanquished in the fields of Chalons: and then, that immediately upon the Victory, Torismund the King of the Goths, (his Father Theodorick being slain) in Campis Catalaunicis ubi & pugnaverat, Regia Majestate salvetur Tolosam ingreditur; being proclaimed King in those very fields, entered with great state and triumph into Tholouse, the Regal City at that time of the Gothish Kingdom. Which plainly proves the place of battle to be near this City: though possible by the name Campi Catalaunici (the great length and breadth thereof considered) we are to understand the whole Countrey of Languedoc.

The old Inhabitants of this Countrey besides the Helvii, the Vellani, the Tectosages, and Albigenses, formerly remembred, were the Agateses, Beterrenses, Gabales, Volea, and the Ariminici; all which, together with some others of lesser note, made the Province of Narbonensis Prima, whereof the Metropolis was Narbon. In the falling of the Roman Empire assigned with the rest of Narbonensis, and some part of Spain, to Atholfus King of the Goths, whom Honorius by this gift and by bestowing on him his Sister, Placidia, bought out of Italy. The Goths having got so good footing in Gaul, enlarged their bounds by taking in the most part of Aquitain, Quercu, and Auvergne: but forced to quit them to the French, who conquered that from them which they got from the Romans; and shut them up within the limits of their first Donation. After this they declined as fast in France, as they thrived in Spain; losing Provence to Theodorick, King of the Ostro-Goths, or Goths of Italy; whose successor Amalasunta, fearing a War from Greece, resigned her interests in Provence to Theodolbert the French King of Metz. Nothing now left unto the Goths of their Gallick purchases, but this Languedock only; and this they held as long as they had any thing to do in Europe, but lost it finally to the Moors, with all Spain it self. Recovered from the Moors by Charles Martel, and added to the rest of the French Empire; it was by Charles the Great given to one Thurfin, of the race of the ancient Kings, with the title of the Earl of Tholouse, on condition that he would be Christened. But long it continued not in his Race; nor in any other, not being settled in a way of Lineal Descent, till the time of Raymond the eighth Earl, Brother to another Raymond Earl of St. Giles (a Town of Gienne) whose Grand-child Hugh, being an adventurer in the Wars of the Holy Land, and wanting Money to provide himself for that expedition, sold his Estate herein to his Uncle Raymond, the Earl of St. Giles before mentioned. From this time forward we find these Earls to be as often called the Earls of St. Giles, as the Earls of Tholouse; and by that name frequently remembred in the Eastern stories; as for his great valour in the course of the Holy Wars, especially at the taking of the City of Tripoli, given to him (after it became Christian) with the title of Earl. This Raymond, worthily named the Great, Earl of Tholouse, St. Giles, and Tripoli, had three Sons; all of them succeeding; of which the eldest was Bertrand, had a Base Son called Ponce, who succeeded him in the Earldom of Tripoli, the Father of Raymond, and Grand-Father of another Raymond, both Earls of Tripoli, and both suspected to be false to the Christian Princes in the continuance of those Wars. Alfonso the third Son was also the Father of a Raymond, the Father of another Raymond, who proved a great maintainer of the Albigenses; and in pursuance of that cause murdered a Legat of the Pope sent to Excommunicate him, and strangled his own Brother Baldwin, because he found him not inclinable to his opinions. For this cause Warred upon, and Vanquished by Simon de Montfort, Father of Simon the great Earl of Leicester; and after many troubles and continual Wars, left his estate and quarrel to his Son named also Raymond, the last Earl of this House; who proving also a strong Patron of these Albigenses, was condemned for a Heretic, cursed by the Pope; and persecuted by the French Kings;

The Revenues of this Principality are about 30000 Crowns. The Arms are Quarterly Gules, a Bend Or, 2 Or, a Hunters Horn Azure, stringed Gules; the third as, &c. Over all an Esccheon of Pretence Chequie, Or and Azure. More briefly thus, Quarterly Chalons and Aurange, under an Esccheon of Geneva.

Southward of Aurange lyeth the County of VENASCINE, as the French call it, Comitatu Vennensium in the Latine; so called from Avenis (now Avignon) the chief City of it. Anciently it had by Lords of its own called Earls of Venize, (Venissa Comites in the Latine) united to the house of Savoy by the marriage of Laurence a daughter hereof, with Earl Humbert the second, An 1080. or thereabouts. But this Family of the first Lords coming to an end, it fell (but by what right I finde not) to the Earls of Tholouse, but held by them as Homagers (for this estate) of the Earls of Provence: on the conviction of Earl Raymond, condemned for Heresie, brought under the protection and patronage of the Popes of Rome; the more absolute Sovereignty hereof and of the City Avignon, being settled on them by Queen Joan, as before is said. The principal Cities of this tract, are, 1 Avignon, the Avenio of Strabo, Pliny, and Mela, a very fair and flourishing City, pleasantly seated on both sides of the River of Rhone: famous for being the residence of the Popes for 70 years, which times the Romans remember till this day by the name of the Babylonian captivity; admitting ever since an Oath unto the Pope at his Coronation, not to remove his Seat to Avignon. The first Pope that removed hither was Clement the 5th, An 1303. when as yet the Popes had no more right in it than that of Patronage and Protection; and returned again to Rome by Gregory the 11th, An 1377. In this City are said to be 7 Palaces, 7 Parish Churches, 7 Monasteries, 7 Nunneries, 7 Innes, and 7 Gates. So that if there be any mystery in the number of seven, or any credit to be given to such Pythagorean divinity: the Archbishop of this City may as well be entituled Antichrist, as the Pope of Rome; if there be nothing but the mystery of this number to affix it to him. It was made an University at the time of the Popes first settling here, and so still continueth; Aleat the great Emblematisst being here Professor. 2 Carpentras, by Protonius called Carpentoracte, a Bishops See; as is also 3 Cavaillon, (of old Caballio) once a Roman Colony, on the River Durance; and 4 Tarascon, on the Rhone, opposite to Beauneac in Languedoc: for the Popes dwelling here so long, could not be otherwise attended than by mitred Prelates. 5 Vaison, Civitas Vasonensium, of Antoninus.

The Revenues of the Pope here are not very great, and those expended all in keeping of Forts and Garrisons, by reason of the ill neighbourhood of the Protestants of Orange. So that it is supposed that it is rather a charge, than a profit to him: which maketh the people like very well to live under his Government, as bringing more money to them than he gathereth from them. The Arms hereof, when under the old Earls of Venize, were Gules, two keys in Saltire Or, stringed Azure. Which

Which seems to have in it some preface, (the Popes pretending to the Keys, as we know they do) that it should one day become subject to the See of Rome.

The old Inhabitants of the whole Countrey, were, as appeareth, the Salii, Massilienses, Vasconenses, and Venetienses, before mentioned; besides the Decretes about Antibes, the Senitis, and Sigistoris about Cistaron: all conquered by the Romans, in their first War in Gaul, called in to aid those of Marseilles against the Salii. The Fortune of it since hath been shewn before. Nothing remains now but the Catalogue of his Cousin-german: as being the son of Charles the seventh, and Mary daughter of Lewis the second, Duke of Anjou, Sister of Lewis the third and René, the preceding Dukes, and of Charles Father of this Charles, the last Earl of Provence. Immediately on whose death, Decemb. 19th. An 1481. the King sent a Commission to Palamede de Forban Lord of Sollier, Chamberlain of Earl Charles, to take possession of the Countrey in his name, and command therein as Lieutenant General. Since which time, Provence never was dismembered from the Crown of France, so much as in the way of Appenage, or any Honorary Title amongst the Kings children.

What the Revenues of it were to the former Earls, I am not able to say, having no good Authority to proceed upon. Onely I find, that besides the Lands belonging to the Earls hereof, and other customary and casual Taxes, there was a Tax called The Royal Impost, being fifteen Florens levied upon every fire; which reckoning 3500 fires, (for such the estimate of them was) amounted yearly unto 56000 Florens. Now it is subject to the rigor and uncertainty of the Kings Taxations, as well as all the rest of France. And so much of those Provinces which properly made up the Kingdoms of the French and Goths; let us next look on those which at the same time were subdued by the Burgundians; whose History, Kingdom, and Estate, are to be considered, before we come to the description of their several Provinces.

The Kingdom of BURGUNDY.

THE Kingdom of the BURGUNDIANS at their first settlement in Gaul, contained all those Provinces of the Roman Empire, then called the Alpis Graia and Penine, Maxima Sequanorum, Lugdunensis Prima, and Vienensis; now passing under the names of the Dukedom and County of Burgundy, Switzerland, the Grisons, Wallisland, Savoy, La Bresse, Dauphine, Lionnois, Nivernois, and some part of the Dukedom of Bourbon. A fair and large quantity of ground, able at once to tempt, and satisfy an ambitious Nation. But the Burgundians came not into Gaul of their own accord; though of their own accord they drew somewhat near it. In their Original they were a people bordering near the Vandals; if not a Tribe or Sept of them; and dwelling in those parts in which are now the Dukedom of Meslenburg, and Pomerania. At the time that Druiss and Tiberius warred in Germany, they Burgundians were utterly Barbarous, living in Tents only here and there clapped up. Which being in their own Language called Burgs, gave them the name of Burgundians amongst the Romans; in the same sense as the wild Arabs had the name of Scenites, amongst the Greeks, from the like kind of living. In the year 416. at the instigation of the Vandals they left their own tents, and planted themselves in the Towns and Villages belonging now to the Marquesses of Baden, and Elk Gers of Rheine. About which time, they received the Christian Faith, being then miserably oppressed by the Hunnes, breaking upon them out of Pannonia. Not finding any other way to free themselves of that enemy, they betook themselves to the God of the Christians, and were universally baptized. After which, falling on the Hunnes, they slew no less than 30000 of them in one battel; from that time forwards never troubled with that barbarous Nation. Christians then they were, and Orthodox in their profession, before their coming into Gaul: and for that reason called in by Stilico to oppose the French, then threatening an invasion of the Roman Provinces. Upon this invitation they passed over the River with an Army of 80000 fighting men, possessing themselves of all which lay from the faithless shore of the Loyre, to the Alpes of Italy; and from the Mountain Vauze, to the Mediterranean; Provence only excepted, about that same time planted by the Goths. Their Government was under Kings: Many, according to their Tribes, when they lived in Germany; Monarchical, when settled in the Realm of France, where they had these five

408 1 Tabica, who first brought the Burgundians into Gaul.
2 Gundioch.
3 Gundebault, who harassed Italy, then in possession of the Goths, with fire and sword, the Uncle of Clotilda, wife to Clovis, the fifth King of the outed of his Kingdom by Childebert and Clotaire, Kings of Paris and Soissons, in revenge of the death of their Brother Chlodomir. And so the Kingdom of the Burgundians fell unto the French, after it had continued about 120 years: Guntram, the son of Clotaire, and Clovis, one of the sons of Dagobert the first, being in their times, honoured with the Titles of Kings of Burgundy.

But the first time that the Kingdom of Burgundy settled amongst the French, in the way of succession, was in the partage of that vast Empire of Charlemagne, amongst the children and posterity of Leodovicus Pius: In constituting of which Kingdom, Provence was added to the reckoning, to make this answerable to the other parts of that broken Monarchy. The first of these French Kings was Charles, the youngest Son of Lotharius Emperor, and King of Italy, eldest son of the said Lewis the Godly. The succession, in this order following.

The French Kings of Burgundy.

855 1 Charles, youngest son of the Emperor Lotharius, died without issue.
858 2 Lotharius, the second King of Metz, and Lewis the second Emperor, Brethren of Charles, succeeded in Burgundy; the Mountain Jour dividing and bounding their Estates.
876 3 Charles the Bald, King of France, and Emperor, Uncle to the three former Kings, all dying without issue, succeeded in the whole Estate; which he again divided into three Governments or Members: that is to say, Burgundy on this side of the Soasne, containing the now Dukedom of Burgundy, with the Earldoms of Lions and Macon. 2 Burgundy beyond the Jour, comprehending the Provinces of Savoy, Switzerland, Wallisland, and the Estates of the Grisons; and 3ly. Burgundy on the other side of the Soasne, lying betwixt the other two; containing the now Counties of Burgundy, Provence, La Bresse, and Dauphine. This last conferred with the Title of Earl, on Boson Earl of Ardennes, by Charles the Bald, who had married his sister Judith; and not long after in the person of the said Earl Boson, raised unto a Kingdom by Charles the Gross, by the name of the Kingdom of Arles and Burgundy. The Kings, these that follow.
4 Boson Earl of Ardennes Husband of Hermingrade, the daughter of Lewis the second, Emperor, and King of Burgundy, was first by Charles the Bald made Earl of Burgundy, beyond the Soasne; and afterwards by Charles the Gross created the first King of Arles and Burgundy, to be held by him and his successors of the German Emperors.
5 Lewis II. son of Boson and Hermingrade, chosen King of Italy, but outed by the Faction of Berengarius.
917 6 Hugh de Arles, supposed to be the son of Lotharius the second, by Waldrada his Concubine; succeeded by the gift of Lewis; and was chosen by his Faction there King of Italy also. For the quiet enjoying of which Kingdom, he resigned this to Rodolph, Duke of Burgundy beyond the Jour, elected by another Faction to that broken Title.
926 7 Rodolph Duke of Burgundy beyond the Jour, succeeded on the resignation of Hugh de Arles: his Brother Boson being settled beyond the Jour.
937 8 Rodolph II. son of Rodolph; a Prince of so short a reign, or of so little note, that he is by some left out of the Catalogue of these Kings.

9 Boson

9 Boson II. the Brother of Rodolph the first, by whom the Dukedom of Burgundy beyond the Jour, was united to the Kingdom of Arles and Burgundy.
10 Conrade son to Boson the second.

965 11 Rodolph III. son to Conrade, who having no issue of his body, gave his estate to Conrade the second, Emperor of Germany, and his son Henry surnamed the Black, whom he had by Gilese, the sister of this Rodolph; by whom it was united to the German Empire, An. 1032. In the distractions whereof, following not long after his decease, the Provincial Earls, or Gouverneurs for the German Emperors, made themselves Masters and Proprietaries of their several Provinces (the Dukedom of Burgundy excepted, settled long before) out of which rose the great Estates of the Duke of Savoy, the Earls of Burgundy, and Provence, the Dauphins of Viennois, and Lords of Bresse, together with the Commonwealths of the Swissers and Grisons: every poor Bird snatching also some Feather or other of this dying Eagle. Yet notwithstanding the dismembering and cantoning of this fair estate, the succeeding Emperors of Germany, claimed not only a super-intendence over, but a disposal of all the Countries that ever were under the command of the King of Burgundy: inasmuch that the Emperor Henry the first, receiving no small part of the money which our Richard the first paid to the Duke of Austria, for his Ransome, gave unto the said Richard the Kingdom of Burgundy, the Sovereignty of Provence, Viennois, Marsilles, Narbon, Arles, and Lions; together with the homages of the King of Aragon, and of the Earl of Digion, and St. Giles. A Royal gift, if either the Emperor had had any dominion over those Countries, or if they would have received any Prince or Officer of his appointing.

The Armes of this Kingdom under the old Burgundian Kings, are said to have been Azure, a Cat Argent, armed Gules. Which being said, we will proceed to the description of those Provinces of this broken Kingdom, which lie within the bounds of France; the rest which lie beyond the Jour, having been spoken of already in the Alpine Countries; which made up the whole continent of the Transjuran Burgundy.

18 DAUPHINE.

North of the Country of Provence, where we left before, lyeth that of DAUPHINE, having on the East, Savoy, and the Maritime Alpes; on the West Lienois, and some part of Languedoc, from which divided by the Rhone; and on the North, La Bresse, and those parts of Savoy which lie towards Piemont. So called, as some report, from Dauphine wife of Guigne the second; in like manner as Flanders is affirmed most probably to have took that name from Flandrina wife of Liderick the second, then one of the last of those Princes who governed in that Country by the name of Forresters.

It is divided into the Higher and the Lower; that mountainous, stony, and unfruitful, of the same nature with the Alpes, with whose branches it is over-run: the other tolerably fruitful, but not to be compared with the rest of France. The people of the Higher, and more mountainous parts, are generally gross and rude; not capable of learning, but well enough inclined to Armes and Traffick, and have a custom, that on the coming on of Winter, they send abroad all those which are fit for travel, (whom they call Biers, or Bisonards) who seldom return back till Easter: none staying at home, but old men, children, and impotent persons, which cannot go abroad to get their livings. Those in the Lower, are more civil, but not more given to labour than the Mountainers are; nor very covetous of gain, so they may live at ease, without want or penury. In both parts generally good Souldiers, and well affected to their Prince.

The Lower Dauphine, together with that part of Provence which lies next to the Rhone, and the adjoining parts of Savoy, made up the Province called Viennensis, from Vienna the Metropolis of it, situate on the Rhone, honoured with the Seat of the Præfatus Prætorio Galliarum; still the chief City of this Countrey, an Archbishops See, and a Siege Præfidiat. From hence the tract about it is called Viennois, and was the Title of the first Proprietaries of this Countrey, entituled Dauphins of Viennois. To this Town Archelans, the son of Herod, was banished by Augustus Cesar. 2 Valence, the chief City heretofore of the Valentinois, then a Roman Colony, now a Bishops See, and a University for the Civil Laws; a rich, strong, and well-traded Town, seated on the Rhone. The Countrey hereabouts from hence called Valentinois, and hath given Honorary Title to two persons of more Fame, than Honour: the first of which was Cesar Borgia, the son of Pope Alexander the sixth, who calling off his Cardinals Cap was made Duke of Valentinois by Charles the eighth; the other Madam Diana, the great Minion and Paramour of Henry the second, under whom she much swayed the affairs of France, and honoured with the Title of Dutchess of it. 3 Grenoble, (in Latine Gratianopolis) the chief Seat heretofore of the Acquisitans, the most populous and best built of all this Province; and much resorted to by the Lords and Nobles; by reason of the Court of Parliament here erected, An. 1453. About this lyeth the Countrey called Grisinandum, 4 Ternay, 5 Rosillon, 6 La Roche, 7 Montelimar, all along the Rhone; 8 Romons upon, the confluence of the Rhone, and the Iser. 9 Cremien, 10 St. Marceline, 11 St. Andre, 12 Beaurepaire more within the Countrey.

The Higher Dauphin, together with those parts of Provence which lie next to Italy, made up the Province of the Alpes Maritimæ, the Metropolis whereof was, 1 Ebrodunum, now called Ambrun, an Archbishops See, and Siege Præfidiat, seated on an high Rock, in the midst of a pleasant Valley, surrounded with Mountains, under which runs the River Durance. The Hilly Countrey hereabouts, is the highest of France. 2 Briançon, near the Head of the River Durance, called Brigantio by Antoninus.

Viennois.

3 Gappes, now a Bishops See, formerly the chief City of the Apencenses; the track of whom is still found in the name of the adjoining Territory, called Le Pais Gapencois: memorable for a Synod or Assembly of the French Prælati here holden Anno 1603, in which it was determined, as and for an Article of Faith, That the Pope was Antichrist, and where the Ministers then assembled, gave audience to the Ambassadors of Foreign States, as to a Commonwealth distinct from the Realm of France, audaciously importuning their King by their several Agents, for liberty of going (whenever they listed) or sending whenever they pleased unto the Councils and Assemblies of all Foreign Nations which professed the same Religion with them; the preamble to those Encroachments on the Royal Authority, which after proved the ruine of their power and party. 4 Tricassin, so called of the Tricassinis, the old inhabitants of these parts. 5 Die, the Dia Vicentiorum of Antoninus, a Bishops See, situate on the River Drofe: from whence come those small, but good Stomack-Wines, which we call Vin Die. Others affirm (and perhaps more knowingly) that this Wine is of the growth of Champagne, most plentifully growing in the Fields of a Town called Hey, from whence it hath the name of Vin De Hey, and so contractedly Vin Day. 6 Chorges, 7 Moimbrun, 8 Effiles, of which little memorable.

The chief inhabitants hereof, in the time of the Romans, besides the Tricassinis, Apencenses, Vacantiis, and Accusiani before mentioned, and the Allobroges, spoken of in the Alpine Provinces, were the Segalauni about Valence, the Decenses about Die, and the Cavari about Grenoble. First conquered by the Romans, then by the Burgundians, and at last by the French: under whom made a part of the new Kingdom of Burgundy, till the surrender of the same to the German Emperors. Under them it continued, till the year 1100, when Guigne, surnamed the Fat, Earl of Grisinandum, seeing the Emperor Henry the Fourth, over-born by the Popes, and not able to assert his own rights; seized upon this Province, under the Title of Earl of Viennois; to which Guigne the second, his Son and Successor, gave the name of Dauphins; either from his Wife so called, as some, or from the Dolphin which he took for his Armes, as others say. In this Family it continued till the year 1349, under the power and Government of these following Princes, entituled

The Dauphins of Viennois.

			1342	10	Humbert II. the younger son of John , and the Brother of Guigne the sixth, the last Dauphin of Viennois , who being surcharged with wars by Ame (or Amade) Earl of Savoy, entred into the Order of Dominican Friars at Lyons; selling his Countrey at a small rate to Philip de Valois, French King, upon condition, that the eldest son of France should be entituled always Dauphin of Viennois; and quarter the Arms of Dauphin with those of France. The conditions willingly accepted, and Charles, the son of King John, the son of Philip de Valois, admitted by his Grandfather both to the Title and Estate in the very year of the surrendry. Since this time, the eldest son of France is called generally the Dauphin of France, sometimes the Dauphin only, by way of eminency; and many times the Prince-Dauphin, to difference him from the Dauphin (or Count-Dauphin) of Auvergne, and perhaps some others. A Title so annexed unto them, that it is not usually laid by on the accession of a greater or superiour Dignity: insomuch as Francis the eldest son of Henry the second, (whom he succeeded in the Crown) being King of Scots, in the right of Mary his wife, was by the French commonly called Le Roy Dauphin, or the King Dauphin. Nor have they the bare Title of this Countrey only, but the commands, profits, and possession of it; sending their own Governours thereunto; who by an ancient indulgence, have the greatest privileges (confering all Offices within the Province) of any Governours of France.

The Armes hereof are Azure, a Dauphin passant, Or.

19 LA BRESSE.

LA BRESSE is bounded on the East, with Savoy; on the West, with Lionois; on the North, with Charolois in the Duchie of Burgundy, and some part of the Franche Comte; and on the South, with Dauphine. The reason of the name I find not. The Countrey is very fruitful and pleasant, embraced betwixt the Rivers of Soane and Rhone, with which very well watered. Chief Towns here in are, 1 Belley, a Bishops See, 2 Bourg, (for distinction sake called Bourgen Bresse) a Town so well fenced, and fortified with so strong a Citadel for command of the Countrey, that it was thought little inferior rior to the two impregnable Fortresses of St. Katherine and Montmelian in Savoy. The Government of which Town and Citadel, was earnestly laboured for by the Duke of Biron, then Gouverneur of Burgundy, after a repulse on the like sute for that of St. Katherine: but being suspected to hold intelligence with the Duke of Savoy, at that time in ill terms with King Henry the 4th, it was also denied him; which drew him into discontent, and thereby to his fatal ruine. Afterwards, during the minority of Lewis the 13th, demolished by special Order of the Council of France, for fear of being surprised by the Duke of Savoy during those confusions. It was of old time called the Forum Secusianorum, from the Secusiani, the ancient Inhabitants of this tract. 3 Castillon, 4 Mont-Real, 5 Bugey, 6 Veromen, of which, nothing observable.

This little Province, being anciently a part of the Kingdom of Arles and Burgundy, had its own Earls, Proprietary Lords hereof; who held it till the year 1285: at what time Sibylle, the Daughter and Heir of Ulric, Earl of Bresse and Baugie, (or Bassee, as some Writers call it) conveyed the Estate in marriage to Ame or Amade, the 4th of that name, Earl of Savoy. In which House it continued till the year 1600; and then surrendered by Duke Charles Emmanuel to King Henry the 4th, to silence the pretences which that King had made unto the Marquise of Saluzzes, and put an end unto the war then begun about it; the politick Duke choosing rather to part with an Estate on this side of the Mountains, than to give that active King occasion to look into Italy; to which Savoy must have been a Thorow-fare, Piemont an ordinary Pass; and where no end could be expected, but the loss of all. Surrendered then it was on good reason of State, and upon that Surrendry united and incorporated with the Crown of France, and put under the Government of the Parliament of Digion, as it still continueth.

Arms hereof are Azure, a Lyon Ermine, armed and Langued, Or.

THe Countrey of LIONOIS is bounded on the East, with Bresse; on the West, with Beau-jolois, Forrest and Auvergn; on the North, with Burgundy Duchy; and on the South, with Dauphin, and a part of Languedoc. So called from Lions the chief City, and under that title made an Earldom by Charles the Gross, in the cantoning and dismembring of the Kingdom of Burgundy: The Earldom containing at that time, not only Lionois it self, but also Forrest and Beau-jolois, before described. The Earls hereof were at first only Provincial Governours, but under the distractions of the German Empire they shifted for themselves, and became hereditary; but long it held not in one hand. For first, the Earldom of Forrest, and the Lordship or Signeury of Beaujeu being taken out of it, about the year 990, the rest of the Estate fell in some tract of time to the Bishops and Church of Lions, but under the Sovereignty of the French Kings, as Lords Paramount of it.

The places in it of most note are, 1 Maison, (Matiscornis) a Bishops See, situate on the Soane; anciently a distinct Earldom from that of Lions, one of the five (as that of Lions was another) which made up the Dukedom of Burgundy on this side of the Soane: one of the Earls hereof called William, flourishing in the year 1000 or thereabouts; whose son and successor named Otho, married Elizabeth daughter of Humbert the first Earl of Maurienne (a Title afterwards exchanged for that of Savoy.) Continuing for some ages after in this Posterity, it was purchased of William the last Earl hereof, and of Elizabeth his Wife, by King Lewis the 9th; and afterwards subjected to the Jurisdiction and Court of Lions, as it still continueth. 2 Eschalas on the Rhone, on the South of Lions, opposite to Vienne, the chief City of the Lower Dauphin. 3 Dandilli, 4 Francheville, 5 Chaumont, and 6 Lebrelle, all somewhat Westward of that River, but not much observable. 7 Lions it self, pleasantly seated on the confluence of the Soane and the Rhone, anciently a Roman Colony, (testified by many old Inscriptions) and honoured with a magnificent Temple, dedicated by the Cities of France to Augustus Caesar: now the most famous Mart of France, and an University; by our Latin Writers called Lugdunum. These Marts in former times were holden at Geneva, from thence removed hither by King Lewis the 11th, for the enriching of his own Kingdom. When Julio the second had excommunicated Lewis the 12th, he commanded by his Apostolical authority that they should be returned to Geneva again; but therein his pleasure was never obeyed: the Marts continuing still at LIONS; as a place more convenient and capacious of that great resort of French, Dutch, and Italian Merchants, which frequent the same. As for the University, questionless it is very ancient; being a seat of learning in the time of Caius Caligula. For in those times, before an Altar consecrated to Augustus Caesar in the Temple spoken of before, this Caligula did institute some exercises of the Greek and Roman Eloquence: the Victor to be honoured according to his merit; and the vanquished either to be feralated, or with their own tongues to blot and expunge their writings, or to be drowned in the River adjoining. Hence that of Juvenal, the Lugdunensis Rhetor dicitur ad Aram, applied to dangerous undertakings. In the time of the Romans first coming into Gaul, it was the chief City of the Hedui and Secusiani; afterwards the Metropolis of Lugdunensis Prima: The Archbishop hereof is the Metropolitan of all France; and was so in the time of S. Irenæus, one of the renowned Fathers in the Primitive Church, who was Bishop here.

In this Town lived Peter Waldo, a wealthy Citizen, about the time of Frederick Barbaross, Emperor of Germany: who being a devout and conscientious man, sensible of the many errors and corruptions in the Church of Rome, distributed the greatest part of his riches amongst the poor; and betook himself to meditation and studying of the holy Scriptures. In the carnal eating of CHRISTS body, the subtraction of the Cup in the blessed Sacrament, in matter of Purgatory; the Supremacy; adoration of Images, Invocation of the Saints departed, and many other points of moment; he held opinions contrary unto those of Rome, and little different from those of the present Reformed Churches. And yet it may not be denied, but that amongst some good Wheat there were many Tares; which gave the juster colour to their Adversaries to exclaim against them. Being much followed, in regard of his piety and charity, he got unto himself and them the name of Pauperes de Lugduno, or the Poor men of Lions, given in derision and contempt. Afterwards they were called Waldenses, by the name of Waldo, the beginner of this Reformation; and by that name opposed, and writ against by Frier Thomas of Walden. The French according to their manner of Pronunciation, drowning the L. and changing the W. into V. call them commonly Vandois; by which name they occur in the stories of that State, and Language. But Lions proving no safe place for them, they retired into the more desert parts of Languedoc, and spreading on the banks of the River Alby, obtained the name of Albigenses, as before was said. Supported by the two last Earls of Tholose, they became very masterfull and insolent: Insomuch, that they murdered Trincan, their Viscount in Beziers, and dashed out the teeth of their Bishop, having taken Sanctuary in S. Magdalens Church, one of the Churches of that City. Forty years after which high outrage, the divine Providence gave them over to the hand of the Croisades, under the conduct of the French Kings, and many other noble Adventurers; who sacrificed them in the self-same Church, wherein they had spoyled the blood of others. About the year 1250, after a long and bloody War, they were almost rooted out of that Countrey also. The remnants of them being bettered by this affliction, betook themselves unto the Mountains lying betwixt Dauphine, Provence, Piemont, and Savoy, where they lived a godly and laborious life; painfully tilling the ground, re-building Villages, which formerly had been destroyed by War; teaching the very Rocks to yield good pasture to their Cattel: insomuch as places which before their coming thither scarce yielded four Crowns yearly, were made worth 350 Crowns a year, by their care and industry. Lasciviousness in speech they used not; Blasphemy they abhorred, nor was the name of Devil (in the way of execration) ever heard amongst them; as their very enemies could not but confess, when they were afterward in troubles. The Crimes alleged against them were, That when they came into any of the neighbouring Churches, they made no address unto the Saints; nor bowed before such Crosses as were erected in the Highways, and Streets of Towns. Great crimes assuredly, when greater could not be produced. And so they lived, neither embracing the Popes Doctrines, nor submitting unto his Supremacy, for the space of 300 years, untouched, unquestioned; even till the latter end of the reign of King Francis the first. But then the Persecution raging against the Lutherans, they were accused, condemned, and barbarously murdered, in the Massacres of Merindol, and Chabriers before mentioned. After which time, joyning themselves with the rest of the Protestant party, they lost the name of Vandois, by which called before; and pass in the account of the Reformed Churches of France; enjoying the same privileges and freedom of Conscience, as others of the Reformed do. And though I look not on these men and their Congregations as Founders of the Protestant Church, or of the same Church with them, as I see some do: yet I behold them as Assertors of some doctrinal truths, and professed Enemies of the errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome, and therein as the Predecessors of the present Protestants.

The old Inhabitants of this tract were a part of the Hedui, that Nation overspreading not this Countrey only, but Bourbonnois, with the whole Dukedom of Burgundy. And of these Hedui, the Insabres are thought by some learned men to have been a Tribe; who passing over the Alpes, together with the Senones, and others of the Gallick Nations, possessed themselves of those parts of Italy which now make up the Dukedoms of Miluin, Parma, Mantua, with the parts adjoining. The residue of the story which concerns this Countrey we have had before.

21. The Dukedom of BURGUNDIE.

THE Dukedom of BURGUNDIE hath on the East, the French Countrey, and some part of Savoy; on the West, Bourbonnois; on the North, Champagne; on the South, La Bresse, Lionnois, and some part of Beaujeu. A Province so well watered with pleasant and profitable Rivers, that as Q. Katharine de Medices used to say of France, That it had more fair Rivers than all Europe; so we may say of this Countrey, That it had more fine Rivers than all France: here being the Rivers of 1. Armancon, 2. Serun, 3. Cuis, 4. Torney, 5. Valence, 6. Doue, 7. Brune, 8. Sein, 9. Louche, and 10. Soasne, (the Araris of the ancient Writers) this last dividing the two Burgundies from one another. Yet notwithstanding this great plenty of waters, the Countrey generally is less fruitful than the rest of France; hardly yielding sufficient for its own inhabitants, except Wines only.

Chief Cities in it, are, 1. Dijon, the birth place of S. Bernard, seated upon the Soasne and Louche, in a champion Countrey: the Town large, populous, and of much resort, as being the Seat of the Governour, and Parliamentary for the Province; a Parliament being here erected, Anno 1476. Well fortified on all parts, but specially defended by a strong Castle called Talente, situate on an hill adjoining. It is called Divio in the Latine, the Bishop hereof Divionensis. 2. Chalons, (in Latine, Caballinum) called for distinctions sake, Chalons upon Soasne, to difference it from Chalons upon Marn, in Champagne: is a Bishops See also, as the other is; and gives name to that Noble Family of Chalons, (out of which the Princes of Orange are extracted) being one of the four ancient Families of Burgundy; the other three, Vienn, Neufchatell, and Virgie. 3. Autun, by Protony called Augustodunum, the chief City of the Hedui, now a Bishops See; heretofore the chief of all the Countrey, some marks of the old splendour being still to be seen; now very ordinary and mean, beautified only with some fair Churches, which the ruins of time have not yet demolished. 4. Beauvais, seated on the Barsoize, in the best and richest soil of all Burgundy; and yielding the best Wines in France: remarkable for an Hospital of so fair a building, that it is thought equal to any Princes Palace in Europe; and an impregnable Castle built by King Lewis the 12th. 5. Alize, now a small Village, but of great name and power in the time of Cesar, then called Alexia, the chief Fortrefs of Vercingetorix, besieged herein by the said Cesar; but so besieged, that he had 70000 men in the Town for defence of the place; and an Army of 300000 Galls at the back of Cesar, to relieve their fellows. So that he was fain to fortifie his Camp with two Walls, the one against them within the City, and the other against them without: which done, he kept such diligent watch and ward on both sides, that the besieged heard sooner of the discomfiture of their Friends, than they did of their coming. Which fatal news being brought unto them, the Town was yielded. And Vercingetorix bravely mounted, rode round about Cesar, then sitting in his Chair of State, disarmed himself, took off his Horses caparisons, and laying all upon the ground, sat down at Cesar's feet and became his Prisoner. 6. Tournus, encompassed with the Soasne. 7. Semur, consisting of three parts, each of them severally Walled, and strongly fortified. 8. Pardun, 9. Nayz, 10. St. Leger, famous for medicinal Bathes. 11. Noyers, on the Borders towards Champagne. 12. Auxerre, by Antonine called Antiodorum; of most note for the Council held here, Anno 627: the Countrey about which is called Auxerrois, and was an Earldom of it self. The Title and possession of that Peter Earl of Auxerre, who was the third Emperour of the Latines reigning in Constantinople; to whom it came in marriage with his first Wife Agnes, the daughter of the last Earl of the former Race. On the fall of which house, it fell unto that of Chalons, by the marriage of Isabel Niece of the said Peter by his brother Robert, to John of Chalons Earl of Burgundy: to whom succeeded John de Chalons his eldest Son by that Venter (his second wife) and finally was sold by John of Chalons, great Grandchilde of the said John Earl of Burgundy, to Charles the fifth of France, Anno 1370; by whom united to the Crown, subjected to the Parliament of Paris, and made part of Champagne. Here is also within this Countrey the great and famous Monastery of Citeaux, the mother of so many Religious houses, dispersed up and down in Europe, from hence denominated, and subject to the discipline and Rules hereof.

Within the limits of this Dukedom (on the South parts of it) stands the Earldom of CHABROLLOIS, heretofore the title of the eldest Son of the Dukes of Burgundy; so called from Charolles, the chief Town hereof, situate in the borders of it, towards La Bresse: seized upon with the rest of this Dukedom, by Lewis the 11th. immediately on the death of Duke Charles the 5th. like; restored again to Philip the second, King of Spain, by Henry the second, of France, on the peace made at Cambray; and subjected to the Parliament of Dole in the County of Burgundy, as a part or member of that Estate. So that neither the Governour of the Dukedom for the French King, nor the Parliament of Dijon, have any thing to do in it. The Arms hereof are Gules, a Lion passant regardant Or, armed Azure.

The ancient inhabitants of the whole Dukedom, according to the limits before laid down, were the Hedui, one of the most potent Nations of all Gaul: who called in the Romans, to aid them in their quarrels against the Sequani and Arverni, made them all subject unto Rome. In the prosperity whereof they made up the Province of Lugdunensis Prima, of which Lions was the Metropolis or principal City. Afterwards, in the division of the French Kingdom of Burgundy, by Charles the Bald; this part thereof, being called the Dukedom of Burgundy on this side of the Soasne, was cantoned into the five Earldoms of Dijon, Chalons, Autun, Lions, and Maiscon: whereof the three first laid together by Odoor Eudes King of France, during the minority of Charles the Simple, were given unto his brother Richard (both Sons of Robert Earl of Anjou) under the style and title of Duke of Burgundy. The issue of this Robert failing, it fell unto another, Robert, Son of Hugh Capet King of France: and the male issue failing of that Line also, it was devolved partly by Escheat for want of heirs male, and partly in the right and title of the heir General, to King John of France the son of Philip de Valois, and of Joan his wife, one of the daughters of Robert the third, who with the consent of Charles his eldest Son, furnished the Wife, gave it unto his second Son Philip, (more worthily furnished the Hardy) together with the marriage of the Heir of Flanders, Artois, and the County of Burgundy. An Argument of no great wisdom, as was judiciously observed by King Lewis the 11th. For by this means, those great Estates being united in one person, and afterwards these Estates improved by as prosperous marriages; this house of Burgundy grew formidable to the Kings themselves: who never left practising against it, till they had brought it to ruine; and once again united this Dukedom to their own Estate from which at first it was dismembred.

 1001 5 Robert, King of France, Son of Hugh Capet, succeeded in the Dukedom, on the death of his Uncle Henry.
 1004 6 Robert II. Son of this Robert, and Brother of Henry King of France.
 1075 7 Hugh, the Nephew of Robert by his Sonne Henry, became afterwards a Monk of Clugny.
 1097 8 Odo, or Otho II. Brother of Hugh.
 1102 9 Hugh II. Son of Otho the 2^d.
 1124 10 Odo, or Otho III. Son of Hugh the 2^d.
 1165 11 Hugh III. the Companion, but great Enemy of our Richard the first, in the Wars of the Holy-Land.
 1192 12 Odo, or Otho IV. Son of Hugh the 3^d.
 1218 13 Hugh IV. an Adventurer with King Lewis the 9th in the Holy-Land.
 1273 14 Robert III. Son of Hugh the 4th which Robert was the Father of Margaret, the Wife of Lewis Hutin King of France and Navarre; and of Joan, the Wife of Philip de Valois, French King, and Grandmother of Philip the Hardy, after Duke of Burgundy.
 1308 15 Hugh V. Son of Robert the 3^d.
 1315 16 Eudes, the Brother of Hugh, was Earl of Burgundy also in right of his Wife.
 1349 17 Philip, the Grand-child of Eudes by his only Son Philip, Duke and Earl of Burgundy by descent (who if he had lived, had been also Earl of Flanders and Artois in right of Margaret his Wife). But dying young and without issue, he was succeeded in all his Titles and Estates by 1363 18 Philip II. surnamed the Hardy, Son of John King of France, Son of Philip de Valois, and of Joan Daughter of Robert the 3^d, by King John his Father, with the consent of Charles the 5th his Brother, (in whom the right of this Dukedom was then pretended to remain) made Duke of Burgundy, and married Margaret daughter of Lewis de Maline (and consequently Heir of Flanders, and the County of Burgundy) the Widow of his Predecessor.
 1404 19 John, surnamed the Proud, Son of Philip the 2^d, Duke and Earl of Burgundy, and Earl of Flanders and Artois.
 1419 20 Philip III. surnamed the Good, who added most of the Netherlands to his Estate.
 1467 21 Charles the Wartlike, Earl of Charollois, Son of Philip the Good. After whose death, slain by the Switzers, at the battell of Nancie, Lewis the 11th seized upon this Dukedom, Anno 1476. pretending an Escheat thereof, for want of Heirs males; and so uniting it for ever to the Crown of France: as by like colour of Escheat, King John had formerly entered on it, and given it unto Philip his younger Son to the prejudice of the Earls of Enverex descended from the daughter and heir of Lewis Hutin, and of Margaret his Wife, the elder Sister of the Mother of the said King John.

Of the great wealth and potency of these last Dukes of Burgundy, we shall speak further when we come to the description of Belgium: the accession whereof to their Estates, made them equal to most Kings in Christendom. But for their Arms, which properly belonged to them as Dukes of Burgundy, they were Bendimise of Or and Azure, a Border Gules. Which Coat is usually marshalled in the Scutcheons of the Kings of Spain; that of the Earldom being omitted, though in their possession. The reasons of which are probably (for I go but by guess) partly because this being the older and Paternal Coat, comprehends the other; and partly to keep on foot the memory of his Title to the Dukedom it self, in right of which he holdeth such a great Estate.

22. The County of BURGUNDIE.

THE County of BURGUNDIE hath on the East, the Mountain Jour, which parts it from Switzerland; on the West, the Dutchy of Burgundy, from which divided by the Saone; on the North, a branch of the Mountain Vange, which runneth betwixt it and Lorraine; on the South, La Bresse. It is reckoned to be 90 miles in length, about 60 in breadth: and with the Provinces of Dauphine, La Bresse, and Provence, made up the Dukedom of Burgundy beyond the Saone; on the Eastern side of which it is wholly situate. This part thereof, now generally called the French Comie, or the Free County, because not under the command of the French Kings; but living in a more free Estate than any Subjects of that Kingdom.

The Country in some parts very Mountainous, but those Mountains yielding excellent Vineyards; and having in recompense of a little barrenness, an intermixture of most pleasing and fruitful vallies: swelling with plenty of all natural commodities useful unto the life of man; and for the variety of fresh streams, and delightful Riverets, inferior only to the Dutchy.

The principal Towns and Cities of it, are, 1 Besancon, called by Cesar, Vesontio, then the chief City of the Sequani, as afterwards the Metropolis of the Province entituled Maxima Sequanorum; by consequence an Archbishop's See. Seated betwixt two Mountains on the banks of the River Doux, by which it is almost encompassed; such artificial Fortifications being added to it, as make it very strong strong both by Art and Nature. But this is an Imperial City, not subject to the Government and Command of the Earls of Burgundy; honoured with a small University founded here, Anno 1540. by Pope Julius the second, and Charles the fifth. 2 Dole, seated on the same River Doux, for riches, strength and beauty, to be preferred before any in all the County; of which it is the Parliament City, and consequently of most resort for dispatch of business. Anciently it was an University for the study of the Civil Laws; but now the University is devoured by a College of Jesuites: who fearing lest the Doctrine of the Reformed Churches might creep in amongst the people, not only have debarr'd them the use of the Protestants Books; but have expressly forbid them to talk of G O D, either in a good fort or in a bad. 3 Salins, so called from its salt Fountains, out of which came the greatest part of the Earls Revenue; in which respect, or that it was the title of Otho, the Son of Frederick Barbarossa, before he did attain the Earldom: the Earls of Burgundy since that time, and the Emperours of Germany in their right, retain the name of Lords of Salins in their usual stile. A City honoured for a while with the seat of the Parliament, removed thither from Dole by King Lewis the eleventh, at such time as he held this Country; beholding to him (being a wife and politick Prince) for many wholesome Ordinances; still observed amongst them. 4 Poligni, the Baillie of the Lower; as 5 Vescal is of the Higher Burgundy. 6 Arboise, noted for the best Wines; and 7 Laxoal, for medicinal Baths. 8 Nizareth, on the borders of Switzerland, fortified with a very strong Castle; the ordinary seat and retreat from business of the first Princes of Orange, of the house of Chalons, who had great possessions in this Country. 9 Gray, and 10 Chastel-Chalon. 11 Quingey. 12 Orgelet. Here is also the great and famous Abbey of Clugny, near the Town of Beaune; out of which 12 free Monasteries in the Western Church, had their first Original.

The old Inhabitants of this County were the Sequani, a potent Nation contending with the Hedui and Averni for the Sovereignty of Gaul, till the strife was ended by the Romans; under whom it made together with Switzerland, the Province of Maxima Sequanorum. In the declining of which Empire, it fell to the Burgundians; and by Rodolph the last King of the French Kingdom of Burgundy, was given to Conrade the second Emperour of Germany. After that reckoned as a part of the German Empire, and governed by such Earls or Provincial Officers, as those Emperours sent thither. Otho of Flanders, Son to a Sister of the Emperour Conrade, was the first that held it as Proprietary: the other three whom Paradine sets before him in his Catalogue of the Earls of Burgundy, being merely Official. It was first united to the Dutchy by the marriage of D. Eudes, with Joan the Countess. But no issue coming out of this bed, it fell into the house of Flanders; and with the Heir of Flanders, unto Philip the Hardy, the first Duke hereof, of the Royal Race of Valois, Anno 1369. Philip the Grand-child of this Philip, united most of the Belgick Provinces unto his Estate: after whose death, and the death of Charles his Son at the battel of Nancie; the Dutchy was surprized by King Lewis the eleventh, as holden of the Crown of France, escheated to him for want of Heirs males. But the County, holden of the Empire, though subdued also by this Lewis, was restored again to Mary the Daughter and Heir of Charles; continuing hitherto in her issue, as appears evidently by this Catalogue of

The Earls of Burgundy.

- 1001 1 Otho Guillaume, the first Earl of Burgundy, by the power and aid of Robert King of France.
 1118 2 Reinald, Cousin and heir of Otho.
 1157 3 Frederick Barbarossa, Emperour, in right of Beatrix his Wife, Daughter of Earl Reinald, was Earl of Burgundy.
 1183 4 Otho the youngest Son of Frederick.
 1200 5 Otho II. Duke of Moranie, part of the Province of Tirol in Germany, was Earl of Burgundy in right of Beatrix his Wife, the Daughter of Otho the first.
 1208 6 Stephen, Earl of Chalons, next heir of Gerard of Vienne, and Joan his Wife, the second Daughter of Otho the first, and Sister of Beatrix, acknowledged by his faction there for Earl of Burgundy, in the life of Otho the second, whom he dispossessed; and left the same unto his Son, to the prejudice of Alice the Daughter of Otho.
 1234 7 John, Son of Stephen de Chalons.
 1269 8 Hugh, the Son of John, married to Alice Daughter of Otho of Moranie, so getting in that pretention also.
 1270 9 Othelin, the Son of Hugh; Earl of Artois in right of Maud his Wife, Daughter of Robert Earl of Artois.
 1315 10 Philip the Long, King of France; Earl of Burgundy and Artois, in right of Joan his Wife; Daughter and heir of Othelin.
 1331 11 Eudes, Duke of Burgundy, husband of Joan of France, the eldest Daughter of King Philip the Long, and of Joan the Countess.
 1349 12 Philip, Duke and Earl of Burgundy, Grand-child of Eudes, and of Joan his Wife, by their Son Philip.
 1361 13 Margaret, the Widow of Lewis Earl of Flanders, and second Daughter of Philip the Long, and their Papal power (which then began to bear some sway in the Christian World:) and gave the last (besides the opportunity of attaining the Western Empire) the Title of Most Christian King, continued ever since unto his Successors. And to say truth, he well deserved those honours, had they been far greater, by many victories obtained against the Enemies of the Gospel; the several Heathens by his means converted to the Faith of Christ; the great abilities he had of estate and judgment, enabling him to support the Majesty of the Roman Empire. For he not only was sole Monarch of the Kingdom of France, not parcelled out as formerly, and in times succeeding, into several petit Kingdoms and Principalities; but had added thereto by his own proper verue the greatest part of Italy, the best part of Germany, all Belgium, the two Pannonias, and a great part of Spain.

But this vast Empire falling into weak hands which were not able enough to manage it, decayed in as little time as it was in raising: partly by the unnatural ambition of the Sons of King Lewis the Godly, the next Successor of this Charles, who to make themselves all Kings, first deposed their Father, and then divided his Estate amongst them, into the Kingdoms of Italy, Burgundy, France, Lorraine, and Germany; four of which falling at last into the hands of strangers, ceased to be French, and passed into such Families as proved the greatest Enemies of the Crown of France: partly by alienating the best and goodliest Provinces of France it self, never again united till these later days; which made the French Kings less considerable, both at home and abroad, which we have touched upon before: and partly by the weakness and unworthiness of the Kings of his race; there being no question to be made, but Lewis the Stammering, Charles the Bald, the Grofs, and the Simple, would have found better Attributes, if they had deserved them. For by this means, the issue of this brave Prince grew so despicable in the eyes of their Subjects, that first Eudes the Son of Robert Duke of Anjou: and after, Rodolph Duke of Burgundy, the Uncle of Eudes; (both of the race of Witikindus the last Prince of the Saxons (and consequently both Aliens to the house of Charles) possessed themselves severally of the Kingdom. And though they did not hold it long, being depressed and overborn by their opposite factions; yet did they lay a fair ground for Hugh Capet to build his and overborn by their opposite factions; yet did they lay a fair ground for Hugh Capet to build his hopes on; Who being Son of Hugh the Great, Count of France, and Earl of Paris, the Son of Robert Duke of Anjou, younger brother of Eudes, and near Kinsman of Rodolph; never left practising his party in the Realm of France, till he had got possession of the Regal Diadem, wherewith two Princes of his house had been invested formerly by the like Elections. But for the Kings of this second Race, founded by two brave Princes, but on the unjust grounds of an usurpation; they are these that follow.

- A.Ch.
751 1 Pepin, the Son of Charles Martel, succeeded in the Office of Maire, Anno 742. and having got the Regal Crown, vanquished the Lombards, made the Boiarians tributary, and crushed the Saxons. 18.
769 2 Charles, surnamed the Great, the son of Pepin, subdued the Kingdoms of the Lombards and Saxons; conquered the Boiarians, and Avars, and vanquished the Saracens of Spain: Crowned Emperour of the West, upon Christmas day, by Pope Leo the third, Anno 800. 46.
815 3 Lewis the Godly, Son of Charles King of France and Emperour, the last sole Monarch of the French, deposed by his ambitious and unnatural Sons: the Empire of the French after his decease, being divided into the Kingdoms of Italy, Burgundy, Germany, France, and Lorraine; and France it self distracted into many Sovereign Estates and Principalities. 26.
841 4 Charles II. surnamed Calvus, or the Bald, youngest Son of Lewis, King of France and Emperour; vanquished by Charles the Grofs, in the War of Italy. 38.
879 5 Lewis II. surnamed Balbus, or the Stammering, Son of Charles the Bald, King of France and Emperour.
881 6 Lewis III. with Caroloman his brother, the base Sons of Lewis the Stammering; Usurpers of the Throne in the infancy of Charles the Simple.
886 7 Charles III. surnamed Craffus, or the Grofs, King of Germany and Emperour; called into France and elected King, during the Minority of Charles the Simple. 5.
891 8 Odo or Eudes, Son of Robert Earl of Anjou, of the race of Witikindus the last King of the Saxons; elected by an opposite Faction, ousted Charles the Grofs. 9.
900 9 Charles IV. surnamed Simplex, or the Simple, the Posthumus Son of Lewis the Stammerer, restored unto the Throne of his Fathers: which after many troubles raised against him by Robert the second, Earl of Anjou (whom he slew in Battel) he was forced to resign. 27.
927 10 Rodolph of Burgundy, Son of Richard Duke of Burgundy the brother of Eudes, succeeded on the resignation of Charles the Simple. 2.
929 11 Lewis IV. Son of Charles the Simple, surnamed Trafmarine, in regard that during his Fathers troubles he had lived in England; restored unto the regal Throne on the death of Rodolph: opposed therein by Hugh Earl of Paris and Anjou, the Nephew of King Eudes by his brother Robert beforementioned.

- 958 12 Lotharius, Son of Lewis the 4th. disturbed in his possession by Hugh Capet, the eldest Son of the said Hugh, on the pretension of that house, by which at last he got the Kingdom.
977 13 Lewis V. Son of Lotharius, the last King of the house of Charles the Great. After whose death (being King only for a year) the Crown was seized on by Hugh Capet; Charles Duke of Lorraine, brother of Lotharius, and Uncle unto Lewis the fifth, being pretermitted.

And now we are come to the present race of the Kings of France, founded in Hugh Capet, so called from the greatness of his head; Son of Hugh the Great, Earl of Paris and Anjou, and Grandchild of Robert the second Earl of Anjou: which Robert was the brother of Eudes, and Cousin German of Rodolph, Kings of France. Who partly by his own wits, but chiefly by the weakness of the mungrel issue of Charles the Great, having got the Diadem; transmitted it unto his posterity: the Crown descending in a direct line from Father to Son, till the death of Lewis the tenth, surnamed Hutin. But here we are to understand, that the Realm of France was at that time shut up within narrower bounds than it is at the present: the large and rich Countries of Champagne, Normandy, Bretagne, Anjou, Poitou, Languedoc, and the great Dukedom of Aquitain, besides those Provinces which constituted and made up the Kingdom of Burgundy, being aliened and dismembred from it. How they became reduced to the Crown again, will be discerned in the ensuing History, and Succession of

The third Race of the Kings of France, of the Capetine or Saxon Line.

- 988 1 Hugh Capet, of whom sufficiently before. 9.
997 2 Robert, the son of Hugh Capet, Duke of Burgundy also. 34.
1031 3 Henry, the eldest Son of Robert; his younger brother Robert being settled in the Dukedom of Burgundy. 39.
1061 4 Philip, the son of Henry, who added Berry to the Crown. 49.
1110 5 Lewis VI. son of Philip, surnamed the Grofs. 28.
1138 6 Lewis VII. son of Lewis the sixth, an Adventurer in the War of the Holy Land: as also was his Son and Successor.
1181 7 Philip II. surnamed Augustus, by whom Normandy, Aquitain, and Anjou, with their several Appendices, were taken from King John of England. 43.
1224 8 Lewis VIII. Son of Philip Augustus. 3.
1227 9 Lewis IX. surnamed the Saint, renowned for his Wars in Egypt, and the Holy Land. He restored Gaienne to the English, and added the Earldoms of Tholose and Macon, to the Crown of France. 44.
1227 10 Philip III. son of Lewis the ninth. 15.
1286 11 Philip IV. surnamed the Fair, King also of Navarre in the right of the Lady Joan his Wife. 28.
1314 12 Lewis X. surnamed Hutin, King of Navarre in right of his Mother, whom he succeeded in that Kingdom, Anno 1305. After whose death the Kingdom of France was to have descended on Joan his Daughter. 2.
1315 13 Philip V. called the Long, Brother of Lewis Hutin, partly by threats, promises, and other practices, caused a Law to pass (to which he gave the name of the Salique Law) for disabling Women from the Succession to the Crown; and thereby quite excluded his Brothers Daughter; served in the same kind himself, by his Brother Charles; who following his example, excluded, on the same pretence, his Nieces Joan, and Margaret, the Daughters of Philip. 5.
1320 14 Charles IV. but in true account the fifth of that name, most commonly called Charles the Fair, Brother of Philip and Lewis, the two last Kings. After whose death began the Wars of the English for the Crown of France; challenged by King Edward the third, as Son and heir of Isabel, the Daughter of King Philip the Fair, and Sister to the three last Kings. 7.
1328 15 Philip VI. surnamed de Valois, Son of Charles Earl of Valois, the second son of King Philip the third, and Uncle to the three last Kings; succeeded under colour of the Salique Law: of which Charles it is said, that he was Son to a King, Brother to a King, Uncle to a King, and Father to a King; yet himself was no King. In this Kings dayes was fought the famous Battel of Crecie, Anno 1343: in which the French Army consisted of about 70000 Souldiers; the English of 11800 only; yet the victory fell unto the English: by whose valour fell that day John King of Bohemia, 11 Princes, 80 Barons, 120 Knights, and 30000 of the common Souldiers. He added unto his Estates, the County Palatine of Champagne, the Country of Dauphine, and the City and Earldom of Montpelier. 22.
1350 16 John, the son of Philip de Valois, in whose reign was fought the battel of Poitiers, wherein Edward the black Prince, (so called for his black Acts upon the French) with an handful of wearied Souldiers (but 8000 in all) overcame the French Army consisting of 40000 men: of which they flew besides the Nobles, 10000 of the common Souldiers, and took Prisoners King John himself, and Philip his Son, 70 Earls, 50 Barons, and 12000 Gentlemen. 14.

- 1364 17 Charles V. the son of John, recovered all those pieces (except only Calice) which the English had before gotten from his Father and Grandfather. He is called commonly Charles the Wise, but Lewis the 11th. would by no means allow him that attribute: affirming that it was but a foolish part to give his younger brother Philip the Dukedom of Burgundy, and withall the heir of Flanders to Wife. And so it proved in the event.
- 18 Charles VI. a weak and distracted Prince, in whose reign Henry the fifth of England, called in by the Faction of Burgundy against that of Orleans; married the Lady Katharine, daughter of this King; and was thereupon made Regent of France during the Kings life, and heir of this Kingdom. But he had first won the great battel of Agincourt, Anno 1415. in which the English having an Army but of 15000, vanquished an Army of the French consisting of 52000 men, of which were slain 5 Dukes, 8 Earls, 25 Lords, 8000 Knights and Gentlemen of note, and 25000 of the Commons; the English losing but one Duke, one Earl, and 600 Souldiers. This unfortunate Prince lost what his Predecessor Philip the second had taken from King John of England, and had not been reftored by King Lewis the ninth.
- 1423 19 Charles VII. Son of Charles the sixth, after a long and bloody War, recovered from the English (then divided by domestick dissention) all their Lands and Signories in France, except Calice only.
- 1461 20 Lewis XI. son of Charles the seventh, added unto his Crown the Dukedom of Burgundy, the Earldom of Provence, (and therewithal a Title unto Naples and Sicily) and a great part of Picardy. A Prince of so great wants, or such sordid parsimony; that there is found a reckoning in the Chamber of Accompts in Paris of two shillings for new sleeves to his old doublet, and three half pence for liquor to greafe his Boots.
- 1484 21 Charles VIII. son of Lewis the 11th. who quickly won, and as soon lost the Kingdom of Naples; which he laid claim to in the right of the house of Anjou. By the marriage of Anne the heir of Bretagne, he added that Dukedom to his Crown.
- 1498 22 Lewis XII. son of Charles, and Grand-son of Lewis Dukes of Orleans, (which Lewis was a younger son of the fifth;) succeeded as the next heir-male of the house of Valois. He dispossessed Ludowick Sforze of the Dutchy of Milain, and divided the Realm of Naples with Ferdinand the Catholick; but held neither long. By his marriage with Anne of Bretagne, the Widow of his Predecessor, he confirmed that Dukedom to his House; united after to the Realm by an Act of State. After his death the English; to prevent the growing greatness of Spain, began to close in with the French, and grew into great correspondencies with them; insomuch that all the following Kings, until Lewis the 13th. (except Francis the second, a King of one year and no more) were all Knights of the Garter.
- 1515 23 Francis, Duke of Angouleme, Grandson of John of Angouleme, one of the younger Sons of the said Lewis Duke of Orleans, succeeded on the death of Lewis the twelfth, without issue male. Took Prisoner at the battel of Pavie, by Charles the fifth, with whom he held perpetual wars; he being as unwilling to endure a Superiour, as the Emperour was to admit an Equal. 32.
- 1547 24 Henry II. Son of Francis, recovered Calice from the English, and drove Charles out of Germany, and took from him Metz, Toul, and Verdun, three Imperial Cities; ever since Members of this Kingdom. 12.
- 1559 25 Francis II. son of Henry the second, King of the Scots also, in the right of Mary his wife.
- 1560 26 Charles IX. brother of Francis the second, the Author of the Massacre at Paris. 14.
- 1574 27 Henry III. elected King of Poland in the life of his brother, whom he succeeded at his death. The last King of the house of Valois, stripped of his life and Kingdom by the Guisan Faction, called the Holy League. 19.
- 1589 28 Henry IV. King of Navarre, and Duke of Vendosme, succeeded as the next heir-male to Henry the third, in the right of the house of Bourbon, descended from Robert Earl of Clermont, a younger son of Lewis the ninth. He ruined the Holy League, cleared France of the Spaniards, into which they had been called by that potent and rebellious Faction; and laid La Breff unto the Crown, together with the Estates of Bearn, and Base Navarre; and after a ten years time of peace, was villanously murdered by Ravillac, in the streets of Paris. 21.
- 1610 29 Lewis XIII. son of Henry the fourth, the most absolute King of France since the death of Charles the Great. For to the reduction of the scattered and dismembred Provinces (the work of his many Predecessors) he added the reduction of all the Ports and Garrisons held by the Hugonots in that Kingdom, (three hundred at the least in number) seized on the Dukedom of Bar, and surprized that of Lorraine, both which he held untill his death. 32.
- 1642 30 Lewis XIV. son of Lewis the thirteenth, and of the Lady Anne, eldest daughter of Philip the third of Spain, succeeded at the age of four years under the Government of his Mother: the 30th King of the Line of Capet, the 43d. from Charles the Great, and the 64th. King of France (or rather of the French) now living.

As for the Government of these Kings, it is merely Regal, or, to give it the true name, Despoticall; such as that of a Matter over his Servants: the Kings Will going for a Law, and his Edicts as valid as a Sentence

Sentence of the Court of Parliament. Quod Principi placuerit, Legis habet vigorem, was a Prerogative belonging to the Roman Emperours, as Justinian tells us in his Institutes: and the French Kings descending from Charles the Great, claim it as their own. The Kings Edicts always ending with these binding words, Car tel est nostre Plaisir, for such is our pleasure. And though he sometimes sends his Edicts to be verified, or approved, in the Parliament of Paris; and his Grants and Patents to be ratified in the Chamber of Accompts there holden: yet this is nothing but a meer formality, and point of circumstance; those Courts not daring to refuse what the King proposeth. It is Car tel est nostre Plaisir, which there goeth for Law. And by this intimation of his Royal Pleasure, doth he require such Taxes, as the necessity of his affairs, the greediness of his Officers, or the impurity of Suiters do suggest unto him: The Patrimony of the Crown being so exhausted by the riot and impvidence of former Princes, that the King hath no other way to maintain his State, defray his Garrisons, reward such as deserve well of him, and support those that depend upon him, but only by laying what he pleaseth on the backs of his Subjects; against which there is no dispute by the Common People, though many times the Great Princes have demurred upon it. And therefore to make them also instrumental to the publick slavery, the Kings are willing to admit them to some part of their spoyl, to give them some exemptions from those common burdens; and to connive at the oppressing of their Tenants, against all good conscience: that being so priviledged themselves, they may not interrupt the King in his Regal Courses.

As for the French Parliaments or Assembly of the three Estates, which heretofore were of great credit and renown, and looked on as the principal Bulwark of the publick liberty, being first discontinued by reason of the sharp and continual wars which the English made in this Kingdom for the space of 100 years and upwards, they afterward became much weakened by the policy of King Lewis the 11th, and the Kings succeeding, and finally by King Lewis the 13th. were laid by for ever. For finding them to retain something still of their ancient stomach, and apt enough to clash with that absolute Sovereignty which his Predecessors had attained to, he resolved to make no more use of them for the times to come; in stead whereof he ordained another kind of meeting, which he called La Assamblee des Nattables, that is to say, the Assembly of some principal men, composed of some selected persons out of every Order or Estate (of his own nomination) whereunto should be added some Counsellour out of every one of the eight Courts of Parliament; which being fewer in number would not breed such a confusion as the others did, and be withall more pliant and conformable to the Kings desires. Now the eight Courts of Parliament before mentioned, being but as so many Courts of Judicature, (like to ours in Westminster) are these that follow, that is to say, the Parliament 1 of Paris, comprehending the Countries of France special, Champagne, Picardy, the Provinces and estates of Anjou, La Beausse, Berry, Poitou, the Provinces which make up the Dukedom of Bourbon, with the Country of Limois; 2 of Rouen, for the Dukedom of Normandy; 3 of Renes, for the Dukedom of Bretagne; 4 of Bourdeaux, for the whole Dukedom of Aquitain, (except only Bearn) with the Countries of Limousin, and Perigot; 5 of Tholouse, for the Earldom of Languedoc, and Quercu; 6 of Aix, for the Earldom of Provence; 7 of Gremble for the Country of Dauphin; and 8 of Biajon, for the Dukedom of Burgundy and the small Country of La Breff; to which is added of late times by King Lewis the 13th. the little Parliament of Pau for the Country of Bearn. Besides which Parliaments, there are certain other Courts in some principal Cities, called Courts Presidial, resembling those with us at Tork, and the Marches of Wales whilest they continued in that power and jurisdiction, which at first they had. And for the better ordering of the whole estate (with reference especially to matters military) it is divided into 12 several and distinct Governments, that is to say, 1 of the Isle of France, 2 Burgundy, 3 Normandy, 4 Guien, 5 Bretagne, 6 Champagne, 7 Picardy, 8 Languedoc, 9 Provence, 10 Dauphine, 11 Lionois, and 12 Orleanois, for in this order they were ranked by the last King: over every one of which is placed a Governour with such authority as the Lords Lieutenants had in England in their several Counties; all of them carrying matters with a very high hand on the common people, and sometimes standing on terms also with the Kings themselves, but instrumental notwithstanding to the common servitude which hath been laid upon this Nation generally, as before it said.

The power of the French King over his Subjects being so transcendent, it cannot be, but that his Forces must be very great; and would be greater then they are, but that they dare not trust the common people with the use of Arms, for fear they should refuse to pay the accustomed Taxes, or forsake their Trades, or turn their Farms back upon their Landlords: But for an Essay of what a French King is able to do in this kind, it is said, that Charles the 9th. in Garrisons and several Armies in the field, had 15000 Horse, and 100000 Foot of his own Nation; besides 50000 Horse and Foot of Swisses, Germans, and others. Nor was this more then what was done by Lewis the 13th. within few years past, who had at once five Royal Armies in the field in Italy, Spain, Germany, and the Belgick Provinces; and kept no fewer then 120000 fighting men in pay and action for some years together. Nor did this last King keep up the military power of France for Land-service only at so high a pitch, but he also brought the Naval power thereof into estimation. For whereas the French Kings before his time were very weak and inconsiderable on the Seas, and had scarce any men of War but what they either hired or borrowed from more Seafaring Nations; this King became so strong in shipping in a little space (I doubt some neighbouring Princes in the mean time looked not well about them) that he was able to rig and arm 10000 sail of good Ships and upwards, fit for any service. But to return again to the power at land, in which the force of these Kings doth consist especially, it is conceived by some and affirmed by others, that he is able to bring into the field for a sudden service, no less than 60 Companies of Men of Arms, 20 Cornets of Light Horse, and five Companies of Harcubisers on Horse-back; which amount to 10000 in the total; together with 20 Ensigns of French Foot, and 40 of Swisses; and yet leave his Garrisons well manned, and his Fortis and Frontiers well and sufficiently defended.

What the Revenues are in a State so subject to the will and pleasure of the King, it is hard to say; being also more or less, as the times and their occasions vary: according unto which the Revenues of this Crown have much altered. Lewis the 11th. gathered one million and a half of Crowns; Francis the first brought them to 3 Millions, his successor Henry the second to six, Charles the ninth to seven, Henry the third to ten; afterwards they were increased to fifteen. And in the time of Henry the 4th. the Treasurer of the Duke of Mayenne did not shame to say, That his Master had more improved the Revenue of France, than any King had done before him, advancing it from two to five millions sterling. A fair Intrado, but far short of those infinite sums which are extorted from the People, whereof a tenth part comes not clearly to the Kings Exchequer. But what need more be said than that of Lewis the 11th. who used to say, That France was a Meadow which he mowed every year, and as often as he lifted: and indeed their Impositions cannot but be great, since there are no less than 30000 under-officers employed to gather them. Hence I believe sprung that wish of Maximilian the Emperour, which was, that he (if it were possible) might be a God; and that having two Sons, the eldest might be a God after him, and the second King of France. And this was also the cause, that in the Wars between Charles the fifth, and Francis the first, when the Emperours Herald had bid defiance to the King, from Charles Emperour of Germany, King of Castile, Leon, Aragon, and Naples, Archduke of Austria, &c. with the rest of his titles: the King commanded the Herald to return the challenge from Francis King of France; commanding him to repeat France as many times as the other had petty Earldoms in his title. And on the other side, of no less bravery and fanie was the saying of the Duke of Alva, who being dissuaded by one of his Commanders from the War with the Netherlands, in regard of the great support they were like to have from the Queen of England, the King of Denmark, the Dukes of Saxony and Brunswick, the Earls of Nassau, &c. Tush man (said he) there will be more Kings and Princes on our side than theirs, that is to say, the Emperour of Mexico and Peru, the Kings of Naples, Sicily, and Sardinia, the Dukes of Burgundy and Milain, the Earls of Halsburg, Charolais, &c. But letting pass these flashes and conceits of wit; certain it is (to say the truth) considering the compactedness thereof within it self, the admirable fertility of the soyl, the incredible multitudes of People, and the convenience of situation betwixt Spain, Italy, and Germany, the name of France might ballance all the others titles.

The chief Orders of Knighthood in this Kingdom, were first of the Gennet, founded by Charles Martel, Mayre of the French Palace: and so called, either from Jane his Wife, as Haillan would have it; or from the Gennets, of Spain, over whom he triumphed at the batel of Tours, as Bellay writeth. It ended in the dayes of S. Lewis. The Knights of the Order wore a Ring wherein was engraven the form of a Gennet.

2 Of the Pairrie or twelve Peers, so called, quasi pares inter se, said to be instituted by Charles the Great in his Wars against the Saracens. Six of these were of the Clergy. 1 The Archbishop and Duke of Rhemes, 2 the Bishop and Duke of Laon, 3 the Bishop and Duke of Langres, 4 the Bishop and Earl of Beauvois, 5 the Bishop and Earl of Noyon, and 6 the Bishop and Earl of Chalons; and six others of the Temporality; 1 the Duke of Burgundy, 2 Duke of Normandy, 3 Duke of Guienne, 4 Earl of Tholouse, 5 Earl of Champagne, 6 Earl of Flanders. These are they so much memoriz'd in the Legends of the old French Writers, but fallly, and on no ground: it being impossible that those should be of the foundation of Charles the Great, in whose time there were none of those Dukes and Earls, except the Earl of Tholouse only. Therefore with better reason it may be thus concluded on, that the Twelve Peers were instituted by Charles the Great, though that honour not by him appropriated unto any particular Estates and Titles; but left at large to be disposed of according to the personal merit of the best deservers: it being most sure, that neither Rowland nor Oliver, nor Duke Naimmes, nor Ogier the Dane, had any of the titles above mentioned. But for the fixing of this dignity in the Dukedoms and Earldoms before named, it is said by some to have been done by Hugh Capet; others refer it to Lewis the 7th. in whose times all those Dukes and Earls were in Rebus Natura. But by whomsoever first ordained, the Temporal Pairries are extinct; and others, of no definite number, created by the Kings, as they see occasion, to gratifie a well deserver. Only at Coronations, and such publick Triumphs, the custom is to choose some principal persons out of the Nobility to represent those Temporal Peers; as at the Coronation of Lewis the 13th. the places of the Temporal Peers were supplied by the Princes of Conde and Conty, the Earl of Soissons, the Dukes of Nevers, Elbeuf, and Espernon: the Ecclesiastical Peers remaining as at first they were. So that though Charles the Great might devise this Order, and institute the first Twelve Peers, as is commonly said; yet was not that high honour fixed in any of those Temporal Princes, till the times succeeding; but given to men of several houses, according to the Kings pleasure, and their well deservings.

3 Of the Star, begun by John King of France, Anno 1352. They wore about their necks a collar of Gold, at the which hanged a Star: the word, Monstrant Regibus astrum. This Order was disgraced by his Son Charles, in communicating it to his Guard: and so it ended.

4. Of St. Michael, instituted by King Lewis the eleventh, Anno 1149. It consisted first of 36 Knights, which afterwards were augmented to 300. The Habit of the Order was a long Cloak of white Damask down to the ground, with a border interwoven with Cockle shells of gold, interlaced and furred with Ermings; with an hood of crimson Velvet, and a long tipper. About their necks they wore a collar woven with Cockle-shells: the word, Immensi tremor Oceani. It took the name from the picture of St. Michael conquering the Devil, which was annexed to the collar. Some think, that the invocation of St. Michael, was in allusion to the tenth of Daniel. Others say, he took St. Michael, in regard of an apparition of that Saint, to his Father Charles the seventh, on Orleans Bridge in his Wars against the English. The Seat thereof was first at St. Michaels Mount in Normandy, a place which had held longest for the French Kings against the English; but it was afterwards removed to Bois de Vincennes, not far from Paris. St. Michaels day, the time of the Solemnity, and Mount St. Michael the name of the Herald which did attend upon the Order; which in most things was preceded by that of the Garret.

5. Of the Holy Ghost, ordained by Henry the third, Anno 1579. to rectifie the abuses which had crept into that of St. Michael, having been of late times given to unworthy persons: to reduce which to its first esteem, he ordered that the Collar of St. Michael should be given to none who had not first been dignified with this of the Holy Ghost; into which none to be admitted, but such as can prove their Nobility by three descents. Their Oath is to maintain the Romish Catholick Religion, and persecute all Opponents to it. Their Robe a black Velvet Mantle, powdered with Lillies and Flames of Gold: the Collar of Flower de Lyces, and Flames of gold, with a Crofs and a Dove appendant to it. And hereunto he gave the name of the Holy Ghost, because he was on a Whitsunday chosen King of Poland.

I omit the other petit Orders, as those of the Cock and Dog, by them of Montmorency; of the Porcupine, by them of Orleans; and of the Thistle, by them of Bourbon.

The Arms of the French Kings in the dayes of Pharamond and his three first Successors, were Gules, three Crowns, Or. Clovis the Great altered them to Azure, Seme of Flower de Lyces, Or; and Charles the sixth to Azure, 3 Flower de Lyces, Or. In which last changes they were followed by the Kings of England, varying the Coat of France, which they enquartered with their own, as the French Kings did; and by the Princes of the blood, who bare the Arms of France, with some difference only, for the distinction of their Houses.

unable to sustain great multitudes, but made more barren than it would be, for want of men to labour and manure the Land. And 6 and last of all, the Impotency of both Sexes for Generation; the men being generally more hot upon their lusts, than able for Generation; and the women for the most part beginning to be Mothers so extremely young, that nature is decay'd, and spent in them, before they have run half their course. And 'tis a most true and undoubted Maxime, that the greatness of Cities, and populousness of Kingdoms and Common-wealths, do much depend on the generative virtue of the men, and the nutritive virtue of the foyle in which they live.

It is situate in the more Southernly part of the Northern temperate Zone, and almost in the midst of the fourth and sixth Climates: the longest day being fifteen hours and a quarter in length, in the most Northern parts hereof; but in the extreme South near to Gibraltar, not above fourteen. Which situation of this Countrey rendreth the Air here very clear and calm, seldom obscured with mists and vapours, and not so much subject to diseases as more Northern Regions.

They are a mixt People, descending from the Goths, Moors, Jews, and the antient Spaniards. From the Jews they borrow Superstition, from the Moors Melancholy, Pride from the Goths, and from the old Spaniards the desire of Liberty. The Jews first planted here by the Emperor Adrian, who having totally banished them their Native Countrey, sent them thither to dwell: the total number of which Plantation is said to amount to 500000 men, women, and children; and yet their numbers much increased in the time of Uldor Ulet the great Caliph of the Sarazens, who having made a Conquest of Spain, sent thither 50000 Families of Moors and Jews, the better to assure it to him. And so they have the coming in of the Moors and Jews, the Conquest of it by the Goths, and their settling here, shall be shewn hereafter: which several Nations by long time, and intermarriages together, were at last incorporated into one. For their condition, it is said that they are highly conceited of themselves, great Braggards, and extremely proud, even in the lowest ebbe of Fortune. Which last appeareth by the tale of the poor Cocker on his death-bed, who (as Barkley in his Icon Animorum reporteth the story) commanded his eldest Son, coming to him for his last blessing, to endeavour to retain the majesty worthy so great a Family; Memineris (said he) in majestatem assurgere familia tua dignam. The same Author relateth another story to the like purpose. A woman of this Countrey attended on by three of her brats; went a begging from door to door. Some French Merchants travelling that way, and pitying her case, offered her to take into their service the bigger of her boys. But the proud, though poor, scorning, as she said, that any of her lineage should endure a Prentiship, returned this answer: Qui aut tu, aut ego, sciamus, in qua fata sit genitus? For ought see or any knew, her Son (simply as he stood there) might live to be King of Spain. Not much unlike to these is that tale of a Spanish Cavaliero, who being for some faults by him committed, whipped through the principal streets of Paris; and keeping a sober pace, was advised by a friend to make more haste, that he might the sooner be out of his pain: But he half in choler, replied, That he would not lose the least step of his pace, for all the whipping in Paris. For indeed their gate is Genet-wise, very stately and majestic.

Of temperate they are hot and dry, which makes them very much given to women, and yet not very able for Generation. And this strong inclination unto women which they find in themselves, makes them so jealous of their Wives, that they permit them not to walk abroad, but when they go to Church: and then too veiled and so hooded, one can hardly see them; and not that neither, but attended with their Damocels, and some truly she-friend, that is to give an account of them at their coming back. Mendoza, an Ambassador from Spain, in Queen Elizabeths time, used to find fault with the promiscuous sitting of men and women in the Church, used here in England; accounting it to be a very great incentive unto lasciviousness. To whom Doctor Dale, one of the Masters of the Requests, is said to have replied, that indeed in Spain, where the people even in the time of Divine Service could not abstain from impure thoughts, and unclean gestures, that mingled kind of sitting was not so allowable: but the English were of another temper, and did not find any inconvenience in it. And it is possible, this humour of jealousy might be derived on them from the Moors, who in the strict guarding of their women, were the Spaniards Tutors: it being death in Barbarie, to this very day, for any man to see one of the Xeriffes Concubines; and for them too, if when they see a man, though but through a casement, they do not presently cry out. A frenzie which much rageth in most Southern people, but not predominant in the Northern; who do not only suffer their Wives to sit with other men in the Church, but even in the open and common Bathes also; two things which a true Spaniard would rather die an hundred deaths, than give consent to. But though the women are not permitted to stir abroad, the men take liberty enough; and are as good smell-feasts as in any Countrey: it being observed of them by a very good Writer, that howsoever in their own houses they are temperate and content with little; yet when they go unto a Feast, they are as gluttonous, dainty, and delirous to make good cheer, as any people whatsoever.

But not to conceal their virtues, and make our selves merry at their follies, (wherein all other Nations have a share with them) they are unquestionably a people very grave in their carriages, in offices of piety very devout, and to their King very obedient; whose greatness they affect more cordially than any Subjects in the world: exact in doing justice upon all Offenders, which commonly they administer without partiality: indulgent unto one another, and of their duties to their betters not unmindful. But that which deserveth the greatest commendation in them, is an unwearied patience in suffering adversities, accompanied with a resolution to overcome them. A noble quality, of the which in their Indian Discoveries they shewed excellent proofs, and received as glorious rewards: withal, of very daring spirits, great undertakers for the most part, and to say truth, the greatest enlargers of their Dominions (according to the advantages of their situation) of any Nation under heaven. For having first either exterminated or subdued the Moors, which for many hundreds of years were possessed of this Continent, the Aragonians lying on the Mediterranean, added to their estate the Islands of Majorca, and Minorca, the Kingdoms of Sicilie, and Sardinia, and the Realm of Naples; the Castilians, lying on both sides of the Straits, first took in some of the opposite Towns on the coast of Africa, next conquered the Canaries or Fortunate Islands, and finally discovered and subdued the most part of America; the Portugals lying with a long Sea-coast on the Western Ocean, possessed themselves of the Azores, most of the Sea Towns of Morocco, and the land of Guinnia, and doubling the Cape of good hope made themselves Masters of many Ports and Islands of great consequence in the East-Indies, adding thereto in fine the large Countrey of Brazil in that part of America which lay fittest for them; and the Navarrois (to conclude) (though locked up by their greater neighbours from all trade at Sea, and consequently enlarging their Dominions that way) adding to their estates the most part of Gascogne, the Palatinate of Champagne, the Earldom of Eureux, with many fair and large possessions in the Realm of France thereupon depending.

In reference to the French, it is said that the French are wiser than they seem, and the Spaniards seem wiser than they are: wherein they agree with many particular men of other Nations, who according to the Philosopher, Sapientes potius cupiunt videri & non esse, quam esse & non videri.

In matters of war the Spaniards are observed to be generally too heavy, slow, and dull; the French too heady and precipitate; the one losing as many fair occasions by delays, as the other overthroweth by too much haste: but between them both they make one good fouldier; who according to the present opportunities, is to make use of the spur of courage, or the bit of respect. But of the strange and many differences in temper, humour and affections, between the Spaniards and the French, we have spoke more at large already when we were in France.

The Women are sober, loving their husbands or friends; wonderful delicate, curious in painting or perfuming; and though they have Wine in abundance, yet are they not permitted to drink it; verifying therein the old English Proverb, that none are worse food than the Woomakers wife. Herein worse condition than the Women of France, who though they are restrained from Wine before their marriage; yet after that they take what liberty they list, and are no more restrained from it than the other sex. But this is the least liberty, which the French Women have above the Spanish: these being so watched and over-looked, that it is hardly possible for them to hold speech with any man, in business of most importance, and much less in matters of civilities only; those having liberty to be courted at all times and places, even in the presence of their husbands, without any distrust or interruption. Heretofore they were wondrous strong, and beyond belief, patient of the throws of Childbed: Strabo relating how one of these women being hired for harvest work, and finding her travel come upon her, because she would not lose her dayes wages, withdrew her self into a bush; where being eased of her burden, she returned from one labour to another. And many of them at this day use not to keep their Chambers above three dayes after their delivery, and then apply themselves to their household business without either danger or delay.

The language is not the same in all places, though all called the Spanish. In Portugal, Catalogne, and some parts of Valencia, it hath a great mixture of the French; who in these parts have had much trade and negotiation. In Granada, and some parts of Andaluzia, it partakes much of the Moor; and in the Mountains of Alpujarras, the Arabic or Moorish language still remains in use. The Countreys bordering on the Pyrenees, and Cantabrian Ocean, (but Biscay specially) have much in them of the Language of the ancient Spaniards, before made subject to the Romans. That which is common to them all, is the vulgar Spanish or Castilian, and hath much affinity with the Latin; Breewood in his Enquiries reporting that he hath seen a letter, every word whereof was both good Latin and good Spanish. Merrila shews a Copy of the like, pag. 300. By reason of which consonancy with the Latine, the Spaniards call their Language, Romance. The other ingredients of this Tongue are generally the Gothish, Arabic, and old Spanish, and in some places the French also, as before is said; those people having made great conquests, and having had great negotiations in this Countrey. It is said to be a very lofty swelling speech, as if it were fashioned to command.

And as their Language, so their Laws do owe a great part of themselves to the Laws of Rome: the Civil or Imperial Laws being generally used amongst them, but intermixt with many customs of the Goths, and the Edicts or constitutions of their several Kings. Those of the Goths being first committed unto writing, and reduced to order by Euricus the first King of the Goths in Spain: those of Castile digested by the command of Ferdinand the third, Anno 1296. into seven Books called the Partidas; not finished till the time of his son Alonso. Leges Hispaniarum quas Partitas vocant, in volumen rededit, as Tarapha hath told us of him in his Spanish History. The like done by King James the first for the Realm of Aragon, An. 1248. respectively confirmed and ratified by the Kings succeeding. Authorized to be read and disputed on in the publick Schools, as well as the Decretals, the Code, the Pandects, or any other part of the Civil or Canon Laws.

The Soil hereof, where it is fertile and productive of the fruits of Nature, yields not to any part of Europe, for delight, pleasures, and commodities; which here appear in greater ripeness and perfection than in other places. But for the most part, it is either overgrown with Woods, cumbered with wilde and rocky Mountains, or of so hot a nature, and so sandy withal, that it is not very fit for tillage; and so deficient in Water, as not good for Pasturage. So that we may affirm thereof, as of the Figs in the Prophet Jeremie, where it is good, no Countrey better; where bad and barren, few so inconvenient, and not any worse. But this defect of outward beauty and Commodities, is recompensed by those within ; affording great plenty of Mines, both of Steel and Iron, and some Mines of Silver : of which last to abundant in preceeding times, that it was never free from the Rovers of all Nations ; and it is said of Anibal, that out of one Mine only in the Countrey of the Turdetani (now part of Andaluzia) he received 3000 pound weight daily, for long time together. The principal commodities which they vend into other Countreys, are Wines, Oyl, Sugars, Metals, Rice, Silk, Licoras, a fine sort of Wool, Cork, Rolin, Limmons, Raisins, Oranges, and fruits of the like nature. In Corn, which is the staff of life, they are so defective, that they receive the greatest part of what they spend from Italie, Sicilie, and France. Their Cattel neither fair nor many, the Countrey being not able to breed them, so that their Diet is on Salads, and fruits of the Earth ; every Gentleman being limited what flesh he shall buy for himself and his Family : which if he fend for to the Butcher, or Poulterer by the smallest child, able to do the Errand for him ; he is sure not to be defrauded in price, or quality. And yet they talk as highly of their gallant fare, as if they surfeited with the plenty of all provisions : handsomely checked in that fond humour, by that worthy Souldier Sir Roger Williams. Of whom it is said, that hearing once a Spaniard thus foolishly bragging of his Countrey salads, he gave him this answer, You have indeed good sawce in Spain, but we have dainty Beefs, Veals, and Muttons to eat with that sawce ; and as God made beasts to live upon the grafs of the earth, so he made men to live upon them. And it is observ'd, that if a Spaniard have a Capon, or the like good dish to his Supper, you shall find all the feathers scattered before his door by the next morning.

And as it is in private houses, so for travelling also, the Innes and Vents of this Countrey are very ill provided : infomuch, that most men that would not go supperless to sleep, carry their provision at their saddle bows ; and men of worth, their bedding also. So poor and mean is the entertainment in these places.

Here lived in ancient times the Giants Geryon, and Cacus, which were quell'd by Hercules : and in the flourishing of the Roman Empire, 1 Seneca the Tragician, and 2 the Philosopher of the same name ; a man of that happy memory, that he could repeat 2000 names in the same order that they were rehearsed : as also 3 Quintilian the Oratour, 4 Lucan, and 5 Martial, excellent in their kinds, 6 Pomponius Mela the Geographer, 7 Trogus Pompeius, with his Epitomator, 8 Justin, and 9 Paulus Orosius the Historian, this last a Christian. In the middle times 10 Isidore Bishop of Sevil, 11 Julian, and 12 Hildefonsus Bishops of Toledo ; and after them Eulogius the Saint and Martyr, men learned for the times they lived in. Then for the later Ages, 1 The renowned Cardinal Francis Ximenes, and 2 Arias Montanus, famous for the Editions of the holy Bible ; 3 Mafius, a learned Commentator ; 4 Ojovius, well seen in the Latine elegancies : and before all, as well in industry as time, 5 Tostatus Bishop of Avila, a man so copious and industrious in his writings, that it is thought he writ more sheets than he lived dayes. But of late times we finde but few of their Works which have passed the Mountains, the Latine which they write being very coarse, and favouring too much of the Schoolman, (wherein their excellency consists) and therefore they set out their Works most commonly in their own tongue only. The chief for Souldiery amongst them were formerly Viriathus, who held out so long against the Romans ; Trajan and Theodosius, both Roman Emperours ; Theodoric the second, King of the Goths, the victorious Conquerour of the Suevians ; Bernardo del Carpio, and Cid Ruis Diaz, famous for their achievements against the Moors : and in late times, Gonsalvo the Great Captain, who subdued Naples ; Ferdinand Duke of Alva, who conquered Portugal, &c.

The Christian Faith, if we may believe the old Spanish Tradition, was first here planted by S. James the Apostle, within four years after the death our Redeemer. To which Tradition, though they held very constant a long time together ; yet of late dayes, Baronius, and other learned men of the Church of Rome, do most deservedly reject it. That St. Paul had a purpose of coming hither, is evident in his 15 Chapter to the Romans : and that he did come hither accordingly, is positively affirmed by S. Chrysostom, Theodoret, and divers others of the Fathers ; which was in Anno 61. as Baronius thinketh. Nor did St. Peter want his part in this great service, but joyned with St. Paul, though not in the journey, yet in the sending of Bishops and others Presbyters, to second the beginnings made by that Apostle. For it is said expressly in the Martyrologies, that Ctesiphon, Torquatus, Secundus, Cecilius, Judaetius, Hefychius, and Euphrasius, being at Rome ordained Bishops by the two Apostles, ad predicandum verbum Dei in Hispanias directi, were dispatched into Spain to preach the Gospel. Bishops most likely, of those Cities where they suffered death, the names of which occur in the Martyrologie. Under the Empire of the Goths, the faith of CHRIST, which at their coming hither they found right and Orthodox, was defiled with Arianism : not ejured till the year 588. when that whole Nation did submit to more Catholic tendencies. But Spain being conquered by the Moors under the conduct of Musa Lieutenant General to Uliad the Arabian Caliph, and Mahometanism overpreparing the whole face of the Countrey : such Christians as remained under their obedience, but few and inconsiderable both for power and quality, had the name of Musarabes. Increasing in estate and numbers by the fortunate successes of the King of Leon and Navarre, and other Christian Principalities growing up apace ; they still retaining their old name and their ancient services, distinct from that observed in the Church of Rome : this being called the Musarabique, the other the Gregorian Missal ; the one pretending S. Isidore Archb. of Sevil, the other S. Gregorie Pope of Rome, for the Author of it. And it continued in this State, till the taking of the City and Kingdom of Toledo by Alfonso King of Castile and Leon, Anno 1083. At what time Bernard a French man being made Archbishop of that City and Primate of Spain, endeavoured the introduction of the Roman or Gregorian Service ; but therein was opposed by the other Prelates, and generally by all the Bishops, sufficiently tenacious of their ancient Forms. At last it was concluded (as the story telleth us) to commit the decision of the Controversie to a fiery trial : both Books being being cast into the fire, the Gregorian leaping presently out, and the Musarabique remaining unhurt in the midst of the flames. Convinced by this experiment that both Forms were pleasing to Almighty God, they yielded so far to the desires of the King (who was zealous in it) that the Musarabique being retained in six of the Churches of Toledo (where it is sung to this day in a Chappel of the Great Church, called Corpus Domini) the Gregorian or Roman Service should be entertained in the rest of Spain. According unto which decree the Musarabique (but not until some tract of time) came to be disused : and the Gregorian Service first admitted in the Cathedral of Toledo, May 29. An. 1091. and after by degrees in the rest of the Countrey.

Since that they have been constant to the Rites of the Roman Church, and of the Faith and Doctrine therein professed, notwithstanding the great intermixture of Jews and Moors ; especially since the setting up of the Inquisition : devised at first about the year 1478. by Pedro Gonfalez de Mendoza, Archbishop of Toledo, against such converted Jews and Moors as did return again to their superstition. But he and those that had the first execution of it, being found so cruel, that in the compass of nine years, no fewer than 3000 Families had been destroyed in that Diocese only ; in the year 1481. it was thought fit to moderate the rigour of it, and to commit the managing thereof to some Jacobins or Dominical Friars ; who in the first place were to have an eye unto such Apostates, and to Hereticks, Magicians, Sodomites, Blasphemers of the name of God, &c. Confirmed in this Authority by Pope Sixtus the 4th. This institution in it self was not only necessary (as the condition of affairs then was) but exceeding laudable, had it been kept within the bounds at first intended. But of late in stead of being used on the Jews and Moors, it hath been turned upon the Protestants, and that with such violence and extremity of torture, that it is counted the greatest tyranny and severest kind of persecution under heaven : infomuch that many Papists would willingly die for their Religion, abhor the very name and mention of it, and to the death withstand the bringing in of this slavery among them. This is it that made the people of Aragon and Naples rebel ; Countreys where the people are all of the Papal side : and this was it which caused the irredeemable revolt of the Low Countrey, the greatest part of that Nation at the time of their taking Arms being Romish Catholics ; yet it is planted and established in Spain and all Italy (Naples and Venice excepted) the managing thereof committed to the most zealous and rigorous Friars in the whole pack ; the least suspicion of heresie, affinity or commerce with Hereticks, reproving the lives of the Clergy, keeping any Books, or Editions of Books prohibited, or discouraging in matters of Religion, are offences sufficient. Nay they will charge mens Consciences under pain of damnation, to detect their nearest and dearest Friends, if they do but suspect them to be herein culpable. Their proceedings are with great secrecy and severity : For first, the parties accused shall never know their accuser, but shall be constrained to reveal their own thoughts and affections. 2 If they be but convinced of any error in any of their opinions, or be gainfayed by two witnesses, they are immediately condemned. 3 If nothing can be proved against them, yet shall they with infinite tortures and miseries be kept in the house divers years, for a terror unto others. And fourthly, if they escape the first brunt with many torments, and much anguish ; yet the second questioning or suspicion brings death remediless. And as for torments and kinds of death, Phalaris and his fellow Tyrants come far short of these Blood-hounds.

The administration of this office, for the more orderly Reglement and dispatch thereof distributed into twelve Courts, or supreme Tribunals, for the several Provinces of Spain ; no one depending on another, but in some sort subordinate to the general Inquisition, remaining in the Court near the Kings person, which hath a kind of superintendency over those Tribunals : in all of which those of the secular Clergy sit as Judges, the Friars being only used as Promoters to inform the Court, and bring more Grift unto the Mill. Of these Inquisitors every one hath the title of Lord, and are a great terror to the neighbouring Peasants. There goeth a Tale, how one of their Lordships, desirous to eat of the Pears which grew in a poor mans Orchard, not far off, sent for the man to come unto him, which put the poor soul into such a fright, that he fell sick upon it, and kept his bed : Being afterwards informed that all his Lordships business with him, was to request a dish of Pears, he pulled up the tree by the roots, and carried it unto him with the fruit upon it. And when he was demanded the reason of that rash and improvident action, he returned this answer, That he would never keep that thing in his house, which should give any of their Lordships cause to send further after him. Certain it is that by this means the people of this Kingdom are so kept under, that they dare not hearken after any other Religion, than what their Priests and Friars shall be pleased to teach them, or entertain the truth if it come amongst them, or call in question any of those palpable and gross impostures which every day are put upon them.

For by this means the people of this Kingdom have been and still are punctual followers of the Church of Rome, and that too in the very errors and corruptions of it ; taking up their Religion on the Popes authority : and therein so tenacious or pertinacious, that the King doth suffer none to live in his Dominions, which profess not the Roman Catholic Religion. Of which they have been, since the times of Luther, such avowed Patrons, that one of the late Popes being sick, and hearing divers men to moan his approaching end, uttered some words to this effect : My life (said he) can nothing benefit the Church, but pray for the prosperity of the King of Spain, as its chief Supporter. And though he spoke these words of King Philip the 2d, yet they hold good in his Successors ever since ; being esteemed the greatest Patrons and Protectors of the Catholic Cause : Which is indeed the proper interests of this King. For seeing that they have framed to themselves an hope of the Western Monarchy ; and finding no fitter means of enlarging their own Temporal, than by concurring with the Pope in upholding his Spiritual Empire, they have linked themselves most fast to that See. To which end, they have taken upon them, to be the Executioners of the Popes Excommunications, by which Office Erasmus and the Catholic surprized Navarre; nor without hope of working the like effect, in some course of time, on the rest of the interdicted Estates of Europe; as may be seen, by the eager following of the French War against Henry the 4th, till he had reconciled himself to the Church of Rome; and the like War managed for many years together, against Queen Elizabeth of England. And the pursuit of this Spanish Monarchy is so hotly followed by the Jesuits, who in all their persuasions speak not more of one God, or of one Pope, than they do of one King; that they hold it forth for the only means to unite the differences of the Church, and subdue that great enemy of Religion, the Turk. Nor is this only a Conjecture, or a project of the Jesuits only, but a design avowed and declared in Print, that all the World may take notice of it: and that too in a Book not only licensed by the Provincial of the Dominicans, and the supreme Council of the Inquisition; but by order from the Lords of the Council, with the Kings Privilege and Commendation prefix before it. The Book entituled, La Conventencia de los dos Monarquias Catholicas, &c. The agreement of the two Catholic Monarchies of Rome and Spain; set out in the year 1612. by one John de Puente. In the Frontispiece whereof are set two Scutcheons, the one bearing the Cross-Keys of Rome, the other the Arms of Castile and Leon; In Vinculo pacis for the Motto. On the one side of this there is a Portraiture representing Rome, with the Sun shining over it, and darting his Beams upon the Keys, with this Inscription, Luminare majus ut præsint Orbis & Urbis, the Greater light to govern the City and the World. On the other side, another Image designing Spain, with the Moon shining over that, and darting her Rays on the Spanish Scutcheon, with this Impres; Luminare minus ut subdat Orbis & dominetur Orbis, i. e. The lesser light made to be subject to the City, (understand of Rome) but to govern all the World besides. Over all in the top of the Front or Title-page, in Capital Letters, Fecit Deus duo Luminaria magna, God made two great Lights. The whole Book being an indifferent large Folio, is but a Comment on this Text; which for substance contained wholly in the Frontispiece, but more at large discoursed of in the Volum itself; and plainly shews what is intended, and by whom. And yet perhaps the Pope and the Jesuits both, may fail in that which is the main of their expectation: and if the project take effect, the Spaniard will then write himself Luminare majus, and make the Pope content with Luminare minus, for his part of the spoil; and glad to borrow all his light from the Sun of Spain. For though the Kingdom of Spain, and Popedom of Rome be thus straitly combined, yet herein the Popes have overthor themselves; in that leaning so much to the Spaniard, and so immoderately increasing his dominion, they do in a manner stand at his devotion; and may peradventure in the end, be forced to cast themselves into his arms as their good Lord and Master. For certain it is, that the Spanish Agents have openly braved the Cardinals, and told them, That they hoped to see the day, wherein the King should offer the Pope half a dozen to be made Cardinals, and he not dare to refuse any, and that they themselves should choose one Pope, but one of their Masters naming. So great an inconvenience it is, more than possible it may be to the Popes, in making this Prince the one and only string to their bow; and fastning the dependencies of his Roman Catholicity upon him alone, excluding France and all the other Kings in Christendom, of the Romish party, from the honour of it. And yet so firm they are to their Spanish Principles, that no favours granted to their persons, or Religion, are of value with them, or thought worthy of their acceptance; if it come from any other Fountain of Grace than the Court of Spain. Inasmuch as I have heard from a great Minister of State, that when some favours were obtained for the English Papists, on the treaty of the Match with Spain; they were ready with great greediness to embrace the same. But when the same favours were obtained for them on the Treaty with France, not a man of them would accept them. For which some of their Chiefs being asked the reason, returned this answer, That by applying themselves to the French, they might lose the Spaniard; and it were great improvidence in them, to change an old and constant Friend, who had never failed them, for one of whose affections they had no assurance; and such a one as by tolerating Heretics in his own Dominions, shewed that he was no fit Patron for the Catholic to rely upon.

The chief Rivers are, 1 Tagus, celebrated for his Golden Sands; of which the Scepter of the old Kings of Portugal is affirmed by some Writers to be made, but I have not Faith enough to believe the same. The lead of it is in the Mountain Seira Molina near to Cuenca; from the which it runneth by the City Toledo; and then smoothly gliding by the Walls of Lisbon, doth pay his tribute to the Western Ocean. 2 Ana, (now Guadiana) which arising about the same place, runneth afterward under the ground, the space of 15 miles: and hence the Spaniards use to brag, that they have a Bridge, whereon 10000 Cattle daily feed. An accident common to many other Rivers, as to Mole, a small River in Surrey; Erasmus in Greece; and Lycus, in Anatolia; of which last thus Ovid:

Existit præsent hinc, alioque renascitur ore.*

So Lycus, swallowed by the gaping ground,
At a new mouth, far off, is rising found.

But having gotten up again, it loseth it self without recovery in the Western Ocean; on the South of Portugal, which it separated from Extremadura. 3 Batis, now called Guadalquivir (which in the Arabic Language signifieth a great River) ariseth out of the Mountains of Sierra Morena; and passing by Corduba, and Sevil, disburdeneth it self into the Southern Ocean, at the Haven of S. Lucar de Barameda. 4 Iberus, which having its head amongst the Mountains of Biscay, passeth on Eastwards by Saragossa, and Tortosa, into the Mediterranean: the whole course thereof being 460 miles, of which it is navigable 200. A River of such note in the time of the Romans, that it divided this whole Countrey into Citeriorem, and Alteriorem; of which more anon. 5 Duerus, which rising in the same Mountains passeth through Portugal, and so unto the Western or Atlantic Ocean. 6 Minus, of which more in Portugal.

Chief Mountains next unto the Pyrenæes spoken of before, 1 The Cantabrian Mountains, called by Pliny, Juga Alpurnum; which rising out of a spur or branch of the Pyrenæes, overpread the Provinces of Biscay, Asturia, and Gallicia (coasting along the shores of the Cantabrian Ocean) where at last they end. 2 Idubeda, Jubala, or Aurantiis Saltus, so called by Pliny, and others of the ancient Writers; which beginning not far from the head of the River Iberus, followeth the course of that River by the City of Burgos, and endeth not far from the influx of it into the Mediterranean. 3 Sierra Morena, by Cæsar called Salus Castulonensis; and Mons Mariannus by Pliny; which beginning about the Town Alicoraz, coasteth along the right-hand shores of the River Batis, to the Southern Seas. 4 Sierra Nevada, by Pliny called Mons Ilipulus, and Orospe by Strabo, but by the *Moor*s the Mountains of Alpharax. A chain of hills which thwart the Kingdom of Granada, from East to West; and amongst which the people, to this day, speak the Arabic tongue.

The Countrey is said to have been inhabited by Tubal, the Son of Japhet. Of whom it is affirmed in the Berosus of Frier Annus, and by such Chronologers as he hath imposed on by the name of that Author; that in the twelfth year of Nimrod, which was 140 years after the Flood, he seated himself in the Asturia, part of Spain, and there built the Town of S. Irvil. A device so foolish and absurd, that it is not to be honoured with a confutation: for either Tubal, must come hither by Sea or by Land. If by Land, then must he in the compass of a year or two, travel not less than 4000 miles (for so far it is at least from Biscay to the valley of Shinar) with women and children; through most unpassable Woods and Mountains: which no understanding man can give belief to. If by Sea, besides the short time he had to provide shipping for so great a company, and so long a voyage, nothing is more improbable to a sober man, than that he should leave Italy and Africa upon either hand; or pretermitt the opportunity of possessing Valentia, Andalusia, Portugal, being fruitful Countries; to fix himself in the most mountainous, woody, and barren Province of all this Continent. Yet most of our Berosians are so confident in it, that they make him the first King of Spain, from whom to Gargarus Melicola, they numbred 25 Kings more, who lasted 988 years: the chief of which are said to be, 1 Hesperus, who subduing also Italy, named both Countreys Hesperia: but so, that Italy was called Hesperia the greater; and Spain, Hesperia the less. 2 Hispantus, whence they conceit the name of Hispantia to be derived. 3 Tagus, 4 Batis, and 5 Anus, whence the three Rivers in Spain, so called, must by all means derive their names. 6 Idubeda, Godfather, no doubt, to the great Mountain so named. 7 Scileus, from whom the Isle of Sicily is said to take denomination. 8 Hispalis, who is reported to have built the City, Sevil, or Hispalis. 9 Brigus, the Founder of Flavio Brigis, and other Towns ending in Briga. 10 Lufus, who gave name to Lusitania, now Portugal. The Catalogue of which Kings I desire no man to believe farther, than that of our own State from Brunus to Cassibeline. A Catalogue so ill contrived, that whereas Justin speaks of Halus, and Herodotus of Arganthonius; Macrobius of Heron, and Plutarch of Indibilia; all Kings of Spain; none of all these are mentioned in it. So that the coming of Tubal (in person) hither is a silly vanity; though we deny not but the Spaniards, or some Nations of them, may derive their Pedegree from Tubal, as being the descendants of the Iberi, whom Jesephus saith to have been anciently called Thobelos: a name in which are all the Radical Letters of Tubal, and which differeth not much from it in sound. For somewhat before the supposed time of Gargarus Melicola, the Iberians are said to come in under Pannus: divided after his decease amongst many petit Kings and Princes, for the space of 900 and odd years, even till the first Attempts which the Carthaginians made upon it: who found here no such Universal or Supreme Monarch, as the Berosian Fables dream of. During which time, we finde nothing more observable and certain in the story of it, than the planting of Colonies on the Sea-coasts by divers Nations, according to the Custom of those elder times. Of which fort were the Towns of Emporia, and Dianium, founded by the Messians; Saguntum, by the Zacynthi, or people of Zant; Rhode, by the Rhodiens, as some think; the City and Isle of Gades, planted by the Tyrians, who after spread themselves over all the coasts of Andalusia. The first that came in bodies hither, in the way of Conquest, were the Celts, a great and potent Nation of Gaul; who mixing themselves with the Iberi, caused the whole Countrey to be called Celtiberia: but the time when they came into it, is very uncertain. Of the invasion of it by the Carthaginians, there is greater certainty. Who being beaten out of Sicily by the conquering Romans, An. V. C. 512. and not daring to look any more that way, bended their Forces to the West; and passing through the Straights of Gibraltar, by the Isle of Gades (their own long before) landed in Spain, under the conduct of Amilcar, the Father of Annibal, four years after the loss of Sicily. In less than 20 years following, Amilcar, Annibal his Son-in-law, and Annibal the Son of Amilcar, had made almost all Spain subject to the Carthaginians, even from the Western Ocean to the Pyrenæes; destroyed Saguntum, built new Carthage, and strook to great a terrour into all the Countrey, that had not Annibals design carried him to Italy. The State of Carthage had been absolute Masters of it without further opposition or resistance. But Annibal having taken all his old Souldiers with him; and those that came from Carthage to command in chief, not being men of parts sufficient to go through with it; they lost it piece-meal to the Romans, but in less time then they had been getting it from the Spaniards; the valour and good fortune of Corn. Scipio, over-ruling the declining power of that mighty State. The last that here commanded for the State of Carthage was Asdrubal the Son of Gisgo; who being beaten by Scipio into the Island of Gades, left that also to the keeping of Mago, one of his Commanders; by whom being pillaged and deserted, it forthwith yielded to the Romans; the Carthaginians after this never possessing foot of ground in all this Continent.

The Romans thus becoming Masters of a great part of it, divided it into Ultiorem, lying from the River Iberia Westward, because the furthest off from them; and Citeriorem, between the said River, and the Pyrenees. But having totally subdued it, they divided it into three main parts, 1 Tarraconensis, so called of Tarragon, the chief City of it, containing Aragon, Navarre, Biscay, Gallicia, &c. 2 Betanicam, so named of the River Betis, which runneth through it, comprehending the now Countreys of Granada, Andalusia, and part of Extremadura. 3 Lusitanicam, denominated from the Lusitani, the most potent people of that part, differing in extent from the present Portugal, (though this called Lusitania by our modern Latinists.) For the old Lusitani comprehended part of Extremadura, and some part of the two Castiles; and no more of the present Portugal, than what lieth betwixt the two Rivers, Ana and Duero: that on the South of Ana being laid to Betia; and that on the North of Duero, unto Tarraconensis. Of these three parts, Betia was in most esteem under the Romans; inasmuch, that it contained 8 Roman Colonies, 8 Municipal Cities, and 29 other Towns, endued with the rights and privileges of the Latins. The reason thereof was, that the people of this Countrey having been formerly broken by the Carthaginians, with more quiet endured the yoke of the Romans; whereas the rest, for a long time relisted the entry and Empire of that prevailing City. But to proceed to the affairs of Rome in Spain, Scipio Africanus laid the first foundation of the Roman Government in this Countrey: which building, though undertaken by many excellent work-men, was not thoroughly finished till the dayes of Augustus, being almost 200 years since the first attempt. He roofed it, strengthened it, and made it a principal building in his Monarchical City. For the old Incole were exceeding valiant and resolute, sometimes disgracing, sometimes endangering the Roman reputation; inasmuch that there were more Commanders lost in those wars, than any other. At first the Romans fought not with the Spaniards, but with the Carthaginians in Spain: then perished both the Scipio's, viz. The Father and the Uncle of Africanus. Virtatibus held war for 20 years, Nimantia held out almost 15, the Astures remained unconquered till the time of Augustus; and also resolutely maintained their particular liberties, Ut dijudicari non poterat (saith Paterculus) Hispanis an Romanis plus esset in armis roboris, & inter populus alteri paritarius foret. Such manner of men were the ancient Spaniards under Rome, and Carthage; the first people of the Continent of Europe (excepting Italy) on which the Romans did begin to enlarge their Empire; and the last that wholly were subdued and conquered by them. But being conquered at the last, and brought under the form of a Province by Augustus Caesar; it was governed by their Proconsuls, Prators, and other Magistrates, according to the division before-mentioned. But Constantine the Great in his new modelling of the Empire, laying some part of Africa to it, made it a Diocese of the Empire; and subject to the Præfatus Prætorio for Gaul, by whose Vicarius it was governed: the whole being then divided into these seven Provinces, viz. 1 Betia, 2 Lusitania, bounded as before; 3 Gallicia, containing the modern Gallicia, Leon, and Oviedo, the greatest part of the Old Castile, and so much of Portugal as lieth betwixt the two Rivers of Minio and Duero. 4 Carthaginensis, so called from the City of New Carthage, comprehending New Castile, Murcia, and Valencia; with part of the Old Castile, Aragon, and Andalusia. 5 Tarraconensis, embracing all Biscay, Navarre, and Catalogne, with the greatest part of the Kingdom of Aragon. 6 Tingitana, so called from Tingis (now Tangier) a Town of Africa, on the opposite Coast, in which are now the great Kingdoms of Fesse and Morocco. And 7 the Province of the Islands, containing Majorca, Minorca, Ebusa, and Frumentaria. Of which seven Provinces, the three first were Consulares, governed by Proconsuls; the other four from their being under Præsidents were called Præfidiariv. Being thus settled, it continued a Roman Diocese till about the year 400, when it was subdued by Gundericus, King of the Vandals; of which people, their beginning, achievements, and final Period, we will speak more when we come to Africa, where they fixed themselves: invited thereunto, partly to eschew the ill-neighbourhood of the Goths, who began to grow too potent for them; and partly to satisfy the desires of Boniface, Governor of that Province for the Emperor Valentinian the third, against whom he had then rebelled, and wanted such support to make good his action. These being gone, the Suevi and Alani, who entred with them, could not long subsist; but were finally broken by the Goths, and afterwards dispossessed of their Kingdoms also, (though suffered to remain in the Countrey still) as shall be shewn hereafter in its proper place. As for the Goths (of whom we shall speak more in Sweden, and have already made some mention when we were in Gaul) having sacked Rome, and wasted Italy, under the conduct of Alaric; they were bought out of that Countrey by the gift of Narbonensis in Gaul, and so much of Tarraconensis in Spain as now makes up the Province of Catalogne: the compulsion being ratified by the marriage of Albaufus, the Successor of Alaric with Placidia, Sister to Honorius the Western Emperor. Vallia, or Wallia, the next of name and note (for Sigeric who interposed, reigned but one year only, and did nothing in it) Successor of Albaufus, having beaten the Alani out of Lusitania and Carthaginensis, added those Provinces also unto his Estates, and confined the Vandals within Betia, was the first of the Goths which entituled himself King of the Goths in Spain. By their Agreement with the Romans, they were to keep those Provinces for the use of the Empire, which they did conquer and recover from the barbarous Nations: but contrary to all Faith, and the Articles of their Agreement, having once beaten the Alani out of Lusitania, by the prowess of Vallia, and the Suevi out of Betia, under the conduct of Theodorick, the Brother of Torismund, they fell upon the Romans themselves; whom Enri- cni, and his Successors, by little and little, dispossessed of all Spain on this side of the Straights. Tingitana held out longest, as furthest off, unfortunately attempted by Theudes the ninth King of the Goths; whose Souldiers being set upon by the Romans on the Lords day, or Sunday; refused to fight in their own defence; and were so miserably defeated, that there was never a man of them left to carry news of the overthrow. So early did the Superstition of a Lords day Sabbath prevail upon this melancholick and devout people. But what this Theudes could not do; was performed by Suintilla; who in the short time of his Reign, An. 642. made the Conquest absolute.

Let us next look upon the Goths as Lords of Spain; and we shall find them to have been Christians in Religion; and somewhat civilized by their long neighbourhood and conversation with the Gracians, before they turned their Forces into the West. Their company more desired in this respect than that of the Vandals; who were not only Pagans, but far more barbarous. But these Goths being for long time of the Arian Faction, did grievously afflict and persecute the Orthodox Prelates: continuing in this error till the death Leongild (or Lentigildus as some call him) the last Patron and Assessor of it. Their Government Monarchical, but the Kings Elective, (though for the most part they kept themselves to the Regal Family:) an Excommunication being laid on such, by the fifth Council of Toledo, as went about to alter that established course. Their Rule of Government was Custom, and that not left in writing, but committed to Memory and Tradition: written Laws being first made by Enricus, which the ensuing Princes confirmed and perfected: What else concerneth them, we shall find in the close of this Catalogue of

			716	31	Roderick, the last King of the Gothes in Spain, elected to the prejudice of the Sons of Vitiza, which after proved the ruin and overthrow of the Kingdom. For though the Kingdom went for the most part by Election, and that they had respect to the next of blood, (as at this time in Poland, and Bohemia) very few interlopers being here admitted: yet some there were, who either by their merit, or some opportunity, got the possession of the Kingdom; though not at all relating to the Royal Family. Of which kind were Theudes; an Osro-Goth, sometimes the Governour hereof for Theodorick King of the Goths in Italy, Protector of this Kingdom, in the minority of Amalaric; and Theudeslaus, or Theudegislaus, Nephew to Totila, one of the Successors to Theodorick. The rest of principal note were, 1 Theodorick the first; slain in the battel near Tholouze against Attila the Hunn; in defence of his own Countreys, and the Roman Empire. 2 Theodorick the second, who beat the Nation of the Suevi out of Betia; and 3 Leongild or Lentigilde, who deprived them of Gallicia also. 4 Reccaredus the first, who first embraced the Catholic Doctrine of the Church, and rejected Arianisme; and for that cause first honoured with the title of the Catholic King; afterwards resumed by Alfonfus the first King of Leon, and made hereditary by Ferdinand the King of Castile, Aragon, &c. Grandfather unto Charles the fifth: Enricus, or Henricus as some call him, as remarkable for Civil Polity, as Reccaredus for piety: as being the Lycurgus or Legislator of this people, nor governed till his time by a written Law, but either by uncertain customs, or at the pleasure of such Officers as the Kings set over them. 5 Suintilla, Son of Reccaredus the second, who having in the short time of his Reign expelled the Roman Forces out of Tingitana, An. 642. was the first Monarch of all Spain, whereof Tingitana (though on the other side of the Sea) had been made a Province by the Emperour Constantine, as before was said. And of this Province was Julianus Governour in the time of Roderick, who being of the Faction of the sons of Vitiza, stomacked his advancement to the Kingdom; and thereby got the greater portion of the Kings displeasure; Who sending him upon an Embassy to the Moors of Africa; in the mean time dissembled his Daughter named Cava: which the Father took in such indignation, that he procured the Moors (amongst whom he had gotten much credit) to come over into Spain. This request they performed under the conduct of Musa and Tariffe; and having made a full Conquest, subjected it to the great Caliphs or Mahometan Emperours: It is recorded in a MS. History of the Saracens, that at the first coming of Tariffe into Spain, a poor woman of the Countrey being willingly taken Prisoner, fell down at his feet, kissed them, and told him, that she had heard her Father (who was lettered) say; that Spain should be conquered by a people whose General should have a Mole on his right shoulder; and

and in whom one of his hands should be longer than the other. He, to animate his Souldiers against the next encounter, unclashed himself, and shewed the mark; which so encouraged them that they now doubted not the Victory. Roderick had in his Army 130000 Foot, and 35000 Horse. Tariff had 30000 Horse, and 180000 Foot. The battel continued seven days together, from morning to night; at last the Moors were victorious. What became of King Roderick was never known. His Souldiers took one arrayed in their Kings apparel, whom upon examination they found to be a shepherd; with whom the King, after the discomfiture, had changed cloathes. It is written also in Rodericus Toletanus, that before the coming of those Saracens, King Roderick upon hope of some treasure, did open a part of the Palace, of long time forbidden to be touched: but found nothing but Pictures which resembled the Moors; with a Prophesie, that whensoever the Palace was there opened, the people there resembled should overcome Spain; and so it hapned, An. 724.

The Moors, now Lords of Spain by the treason of Julian, (who having seen the miserable death of his wife and children, was starved in Prison by the Africans) permitted the free use of Religion to the old Inhabitants; lest they seeking new dwellings for the liberty of Conscience, should leave their native Soyl desolate. The Moors finished their conquest in five years, say some; others in two, and some again in eight Moneths. To keep the new conquered Countrey in subjection, no way was so convenient as to plant Colonies: but the Moorish women would not abandon their old seats. Hereupon Musa and Tariff, by gifts, pardons, and persuasions, drew many Christian women to forsake their Religion, whom they married to the Souldiers. Not long after Ulidor Ulit, the great Caliph, sent over about 50000 Families of Moors and Jews; assigning them a convenient portion of Lands, to be held with great immunities, and upon small rents. These politick courses notwithstanding, the Moors long enjoyed not the sole Sovereignty herein: for the Christians having now recovered breath, chose themselves Kings; and the Authority of the Caliphs declining, gave the Moors liberty to erect divers petty Royalities; many of which by little and little were brought under the command of greater and more powerful Princes. So that at last Spain fell into a fifteenfold division, viz. into the Kingdoms and proprietary Estates of 1 Navarre, 2 Biscay, and 3 Guipuscoa, 4 Leon and Oviedo, 5 Gallicia, 6 Corduba, 7 Granada, 8 Murcia, 9 Toledo, 10 Castile, 11 Portugal and the Members of it, 12 Valentia, 13 Catalonia, 14 the Kingdom of Majorica, and 15 that of Aragon: not to say any thing of the petty Kingdoms of Jaca, Algozire, and Sevilla, besides others of like nature to them; erected by the factious and divided Moors, but of short continuance all of them, and of little note. All now reduced at this day, under the three Governments of Castile, Portugal, and Aragon; the Kingdoms and Estates of Leon, Navarre, Corduba, Granada, Gallicia, Biscay, Murcia, and Toledo, being under Castile; Portugal with Algarve, and the Isles of Azores, an entire Government of it self; Valentia, Catalonia, and Majorica, under that of Aragon.

I. NAVARRE.

NAVARRÉ, the second Kingdom for antiquity in Spain, is bounded on the East with the Principality of Bearn, in the Kingdom of France; on the West first with the River Ebro, or Iberus; and after with a little River falling into it, near Calahorra, by which divided from Castile; on the North, with the Cantabrian Mountains, by which parted from Guipuscoa; and the South, with the River Aragon, by which divided from that Kingdom. Of larger extent antiently than it is at the present, the little Province of Alava, lying toward Guipuscoa, and the whole Countrey of Rioja (on the West side of the River Ebro) being taken from it, and reckoned Members of Castile, by Alfonso the 4th. Howsoever, we shall look upon it in its antient bounds, and shall accordingly take notice of the Cities and chief Towns thereof.

It was called at first the Kingdom of Saluarbe, from a Town of that name, situate in the most inaccessible part of the Pyrenæes; and therefore chose by Garcia Jimenez the first King hereof, for the seat of his Kingdom, as most defensible against the fury of the Moors. Afterwards it took the name of Navarre, either from Naveis, signifying a plain and champagn Countrey: first used by Inigo Arista the sixth King, who having taken Pampelune, abandoned the hill Countreys, and betook himself unto the Plains; or from Navarriere, the chief of the three parts into which that City was divided, not only at the taking thereof, but a long time after.

The Countrey though environed on all sides with mighty Mountains, yet of it self is said to be reasonably fruitful; well watered, and for the most part plain and level, as before is said. It taketh up also some parts of both sides of the Pyrenæes: the Spanish side being fertile, and adorned with trees; the French side generally very bare, and naked. That on the Spanish side, and on the summits of the Mountains, now possessed by the Spaniards, is called High Navarre: that on the French side, now called Basse, or Low Navarre, estimated at a sixth part of the whole Kingdom, is enjoyed by the French; incorporated by King Lewis the 13th, to the Realm of France, An. 1620.

Places of most importance in Basse Navarre, 1 S. Palai, formerly the place of Judicature for this part of the Kingdom; but in the year 1620. removed to Pau in the Principality of Bearn: both Bearn and Basse Navarre, which had before been governed as distinct Estates, from the Realm of France, being then incorporate to that Crown. 2 Navarrenx, a Town of great importance, seven Leagues from Pau; well fortified, and as well munitioned: King Lewis the 13th, finding in it at his coming thither, An. 1620. no fewer than 45 Canons all mounted, besides 40 Culverins and smaller Pieces;

Navarre.

Pieces; with Powder, Baller, and Victuals answerable thereunto. 3 Pied de Port, or S. John de Pied de Port, bordering on the edge of France, against which formerly a Piece of especial strength. 4 Roncevaux, situate in the most pleasant Countrey of all Navarre, in the entrance of a small but delightful Valley: famous for the great battel fought near unto it, in the Straights or entrances of the Mountains leading to this Valley; betwixt the French under Charlemagne, and a great Army of Moors and natural Spaniards, confederate together in defence of their common Liberty. In which battel, by the treachery of Ganelon, 40000 of the French were slain; and amongst them Roland Earl of Mans, the Nephew of Charles, and others of the Peers of France, of whom so many Fables are reported in the old Romances, the first Author of which Fables passeth under the name of Archbishop Turpin, said to be one of those twelve Peers; who taking on him to record the Acts of Charles the Great, hath interlaced his Story with a number of ridiculous vanities: by means whereof the noble Acts of that illustrious Emperour, and his gallant Followers, are much obscured and blemished by those very pens, which in the times succeeding did employ themselves to advance the same.

Of special note in High Navarre, 1 Vitoria, first built or rather re-edified by Sancho the 4th, King of Navarre, An. 1181. by whom thus named in memory of some victory obtained thereabouts, against the Castilians, whereas before his time it was called Gasteiz: as in like case there had been many Towns built by the Greeks and Romans, by the name of Nicopolis, or the City of Victorie, which we shall meet withal hereafter. Situate in the place of the antient Vellies, but graced with the privileges, and name of a City by John the second of Castile, after it came under the command of that Crown, An. 1432. A Town belonging properly to the little Province of Olava, and the chief thereof. Which Province being wholly in and amongst the Cantabrian Mountains, was of old a member of Navarre: but being extorted from it, An. 1200, by Alphonso the 4th, of Castile, it was in the year 1332 incorporated into that Crown as a part thereof; as were some other Towns and Members of this Kingdom also, won by the Castilians. 2 Viane, on the East of the River Ebro, well fortified, after the taking of Lagrogas on the other side of the water (from which distant not above a League) as the Frontier Town against Castile. Of greatest note for being the title of the eldest Son of Navarre, who was called Prince of Viane; advanced unto this honour by King Charles the third, An. 1421. in imitation of the like custom in Castile, where the eldest Son was called Prince of the Asturias: but not less memorable for the death of Cesar Borgia, slain near unto it in an ambush, after all his wanderings, and interchangeableness of fortunes. For being son of Pope Alexander the sixth; by birth a Spaniard, he was by his Father made a Cardinal; but relinquishing that Title, by Charles the eighth of France created Duke of Valentinois in the Province of Dauphine: during his Fathers life; he had reduced under his obedience, divers of the Estates which antiently had belonged to the Church of Rome; but after his decease, imprisoned by Pope Julius the second, who was jealous (not without good cause) of his plots and practices. From Rome he stole unto Gonsavo, then Vice-roy of Naples for Ferdinando the Catholicque; who notwithstanding his safe conduct, sent him prisoner to Spain: but breaking Prison (desperately sliding down a window) he came at last into this Kingdom, and was here slain in an Ambuscado, as before was said. So many times was Machiavels great Politician over-reached by Bookmen and Souldiers. 3 Soabarbe, in the most inaccessible parts of the Pyrenæes, for that cause made the first seat of the Kings of Navarre, entituled from thence the Kings of Soabarbe. Made afterwards a distinct Kingdom from Navarre by Sancho the Great, who gave it to Gonsaves his youngest Son: after whose death (not having issue) it was seized on by Don Raynir the first King of Aragon; and made a Member of that Crown. 4 Sanguessa, a Town of a large Territory and jurisdiction, privileged with a Suffrage in the Convention of Estates, and a strong Fortrefs on the borders towards Aragon: for which cause formerly aimed at by the Kings thereof, who have had it sometimes in their hands. 5 Pampelun, in the Champagn Countrey, on the banks of the River Arza, the Metropolis of this Kingdom; and the seat Royal of its Kings since the Conquest of it from the Moors by Inigo Arista the sixth King of Navarre. Of old divided into three parts, that is to say Bourg, Pueplement, and Navarriere; each having several Officers and Jurisdictions (the cause of many quarrels and much blood amongst them) till all united into one body, and reduced under the command of one chief Magistrate, by King Charles the third. An antient Town first built by Pumpey at the end of his Wars against Sertorius; in memory of whom called Pompeipolis by our modern Latinists; but Pampelun, more near unto the present name, by Ptolomy and Antoninus: now an Episcopall See, the seat of the Vice-roy, and one of the best fortified Towns of all Spain. 6 Mota, not far from the borders of France, where it joyneth on Guipuscoa, a place of principal importance: the Castle whereof was one of the last pieces on this side of the Mountains, which held out for King John of Alber against Ferdinand the Catholicque, in his surprisal of this Kingdom. 7 Montreal. 8 Olite, and 9 Tafalla, all yielded with the rest of this Kingdom, to Frederick of Toledo, Duke of Avia: Who had the happiness to subdue this Realm to the Crown of Castile, as his Son Ferdinand had to conquer the Realm of Portugal. 10 Tudele, on the Eastern bank of the River Ebro, took from the Moors, by a surprize by Rotom Earl of Perch, (a French man) coming with many other noble persons to the aid of Alfonso, King of Navarre and Aragon, at the siege of Saragossa, An. 1110. Given by that King unto him, for the reward of his service; and afterwards united to the Crown of Navarre; by the marriage of Magdalen Daughter of Earl Rotom, with Garcia the seventh King of Navarre, Successor in that Kingdom to the said Alfonso. Of late times honoured with a little University there founded by Ferdinand the Catholicque, on his surprisal of that Kingdom. 11 Calahorra, situate on the Western banks of the Iberus or Ebro, by Ptolomy called Calagorina, by Strabo, Callaguris, now a Bishops See; taken from Sancho the 8th of Navarre, by Alfonso the fourth of Castile, and made a Member of that Kingdom.

and John of Albret, Ferdinand gathered an Army under the pretence of rooting out the Moors, and surprized this Kingdom, altogether unprovided, and destitute of means to make the smallest resistance An. 1512. The pretended reason of this surprisal, was an Excommunication laid on these Princes by the Pope, of which this King took upon him to be Executioner: but the true cause was an antient desire which this King had to possess this frontire Kingdom; it being a strong Bulwark against France. It hapned then that Lewis the 12th, having incurred the displeasure of Pope Julius the second, was together with all his adherents, excommunicated; and his, and their Estates given to such as could or would subdue them. The King and Queen of Navarre were at this time both French Subjects: he in respect of Albret, his paternal inheritance, and she of her Estates of Foix and Bearn; and therefore sided with the French King. Ferdinand having (as we said) levied an Army under colour of extirpating the Moors, turneth upon the French King; and demanded of these Princes, not only a free passage through their Country, but also to have certain places of strength put into his hand, for his better assurance. These unjust demands the Navarroys denied. Whereupon Ferdinand with all expedition invaded the Kingdom, the greatest part of which he took without a blow given: the French King being as backward in affording due assistance, as the other was unprovided of means for defence. The French settled those parts of it which lye on that side of the Pyrenies; leaving the rest, which lyeth on the French side of those Mountains (being about a sixth part of the whole) to the Descendents of those Princes whom he had seized.

The chief Order of Knighthood was of the Lilly, begun by Garcia the sixth; their Blazen a Pot of Lillies with the portraiture of our Lady engraven upon it; their duty to defend the Faith, and daily to repeat certain Ave-Maries.

The Armes of Navarre are Gules, a Carbuncle nowed Or. Which Carbuncle having a resemblance unto chains of Gold, is said to have been first taken by Sancho the 8th, in memory that he and his Forces had first broken the Fortification made with chains, about the Pavilion of Mahomet Enafar, the Meramolin of Morocco, at the great fight in Sierra Morena; before which time the Arms of this Kingdom had been Azure, a Cross Argent.

3 BISCAY and GUIPUSCOA.

OF these two we shall speak together, because of the similitude and resemblances which are between them, both in the Country and the people: the names being also forged from the same Original: Bounded on the VVest, with the Kingdom of Leon; on the East with the Pyrenies, and Guienne in the Realm of France; on the North, with the Cantabrian Ocean; and on the South, with Navarre, and old Castile. Thus named from the Vascons, inhabiting the neighbouring Kingdom of Navarre in the time of the Romans: part of which people in the year 640. or thereabouts, passed over unto the further side of the Pyrenies, where they took up those parts of France, since from them called Gascoigne. The rest continuing in their old Seats or spreading more into the West towards the Cantabrians, gave to those parts the name of Guipuscoa, and Viscayas, (for so the Spaniards write and speak it) now by us called Biscay: their language also (which is much different from the rest of Spain) being called the Basquish, more neer in sound to that of Vascons, the Original name.

The whole Country is very Mountainous and Woody, yeelding but little store of Corn, and less of Wine: the defect of the first being supplied from other Countreys, of the last by Sider; for which end they plant Apples here in great abundance. But from those Woods they draw continually great store of Timber, for the building of Ships: and from those Hills there do not only issue pleasant Rivers, (some say 150 in number) of which Ibernus and Duero are said to be two; but such infinite store of Iron and Steel, that no Country yeeldeth better or in greater plenty. Called and accounted for this cause, the Armory of Spain; and giving occasion unto Pliny to report, that there was in this Country, a whole Mountain of Iron: Maritima Cantabria parte Mons prærupte altus (incredibile dictum) totus ex eamateria est, lib. 33. cap. 45. Nor do they only furnish all Spain with Iron, which they make into Instruments of war, and others for domestick uses; but with Timber also for their shipping: with which so stored, that whole Fleets may be built and armed from this Country only.

It is divided commonly into two parts, the Eastern bordering on the Pyrenies, and the Realm of France, which is called GUIPUSCOA; and the Western bordering on the Kingdom of Leon, which properly is called BISCAY: the Town of Montrico standing in the confines of both. Both of them heretofore of the same Original, though by several means united to the Crown of Castile; both speak the same Cantabrian language, now called the Basquish; the people of both being more rude, and simple, than the rest of Spain; but standing much upon their Gentry, according to the custom of most mountainous and unconquered Nations. The difference is, that those of Guipuscoa, by reason of their traffique and commerce with other Countreys, favour a little more of Christianity, than the others do: in which the common Biscains are so far to seek, that though they have some general notions of God and CHRIST, yet very few of them are able to render an account of their Faith, in any tolerable measure. And thus a view being taken of those general notions in which both Countreys are concerned; let us next look upon them in their several and distinct capacities, with reference to their chief Towns and Stories.

And first for GUIPUSCOA: The places of chiefest note in it are, 1. S. Sebastian, (Don Biscay.

(Don Bastia, as the Vulgar call it) a noted and well-traded Port, at the mouth of the River Gurrineo, beautified with a fair and capacious Haven, defended at the entrances with two strong Castles founded upon the opposite Rocks; and honoured with an Episcopal See. 2. Tolosa (commonly called Tolosette) at the confluence of the Rivers Oria, and Durzo. 3. Placenza, on the River Denia, inhabited by none but Black-smiths, who do attend their Hammers with such endless diligence, that Vulcan's Forge may seem to be translated hither out of the Isle of Lemnos. 4. Guetaria, beautified with a safe and convenient Haven, defended from all winds by a little Island lying before it: the birth-place of Sebastian del Cano that famous Pilot, the first that sailed about the World; Magellanus who went chief in that expedition perishing in the Action. 5. Fontarabia at the mouth of the River Vidosa, which divides this Country from Guyenne in France; for that cause very well fortified, and as strongly garrisoned. 6. Rentaria, situate near a Brook abounding with most excellent Salmon. 7. Montrico at the mouth of the River Denia, the farthest Town hereof on the edge of Biscay. Most of which stand upon or neer the Sea; there being but few Towns of note within the Land (though there are enough scattered Villages, as in Biscay also) because of the roughness of the Mountains.

As for the fortunes and affairs of this part of the Country, after the subversion of the Kingdom of the Gothes in Spain (for till that time they followed the same fortunes with the rest of this continent) it was at first a member of the Crown of Navarre; afterwards wrested from King Sancho the sixth, by Alfonso the first of Castile, An. 1079. by whom committed to the Government of Lopes Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biscay. Restored again to the Kings of Navarre, upon some following Capitulations; it so continued till the year 1200. when having experience of the Government of both Kingdoms and liking better that of Castile, they offered themselves to the subjection of Alfonso the fourth; who without so much as one blow took, became Master of all the Country, and left it settled and confirmed unto his Successors, as it hath ever since remained.

2 For BISCAY next, the Principal Towns thereof are, 1. Larrabechia, the chief Town of this Province in elder times, in the chief Church whereof the Kings of Spain, as Lords of Biscay, use to be solemnly inaugurated; here making Oath to maintain the liberties of the Country, and receiving the Homage and Allegiance of the people of it. 2. Bermeo, an old Town also, and amply privileged; the franchises whereof the Kings are solemnly sworn to keep, in the Church dedicated to the honour of S. Euphemia. 3. Guernica, the third Town for antiquity in this part of these Countreys. Then of a later date we have 4. Bilbo, or Bilbao, situate some two Leagues from the Sea, but on a fair and deep Creek thereof; on the other side surrounded with Mountains; built out of the ruines of the old Flavobriga, by Diego de Haro Lord of Biscay, An. 1500. and situate the best of any Town in this Country for plenty of Victuals, especially for flesh and most excellent bread. Exceedingly enriched by making of Armour, and all sorts of weapons (their chiefest Manufacture) the Bilbo Blades in such request being brought from hence. Besides which trade of Arms and Iron, they deal also in Wooll; by the vent of which Commodities they are grown so wealthy, that here are many private Merchants, which build yearly three or four good Ships for their own trade only. 5. Laredo, a Sea Town also with a capable Port: The landing place of Charles the 5th. when he had relinquished the Empire, and all his other Estates, with resolution to spend the rest of his life in Spain, in a private manner: it being observable, that he was no sooner landed, but the Admiral Ship in which he came, and the greatest part of the Navy which came with him, perished in the Haven, to shew him (as it were) that there was no receding from this resolution. 6. Portugalete, commodiously seated on an Arm of the Sea, which floweth up to their very houses; and serveth them exceeding fitly, for the lading and unlading of their commodities.

The old Inhabitants of this tract before the coming in of the Vascons, were the Cantabri; these subdivided into the several Nations of the Marbogi, the Caristi, the Antrigones, the Varduli, and the Cantabri properly so called. From these descend the modern Biscains. An Argument whereof may be their Language, different from the rest of Spain, and said by some to have continued in this Country ever since the confusion at Babel. And though they over-shoot themselves, that go as far as Babel for the pedigree and Antiquity of it: yet that it was the antient Language of Spain, is more than probable: because this people have ever continued without any mixture of foreign Nations, as being never thoroughly subdued either by Romans, Carthaginians, Goths, or Moors; and so they remained, as in their liberties not Mattered, so in their Language not altered. In like manner the Aralick continueth uncorrupt, in the hilly parts of Granada; the Tongue of the old Britons, in our Wales; and the antient Epirotick, in the high, Woody, and more mountainous parts of that Country. And though those of Guipuscoa speak the same Language also, yet is it with a greater mixture of other words (by reason of their neighbourhood with France, and commerce with strangers) than it is in Biscay; where the old natural Language, whatsoever it was, is in far more purity.

Nor do the Biscains differ from the rest of Spain in language only, but in Customs also, four of which I will here set down as a light to the rest. First they account themselves free from taxes, and contributions to the Kings of Spain; yeelding them obedience with their Bodies, but not with their Purser. And when any of the Spanish Kings in their Progresses, come to the Frontiers of this Country, he bareth one of his Legs, and in that manner entrench into it. There he is met by the Lords and Gentlemen there dwelling, who proffer him some few small Brats pieces (Maravides they call them, whereof 600 go to a Crown) in a Leather Bag, banged at the end of a Lance; but withall they tell him, that he must not take them. Which Ceremony performed, they all attend the King in his journey.

Biscay.

Secondly, they admit no Bishops to come amongst them: and when Ferdinand the Catholic came in Progress hither, accompanied amongst others by the Bishop of Pampelune: the people arose in Arms, drove back the Bishop, and gathering all the dust on which they thought he had trodden, cast it into the Sea. Which avernes unto Bishops, as they first took up in all probability, on some hard usage which they found at the hands of their Prelates; and still retain it out of a stubbornness of nature, most peculiar to them: so possible enough it is, that the want of Bishops, and of Episcopal Visitations amongst the Biscains, is not the least cause of that ignorance and rudeness (spoken of before) which is found amongst them. Thirdly, they allow not any Priests to live in their Villages, except he bring his Cannone with him: conceiving it impossible for them to keep their Wives unto themselves, if the Curate hath not a Woman of his own. Fourthly, the Women at all meetings do first taste of the Cup, and so dispose of it to the men; which custom they have had amongst them ever since Ogno, the Countess of Castile, attempted to have poisoned her son Sancho, in a Cup of Wine.

But to return again to the old Inhabitants, they were a people of that courage, that they defended the liberty of their Country against the Romans, when the residue of Spain was subdued; and were at last, not without great effusion of blood, and manifest tokens of manly resolution, and heroic spirits on their parts, vanquished by the darling of Fortune, Augustus. Such hilly and mountainous people are always the last that are conquered, and the first that stand on their own guard: as besides these Biscains, the Navarrois and Asturians, here in Spain, in respect of the Moors; and our Britains, in relation to the Saxons. Whether it be, that living in a sharp air, and being inured to labour, they prove on occasion good and able men; or that the Forts of nature own building are not so easily won, as defended; or that the unpleasantness of the Country, and unfruitfulness of the soil, yeeld no occasion to strangers, to desire and adventure for it; I take not on me to determine. But being overcome at last, they were first cast into the Province of Tarracensis; and so continued after the new modelling of Spain, by the Emperor Constantine. Under the Romans they continued, till that Empire fell; and then not conquered by the Goths, but resigned over to them by the Romans, with the rest of that Province. Nor lost they any thing of their ancient and natural courage, by the intermixture of the Vascons; continuing till good Souldiers both for Sea and Land: a stubborn, fierce, and courageous people; impatient of servitude, and not easy to be forced to any thing which they like not of. The last of all the Spaniards that submitted to the fury of the Moors, (excepting those of the Asturias never conquered by them) and one of the first Provinces which shook off that yoke: animated and conducted in that undertaking, by Soria, descended of the blood Royal of Scotland, An. 870. made upon that good service the first Lord of Biscay. After this they continued a free and distinct Estate under their own Proprietary Lords and Princes of the noble Family of Haro; till that Nero of Spain, Don Pedro the Cruel, violently took it from Donna Ieande, the right heir of it, An. 1358. From which Donna Ieanne, the eldest Daughter married to Ferdinand the younger son of Ferdinand de la Cerde, the right Heir of Castile, issued the Lady Ieanne Manuel, the Wife of Henry the second, and Mother of John the first, both Kings of Castile: by which last, this Country was united to that Crown for ever, An. 1379. The names of the Proprietary Lords of this Estate, we have in this following Catalogue of

- 1350 18 Nugno de Lara, an Infant of two years old, succeeded John Nuges of Lara his Father.
- 1351 19 Jean and Isabel, the Sisters and heirs of Nugno de Lara, seized upon by Don Pedro; and the whole Signeury of Biscay subjected by strong hand to the Crown of Castile, with many other fair Estates which depended on it.

The Armes of these Lords of Biscay, were Argent, two Wolves Sable, each of them in his mouth a Lamb of the second.

LEON, and OVIEDO.

THE Kingdom of LEON and OVIEDO hath on the East, the Countrey of Biscay; on the North, the main Cantabrian Ocean; on the South, Castile; on the West, Gallicia. So called from Leon, and Oviedo, the chief Cities of it, and first seat of their Kings; the antientest Kingdom in all Spain. By a more ancient name it was called Asturia, from the Astures; who possessed it in the time of the Romans: divided into the two general names of Augustani, and Transmontani; but comprehending the particular tribes or Nations of the Pesici, Gigari, Zoela, and Lancenses.

The Countrey mountainous and woody, but formerly of some esteem for those small, though swift Horses which the Romans (from hence) called Asturcones; we may read it, Hobbies; which afterwards became a common name for all Nags or Gueldings: Asturco Macedonicus being used for a Macedonian Nag, by Petronius Arbitr.

It is divided commonly into two parts, that is to say, Asturia de Oviedo, bordering on Gallicia, towards the West; and 2 Asturia Santillana, confining on Biscay, towards the East. From which division of the Countrey, the eldest son of Castile is called Prince of the Asturias, in the plural number; which title some suppose to be given unto them, because it was the first Countrey which held up against the Moors. But indeed the true Original hereof is referred by the best Spanish Writers, to the time of the marriage of Catharine, Daughter of John of Gauant, and in right of her Mother Constance, the right Heir of Castile; unto Henry son of John the first, then in possession of that Kingdom. For to this new married Couple it was granted, saith Mariana, that after the manner of England, where the Heir apparent is called Prince of Wales, they should be called Princes of the Asturias. In times succeeding the Towns of Iaen, Ubeda, Biattia, or Bacca, and Andajar, all situate neer together in Andalusia, and each of them invested with a goodly Territory, were added to the Patrimony and Estate hereof; and so continue to this day.

Places of most importance in it, 1 Sublanco, now a small Village, but once a Town of so great strength, that it was destroyed by the command of the Emperour Nerva, lest it might animate these Mountainers unto a revolt. 2 LEON, situate at the foot of the Mountains, not far from the place of the old Sublanco, (as it was then called.) The Town but mean, were it not beautified by a fair and large Cathedral; the Bishop whereof acknowledgeth no Metropolitan but the Pope alone. Recovered from the Moors, An. 722. Afterwards made the Regal Seat of the Kings of Leon: by some called Legio, because the seventh Legion was here lodged; by Polomy called Legio Germanica, and by others Gemina. 3 S. Andera, so named from a Church there built to the honour of S. Andrew; by Polomy called Flavionavia, now a well traded Port on the Cantabrian Ocean. 4 Santillana, which gives name to the Eastern part of Asturia. 5 Llanes, where the two Asturias meet together: 6 Ciudad Real, in the Western part of Asturia, called Asturia de Oviedo. 7 Villa Viciosa, the only noted Port in this part of the Countrey. 8 Aviles, on the borders of Gallicia, neer the Sea, and not far from the Promontory called of old Promontorium Scythicum, but now Cabo de Pinus. 9 OVIEDO; called for a time the City of Bishops, because many of the Bishops of Spain, dispossessed of their Churches by the Moors, had retired thither; and there preserved the line of Episcopal Succession, till their Sees were filled again with Bishops in more happy times. Antiently it was called Lucus Asturum; and was of old a Bishops See; re-edified by King Froila the first, in the year 757. Famous enough in giving the title of a Kingdom to the first Christian Princes, after the Conquest by the Moors; called from hence Kings of Oviedo. Afterwards, An. 896. in the time of K. Ordoño the first, they began to be stiled Kings of Oviedo and Leon; and at last Kings of Leon only: Oviedo being quite left out of the Regal style by Raymir the second, An. 940. More towards the Inlands of this Kingdom (now reckoned part of old Castile) are 10 Palencia, the Palantia of Polomy and Antoninus, seated on the River Carrion; once a small University, till the translation of it unto Salamanca, by King Ferdinand the third. This Town first felt the fury of the Susvians, when they mastered these parts of Spain. 11 Astorga, antiently called Augusta Asturica, whence the Astures of this tract were called Augustani; a Bishops See; fronting on Gallicia: happy in this, that it felt not the fury of the lustful King Vitiza; who to secure himself in his unlawful pleasures, and to weaken his subjects, if they should attempt anything against him, dismantled all the Towns in his Dominions, except Leon, Toledo, and this Astorga. 12 Borvenet, on the South-east of Astorga, which gave the title of Duke to Frederick the Base son of K. Henry the second, (of Castile) the stemme of the most potent Family of Spain, for the times they lived in; 13 Toro, the most Southern Town of all this Kingdom; and for that cause well fortified against the encroachments of the Castilians, till the uniting of the Kingdoms; made afterwards (as lying neerest to Castile, and the Court of the King) the ordinary place of conference with the States of Leon.

Who were the old inhabitants of this Countrey hath been shewn already. When conquered by Augustus

- 8 Arlamirus, Son to Theodomirus.
- 9 Eboricus, the son of Arlamirus, deposed and shorn Monk by Andeca.
- 10 Andeca, the last King of the Suevi in Gallicia, or rather the Usurper of the Regal title; served in the same kind by Lentigildis King of the Goths, as he had served Eboricus his Lord and Master. After which time Gallicia was made a Province of the Gothish Monarchy, and the name of Suevians no more heard of in Spain. In times ensuing it became a part of the Kingdom of Leon, by the Kings whereof it was won piece-meal from the Moors, as their fortunes favoured them. Erected to a Kingdom by Alphonso the third, surnamed the Great, Anno 886. and given unto Ordono his second son: by whose Succession to the Crown on the death of his elder brother Garcia, it was again united to the Kingdom of Leon, but so as to continue a Realm distinct. In the year 955, the Gallicians not brooking the ill qualities of Raimir the third, elected Veramund for their King, the son of Ordono, did third and right heir of the Kingdom: who coming to the Crown of Leon on the death of Raimir, did once again unite it unto that estate. Disembred from it once more by Ferdinand the first King of Castile and Leon, who gave it unto Garcia his youngest son, Anno 1067. but conquered shortly after by Sancho the eldest son of Ferdinand, by whom Garcia was discomfited and imprisoned, Anno 1081. Never since separated from the Crown of Castile and Leon, but when Leon was severed from Castile; going along with Leon in those separations, till the union of those Kingdoms in the person of Ferdinand the second, Anno 1230. the Castilians being then grown better Statesmen, than to canton Kingdoms.

The Armes hereof were Azure, semee of Croffets Fitchee, a Chalice crowned Or.

6. The Kingdom of CORDUBA.

HAVING thus surveyed those Provinces under the Government of Castile, which lye at the foot of the Pyrenes, and on the shores of the Northern or Cantabrian Ocean; we will next look on those which lye more towards the Straights of Gibraltar, and the Mediterranean. And so come round at last to Castile it self. And first we will begin with the Kingdom of CORDUBA, which at the first erection of it, contained all those parts of Spain conquered by the Moors, and not again recovered by the King of Leon and Navarre: contracted within narrower bounds when subdued by the King of Castile; at that time comprehending only the Provinces of Andalusia, Extremadura, Granada, and the Isle of Gades. We will consider it notwithstanding in both capacities; in the first and largest notion, as unto the story and affairs thereof, till distracted by the Moors into many Kingdoms; in the last and strictest, as to the Chorographie, and Description of it.

The Kingdom of CORDUBA, as it stood when subdued by the Spaniards, was bounded on the East with Africa, and the Mediterranean; on the West, with Portugal and the Ocean; on the North, with the Mountains of Sierra Morena, and Castile; and on the South, with the Ocean, the Straights of Gibraltar, and the Midland Seas: so called from Corduba the chief City of it and the Seat Royal of their Kings.

It contained, as before was said, the Provinces of 1 Andalusia, 2 Gades, 3 Extremadura, and 4 Granada. But because Granada had the fortune to continue a Kingdom, when the rest were conquered, we will consider it by it self: and here proceed to the description of the other three.

1 ANDALUSIA is bounded on the East with Granada; on the West, with the Atlantick Ocean, and Algarve, in Portugal; on the North, with Sierra Morena, and Extremadura; on the South, with the Ocean, the Straights, and the Mediterranean. By Pliny it is called Conventus Cordubensis, from Corduba, at that time the chief City of it: and after, Andalusia, quasi Andalusia from the Vandals, who having won it from the Romans, had for some time, (and till their expulsion into Africa) possessed themselves of it.

This is the most rich and fertile Countrey of all Spain, extremely fruitfull of Wine, Oyl, and *Orenge*s (which last being shipped at Sevil, and so brought for England, are by us called by the name of *Sevil Orenge*s) and better furnished with corn than most part of this continent; watered with the Rivers 1 Anas, 2 Odiar, 3 Betis, and 4 Tenot: which makes it flourish with a continual greenness of Olives, Vines, and other Fruits; of which the Hills, though watered only with the dew of Heaven, do partake also in reasonable measure. The Air hereof, by reason of its Southernly situation, is exceeding hot, in so much that their Corn there is ripe in April: but those excessive heats much moderated by those constant refreshings which the cool winds breathing from the North, do bestow upon it. In which respect King Ferdinand the Catholic did use to say, that it was best living in the Summer at Seville, (one of the chief Cities of this Province) by reason of these cool refreshings; and in the winter time at Burgos in old Castile, which though situate more Northernly, in a very sharp air, had yet many notable defences against the cold.

The Principal Cities and Towns hereof are, 1 Corduba, seated at the foot of Sierra Morena, on the left shore of Guadalquivir, over-looking towards the South, a spacious and fruitful Plain. First founded by Marcellus a Roman Consul, An. P. C. 601. employed at that time in the wars of Spain: the first Colony planted in this Province by the Romans, and the chief City of Batica. For a long time the seat of the Moorish Vice-Royes, Lieutenants to the great Caliph of the Saracens; after of its own Kings of that Nation, who built here for their Palace a magnificent Castle. Reduced by Ferdinand of Castile, it was restored unto the honour of an Episcopal See, which anciently it had, and doth now enjoy. A City of great Circuit, but of very few houses, by reason of the multitude of Gardens in it. Famous in former times for the birth of Lucan, and both the Senecas.

Duosque Senecas, unicunque Lucanum Fecunda loquitur Corduba: fatis Martialis,

Corduba glorying in her fruitful field,
One Lucan, and two Senecas did yeeld.

Nor was it less fruitfull of good wits in the times succeeding. For not to say any thing of Hojius that renowned Confessor, who was Bishop here in the time of Constantine and before; it was a flourishing University in the time of the Moors: Avicen, Averroes, Rhazis, Amanfur, Messahalah, those famous Philosophers and Physicians being Students or professors in it. It is now vulgarly called Cordova; and hence cometh our true Cordovan leather, made of the skin of a Sardinian beast. Near unto this City is a wood of 30 miles in length, having nothing but Olive trees. 2 Iaen, a Bishops See, remarkable for nothing more, than that the Kings of Spain, ever since the first recovery of it, have stiled themselves Kings of Iaen; and use it to this day amongst the rest of their Titles; it having been before that time, the seat and title of some petit Kings amongst the Moors. Not far hence stood the famous Town of Illiturgis (by Pliny Illurgis) mentioned so often in the wars betwixt Rome and Carthage. 3 Offuna, of most note for the Dukes hereof, and a small University founded here, Anno 1549. 4 Eccia, on the River Chenil, of more esteem formerly than at the present: by Prology and Antoninus called Afygi, by Pliny, Augusta Firma; a Roman Colony, and one of the four Juridical Resorts of Batica. 5 Marchena, situate on an Hill, where is said to be the best breed of Gennets (a swift race of Horses) not of this Province alone, but of all Spain; the River Betis (as it was thought) conveying some secret virtue into them. Of this race was the Horse which Cesar so loved, that he erected his statue (when dead) in the Temple of Venus: and the ancient Lusitani thought they were begotten by the wind. 6 Xeres, situate more within the Mid-lands, towards the borders of Granada, and therefore called Xeros de la Frontera, (the Asa of Prology and Antoninus) famous for plenty of that wine, which we call Xeres, Sack; but more for that great and fatal battel fought near unto it, betwixt K. Roderick and the Moors, the loss of which drew along with it the loss of Spain. 7 Medina Sidonia (so called to distinguish it from a Town of Castile, called Medina Celi); the Duke whereof was General of all the Forces, both by Sea and Land, intended for the Conquest of England, Anno 1588. The Town called anciently Asinda, and Asido Casariana: the Duke whereof is of the Family of the Guzmans, and the greatest Prince for Revenue in all Spain, his Intrado being estimated at 130000 Crowns per annum. 8 Algezire, on the Sea side, a Town of such strength and consequence, that it held out a siege 19 months for the Moors of Africk, against Alfonso the 5 of Castile; to whom surrendered at the last upon Compulsion, Anno 1343. Since which the Kings of Castile have stiled themselves Kings of Algezire; not yet discomfited. 9 Conil, a Town on the sea-coast, beyond the Isle of Gades, part of the Patrimony of the D. of Medina Sidonia. 10 Gibraltar, a strong Town seated at the mouth of the Straights from hence denominated, lying at the foot of the mountain of Galpe, supposed to be one of Heracles Pillars; the furthest point Southwards of all Europe. 11 S. Lucar de Barameda (the Luciferi furum of the Ancients) the Port-Town to Sevill, situate at the mouth of the River Betis, or Guadalquivir: where the Ships of that rich City ride, either for a wind to put to Sea; or for a tide to carry them up the River, as they come from America. 12 Tariff, seated at the end of the Promontory, which looks towards Africk; and so called, because Tariff, Leader of the Moors into Spain, here landed: recovered from the Moors by Sancho the third of Castile, Anno 1292, or thereabouts; the first Governor thereof being Alfonso Peres de Guzman, the first founder of the now potent Family of Medina Sidonia. Supposed by some to be the Carteia of the Ancients. And if so, then a Colony of the Lusitanians (begotten on some unmarried Spanish women by the Roman Souldiers) placed here and indulged the privileges of the Latines, by Decree of the Senate, An. P. C. 600. Not far from these last Towns, in a little Island made by two branches of the Betis, where it falleth into the Sea, stood the famous 13 Tartessus, celebrated in most ancient Writers for the abundance of silver, which the mines of it did produce. Which was so great, that (as we read in Aristotles Book de Mirabilibus) when the Tyrans or Phenicians first came thither, οἱ ἄνθρωποι ὄνουν δένδρεα, μὴν δένδρεα καὶ ἀργύρεα, that their ships ships were neither able to contain it, or transport it thence: infomuch that they were fain to make their Anchors, and other Utenfils, of Silver. The like commodity the Grecians found in their Voyages hitherto, of which Herodotus maketh mention Lib. IV. Hereupon some have been perwaded that the ships which Solomon built to go for Tarfish (whereof we read 1 King. 10. 22) were bound no further than this place. But we will not enter at this time upon that dispute. As for the situation of it, that it was neither Tariff, as some, or Carteia, as others do conjecture; (though where Carteia was, be alike uncertain, if it were 100 fathoms from the mouth of the River Batis, as before is said, doth appear by Strabo; Who telleth us that Batis falls into the Sea with two mouths or channels, βασις ἐν τῷ παραλίῳ ἔχει ἑξήκοντα ἑκατὸν ὁδοὺς, &c. and that in the midst thereof there is a City called Tartessus, of the same name with the River (for Batis anciently was so named) from whence the whole Countrey thereabouts is called Tartessus. The like Pausanias saith expressly in his Eliaca. Which situation of this Town in an Island, at the mouth of Batis, occasioned Pliny and some others of the ancient Writers, to give the name of Tartessus to the Isle of Gades; whereof more anon.

In the mean time go we on to 14 Sevil, (in Latine, Hispalis) the fairest City, not only of Andalusia, but of all Spain. It is in compass six miles, divided into two parts by the River Batis, but joynd together by a strong and beautiful Bridge; the whole environed with beautiful walls, and adorned with many magnificent and stately buildings, as Palaces, Churches, and Monasteries: amongst which, that of the Gerosians, or Carthusians, is endowed with 25000 Crowns of yearly revenue. It is also the See of an Archbishop, under whose Jurisdiction are laid to be 20000 Villages; and a most flourishing University, wherein studied Avicen the Moor, that excellent and learned Scholar, Pope Sylvester the second, and Leander, who was Archbishop hereof, about the year 580, a stout defender of the Catholic tenetries of the Church against the Arians. The university adorned with one of the greatest and goodliest Libraries in the Christian world; furnished by Diego, the Son of Christopher Columbus, the first founder of it, with no fewer than 12000 Volumes, in several Languages, gathered together with extraordinary charge and care: and endowed with a very fair Revenue for the maintenance and enlargement of it. Famous in former times for two Provincial Councils holden here, the first Anno 584, the last An. 636, and at the present, for that here are continually maintained 30000 Gennets for the service of the King; but most of all for the great traffique of the place. For from this Town the Cassilians set forwards towards America, and here they do discharge the Fleets of Gold and Silver, which they bring from thence. To this Town come the Pearls of Cubagua, and the Emeralds of S. Martha, the Cochineile of Mexico, the Corals of Hispaniola; and in a word, the whole treasure of the New-found-World. Here is the publick Emporie of all Spain, for her Wines, Orenge, and Oyls; sent from hence in so great abundance into all parts of Europe, that the People use to say in the way of a By-word, That if there enter not into Sevil 4000 Pipes of Wine every day in the year, the Farmer of the Customs is sure to break: infomuch as the Revenues coming out of this City only, are worth a very good Realm to the Catholic King; M. ginnus reckoning it at no less than a Million of Crowns yearly. Lastly, here resteth the body of Christopher Columbus, the fortunate discoverer of the New-world, with a Latine Epitaph upon his Tomb; but short (God knoweth) of the great merit of the Man; of which more hereafter.

As for the fortunes of this City as they relate to Ecclesiastical or Spiritual matters, it hath been long the See of an Archbishop (as before is said) next in revenue and degree unto him of Toledo; his revenue estimated at 100000 Crowns per annum, his Jurisdiction reaching over all Andalusia and the fortunate Islands, in which are said to be contained 20000 Villages; the very Docetes of which being said to comprehend 2000 Benefices, besides Frieries, Nunneries, and Hospitals, which may make the former computation of the Villages subject to his power as a Metropolitan of more easie credit. Yet not so much considerable for its wealth and revenue, as for being once the See of Isidore, so much renowned (considering the time he lived in) for the Universality of his learning, who was Bishop here, called usually Isidorus Hispanensis, to distinguish him from another of that name in Egypt, called Pelusiota. As for the civil fortunes of it in the declining of the Moor, when their Eitate was broken into many Realms and Principalities, it became a Kingdom of it self under a noble Moor named Alcorax, An. 966. one of the Kings whereof called Almuncamus, was of so great power, that he had the Regal City of Corduba, and the greatest part of Andalusia under his command, made subject with the rest of the Moor in Spain, to the Miramolines of Morocco, An. 1091, till the retreat of Mahomet Enaf unto Africk, An. 1214. After which once more made a Kingdom in the person of Aven Lalle, a great Prince of the Moor, but no longer continuing in that Royal dignity and estate, than till the year 1248. when taken and subdued by Ferdinand the second of Castile; and made a part of his Estates; but so, that it remaineth a Realm distinct in the Regal stile, in which the Kings of Spain are called Kings of Sevil.

2 South of Andalusia, at the mouth of Guadalquivir, stands the Isle of GADES, distant from the main land 700 paces, and joynd unto it with a Bridge called Puerto de Suaco. It is in length 13 miles, of a very fruitful soyl; besides the riches which it gets by Fishing, and making of Salt. First peopled by the Tyrians 562 years before the Birth of CHRIST; subdued by the Carthaginians, An. V.C. 236. being invited by the Tyrians to aid them in a defensive War against the Spaniards; and was the last hold which the Carthaginians had in Spain, out of which beaten by the valour and good fortune of Scipio Africanus. Here stood in ancient times a Temple consecrated to the honour of Hercules; in which all Seafaring men (at their being here) used to pay their vows, and offer sacrifice, as being arrived at the furthest parts of all the World.

Places of most importance in it, are, 1 Porto Real, a fair and capacious Haven, between the Town of Cadix, and the main Land of Andalusia. 2 Santa Maria, another Port more towards the North. 3 Cadix, or Gades, the chief Town of the Island, and giving name unto the whole. Situate in the Western part of the whole Isle, on a large Bay serving as a Road for the Indian Fleet, by the resort and trade whereof it is much enriched. First founded by the Tyrians, afterwards made a Municipal City by the Romans, and one of the Juridical Resorts for the Province of Betica: in whose times it was held to be the noblest and richest in all Spain, not yielding to any in the Empire for greatness, magnificence, or number of Inhabitants of account and quality. Infomuch that here lived at one time 500 Roman Knights, which number was not equalled in any one place, except Padua only: besides the great concourse of Merchants from all parts of the World. Which great resort, occasioned Cornelius Balbus, a Native of it, to add a new Town to the old; the whole circumference of both being 20 furlongs. By the Moor at their conquest of Spain, it was utterly ruined; but since repaired, well fortified, and made the Magazine for the Ammunition of the Spanish Navies. Taken notwithstanding in one day by the English, under the conduct of Charles Lord Effingham, Robert Earl of Essex, and Sir Walter Raleigh: in which they burned the Indian Fleet, consisting of 40 ships, whose lading was worth 8 Millions of Crowns; overcame the Spanish Navie, consisting of 57 Men of War; took the St. Michael, and the St. Andrew, two great Gallies, with their luggage; spoiled and carried away more Martial furniture, than could be supplied in many years; and forced the Town, in which they slew and took Prisoners 4000 Foot and 600 horse, and brought thence a very great booty in the sackage of it, An. 1596. The fortunacy of which enterprise gave occasion to one of the Wits then living, to frame this excellent Anagram on the name of the Earl of Essex, (who was looked on as the greatest Adventurer in it) viz. Deveraux, Vere dux. Which he afterwards cast into this Distich.

Vere dux Deveraux, & verior Hercule; G A D E S
Nam semel hic vidit, vicit at ille simul.

Alicides yields to Deveraux; he did see Thy beauties (Cales) but Deveraux conquer'd thee.

Neer to this Isle, is that so celebrated Straight called by some Fretum Gaditanum, for the nearness of it to this Island; by others, Fretum Herculeum, not because Hercules did there break out a passage to let the Ocean into the Mediterranean, as the Poets fable; but because of the two Pillars which he caused to be erected on each side of it, with the inscription of Nil Ultra, this being supposed to be the furthest Countrey Westward. But when that supposition was proved untrue by the discovery of America, Charles the fifth being in those parts, caused two new pillars to be placed where the old ones stood, or rather where he thought they stood, and Plus ultra to be written on them. As for those Pillars so much memorized in the ancient VVriters, some place them in the Temple of Hercules, within this Island; others on the Promontory of Calpe in Spain, and that of Abila in Africk; and some again in two little Islands near those Promontories. This therefore being a matter doubtful, and not worth the looking after, let us return unto the Straight; called now the Straight of Gibraltar, from the Town and Castle of Gibraltar, situate on the brink hereof; the Straight being in length 15 miles, and in breadth, where it is narrowest, seven.

EXTREMADURA hath on the East and North Castile; on the West, Portugal; and on the South, Andalusia. It was first called Beturia, from the River Batis, which runneth through it; and for distinctions sake, Beturia Celtica, from the Celtici, then the Inhabitants of this Tract: to difference it from Beturia Turdulorum, containing those parts of Granada, and Andalusia, which lye nearest unto Tarracensis. And when first it had the name of Extremadura, it was of larger extent than now it is, reaching unto the banks of the River Duero, the bounds at that time of the Kingdom of the Morisicos; so called by the Christians, as lying on the extremities, or furthest side of that River.

Principal places in it, are, 1 Alcantara, on the banks of the River Tagus, situate near the ruins of Norba Caesarea, destroyed by Petronius and Africanus, two of Pompey's Captains, for adhering faithfully to Caesar: now of most note for an Order of Knights here seated, and from hence denominated; whereof more hereafter. 2 Guadalcanal, famous for its Mines of Silver and Gold. 3 Merida, situate also on the Tagus, first called Augusta Emerita, founded and made a Colony by Augustus Caesar, who placed herein his old Soldiers, whom the Romans called Emeriti; hence it had the name. The chief City after that of Lusitania, and by Africanus preferred before any in Spain; now ruinous, meanly built, and but ill inhabited: Famous for nothing but the Bridge upon the River Tagus, a Monument of the Roman greatness. Nigh to this Town was fought that memorable battle betwixt Wallia, the first King of the Goths in Spain, and Attace King of the Alani and Silinges (this last a people of the Vandals): the victory whereof falling to the Goths, caused the whole Nation of the Vandals to draw forth out of Spain. 4 Medinilla, near which the River Guadiana hideth it self under the ground, for the space of 10 leagues; but more famous for the birth of Ferdinand Cortez, the fortunate Discoverer and Conqueror of the Realm of Mexico. 5 Badajoz, a Bishops See on the borders of Portugal. 6 Guadalupe, on a River of the same name, renowned amongst those of the Church of Rome, for the miracles and Image of our Lady of Guadalupe; as much reformed to in Spain, as our Lady of Loretto is in Italy. 7 Placenza, a Bishops See, near the Hills of Castile, amongst which hills (by reason of their strength and safety) Sertorius made his last retreat, when persecuted by the Romans of the contrary faction, and where he was most wickedly slain by Perpenna and some other of his own associates: not far from hence if it be not in the self-same place, in a retired and solitary valley standeth the Monastery of S. Justus, remarkable for a greater Miracle, Extremadura.

Miracle, than any the Lady of Guadalupe is able to boast of: which is, that Charles the fifth, that most puissant Monarch, having resigned his Empire to his Brother Ferdinand, and all the rest of his Dominions to his Son Philip the second, did here bid farewell unto the World; spending the residue of his time in prayers and devout Meditations. The greatest Monument and example of Self-denial which these later Ages have afforded. Far beyond any abnegation of the World by our cloytered Monks; or any quitting of their Crowns by some Kings and Emperors in the darker Ages of the Church; who living in the time of Ignorance and Superstition, saw not so clearly what they did (or did it out of weakness, and want of spirit); as this Masculine and Heroick Emperor.

The old Inhabitants of these Countreys, were the Turduli, the Bastuli, and the Turditani, of Andalusia, and Granada; the Celtici, and some part of the Dusiani, and all vanquished by the Romans, during the second Punic war; under the fortunate command of Scipio Africanus. From them extorted by the Vandals, who passing over into Africa left it to the Suevians; loit by them to Theodoric the fourth King of the Goths, who hereby added all Belgica to his other Dominions. Under the Goths it remained subject till their fatal overthrow by the Moors, who having made almost an entire Conquest of all the Continent of Spain, were at first subject to the Great Caliphs, Lords of the Saracenic Empire; governing here by their Lieutenants, from Udior Ubit, under whom they first made this Conquest, Anno 714, to Abdalla of the House of Alavici Anno 757. At what time Alderamen, of the Line of Mahomet the Impostor, and first Emperor of the Saracens, flying the fury of Abdalla, by whom the old Line of the Caliphs, of the Race of Humeia (of which Race this Alderamen was) had been dispossessed of that Empire; came into Spain, and was with great joy entertained by the Spanish Moors, cordially affected to his House: whose Government he took upon him, discharged of all subjection and subordination to the Caliphs, or Mahometan Emperors; and making it an absolute Kingdom of it self. In his Race it continued without any factions or subdivisions, till the time of Hizen the second, the tenth King of these Spanish Moors: after whose death distracted amongst many petty Tyrants, till they were all brought under by the Moors of Africa; of which more anon. In the mean time take here the Catalogue of the Kings of these Moors of Spain, called commonly from Corduba their Royal Seat of Africa. Concerning which we are to know, that after the great Victory obtained at Clavigno, against Alderamen the second, by Raymir King of Leon, An 836. in which the Moors lost 60000 of his men; the power and reputation of the Spanish Moors began to decline: brought utterly to nothing; by the sloth and negligence of Hizen the second; after a long and unprofitable reign, deposed by Zuleima, who succeeded. But the Moors not easily brooking the command of a new Impostor, fell into many factions, and Divisions amongst themselves: every great man seizing on some part of the Kingdom, which he retained unto himself with the name of King; from whence we have a King of Sevil, another of Toledo; a third at Valentia; a fourth of Cordova, &c. the names of which last only do occur in the former Catalogue; as they which did pretend a Sovereignty over all the rest. And 'twas a sign the Kingdom was in the expiring, when so many Kings succeeded in so few years, after one another: there passing from the depoling of Hizen the second, to the beginning of Mahomet the fourth, not above 34 years in all; during which time we finde no fewer than 10 Kings. The often change of Princes, and short lives of Kings are the apparent signs of a ruinous State, approaching very near to its expiration; tion: as may be seen by the short lives and reigns of the last Western Emperours, nine of them hardly reigning 20 years; as also of the Kings of the Goths in Italy, of which the last held the Throne no longer than the nine Western Emperours had done before them. But to proceed, Mahomet the last King of this first Rank, having left the stage in the thirteenth year of his reign, Anno 1027. we find no good const of his Successors in the Kingdom of Corduba; made inconsiderable by the withdrawing so many Provinces from the body of it: the pride and insolence of which Royteless and petty Tyrants, forced them at last to call unto their aid the Kings or Mahometines of Morocco; by whom themselves and all the rest of their Corrivals, were in fine subdued. Under seven Princes of Morocco, the Spanish Moors continued subject about 120 years, that is to say, from the first coming in of Joseph Telepin the Mahometine, Anno 1091. unto the going out of Mahomet, surnamed the Green, Anno 1214. During which time the affairs of the Moors in Spain were so well conducted, that they lost nothing to the Christians, but Extremadura, taken from them by Alfonso the second in the account of Castile, the seventh in account of Leon, Anno 1147. and the City of Lisbon, taken from them in the same year also by Alfonso; the first King of Portugal. But Mahomet the Green being vanquished in the great fight at Sierra Morena, by the joint Forces of the confederated Christians, Anno 1214. left off all further care of the Moors in Spain; after his going thence distracted once again into many Kingdoms, almost as many as great Towns; all of them swallowed up in a little time by the Kings of Castile, Aragon, and Portugal. And amongst them the Kingdom of Corduba, not able to stand long on this new Foundation, was ruined and brought under the command of the Castilians, by their King Ferdinand the second, Anno 1236. Since that time there is no more mention of the Kingdom of Corduba.

The Arms whereof were Or, a Lion Gules, armed and Crowned of the first, a Border Azure charged with 8 Towers Argent.

7. GRANADA.

GRANADA is bounded on the West, with Andalusia; on the East, with Murcia, and the Mediterranean; on the North, with New Castile; on the South, with the Mediterranean only. So called from Granada, the chief City, and Seat Royal of it.

It is in length 200 miles, 100 miles in breadth, and about 700 miles in compass: a Kingdom of no great extent, but such as contained in it more fair Towns, strong Fortresses, and defensible places, than the like quantity of Ground in the world besides. The North part of the Country plain; the South parts over-spread with the Alpujarras, and other spurs and branches of the Orospeña. In the time of the Moors wonderfully well inhabited, and full of all sorts of commodities; the Hills planted with Vines and Fruits, the Plains and Vallies swelling with Corn and Gardens: since their expulsion, neither much peopled, nor very fruitful, for want of men to dress and manure the Land.

The principal Cities of it, are 1 Granada, situate on two Hills, divided by a Vally, through which runneth the River Darien; consisting of four several parts, called Abamire, Sierre de sol, Granada, and Antequera: the two first standing on the Hills, the two last in the Vally; the whole circuit being about seven miles, and containing in the time of the Moorish Kingdom, about 200000 of souls. Fenced with strong walls, fortified with 130 Towers, and replenished with abundance of wholfom and pleasant Springs. The Merchants and Gentry of the best sort, do dwell in that part which is called Granada: the houses of which are for the most part built of free-stone, with delicate and artificial Masonry; shewing great magnificence. Herein standeth the Cathedral Church, a work of admirable structure; of Figure round, as having sometimes been a Mahometan Mosque. Here is also the place which they call Alcazar, representing a little Town, to which are ten Gates. In the Abamire is the Palace of the Moorish Kings, covered with Gold, indented with Musical work; and which by reason of the structure, and multitude of Fountains which are about it, may be put amongst the Wonders of the world; having withal a goodly prospect over all the Town, lying under it upon the East; a spacious Champantoward the North, and the snowy tops of Sierra Nevada towards the South. This City is the ordinary Parliament, and Court of Justice for all the Southern parts of Spain, as Valadolid is for the Northern: Madrid, which is the highest Court, having jurisdiction over, and receiving Appeals from both. A Town first raised out of the ruins of Ilberis, situate not far off on the Hill Elvire, much mentioned in the stories of Rome and Carthage. In the two other parts of the Town there is nothing remarkable, inhabited only by Mechanicks of the poorer sort. 2 Albama, seated amongst steep and craggy rocks, out of which issue Medicinal Waters, occasioning a great resort of the Spanish Gentry: the first Town taken by the Spaniards in their last long War against the Moors for the recovery of this Kingdom, Anno 1482. and looked on by the Moors as a sad preface of a ruined and expiring Empire. 3 Guadix, an Episcopal See, about nine leagues from Granada. 4 Veles Malaga, by Ptolemy called Cax, by Antoninus, Sexicanum; situate at the foot of the Mountains called Alpujarras, a large branch of the Orospeña, over-spreading a great part of this Country; heretofore planted with incredible numbers of Moors, who chose to dwell there for the strength and safety of the situation; since their expulsion, desolate and unfrequented, nothing remaining of them now but the Arabick Language; which is still spoke by those few people which inhabit in it. The Mountains in this tract so high, that from the tops hereof a man may easily discern the whole course of the Straight of Gibraltar, together with the Towns of Senta, and Tangier, in Africa. 5 Ronda, at the foot of another branch of the Orospeña, called from this Town, Sierra de Ronda.

Granada.

Ronda. Not far from which, by Munda, now a very small Village, was fought that memorable battle betwixt Caesar and the Sons of Pompey, the honour of which fell to Caesar, who then made an end of the Civil Wars, which it was at very day four years before, were begun by Pompey the Father. In this fight was Cn. Pompeius slain, and his Forces broken: Caesar himself being so put to it, that seeing his Soldiers give back, he was fain to maintain the fight by his own great courage, bidding them remember, that at Munda they fought for their General. The shame of which reproach, and his noble example, encouraged them to a new onset, which was honoured with a signal and remarkable Victory: this being the last fight that Caesar was in, murdered not long after in the Senate-house. And of this fight he used to say, That in all other places he fought for his honour, in this for his life. 6 Antequera, heretofore a well-fortified Town, bordering close upon Castile. 7 Maxacra, on the shore of the Mediterranean, supposed to be the Virgo of Pliny, from whence the neighbouring Creek or Bay was called Virgitanus. 8 Vera, on the same shore, the furthest Town of Betica, and of this Country towards Murcia: supposed to be the Virgo of Pliny, from whence the neighbouring Creek or Bay was called Virgitanus. 9 Loxa, on the River Darien, enjoying a situation both strong and pleasant. 10 Malaga, or Malaca, situate at the mouth of Guadalquivir, once sacked by Cassius the rich Roman; who flying out of Spain, to avoid the fury of Marius and Cinna, who had slain his Father and Uncle, hid himself and his Companions in a Cave hereabouts, for eight Months together: but after hearing of their deaths, issued out, and ranfacked, amongst many other Cities, this Malaga. A Town of great Traffick, and much resort, especially for Raisins, Almonds, Malaga Sacks: well fortified, and of great importance, as a Town of War; and to the great prejudice of the Moors taken by Ferdinand the Catholic, Anno 1487. the Conquest of the whole Kingdom of Granada, following not long after. It was since made a Bishops See, or restored rather to that dignity which it had of old. 11 Ameria, a noted Haven on the Mediterranean, the Adversary of Melis; a Colony of the Carthaginians, and anciently a Bishops See. 12 Carthema, 13 Coim, and 14 Balsa, more within the Land: this last the strongest Bulwark of the City of Granada, on the North-east whereof it standeth. A place of great strength both by Art and Nature, and by the Moors defended with so great a gallantry, that it held out a Siege of seven Months against an Army of 13000 Horse, and 24000 Foot, King Ferdinand the Catholic, being there in person: and yielded at the last, Decemb. 4. 1489. upon better conditions than any Town had done before it.

As for the fortunes of this Country, after the Conquest of it by the Moors and Saracens, it was a part or member of the Kingdom of Corduba; and so continued till that Kingdom was subdued by the Spaniards. But the Moors were too stout to yield all at once. Having yet ground enough both to secure themselves in, and endow their King: they are resolved, though they had lost one Kingdom, to erect another. And therefore Corduba being taken, and that Kingdom ruined, the Moors, with Mahomet Aben Alhamar their unfortunate, but valiant King, removed themselves unto Granada, and there renewed their strength and Kingdom; which lasted 256 years, under 20 Kings, whose names here follow in this Catalogue of

The Kings of Granada.

		1482	20 Mahomet Boabdilin, the last King of the Moors in Spain. Of all which there is little left upon Record, their whole time being spent in defending their borders against the encroachments of Castile; or else in Civil Wars and discords amongst themselves: in which they were so frequent, and sometimes so violent, as if they had no Enemy near them. Mahomet Aben Ezar the fourth King, deposed by Mahomet Aben Levin; and he again thrust out by Ismael the Son of Ferrachen, before he could enjoy the fruits of his treason. Mahomet, son of Ismael, murdered by his Subjects; Joseph the son of Mahomet slain by Mahomet Lagus; and he again deposed by Mahomet Vermeil; who in the end was miserably slain by Pedro the Cruel of Castile, to whom he had fled for help and succour. After this time they ruined and deposed one another till the end of their Kingdom; the Successor never staying for the death of his Predecessor, but violently making way for himself to enter on the Government: even Mahomet Boabdilin the last King hereof, not having patience to expect the death of his Father; but setting him besides the Throne, as he himself was for a time, by Muley Moabdilin his Uncle: and thereby opening a fair Gate for Ferdinand, King of Castile and Aragon, to bring in his Forces, and to the subduing of them all. Such was the fortune of this Kingdom, that as it began under a Mahomet, a Ferdinand being King of Castile: so it ended under a Mahomet, a Ferdinand being King of Castile also. In the first year then of this mans Reign did the War begin, or rather in the last year year of his Father, who by taking Zahara from the Christians gave the first occasion: and in the tenth year of the War (for so long it lasted) Anno 1492. the Empire of the Moors ended in Spain, by the valour of Ferdinand the Catholic, and Isabel his wife, after their first entrance into it, more than 760 years.

Such of them, as after the decay of their Kingdom had a desire to stay in Spain, which had for so long time been their native Country, were suffered to do so by the prudent Victors, (fearing a desolation of the Country, if they should abandon it;) conditioned that they would be Christianized. And that they might be known to be as they professed, the Inquisition was established in the City of Granada, consisting of a certain number of Secular Priests, and Dominican Friars: who finding any counterfeiter, or Apostate Christians, were first gently to reprove and exhort them; and after, if no amendment followed, to inflict such punishment on them as was accustomed in like cases. By the terror of which Inquisition, many professed in shew the Christian Faith. But being Christians only in the outward shew, and practising on all occasions against the State, the Kings of Spain resolved long ago on their Extermination; but never had opportunity to effect it, till the year 1609. At what time Philip the third having made a peace with England, and a truce with Holland; and finding the Moors of Africa so embroiled in Wars, that they were not able to disturb him; put that extreme rigour in execution, which had before been thought of in their consultations: 110000 of them being forced to quit this Country, and provide new dwellings: under colour that they went about to free themselves from the Inquisition, and to recover their old Liberty lost so long before.

The Forces which the Kings of Granada in the times of their greatest power were able to raise, were far beyond the Amasurement and extent of their Kingdom: not above 700 miles in compass, as before is said: but so exceeding populous, and well accommodated with all manner of necessaries, that within two dayes space, the King hereof was said to have been able to draw together 50000 Horse and 200000 Foot, for defence of his Kingdom. Turquet reports it so in his Spanish History. But this proved more then they were able to do in their greatest need; when this Kingdom was finally invaded, and at last subdued by Ferdinand and Isabel Kings of Spain: though possibly by reason of their divisions at that time, some following the party Mahomet Boabdilin, and others that of his Uncle Muley chosen King against him; they might not joyn together in a common interests for the defence of their Estate. The Arms whereof were Or, a Pomgranate (or apple of Granada) slipped, Vert.

8. MURCIA.

MURCIA is bounded on the West, with Granada: on the East, with Valencia; on the North, with Valencia, and a part of Granada; and on the South, with the Mediterranean Sea; so called from Murcia the chief City. In former times esteemed a rich and wealthy Country, stored with all sorts of fruits; and so abounding in Silver Mines, that when the Romans were Lords of it, they kept continually four hundred men at work, and received 2500 Drachmas of daily profit; now for the most part barren, and but ill inhabited.

Cities of note there are not many in so small a Country. The principal, 1 Murcia, by Ptolemy called Menralis, seated upon the River Segura; a Bishops See, situate in a pleasant and delightful Plain, planted with Pomgranats, and other excellent fruits: from this, the Country had the name of the Kingdom of Murcia. 2 Carthagea, or Nova Carthago, first built by Asdrubal of Carthage, the brother of Annibal, for the better receiving of such aids, both of men and money, as should come from Africa. Situate in a Demi-Island, in the very jaws of the Mediterranean; by which and by a deep Marish on the West side of it, so impregnablely fortified; that if Scipio, afterwards called Africanus, who then lay at the Siege thereof, had not been shewed a way over that Marish, at a dead low water; by poor Fishermen of Tarragon, who knew the secret, he had there lost both his time and his honor. Nothing more memorable, in the sackage and spoil thereof, (though there was found abundance of Arms and Treasure) than the virtue of Scipio, who finding there many Spanish Ladies of great birth and beauties, lest there as hostages for the Spaniards with the Carthaginians, would not permit any of them to be brought before him, for fear it should betray him to some inconvenience. Being re-edified it was made a Roman Colony, and one of the seven Juridical Resorts of Tarracensis: by Constantine made the chief City of the new Province of Carthaginensis, which was hence denominated: Afterwards twice sacked by the Gothes and Vandals, it lay for a long time buried in its own ruins. And though again new built and peopled, it is still but small, containing at the most but 600 households: and would be utterly abandoned, but for the safety of the place, and the strength thereof, garrisoned, and fortified very strongly by King Philip the second, for fear of surprisal by the Turks; and the security of the Haven (which is withal very large and capacious) coming from a little Island, lying at the mouth thereof; by which assured from tempestuous winds, and the violent ragings of the Sea. Hence the occasion of that saying of Andreas Doria, Admiral unto Charles the fifth, that there were but three safe Ports in the Mediterranean; that is to say, August, July, and this Carthagea: meaning as I conceive, that those two Moneths being commonly free from tempestuous weather, were of as great safety to the Mariners, as this famous Port. 3 Lorca, another Port Town, situate on a Creek more within the Land. 4 Almansa, 5 Saracel, two strong Towns bordering on Valencia; well fortified, when Murcia and Valencia were in several hands. 6 Cervillan. 7 Albama. 8 Rus, &c.

Toledo.

This Country being part of the Province of Carthaginensis, was by the Alani taken from the Romans, at their first entrance into Spain; from them recovered by Wallia, the first King of the Goths, in this part of Europe. Together with the rest of Spain, it was subdued by the Moors of Africk, in the distractions of whole Empire after the going hence of the Moors of Africk, it was made a distinct Kingdom by Alien-Hut, of the race of the Kings of Saragossa, who had seized upon it, Anno 1228. and for a time was the most puissant King of the Moors in Spain, commanding over this Country, Granada, and a great part of Andalusia. Invited to a Feast, and then basely murdered by Alien Arramin a false servant of his, Anno 1236. one Alien Hudiel seized on the Realm of Murcia, disturbed in his possession by Alboquis, the last King hereof. But he not able to defend himself against his Competitor, surrendered it to Ferdinand the second of Castile, whom he put into possession of the Fort of Murcia, and many other places of great importance; conditioned, that Alboquis should enjoy the title of King of Murcia, as long as he lived, under the Sovereignty of Castile; and that Ferdinand should enjoy one half of the profits of it. This was in the year 1241, after it had continued in the state of a Kingdom, but 12 years only, united to Castile without blood or trouble, and so remains ever since.

9. TOLEDO.

THE Kingdom of TOLEDO, so called from Toledo the chief City of it, contained once the greatest part of that Country which is now called New-Castile; of which it is now reckoned only for a part or member. The Country lying next unto it was anciently the Seat of the Carpentani; the nature of the soil we shall find elsewhere.

Principal Cities of this Kingdom, 1 Toledo, of great Antiquity, as being taken by Fulvius a Roman Prator, in the time of Scipio Africanus; and then a City of good note. Pleasantly seated on the Tagus, beautified with many pieces of rare and excellent Architecture; and fortified with 30 Towers standing on the Walls. By reason of the situation of it in the very midst almost of Spain, it is passing well inhabited, as well by the Nobility, who reside there for pleasure, and by Scholars, who abide in it for their Studies; as by Merchants, who resort thither for their profit: besides such Souldiers and their Off-studies; who are continually garrisoned in it for defence thereof. The private buildings generally are, who are by far more handsom in the inside than the outlide promiseth: most but mean, and ordinary; though by far more handsom in the inside than the outlide promiseth: most of them being furnished with water from the River Tagus, conveyed unto them by the admirable inventions of one Pamper, a native of Cremona in the Dukedom of Milain. The streets narrow, close, hilly, and uneven, exceeding troublesome to walk or go upon, especially in slippery or dirty weather, by reason of its steep and uneven situation on the side of a rocky hill: by which, and by the River which almost surrounds it, it is naturally very strong, and well helped by Art. For that cause made the fear of the Gothish Kings: by one of which called Bamba, so repaired and beautified (besides the addition of a strong Wall for defence of the place) that he is by some accounted for the founder of it. For so we find it in these old Verses:

Evexit (fautore Deo) Rex inclitus Urlem
Bamba, sua celebrem protendens Gentis honorem.

That is to say,

King Bamba (God assisting) rais'd this Town,
Extending to the ancient Goths renown.

When the Goths fell, it was in chief estimation amongst the Moors, and by them advanced unto the honour of a Kingdom; whereof more anon: but under both (as it continueth to this day) the See of an Archbishop, who is the Metropolitan of Spain, and president for the most part of the Inquisition, his Revenue answerable to his place; the greatest of any Clergy-man in the Christian World, next to the Popes of Rome; as being estimated at 300000 Crowns per annum. Finally, this City hath been honoured with no fewer than 18 National Councils, here holden in the time of the Goths; and is now a famous University for the study of the Civil and Canon Laws, and hath to this day the Temporal Jurisdiction over 17 Walled Towns, besides Villages. 2 Calatrava, the next Town of note, is situate on the diction over 17 Walled Towns, besides Villages. 2 Calatrava, the next Town of note, is situate on the River Ana, of most fame in these later times for an Order of Knights, called the Knights of Calatrava; of which more when we come to Castile. Neighbourd by the ruins of the strong and famous City Castulo, which being under the command of the Romans, was by the Gyreseni, a people that dwelt on the other side of the River, suddenly entred and taken. But Sertorius following after them by the same other tide of the River, and causing his men to apparel themselves in the cloathes of the Gate, put them all to the sword: and causing his men to apparel themselves in the cloathes of the Enemy, led them to the chief City of the Gyreseni; who supposing them to be their own party, opened their Gates, and were all either slain or sold for slaves. More of this Town anon when we come to Castile, to which now belonging. 3 Talborn, commonly called Talvera de la Reyna, or the Queens Talvera; and called so on occasion of an execrable murder, committed there by the command of Queen Mary, the Widow of Alfonso the sixth, on the Lady Leonore de Gusman, her husbands Paramour. A proper and neat Town it is, pleasantly seated on the Tagus; supposed to be the Litora of Ptolemy, and now belonging to the Archbishop of Toledo, as chief Lord thereof thereof. 4 Medina Zelims, commonly called Medina Celi, of great importance when possessed or neighboured by the Moors. Now of most note for giving the title of Dukes to the illustrious Family De la Cerda, descended from Ferdinand, the eldest Son of Alfonso the fifth; claiming by that descent a title to the Crown of Castile. What other Towns belonged unto it, we shall see anon.

As for Toledo it self, in the time of the Romans it was the Metropolis of the Province of Tarracensis; after that the seat Royal of the Gothish Kings; removed thither from Tholouse in Languedoc: forced by the Moors at their first entrance into Spain, Anno 716. more prudently aiming at the head, than the Goths possibly expected from such Barbarians. In the Confusions of that Kingdom, betwixt the beginning of the reign of Mahomet the fourth, and the second coming in of the Moors of Africk, made a distinct Kingdom of it self; continuing in that estate till taken from Haia Alchadachir the last King hereof, by Alfonso the first, King of Castile, Anno 1083. This Alfonso being the younger Son of Ferdinand, the first King of Castile and Leon, had the Kingdom of Leon for his part. Ejected out of that by his brother Sancho King of Castile, he lived in exile with the Moors, kindly received and entertained by Almenon the Father of this Haia, King of Toledo, till the death of his brother. After which coming to the Crowns of Castile and Leon, Anno 1073. he picked a quarrel with his Host, and besieged Toledo; his long abode there making him acquainted with all advantages that might facilitate his designs: which notwithstanding held him a siege of five years, before he could make himself Matter of it: by him incorporated presently on the taking of it, with the rest of that Kingdom, and made the head of New-Castile. But for the Kings hereof, as well those who held it but for life, as those who left the same unto their Posterity, they are these that follow.

The Moorish Kings reigning in Toledo.

A. Ch.

- 1 Galefroy, King of Toledo in the time of Charlemagne, under the Vassalage of the great Caliph of Damascus, subdued by Abdaramen the first King or Miramolin of the Moors in Corduba, of the house of Hunna.
- 787 2 Zuleima, eldest son of Abdaramen King of Corduba, being dispossessed of the Realm of Corduba, and the rest of his Estates in Spain by Hizen his younger Brother, reigned a while in Toledo; of which outed also not long after: Toledo from that time continuing a Member of the Kingdom of Corduba, till the later end of the reign of Abdaramen the second. At what time
- 833 3 Aben Lope, (the son of Musa Aben Cacia, a Goth by Nation and descent, but a Moor by profession, who had caused the Toledans and others of the Moors of Spain to rebel against Abdaramen) assumed unto himself the title of King of Toledo: a strict confederate of Ordono the 11th. King of Leon, by whom supported in his Wars against those of Corduba, but at last vanquished and dis seized by Mahomet, the son of Abdaramen, Anno 848.
- 990 4 Abdalla, a great man among the Moors, during the contentions betwixt Zuleima and Hizen the second for the Realm of Corduba, seized on the City of Toledo, which he held as King: and kindly entertained Mahomet Almohadi, made King of Corduba during those contentions; by whom succeeded in this Kingdom.
- 995 5 Mahomet, surnamed Almohadi, of the Regal Family of Humy, King of Corduba, and dispossessed thereof by the faction of Zuleima, retired to Toledo, and was kindly entertained by King Abdalla, whom he succeeded in this Kingdom.
- 999 6 Obeydalla, the Son of Mahomet, slain in his Wars with Hizen the King of Corduba, in the first or second year of his reign.
- 1000 7 Hairam of the same house of Aben Humeya, and probably the next kinsman of Obeydalla, succeeded him in this Estate, and left the same unto his posterity, till subdued by the Spaniards.
- 1010 8 Hizen, the Son of Hairam, of whom nothing memorable.
- 1045 9 Ali Maynon, or Almenon, as the Spaniards call him, the Son of Hizen, who entertained Alfonso the sixth of Leon, when dispossessed of his Estate by his brother Sancho.
- 1076 10 Hizen II. Son of Ali Maynon.
- 1078 11 Hiaya, surnamed Alcadabile, the Son of Ali Mainon and Brother of Hizen, a cruel Prince and ill beloved of his Subjects; which gave occasion unto Alfonso King of Castile and Leon spoken of before, to invade this Kingdom, by whom at last it was subdued, and Toledo with its Territories added unto Castile, as before is said, Anno 1083. By which means there accrewed to the Realm of Castile, besides Toledo it self, and the Towns spoken of already, those of Illescu, Escallona, Alaguda, Canales, Coria, Consuegra, Berlanga, Guadalajara, Arienca, and divers others, now passing in the estimate of New-Castile.

But to conclude, Toledo thus reduced under the command of the Christians, was forthwith made the Metropolitan City of Spain (in regard of Ecclesiastical or Spiritual matters) as it had been before in the time of the Goths: and shortly after honoured by Alfonso with the title of the Imperial City; that King upon the conquest hereof, having assumed unto himself the title of Emperour of Spain; but somewhat too affectedly, as the case then stood, there being other Kings in Spain as well as he. In which respects he gave unto this City for the Arms hereof, in a Field Azure, a Crown Mitral Imperial Or, garnished with sundry precious Gems Proper; changed afterwards by Alfonso the third of Castile and eighth of Leon, affecting the same title of Emperour, to an Emperour sitting on his Throne in a Robe of Gold, with a Globe in his left hand, and a sword in his right. But the Blazon of these Arms I finde not, nor much worth the searching: the old Coat being worn again after his de-

10. CASTILE.

CASTILE is bounded on the East with Navarre, Aragon, and part of Valencia; on the West with Portugal, on the North with Biscay, Guipuscoa, and the Asturias; on the South with Extremadura, Andalusia, and Granada. The reason of the name we shall have anon.

This was the most prevailing Kingdom of all this Continent, to which the rest are all united either by Marriages or Conquest. Divided commonly into the New and the Old, parted from one another by the hills of Segovia: the one being called the Old Castile, because it was the ancient patrimony of the first Earls heretofore; and the other named the New, from that addition which was made to the first inheritance, by the Conquest of the Realm of Toledo and other pieces from the Moors. The Old Castile is the less fruitful of the two, more fit for Pasturage than Corn; but better stored with that and all sorts of fruits, than the Neighbouring Countries, which lie betwixt it and the Northern or Cantabrian Ocean: the New more plain and Champain, better stored with fruits; and furnished with sufficient plenty of Corn and other provisions necessary for the life of man. The Old Castile watered with the Rivers of 1. Relauinos, rising not far from Burgos; 2. Tormes, passing by Salamanca; 3. Duero, the Receptacle of the others: The New with Guadarama, honoured with the Neighbourhood of Madrid; 5. Tevina, and 6. Tagus, the most famous River of all Spain.

The OLD CASTILE is situate on the North of the New, and hath for the chief Cities of it, 1. Soria, of great note in the ancient Story, by the name of Numantia, which for the space of fourteen years withstood the whole Forces of Rome: during which time they valiantly repulsed their Enemies, and forced them to dishonourable Compositions. But finding at the last no hope of holding longer out, they gathered together all their Armour, Money, and Goods, laid them in a heap, then set fire unto them, and finally burnt themselves in the midst of the flame; leaving Scipio (who had brought them to that extremity) nothing but the bare name of Numantia, to adorn his triumph. 2. Avila, situate under the great Mountains, which are called from hence the Mountains of Avila. Known anciently by the name of Abule, and by that name giving the title of Avulensis to the renowned Tostatus, who was Bishop of it. A Man, who in his time was President of the Council to John King of Aragon; yet could find leisure enough not only to attend his Episcopal charge, but to compile those learned and painful Commentaries on a great part of the Bible. Of which and his other abilities (besides that which hath before been noted of him) we may take that Elogie which Casambon hath given him, in his Book against Baronius, saying, Laudo acumen viri, si in meliora incidisset Tempora, longe maximi. 3. Valadolid, a fine neat Town, and one of the ancientest Universities of Spain: discontinued for a time by Students, and then reitord again by King Philip the second, whose Birth-place it was; and who erected here a Colledge (among others) for the education only of young English Fugitives. Seated upon the River Pisuerga, and one of the Chanceries of the Kingdoms of Castile and Leon. By means whereof, and of the Kings Court here residing in the Summer times, it became in little space a fair, large, populous City, and of great resort; not yielding unto any in Spain, except Lisbon, and Sevil. It is called in Latine, Vallis Oletum, and Vallis Oletana, from the abundance of Olives growing near it; but by Ptolomy, Pintia. 4. Segovia, a Bishops See, of great trade in cloathing; situate under a branch of the Mountain Idubeda, called from hence the hills of Segovia. 5. Burgos, near the head of the River Relauinos, or Relanzon, at the foot of the great Mountain d'Oca, part of the Idubeda; built out of certain Villages lying hereabouts by Nugno Bellides, a German, Son-in-law unto one of the first Earls of Castile. For a long time the seat of those Kings, since of the Archbishops heretofore, the Cathedral being one of the fairest in Spain; built with such Art, that Mass may be sung aloud in five several Chappels, without disturbing one another. This City doth contend for Primacy and Precedency (in Civil matters) with that of Toledo, of which it hath the first place or vote, in all Parliaments or Assemblies of the States of Castile. But yet to satisfy Toledo, the Controversie is still undecided, and was once finely taken up by one of the Ferdinands, saying, that he would first speak for Toledo, and then Burgos should speak for it self. Without the Walls of this City is a famous Nunnery, called De las Huelgas, consisting of 150 Religious Women, all of Noble Houses. 6. Ciudad Rodrigo, a Bishops See, on the River Gadua. 7. Zamora, a strong and well built City, and a Bishops See, the Seneca of Ptolomy; situate on the River Duero, and now famous for the best Bag-pipes. 8. Tordesillas, the Segisana of the Ancients. 9. Lerma, not far from Burgos, the chief Seat of the Dukes so called, a Prince of great possessions, and the chief of the Family of Rois and Sandoval. 10. Salamanca, the most famous University of Spain, especially for the Study of the Civil and Canon Laws; first instituted by Ferdinand the second of Castile, Anno 1240. and by an Order of the Popes, together with Paris, Oxford, and Bononia in Italy, created a Generale Studium; wherein there were to be Professors of the Greek, Hebrew, Chaldean, and Arabic Tongues, besides those of the Arts. It was of old called Salmantica, is now a Bishops See, situate on the River Tormes, as before was said.

Not far from this City, about the times of our Grandfathers, was discovered in a Valley situate amongst high and impassable Mountains, a kind of Patoccos, or Savage people, never heard of in Spain before.

before. The occasion this. An Hawk of the Duke of Alva's which he very much valued, flew over those Mountains; and his men not being able to find her at first, they were sent back by the Duke to seek her. Clambling from one hill to another, they hapned at last upon a large and pleasant Valley; where they spied a company of naked Savage people, hemmed in amongst many craggy Rocks. The Salvager gazing a while upon them ran into their Caves, made in the hollows of the Rocks, the best houses they had: which being observed by the Falconers, they returned again unto their Lord, telling him, that in stead of a Falcon, they had brought him news of a New World in the midst of Spain, and of a race of People which came in with Tubal. Strongly affirming what they said, they obtained belief. And the Duke shortly after went with a Company of Musquetiers, and subdued them easily; they having no offensive Weapons but only Slings. They worshipped the Sun and Moon, fed upon nothing that had life; but had good store of excellent fruits, roots, and springs of water, wherewith Nature was well contented. And though their language was not altogether understood by any; yet many of their words were found to be purely Basquish. Reduced on this discovery to Christianity; but easily discernible from all other Spaniards, by their tawny complexions, occasioned by the reverberation of the Sun-beams from those rockie Mountains, wherewith on all sides they are encompassed. The truth hereof, besides the credit of James Hamel in his Instructions for Foreign Travel, I have upon enquiry, found to be attested by men of gravity and great place in this Realm of England; employed there in affairs of publick interests. Satisfied therefore in the truth of the Relation, I am partly satisfied in the men: whom I conceive to be some remnant of the ancient Spaniards, who hid themselves amongst these Mountains for fear of the Romans. Their Language and Idolatry speak them to be such. For had they either fled from the Goths or Moors, there had been found some Cross, or other Monument of Christianity, as in other places; or some such mixture in their speech, as would have favoured somewhat of the Guths, or Romans. But it is time I should proceed.

NEW CASTILE is situate on the South of the old. The chief Cities there, 1. Signenca, a City heretofore of the Celtiberi, now a Bishops See, beautified with a fair Cathedral, supposed to be the Condabara of Ptolomy. 2. Madrid, upon the Guadarama, the Mantua of the Ancient Writers, now the seat of the Kings; whose residence there, though the Country be neither rich nor pleasant, hath made it of a Village the most populous City in all Spain. It is a custom in this Town, that all the upper Rooms in their houses do belong to the King, except some composition be made with him for them. And of this Town the Spaniards do use to brag to strangers, that they have a City walled with Fire; and then make good the boast by saying, That it is situate in the midst of Quarries of Flint. 3. Alcala de Henares (of old called Complutum) renowned for an University of Divines, founded here in the time of Ferdinand the Catholic, by Francisco de Ximenes, Cardinal and Archbishop of Toledo; and by him furnished with the ablest men both for Divinity and the Tongues, that all Spain afforded. By whose joynt diligence and study in turning over so many Copies of the Bibles, gathered together at his charge from all parts of the World, he published the Complutensian Edition of the holy Scriptures in the Original Greek, Hebrew, and Vulgar Latine, with the Translation of the Septuagint into Latin also. A work of very great charge and pains (taking up 15 years in doing) but of greater profit; there being at the end thereof an Hebrew Dictionary for the understanding of that Language. 4. Alcoraz, amongst the Mountainous tracts of Orospeida, called Sierra de Alcoraz; memorable for a great discomfiture given unto the Moors, Anno 1094. 5. Molina, in the same Mountainous tract, hence called Monte de Molina; remarkable for giving the title of Lord to the Kings of Castile, who in the Regal stile are called Lords of Molina: the Signeury hereof accreting to that Crown, by the Marriage of Sancho the third, with Mary the daughter of Alfonso the last Lord Proprietary. The Territory large, and the Town of strength: well fortified in the times foregoing, both by Art and Nature. 6. Cuenca, seated at the Spring-head of the River Xucar, and not far from that of the Tagus also, amongst the Mountains of Orospeida; built by the Moors on the top of those craggie hills, whom it served for an impregnable Fortrefs against the Christians, till taken by Sancho the second of Castile, Anno 1177.

Here also is the Escorial, or Monastery of St. Lawrence, built by King Philip the second. A place (saith Quade, who spendeth 13 pages in its description) of that magnificence, that no building in times past, or this present, is comparable to it. The front toward the West is adorned with three stately gates, the middlemost whereof leadeth into a most magnificent Temple, a Monastery in which are 150 Monks of the Order of St. Jerome, and a Colledge: that on the right hand openeth into divers offices, belonging to the Monastery; that on the left, unto Schools, and out-houses, belonging to the Colledge. At the four corners there are four Turrets of excellent Workmanship; and for height, Majestical. Towards the North is the Kings Palace; on the South part divers beautiful and sumptuous Galleries; and on the East side, sundry Gardens and Walks, very pleasing and delectable. It containeth in all 11 several quadrangles, every one encloystered; and is indeed so brave a structure, that a voyage into Spain were well employed, were it only to see it, and return. Here is also in this tract the old Town of Castulo (the Castro of Strabo) then the chief City of the Carpentani, and the Birth-place of Himilce, the wife of Annibal; from whence this whole Tract had the Name of Salmus Castulonensis, and so called by Cesar, now a poor Village, known by the name of Castona la Vieja; in which is somewhat to be found of the ancient ruins. But of this more already, when we were in the Kingdom of Toledo, to which it more properly belonged.

The old Inhabitants of these Castiles were the Vaccii, Ventones, Arevacae, Oretani, Carpentani, Ditani, &c. From none of which the name of Castile can be deduced: so that we must fetch it either from the Castellani, once a People of Catalogne; or from some strong fortified Castles erected in the frontiers against the Moors. This last conjecture may seem probable, because the Arms of this Kingdom are in the place of the now antiquated and useless Orders of Knighthood, which were heretofore of great authority and power, that is to say,

1. Of Calatrava, a Town of the Kingdom of Toledo, abandoned by the Templers, (to whom the defence thereof belonged) on the approach of the Moors; made good by Raymond the Abbot of Pisaria, and the Monks of Cisteaux, An. 1157. For the future preservation and defence whereof, they ordained this Order, which in process of time grew to such estate, that besides eight fair Priories, they enjoyed in Spain no less than 61 Towns and Castles. The Knights hereof do wear for their Habit, a White Robe with a Red Cross upon their breasts; confirmed by Pope Alexander the third, Anno 1164. under the Discipline of Cisteaux. Their residence is at the Castle of Cova, bound by their Order to serve in the Wars against the Infidels; upon which services they have been sometimes in the field with 300 great Horse.

2. Of St. Jago, instituted by the Canons of Eley, and certain Gentlemen of Casfile, in imitation of the Order of Calatrava; for the security and entertainment of Christian Pilgrims, travelling to the Shrine of St. Jago: confirmed by the said Pope Alexander the third, An. 1175. under the Rule of St. Augustine. Their habit is a White Robe, with a Red Cross like a Sword: the companions of it according to the first Founders, being part Ecclesiastical, and part Secular: whereof these last are only tied unto the vow of conjugal Chastity. They grew in little time unto such esteem, that besides two Colleges or Seminaries well endowed for the entertainment of Strangers; together with 90 Towns and Castles in several parts of the Kingdom. The whole number of Gentlemen, besides Friars serving in their Cures, and other Ministers, is above 600. Their first residence at the Hospital of St. Mark in the Suburbs of Leon, on a dislike with Ferdinand the second King of Leon, removed to Ueles in Casfile, bestowed upon them by Alfonso the fourth. Upon this occasion being divided, they have since two Masters or Commandadors, the one called the Commandador of Leon, who resides at St. Marks; the other the Commandador of Casfile, who resides at Ueles.

3. Of Alcantara, a Town of Extremadura, defended by Ferdinand of Leon against the Moors, where he framed this Order; confirmed by Pope Lucio, Anno 1183. Others ascribe it to Alfonso, the Successor of that Ferdinand, Anno 1217. by whom endowed with all the Lands of the Calatravians in the Realm of Leon; but acknowledging the Superiority thereof, and under the same Rule of Cisteaux. Their device at first was a Pear-tree Vert, in a Field Or; to which hanged a pair of Shackles, as a sign of their subjection to them of Calatrava; changed Anno 1411. to a White Robe, and a Green Cross on their Breasts.

I omit here the Order of the Dove and Reason, instituted by K. John of Casfile, because of small esteem, and but short continuance; nor shall I now speak any thing of the Arms of the Kingdom, which we have seen before on another occasion. And so much for Casfile, the first of those three greater Kingdoms of Spain, under which all the rest are now reduced; containing in this Continent all the Provinces and Estates before described, amounting to two third parts of the whole; and many large Estates elsewhere, as shall be shewed hereafter in its proper place. Pass we on next to Portugal, the second in repute of the said three Kingdoms; not so much for the largeness of the Territories, which it had on the Continent, as for its great Appendix in all other parts of the World.

II. The Kingdom of PORTUGAL.

THE Kingdom of PORTUGAL containeth 1. Portugal it self; 2. Algarve, or Regnum Algarbium; and 3. the Terceras, or Isles of Azores: these last not reckoned parts of Spain by any of our Writers either old or new; but made by us a part hereof, because situate over against Portugal, one of the first additions which was made unto it on the Ocean; and finally, because I know not under what other head to reduce them better.

And first for PORTUGAL it self, it is bounded on the North with the Rivers Minio and Avia, which part it from Gallicia; on the South with Algarve; on the West with the Atlantick Ocean; and on the East with the two Castiles and Extremadura; from which divided by a line drawn from Ribadania, (standing on the Avia, to Badajos, on the Anas or Guadiana). Extended on the Sea-coast from North to South, 400 miles: the breadth of it in the broadest place (not taking in the Islands into this account) 100 miles; in the narrowest, 80. the whole circumference 879 miles, and in that compass 1460 Parishes.

It was first called Lusitania from the Lusitani, the chief Inhabitants thereof, and took the name of Portugal either from the Haven or Port of Cale, sometimes a very rich and flourishing Emporie; or rather from the Haven Town of Porto, at the mouth of Duero, where the Galls (or the French rather) used to land their Merchandise: which was therefore called Portus Gallorum, and which Town was given in Dower with Teresa, the daughter of Alfonso the sixth, to Henry of Lorrein, with the Title of Earl of Portugal. Whose Successors coming to be Kings, extended this name to all those Countries which they got from the Moors, as it continueth at this day.

The Air is very healthy, the Country for the most part hilly, and bare of Corn, supplied from France and other parts of the North; that which they have being as good as any in Europe, if not better. The soil, and people, in all places not rich alike. For where the soil is richest, as in the parts lying on the North of Duero, there the People are poorest; in regard of the great distance thereof from Lisbon, and so not benefited by the trading of that wealthy City. And where the soil is poorest, there the

the People be richest, helping themselves by trade and manufacture; especially by making of Silks, and Salt, sufficient for themselves, and for other Countries. But where there is a defect of Corn, that defect is otherwise sufficiently recompensed with abundance of Honey, Wine, Oyl, Allom, Fruits, Fish, Salt, white Marble, and some Mines of Silver, &c.

The people of a more plain and simple behaviour, than the rest of Spain; and (if we believe the old Proverb) none of the wisest. For whereas the Spaniards are said to seem wise, and yet to be Fools; the French seem Fools, and yet to be wise; the Italians both to seem wise, and to be so; the Portugals are affirmed to be neither wise indeed, nor so much as to seem so; But little different from which is the Spanish By-word, which telleth us of the Portugals, that they are Pocos y Locos, few and foolish: which others vary with the addition of another part of their Character; saying, they are Pecos, Sotos, y Devotos, few and foolish, but withal devout. They have great animosities (if it be not grown to an Antipathie) against the Casilians, for bereaving them of their Kingdom and Liberty, though both of late recovered by them: but when most Fools, were counted for good Sea-faring men, and happy in the discovery of Foreign Nations.

Rivers it hath of all sorts, both great and small, almost 200. Those of most note, 1. Minio, full of Red Lead, (from hence called Minium by the Latins) navigable with small Vessels 100 miles. 2. Lethe, now Lavada. 3. Mallada, now Mondego. 4. Tagus. 5. Duero, and 6. Anas; these three last common also to the Rest of Spain: Anas or Guadiana, passing by Portugal but for seven Leagues only, Tagus for 18. and Duero for 80. None of them navigable for any long space by ships of burdum; the Rivers of all Spain being generally swift of course, retrained within narrow channels, banked on both sides with very steep rocks, which make them inconvenient for Navigation: Infomuch that it is reckoned for a great Privilege of Tagus, and the Realm of Portugal, that this River is there navigable with great ships 15 or 20 miles within the Continent. But here that want is somewhat tolerably supplied with three excellent Havens. 1. That of Lisbon upon Tagus, and 2. Porto, on Duero, to the North of Lisbon, of which more anon; 3. of Setaval, South of Lisbon, situate on a Gulf of 20 miles in length, and three in breadth; a place of principal importance to those parts of the Realm. Rivers however of great fame, according to whose course the whole Country was divided by the Romans, into Uleriorem, lying beyond Duero Northwards; 2. Citeriorem, on the South of Tagus; and 3. Interamni, betwixt both.

Principal Cities of this part, 1. Lisbon, seated upon Tagus, a famous City for Traffick, the Portugals in all their Navigations setting sail from hence. By the Latins called Olyppo, and Olyssippo, because as some say Olysses built it, coming hither in the course of his ten years travel; a thing merely fabulous, it being no where found that Olysses did ever see the Ocean. But like enough it is, that this Town being seated conveniently for Navigation, and inhabited by Sea-faring men, might at the first be consecrated to the memory of so great a Traveller; as Athens being a place of Learning, was dedicated to Minerva, whom the Greeks call Athene. It is in compass seven miles, and containeth upwards of 30 Parishes, and in them 20000 houses; all of neat and elegant building. Turrets and Towers it numbeth upon the Walls about 76, Gates towards the Sea-shore 22. And towards the Continent situate upon five small Hills, betwixt which is a Valley which runs down to the River: on the highest Hill an ancient Castle, not strong, but by reason of the situation, serving now only for a Prison for men of quality: the entry of the River being defended by the Castle of Cascais; and nearer to the City by the Fort of S. Julian, and the Rock of Belem, munitioned with 20 pieces of Ordnance. This City heretofore was honoured with the Seat of the Kings, since of the Vice-Roys, an Archbishops See, the Staple of Commodities for all the Kingdom, and thought to be more worth than the whole Realm beside: said by some French Writers to be the best peopled City in Christendom, next unto Paris; and by Botero an Italian, made to be the fourth Mart Town of Europe; the other three being Constantinople, Paris, Mosco. In which they do great wrong to London, as populous and well-traded as the best of them all. 2. Santaren, on the Tagus, so called from S. Irene, a Nun of Tomar, (a Monastery, in which the old Kings of Portugal did use to be crowned) here martyred by the Moors; by Prology called Scabaliscus, then a Roman Colony. 3. Sintra, upon the main Atlantick, at the end of the huge Mountains, called Montes Lema; whether by reason of the cool refreshings from the Sea, and pleasure of the Woods adjoining, the Kings of Portugal used to retire in the heats of Summer. 4. Coimbre, on both sides the River Adondego, pleasantly seated amongst Vineyards and Woods of Olives, a Bishops See, and an University; the Masters whereof made the Commentary on most part of Aristotle, called from hence Schola Coimbricensis. Then on the North of the River Duero, betwixt that and Minio, are 5. Braga, by Prology called Bracara Augusta, reckoned by Antonine for one of the four chief Cities in Spain; the Royal seat when time was, of the Suevian Kings, and now the See of an Archbishop, contending for the Primacy with him of Toledo. 6. Porto, the Haven of the Galls, on the mouth of Duero. 7. Miranda, a Bishops See on the same River. 8. Bragance, the Duke whereof is so great a Prince, that it is thought a third part of the people of Portugal are his Vassals, and live on his Lands; originally descended from Alfonso, natural Son to John the first; created by his Father Earl of Borcellos, after Duke of Bragance; the later Dukes since the time of King Emanuel, being withall of the right Royal blood, two steps of main advantage to the Royal Throne, lately ascended and obtained by John Duke of Bragance, now called John the 4th. And finally, on the South of Tagus, betwixt that and the Kingdom of Algarve, there is 9. Evora, in the midst of a large and spacious Plain, an Archbishops See, and an University; this last of the Foundation of King Henry the Cardinal. 10. Portelegre, a Bishops See. 11. Oliveira on the Guadiana. 12. Beja, by Pliny called Pax Julia, now Meum, and not very well inhabited, but anciently a Roman Colony, and one of the three Juridical Reforts of Lusitania.

1 TERCERA, the chief of all the rest, 18 miles in compass, well stored with Peaches, Apples, Limons, Oranges: and for the Kitchen, with Turneps, Cabages, plenty of Pot-herbs, and as good Batato-roots: (which are the best food the people have) as any be in the World; but more esteemed in Portugal than they be in this Island, by reason of their great abundance. Here is also great quantity of the best kind of Wood, (which from hence is called Island-Wood) and a Plant about the height of a man, which bears no Fruit, but hath a root as profitable as those that do: out of which the People draw a thin and tender film, wherewith they fill their Mattresses, in stead of Feathers. Fowl enough for the life of man, and yet none of prey. No Port of any safety in it but that of Angra; and that made safe by Art, and not by Nature: the whole begirt with Rocks, which stick out like

8 FLORES, directly East from Fayal, so called from its abundance of Flowers, (as Gratiosa from the like flourishing Verdure of it) is in compass not above 8 miles; but plentifully furnished with Cattel, and good grounds to feed them. The chief Town of it Santa Cruz. The Isle (though small, yet) twice as big as the Isle of 9 CORVO, so called from its abundance of Crows, situate on the North hereof, and but little distant: both very unsafe, and both most miserably poor, by reason of the many Pirates which lie betwixt them, to intercept such ships as trade towards America. But this, though much smaller than the others, may in time be of more esteem than any of them, in regard it is conceived to be the most natural place for the first Meridian, as before was noted: The Needle here pointing directly to the North, without Variation. Which whether it proceed from some secret inclination of the Load-stone to that part of the World, more in this place than any other; or that being situate betwixt the two great Continents of Europe and America, it is drawn equally towards both, by the magnetical virtue of the Earth it self, I leave to be disputed by more able judgements.

Portugal.

These Islands were first discovered and subdued by the Portugals, under the conduct, or by the direction of Prince Henry, Son of John the first; who first made the Portugals in love, with the Seas: And they were also the last Members of the Crown of Portugal which held out for Don Antonio the Baitard, against Philip the second of Castile: against whom the Island of Tercera was for a while gallantly defended by Emmanuel de Silva, with the help of the French; but taken at the last by the Marquess of Santa Cruz, and the French, after promise of life, cruelly murdered in cold blood. After which, garisoned at the first by none but Portugals. But upon some commotion, hapning in that Kingdom, it was thought fit on some reason of State, to make sure of the best Islands by Spanish Garrisons; which accordingly were put into the Castles of Angra, in Tercera; the Towns of Punta del Gadan, in S. Michaels; and Doria in Fayall. And to say truth, the Spaniards had good reason to be careful of them; these Islands being of such importance, as without them the Navigation of the Indies, Athiopia, Brasil, and New Spain, could not be continued: because the Fleets which come from those Countreys to Lisbon, or Sevill, must in a manner of necessity touch upon some of them; as well in following their course if they come from the West, as in recovering such winds as are useful to them, if they come from the East.

But to return again to the main Land of Portugal, know, that the ancient Inhabitants of it were the Lusitani, dwelling betwixt Tagus and Durnis, the old Lusitania being bounded within those Rivers; the Celtici, and Turditani, who took up also some part of Betice, dwelling on the South of Tagus; and the Gallaici Bracarii (so called to difference them from the Gallaici Lusenses who possessed Gallicia) on the North of Durnis. Subjected first unto the Romans, by whom accounted one of the three parts of Spain. In the declining of their Empire conquered by the Alani; and from them taken by the Suevians; who, for a time, made the City of Braga the Royal seat of their Kings. The Suevians lost it to the Gibbes, and the Goths to the Moors, as hath been shewn already in their several Histories. Recovered in part by the Kings of Leon: to whom that part continued subject, till given by Alfonso the sixth of Leon, in Dowry with his base Daughter Teresa, to Henry of Lorrein; whose vertue and good service merited no less reward, An. 1099. Who having fortunately governed it by the title of an Earl, for the space of 12 years, left his Son Alfonso, Heir both to his Fortunes and Vertues; honoured with the title of King of Portugal, by the Sovereigns of Leon, for his most gallant demeanor shewn in the battell of Obrigue, An. 1139. He had before the Assumption of the Regal Stile, ruled 27 years with a great deal of honour; and he reigned here with no less, 45 years after that Assumption, revered by his Friends, and feared by his Enemies. So that the whole time of his sitting in the Chair of State, was 72 years: a longer enjoying of Sovereignty, than any Prince, since the first beginning of the Roman Monarchy. His Successors we shall have in order, in the following Catalogue. But we must first tell you, as in other places of this Work, that the Princes of most note in the whole succession, are, 1 Henry of Lorrein (whom some make a Burgundian of the City of Besincon) who coming into Spain to the His Wars, and deserving nobly in the same; was honoured by Alfonso the sixth, with his Daughter Teresa, and the Town of Porto for her Dowry: given to him with the title of the Earl of Portugal. He extended his Estate as far as Conimbre, on the South of the River Duro; that River being before that time the utmost bound of it that way. 2 Alfonso the first King, who took Lisbon from the Moors, An. 1247. and made it the Seat of his Kingdom, which he extended Southward as far as Algarve. 3 Alonso the 3d, who partly by Conquest, and partly by Marriage, added Algarve to his Estate; getting it by the Sword, and confirming it to him by the Bed. He also did prevail so far with Alfonso the Wife, (never the wiser for so doing) as to get his Realm discharged of the Homage which formerly had been done to the Kings of Leon, An. 1270. 4 Alfonso the 4th, confederate with the fifth of the same name in Castile, against Alvacaen the Miramonolin of Africk, at the fight near the River Salado, not far from Tariff; where they discomfited the vast Army of Moors, consisting of 470000 Horse and Foot. 5 John the first, the base Son of Pedro the first, setting aside the Lady Beatrice, Queen of Castile, the Daughter of Ferdinand the first, and the Lawfull Children of his Father, being many in number; by force and colour of Election obtained the Kingdom. Fortified it by his marriage with the Lady Philip, Daughter of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster; a strong Competitor at that time for the Crown of Castile: on which relation, this King, the four Kings next succeeding, and two of this Kings younger Sons, were made Knights of the Garter. 6 Edward the son and Successor of John the first, of whom there goes a story, that on the day of his Coronation, he was addressed by a Jew, (one of his Physicians) learned in Astrology, to defer the Ceremony untill noon, in regard he found by his Art, that if they did proceed unto it in that conjuncture, his Reign would be very short and full of trouble. But the King either out of magnanimity or contempt of that Art, going on with the Ceremony; the Jews prediction was found true: for he reigned not fully five years, and with ill success in his attempts against the Moors. 7 Henry Duke of Viseo (Visontium the Latins call it) the second Son of John the first, created Knight of the Garter by King Henry the sixth, An. 1444. By whose encouragement, and example, the Portuguese began to be affected to forain Voyages: discovering in his time, (and for the most part under his conduct also) the Islands of Azores, Madara, Holy Port, those of Capo Verde, and a great part of the coast of Africk, as far as Guinea: He dyed An. 1465. 8 Alfonso the fifth, who warring on the Moors in Africk, took from them the strong Towns of Tanger, Alcacer, and Azzila. 9 John the 2d, under whose reign, the Portugals fully settled themselves in Guinea, and the Realms of Congo; discovering all the Coasts and Isles of Africk (not before discovered) as far as to the Cape of Good-hope, Anno 1487. planting, and fortifying (as they passed: the whole Discovery of Africk, the East-Indies, and Brazil, being perfected in the

Portugal.

Reign of King to Emanuel; under whom also they difcomfited great Armies of the Turks, and Sultans of Egypt, bringing by Sea the riches of the East into the West. 11 Sebastian, the Grandchild of King John, Son of Emanuel, embarking himself unadvisedly in the Wars of Africk, lost his life (as it is generally supposed) at the battel of Alcasar, in which three Kings fell in one day. But many of the Portugals are of opinion, that he was not killed, but that for shame and sorrow he returned not home; wandering from one place to another, and at the last was found and avowed at Venice: thence carryed to Naples, where he was kept three dayes in a dark Dungeon, without any sustenance but a knife and a halter; brought into Spain by the Kings command, where at last he dyed. A man in whom for many circumstances met, to make up a truth, that the very Spaniards used to say, that either he was the true Sebastian, or else the Devil in his likeness. But whether true or not, is not now material, death having put an end to that dispute; though the controversy which ensued upon his death for the Crown of Portugal be not yet decided. For though King Philip the 2d of Spain succeeded in it next after Henry the Cardinal King (who only came upon the Stage that the Competitors might have time to declare their Titles); and claimed the Crown as eldest Heir male, and nearest Kinsman to King Henry: yet all the World was not well satisfied, in the Justice and Equity of his demands. In the carrying on of which affairs he seemed to deal very candidly to the eyes of men, not biased by their proper Interests: offering to submit his Title to a Disputation, protesting that the Laws of Portugal were more favourable to him, than the Law of Castile; and openly acknowledging, that if he should chance to die before the said Henry, his eldest Son, as being a degree further off, would come behind some others of the Pretendants to it, of whom himself had the precedence. But finding nothing done by Henry, and meaning to make sure work after his decease, (Antonio the Bastard having got possession of Lisbon, and taking on himself as King, by a popular and tumultuous Election) he raised an Army under the command of Ferdinand de Toledo, Duke of Alva, and subdued all that stood against him; Katharine the Dutchesse of Bragance, Daughter of Prince Edward; surrendering also all her interrests and pretensions to him; so entering by a mixt title of descent and Arms, An. 1580. Threescore years it was peaceably enjoyed by the Kings of Spain, when suddenly dispossessed by a potent Faction, appearing for John Duke of Bragance, descended from the youngest Son of King Emanuel: which wrought so cunningly and successfully in his behalf, (by the great wit and under-hand practices of Cardinal Richelieu, and others, Ministers of the French) that the King of Spain was sooner diseisied of Portugal, than he heard of any plot or practise set on foot against him, An. 1639. In which it is to be observed, that as King Philip the 2d, for the better obtaining of this Crown, had embroyled the French, engaging that King in a bloody war against the Protestants of that Kingdom; so make him sure enough from troubling him in his present Enterprize: so the French Ministers had caused a revolt in Catalogne; to the end, that when the King of Spain was busied in reducing that Province, the Portugals might have opportunity to redeem themselves from the power of the Spaniards; whom the Antipathy betwixt the Nations made less pleasing to them. Nor was it a partial detection only, or the loss of Portugal and no more; but a general falling off of the whole Estate, in Africk, Asia, America, in the Isles and Continents: the Accessories, (excepting only the Town of Cebu in Barbary, and some of the Terceras) going the same way as the Principall did. And here we think that grave and deliberate Nation of the Spaniards may be justly taxed, for committing a greater Salaciſm in point of State, than ever people did before them: in that having got the full and peaceable possession of the Crown of Portugal, and all the out-parts and Members of it; they continued all the Garrison and strong holds of the whole Estate in the hands of the Natives. By means whereof, when Portugal it self fell off from the King of Spain, the Provinces and Plantations did the like, without any hesitancie: which, had some of the chief pieces in every Province, Factory, and Plantation, being brought by little and little (if not all at once) into the power of the Cassilians; might have been easily prevented. Nor hath the Spaniard hitherto attempted any thing material, for the recovery of that Kingdom: having been ever since so overlaid by the French in Catalogne, Nauvire, Biscay, Flanders, Artoys, and Italy; that he hath not had much leisure to attend that business. But leaving him and them to their own affairs, it is time to represent you with a Catalogue of

The Kings of Portugal.

Valentia.

- 1580 18 Philip the second of Spain, Son of Charles King of Castile and Emperour, and of the Lady Mary his Wife, daughter of Emanuel. 18. that Name, a Prince of great Possessions, and of Royall Race, who hitherto hath peaceably enjoyed it.
- 1598 19 Philip II. of Portugal, and III. of Spain, of Henry of Lorrein. 2.
- 1621 20 Philip III. of Portugal, and IV. of Spain. During his Reign the Portuguese weary of the Spanish Government, chose for their King
- 1636 21 John Duke of Braganca, the IV. of that Name, a Prince of great Possessions, and of Royall Race, who hitherto hath peaceably enjoyed it.

Now that we may the better see by what title, both the Kings of Spain, and the Dukes of Braganca, claim the Crown of Portugal; and what other pretenders there were to it, on the death of Sebastian; and what right as well Antonio the Bastard (but alledging a sentence of Legitimation) as the Princes of the House of Savoy did pretend unto it: we will lay down their Genealogies from King Emanuel, in this following Scheme.

By this it may appear how the claims are grounded; but whether title will prevail, cannot now be told. Suffice it, that as the Royal line of Portugal did begin in a Henry, so it ended in a Henry also: the male line failing in the person of the Cardinal-King, and the Crown falling (on whomsoever it shall fall) on the Heirs of the Females.

The principal Orders of Knighthood in this Kingdom, are 1 Of Avis, so called from a Town of that name in Portugal, the seat thereof; founded by Sanctius or Sancho the first, in imitation of the Order of Alcantara, whose Green Cross they wear; but equal to it neither in power nor riches.

2 Of CHRIST, instituted by Denys King of Portugal, who conferred on them all the Lands and Possessions of the exaurated Templars; confirmed by Pope John the 22d. An. 1321. Their Robe is a Black Cassock under a White Surcoat; over which a Red Cross, stroaked in the midst with a white line: their duty to expell the Moors out of Batica, the next Neighbour to Portugal. To which Crown they have added many gallant Countreys in Asia, Africa, and Brussl; and so improved their own Estates, that all the Isles in the Atlantick do belong to them: besides the rents of the Mine of S. George in Guinea, amounting to 100000 Ducats of yearly income.

The Arms are Argent, on five Escutcheons Azure, as many Bezants in Saltir of the first, pointed Sable, within a Border Gules, charged with seven Towers, Or. Which five Escutcheons were born in memory of five Kings, whom Alfonso the first King slew at the battell of Olbrigue, An. 1139. the Border with the Towers or Castles, being added by Alfonso the third, on his Investiture into the Kingdom of Algarves, by Alfonso the fifth of Castile, An. 1257. whose Daughter Beatrix he then married, and so conceived himself to have some relation to the Arms of that Kingdom. And so proceed we on to those Provinces, which are under the Government of Aragon; the third great body of this State.

VALENTIA hath on the East, the Mediterranean; on the West, parts of Castile, and Aragon; on the North, Catalogne; and Murcia, upon the South. It is watered with the Rivers 1 Xucar, called of old Sucron, and Surus; 2 Guadalander, signifying a River of pure water; and 3 Millar.

This Countrey standeth in the most temperate and pleasing Air of all Spain, full of Gardens, and places of wonderful delight; where groweth abundance of Rice, Sugar, Corn, and Fruit: garnished all the year long with sweet-smelling flowers, and miraculously fruitful of Pomgranats, Limons, and other delicacies. It hath also Mines of Silver at Burial, of Gold at Lodur, of Iron at Finifrat, of Alabaster at Piacent, and of Allom, Lime, and Plaster in many places. From thence also come the best Silks in the World, Cotton of Murcia, Crimson, Scarlet, and other precious colours, and rich perfumes. Finally, all the senses of man may be delighted, and refreshed, with that which comes from this happy Region; in quality and sweetness much like that of Naples. The delicacy and great pleasures whereof, have made the Inhabitants of it to be thought less warlike than the other Spaniards. The Sheep of this Countrey also bear the finest Fleeces of any in Spain; first stocked with Cotswold Sheep from England, at the request of John King of Aragon, An. 1465. by the imprudent counsellor of K. Edward the fourth.

Places of most note in it are, 1 Alicante, a noted Port on the Mediterranean, whence come our true true Alicant Wines made of the juice of Mulberries; by Ptolemy called Illicitas, by Mela, Ilicis; from whence the Bay adjoining is called Sinus Illicitanus, now the Bay of Alicante. 2 Oriuela, a Bishops See, on the River Segura, which divides this Province from Murcia. 3 Segorve, a Bishops See, by Ptolemy named Segobriga, the chief City in old times of the Celiberi. 4 Xelva, supposed to be the Incibilis of Livy, where Scipio defeated Hanno and his Carthaginians. 5 Valentia, a fair, pleasant, and well-traded City, the See of an Archbishop, and giveth name to the whole Province: in its first glory, one of the chief Roman Colonies in these parts of Spain; in its last, the Royal Seat of the Moorish Kings of this Countrey. Situate three miles from the Mediterranean, not far from the mouth of the River Durea; now called Guadalander: and is by some said to have been heretofore named Roma, which signifieth strength. But when the Romans mastered it, to distinguish it from their Rome, it was called Valentia; which in the Latine Tongue, is of the same signification with the Greek $\pi \lambda \omega \nu$. Here is an University in which St. Dominick, the Father of the Dominicans, studied. 6 Laurigi, now a small Village, once a Town of great strength, called Lauron: which Sertorius besieged, took and burned, even then when Pompey, whose confederates the Lauronites were, stood with his whole Army nigh enough unto the flame to warm his hands; and yet durst not succour it. 7 Cullera, a Sea Town standing at the mouth of the River Xucar. It was formerly named Sucron, after the name of the River: and is famous in Plutarch, for the victory which Sertorius here got of Pompey; Pompey's Army being not only overthrown, but himself with life hardly escaping. 8 Morvedre, situate in or near the place of the old Saguntum; the People whereof when besieged by Annibal, continued to obdurate in the expectation of aid from Rome, that they chose rather to burn themselves, than yield up the Town: the occasion of the second War betwixt Rome and Carthage. First founded by the Zacynthians, and after this destruction of it, repaired, or re-edified by the Romans, (they could not possibly do less) by whom made a Colony. 9 Gandia, which gives the title of a Duke to the house of Borgia, and was the style of Francisco Borgia, the eldest Son of Pope Alex. the sixth (of this noble Family) called commonly in Guicciardine by the name of the Duke of Gandy. 10 Denia, seated on the brink of the Mediterranean, over which it hath a goodly prospect; the Marquise of the Duke of Lerma: first founded by the Massilians, by whom called Dianium. Not far from which is the Promontory of Ferraria, of old called Promontorium Dianium, the Refuge of Sertorius in his Wars against Pompey, and Metellus, both of great renown: the one aged, and of much experience; the other young, and of high resolutions. And yet Sertorius found himself more troubled with the old mans gravity, than the young mans gallantry: inasmuch as he was used to say, That had it not been for the old Woman Metellus, he would have whipped the Boy Pompey home with Rods. For he had twice overcome this Great Pompey, before Metellus was joyned in the Action with him: the first time dangerously wounding, and the second time driving him out of the Field. But fighting against both he was over-matched; and yet seemed rather to retire than flie before them: the Spaniards behaving themselves very valiantly in the time of these Wars under him; to which Florus alludeth, saying, Nec unquam magis apparuit Hispani militis Vigor, quam Romano dux. At the last when he had a long time upheld the Marian Faction, he was traiterously murdered by Perpenna one of his Associates; for which Metellus and Pompey had a Triumph at Rome. So high an estimate did they set upon the casual death of this poor Prescript.

The Ancient Inhabitants hereof were the Bastetani, the Edetani, Contestani, and some part of the Celiberi; originally of the Province of Tarracensis, afterwards (in the sub-dividing of that Province by Constantine) of Carthaginensis. In the declining of the Empire first subdued by the Alani, who were scarce warm in their new dwellings, when dispossessed by the Goths. From the Goths taken by the Moors, of whose Kingdom reckoned as a Province; till the fatal overthrow given to Mahomet Enasir at the battell of Sierra Morena, and the departure of the Moors of Morocco to their own Countrey, which followed presently upon it. By Zeit Alien-Zeit, the Brother of this Mahomet, made a distinct Kingdom of itself, Anno 1214. but taken from him by one Zaen a Prince of the Moors of Spain, under colour that he had a purpose of turning Christian, and making his Kingdom subject to the Crown of Aragon, (as indeed he did) Anno 1228. Conquered from Zaen the new King, before he could enjoy the sweets of a new raised Kingdom, by James King of Aragon, Anno 1238. Since reckoned a Member of that Kingdom, never dismembered from the body of it since the first uniting. But till so overgrown with Moors (not to be blamed for loving such an excellent fear) that at the final expulsion of that people by King Philip the third, there were reckoned no fewer, than 22000 Families of them in this little Countrey.

CATALONIA is bounded on the North-east, with the Land of Roussillon and the Pyrenees; on the East, with the Mediterranean; on the South, with Valentia; and on the North and North-west, with Aragon. The Countrey somewhat mountainous and full of Woods, and not very well cultivated: be- holding more in that respect, for Corn, Fruits, and other necessary provisions unto the courtelie of the Sea, which serves them out of other Countreys, than to the Goodness of the Land. And yet it is as well watered as most parts of Spain, having in it besides the Elro, or Iberus, common to many other Provinces; and Cinia, which runneth betwixt it and Valentia; the Rivers of, 1 Tardera, 2 Lobregat, 3 Segre, 4 Francelino, 5 Besons, and 6 Onbar.

Catalonia.

The name of Catalonia some derive from the Castellani, who formerly inhabited some part hereof; others will have it called Catalania, corruptly for Gothalanis, from the mixture of the Goths and Alani, successively the Masters of it: and some more improbably from one Carthalo, a Noble man of this Countrey, who lived here they know not when. More like it is, that it took this name from the Catalauni, an old French people of Languedoc, the adjoining Province; from whom the fields called Camp Catalaunici near unto Tolouse, took denomination. But from what root soever they came, certain it is that they are generally a stout and courageous People, as may be seen by their exploits in most parts of the Greece, which they miserably spoyled and pillaged many years together, in the time of Andronicus the second, to whose aid called in. But then withall they are a very perverse and obstinate people, little observant of the pleasure or profit of their natural Princes; but on the other side, so zealous in defence of their own Privileges, that they have created more trouble to their Kings under that pretence, than all the rest of the subjects of Spain. Of which we need no other instance than their late revolt unto the French, Anno 1638. which drew after it the loss of the Realm of Portugal, and many Towns of great importance in Flanders, and the rest of the Netherlands.

Principal places in it are, 1 Barcelone, situate on the Mediterranean, near the River Lolregat; accommodated with a large and commodious Port, where commonly the Spanish Souldiers do embark, which are bound for Italy. The Town adorned with large streets, handsome buildings, strong walls, and a very pleasant situation: called Barcino by the ancient writers, in whose time it was a Roman Colony; now honoured with a Bishops See, and the Seat of the Viceroy. 2 Tarragon, seated also on the Mediterranean, East of the River Francolino: built, fortified and peopled by the two Scipio's, the Father and Uncle of Africanus, for a Counter-Fort to Carthage (or New Carthage) not long before founded by the Carthaginians. Afterwards made the Metropolis of Tarraconensis, hence denominated; but strip of that honour by Toledo, and is now but two miles in compass, and containing not above 700 Families. Yet still it holdeth the reputation of an Archbishops See, contending with Toledo for the Primacy of all Spain (as Braga also doth in the Kingdom of Portugal): the controversy being undecided to this very day. 3 Ampurias, on the same sea also, once of great esteem, founded by the Massilians; a Roman Colony, and a well Traded Town, as the name doth signifie: this being the Emporia spoken of by Strabo and Ptolomy; now not observable for any thing but a safe Road for ships. 4 Blanes, 5 Palamos, and 6 Rosus, all Ports on the same Sea, but subject unto divers winds, and not very spacious, this last by Ptolomy called Rhoda, first founded by the Rhodians, or people of the Isle of Rhodes, and by them so named. More in the Land are 7 Girona, a small but handsomly built, and a well traded Town; a Bishops See, and the title of the eldest Son of Aragon, called Prince of Girona. Which title was first given to John, the eldest Son to King Pedro the fourth, immediately upon his birth, Anno 1351. and hath since continued. 8 Tortosa, on the River Elro, in the most rich and pleasant part of all the Countrey; recovered from the *Moor*s by Raymond the fifth, Earl of Barcelone and Prince of Aragon, about the year 1146. The principal Agent in that work, William Raymond of Moncada, Seneschal of Catalogne; rewarded for his good service in it, with a third part of the City. A goodly Town, and of good importance; garrisoned by the French, since the late revolt of Catalonia from the King of Spain; and like to draw a great part of this Province after it, whilest it continueth in their power, or the possession of their party. 9 Urgel, an Earls honour, and a Bishops See, situate at the foot of the Pyrenees. 10 Monblanc, which heretofore gave the title of Duke, to the second Sons of the Kings of Aragon. 11 Moncada, once a Town of strength, but of more note for giving denomination to the noble Family of Moncada, Hereditary Seneschals of Catalogne, and Lords of Bearn. Here is also on the East part where it joyneth with the Land of Roussillon, the Promontory called of old Templum Veneris, now Cabo de Ceux. And not far from Barcelone the Mountain called Montferrato, on the sides full of Hermitages and Anchorets cells; and having towards the summit of it, a Chappel dedicated to the Virgin Mary: much famed and resorted to by Pilgrims from all parts of the World, for her miraculous Image, which is there enshrined.

The old Inhabitants of this Province were the Castellani, Anxitan, Indigites, Cofiani, with part of the Ilercones and Iaccetani; all of them part of Tarraconensis. In the declining of the Empire, seized on by the Alani; and they soon after vanquished, if not dispossessed, by the power of the Goths. Lost to the *Moor*s in the general ruine of the whole; from them recovered by the puissance of Charles the Great: who having taken the City of Barcelone, Anno 801. gave it to one Bernard a Frenchman, with the title of Earl, who Governed the Countrey for that Emperour; as Wifredus, or Godfredus his successor, did for Lewis the Godly. Godfredus Sont to this Godfrede, by the gift of Charles the Gros, was the first Proprietary; united unto Aragon, by the marriage of Earl Raymond, with the Heir of that Kingdom. First held in Vassalage of the French, but that acknowledgement released to King James the first, Ann. 1260. by the King St. Lewis, the King of Aragon releasing at the same time his pretensions and rights of Sovereignty to Carcaffon, Beziens, Albi Nismes, and some other pieces in France, of old belonging to that Crown. But before that the Castellani had neglected the acknowledgment of their subjection to that Crown, it being ordered by Alfonso the second King of Aragon, about the year 1180. that the year of the reigns of the Kings of France should no more be used in any Instruments or Writings which concerned that People; but the year only of the Incarnation of our Lord and Saviour: which in effect was to disclaim the Sovereignty of the Crown of France.

1131 10 Raymond V. Son of Raymond the fourth, and Douce Countess of Provence, married Petronilla Daughter of Raymair, or Raymond the second, King of Aragon; whom he succeeded in that Kingdom, Anno 1134. Uniting these Estates together, never since disjoyned: the chief Procurer of this match being William Raymond of Moncada spoken of before.

The Arms hereof were four Pallets Gules, in a field Or; now the Arms of Aragon. Which Arms were given to Geoffry, surnamed the Hairy, the first Earl hereof, by Lewis the Stammering Emperour and King of France, to whose aid he came against the Normans with a Troop of Horse: and being bloody in the fight, desired of the Emperour to give him some Coat of Arms, which he and his Posterity might from thenceforth use. Who dipping his four fingers in the blood of the Earl, drew them thwart his Shield (which was only of Plain Gold, without any Devise) saying, This shall be your Arms hereafter.

14. The Kingdom of MAJORCA.

THE Kingdom of MAJORCA contained the Islands of Majorca, Minorca, Ebusa, and Frumentaria, in the Mediterranean; the Land of Roussillon, Sardaigne, or Cerdagne, in the Continent of Spain; and the Earldom of Montpellier, in France.

The Land of ROUSSILLON, which is the first Member of this Kingdom, is situate betwixt two Branches of the Pyrenees; bounded on the South with the Mediterranean; on the West, with Catalogne; on the North, with the said Pyrenees; on the East, with Languedoc in France. Places of most importance in it, are 1 Helna, a Bishops See on the River Techo. 2 Colliure, now a poor and ignoble Village, of note only for a safe and commodious Harbour; but formerly the great and famous City of Illiberis, so often mentioned in the Wars betwixt Rome and Carthage. 3 Pypignan (in Latine, Pypinianum) built in the year 1068. by Guinard Earl of Roussillon, in a pleasant Plain on the River Thelis; now a rich Town, well traded, and as strongly fortified against the French; to whose fury in the time of war it is still exposed. Belieged by Henry, Son to King Francis the first, with a puissant Army, Anno 1542. Partly to be revenged upon Charles the fifth, who had before attempted Marcellus in Provence; and partly to get into his hands the chief dore of Spain, by which he might at all times enter into that Kingdom. But he found here such strong resistance, that he was fain to raise his siege, with as little honour, as Charles had gotten by the Expedition which he made into Provence. 4 Salsus (the Salsus of Strabo) a strong place on the Frontier of Languedoc; fortified according to the Rules of modern Fortification, and one of the chief Bulwarks against the French. 5 Roussillon, a Castle of more bombur and antiquity, than strength or beauty, by Pliny, and other Ancients, called Ruscino, the Countrey Cematus Ruscinonensis, now Roussillon, and the Land of Roussillon; accounted heretofore a part of Gaul of Narbonensis, and added unto Spain in the time of the Goths. On the death of Girard, the last Proprietary Earl, it was added to the Crown of Aragon by Alfonso the second; by James the first, laid to the Kingdom of Majorca; united to the Crown again by King Pedro the fourth. After that sold (or rather pawned) by King John the second, to Lewis the eleventh of France for the sum of 300000 Crowns, Anno 1462. and freely returned back again to Ferdinand the second, (after called the Catholic) by King Charles the eighth, Anno 1493, conditioned that he should not hinder him in the Conquest of Naples. Joyning hereto as part of the Kingdom of Majorca, was the Countrey of Sardaigne, or Cerdagne; the habitation of the Ceretani in former times, and afterwards accounted of as a part of Aragon. The chief Town of those Ceretani, called Julia Lylica; the principal now being hath the name of Cardono (or Sardona as the Spaniards commonly pronounce) retaining some resemblance to the name of the Nation. The Countrey lying in the Valleys of the Pyrenees, and consequently in a corner somewhat out of the way; was thought fit to be added to the Land of Roussillon (for the better endowment of this Kingdom): the Fortunes of which it hath since followed, as appendent on it; pawned when that was unto the French, and with that restored.

2 The Earldom of MONTPELIER is situate in the Province of Languedoc, adjoining to the Land of Roussillon; so called from Montpelier, the chief City: for the description whereof, we must send the Reader back to France, having spoken of it there already. All I shall here repeat is this, that Mary the Daughter of William the last Earl thereof, brought it by marriage to her husband Peter the second, King of Aragon: and that it was sold to Philip de Valois the French King, by James King of Majorca, of that name the third. Nothing else memorable in the story and affairs of this little Earldom, but the Aragon and Navarre by a second Wife: and the fifth of that name of Castile and Leon, which Kingdoms he obtained by the marriage of Isabel or Elizabeth, Sister and Heir of Henry the fourth; uniting thereby the great Estates of Castile and Aragon, and all Appendixes of either. In which regard he may well challenge the first place in the Catalogue of the Monarchs of Spain, to be presented in due season.

In the mean time to draw to a conclusion of the affairs and Estate of Aragon, we are to understand, that of all the Kingdoms which belong to the Spaniards, it is the most privileged, and free from the absolute command of the Kings of Spain: having in it such a temper or mixture of Government, as makes the Kings hereof to be well-nigh similar; of little more authority than a Duke of Venice. For at the first erecting of this Estate, the better to encourage the people to defend themselves against the Moors, they had many Privileges indulged them; and amongst others the creating of a Justiciar or popular Magistrate; which, like the Ephors of Sparta, had in some cases, superiority over their Kings, reversing their judgements, cancelling their Grants, and sometimes censuring their proceedings. And though King Philip the second in the business of Antonio de Perez had made a Conquest of that Kingdom, and annulled all their Privileges; yet after of his own meer goodness he restored them (in part) again, as they continue at this day.

Chief Orders of Knighthood (besides that of Mercede, spoken of before) in this Kingdom, are, 1 Of S. Saviour, instituted by Alfonso the first, An. 1118. to animate the Members of it against the Moors. Of the habit and customs of this Order I have met with nothing.

2 Of Montesa, instituted by James the first, King of Aragon, An. 1270. or thereabouts. Endowed with all the Lands of the Templars (before dissolved) lying in Valencia; together with the Town and Cattle of Montesa, made the Seat of their Order, whence it took the name. Subject at first, unto the Master of the Order of Calatrava, out of which extracted; and under the same Rule of Cisterneux. But after, by the leave of Pope Benedict the 13th. they quitted themselves of that subjection; and in sign thereof, changed the Habit of Calatrava, which before they used, to a Red Cross upon their Breasts, now the badge of the Order.

The Arms of Aragon since possessed by the Earls of Barcelona, are Or, four Pallets Gules: before which, they were Azure, a Cross Argent.

The Monarchy of SPAIN.

Thus having spoke of Spain, and the Estate thereof, when broken and divided into many Kingdoms; let us next look upon it as united into one main body: effected for the most part by Ferdinand the last King of Aragon, before mentioned. Before which time Spain being parcelled into many Kingdoms, was little famous and less feared; the Kings thereof as the Author of the Politick Discourse, &c. hath well observed, being only Kings of Figs and Oranges. Their whole puissance was then turned against one another; and small Achievements had they out of that Continent, except those of the House of Aragon upon Sicily, Naples, Sardinia, and the Balears. Thunanus, a diligent Writer of the History of his own times, (if in some things he favour not more of the Patri than the Historian) telleth us, that before this Kings Reign, the name and glory of the Spaniards was like their Countrey; hemmed in by the Seas on some sides, and the Hills on the other: Potiusq; patuisse exteris invadentibus, quam quicquam memorabile extra suos fines gessisse. 'Tis true, that Sancho the Great, King of Navarre, assumed unto himself the Title of King of Spain; and that Alfonso the fourth of Castile, and the ninth of Leon, caused himself to be crowned Emperour of Spain, in the Cathedral Church of Leon: Titles ambitiously affected upon no good ground, and such as ended with their Persons. But this Prince worthily named the Great, seized on the Kingdom of Navarre, conquered Granada from the Moors, subdued the Kingdom of Naples, united Aragon to Castile, banished 124000 Families of the Jews; began by the conduct of Columbus, the discovery of the Western Indies: and finally by marrying his Daughter Joan to Philip, Son of the Emperour Maximilian, Duke of Burgundy, and Lord of the greatest part of the Netherlands, laid the Foundation of the present Austrian greatness. Continued since by so many intermarriages, betwixt the Spanish and Imperial Branches of that potent Family; that Philip the second might have called the Arch-duke Albertus, Brother, Cousin, Nephew, and Son. A strange Medley of Relations. Thus by the puissance of this Prince, the Spaniards became first considerable in the eye of the World, and grew to be a terror to the Neighbouring Nations. Nomen Hispanicum obscurum antea & Vicinis pene incognitum, (saith the same Thunanus) tum primis emerit, trahitq; temporis in tantam magnitudinem excrevit, ut formidolosum ex eo, & terribile toti terrarum Orbi esse cepit. And he saith true, with reference to the French, and Italian Nations; to whom the Spaniards have administered no small matter of fear and terror: though unto others they appear no such dreadful Bugs-bears. But sure it is, and we may warrantably speak it without any such impressions of fear and terror, that this Kingdom since that time is wonderfully both enlarged and strengthened: strongly compacted in it self, with all the Ligaments both of Power and State, and infinitely extended over over all parts of the World, his Dominions beholding (as it were) both the rising and the setting of the Sun; which before the Spaniard no Monarch could ever say. A greater change, than any man can possibly imagine to have been effected in so short a time, as was between the first year of Ferdinand the Catholic, and the last year of Charles the fifth.

Concerning the title of the most Catholic King, re-attributed to this Ferdinand, I find that Alfonso the first of Oviedo, was so named for his sanctity: with whom it died, and was revived in Alfonso the Great, the twelfth King of Leon and Oviedo, by the grant of Pope John the 8th. After it lay dead till the days of this Prince, who re-obtained this title from Pope Alexander the sixth: either because he compelled the Moors to be baptized, banished the Jews, and in part converted the Americans unto Christianity; or because having united Castile to his Dominions, surprized the Kingdom of Navarre, and subdued that of Granada, he was in a manner the Catholic, or general King of all Spain. The last reason seemeth to sway most in the restoration of this attribute, in that when it was granted and confirmed on Ferdinand, by Pope Alexander the sixth, the King of Portugal exceedingly stomached at it: Quando Ferdinandus imperio universam Hispaniam (saith Mariana) non obtineret, ejus tum non exigua parte penes Reges alios. It seems Emanuel could not think himself a King of Portugal, if the title of the Catholic King did belong to Ferdinand. Wherein he was of the same mind, as was Gregory the Great, who when John of Constantinople had assumed to himself the title of the Oecumenical or Catholic Bishop; advised all Bishops of the World to oppose that arrogancy: and that upon the self-same reason, Nam sile est Catholicus, non est Episcopus, for if John were the Catholic Bishop, they were none at all. But upon what consideration soever it was first re-granted, it hath been ever since assumed by his Posterity: to whose Crown as hereditary and in common use, as the most Christian King to France, the Defender of the Faith to England.

And yet there was some further reason, why the Spaniard might affect the title of Catholic King, his Empire being Catholic in regard of extent (though not of Orthodoxy of doctrines) as reaching not over all Spain only, but over a very great part of the World besides. For in right of the Crown of Castile he possesseth the Towns of Adellila and Oran, the Haven of Mafalquivir, the Rock of Velez, and the Canary Islands in Africa; the Continent and Islands of all America except Brasil, and some Plantations in the North, and in the Cannibal Islands, of the English, Hollanders, and a few poor French. In the right of the Kingdom of Aragon, he enjoyeth the Realms of Naples, Sicily, and Sardinia, with many Islands interspersed in the Mediterranean; and in the right of the house of Burgundy, the Counties of Burgundy and Charolais, the greatest part of Belgium, with a title unto all the rest: besides the great Dukedom of Millain, the Havens of Telamon and Plumbino, and many other pieces of importance in Italy, held by investiture from the Empire. To which if those Estates be added which accrewed to Philip the second by the Crown of Portugal, we have the Towns of Ceuta, Tangier, and Maragon in Barbary, the Fortresses of Arguin and S. George in Guinea, the Islands of Azores, Madera, Cape Verd, S. Thomas, Del Principe, on this side of the Cape, and of Mesambique on the other: in Asia all the Sea-coast almost from the Gulf of Perfia unto China, and many strong holds in the Moluccos, Bantan, Zellan, and other Islands; and finally in America the large Countrey of Brasil, extending in length 1500 miles. An Empire of extent enough, to appropriate to these Monarchs the title of Catholic.

The Monarchs of Spain.

- A. Ch.
1478 1 Ferdinand, King of Aragon, Sicily, Sardinia, Majorca, Valencia, Earl of Catalogne, surprized Navarre, and conquered the Realm of Naples.
Isabel, Queen of Castile, Leon, Galicia, Toledo, Murcia, Lady of Biscay, conquered Granada, and discovered America.
1504 2 Joan Princess of Castile, Granada, Leon, &c. and of Aragon, Navarre, Sicily, &c.
Philip Archduke of Austria, Lord of Belgium.
1516 3 Charles King of Castile, Aragon, Naples, &c. Archduke of Austria, Duke of Millain, Burgundy, Brabant, &c. Earl of Catalogne, Flanders, Holland, &c. Lord of Biscay, Friseland, Utrecht, &c. and Emperour of the Germans. He added the Realms of Mexico and Peru, the Dukedom of Gelderland and Millain, the Earldom of Zutphen, and the Signeuries of Utrecht, Over-Tyssel, and Groynning, unto his Estates. A Prince of that magnanimity and puissance, that had not Francis the first in time opposed him, he had even swallowed all Europe. He was also for a time of great strength and reputation in Tunis and other parts of Africa, disposing Kingdoms at his pleasure: but the Turk broke his power there, and being hunted also out of Germany, he resigned all his Kingdoms, and died private. 42.
1558 4 Philip II. Of more ambition, but less prosperity than his Father; fortunate only in his attempt on the Kingdom of Portugal, but that sufficiently ballanced by his ill successes in the Netherlands, and against the English. For the Hollanders and their Confederates drove him out of eight of his Belgick Provinces: the English overthrew his Invincible Armada, intercepted his Plate-Fleets, and by awing the Ocean had almost impoverished him. And though he held for a time an hard hand upon France, in hope to have gotten that Crown by the help of the Leaguers: yet upon casting up his Accompts, he found that himself was the greater loser by that undertaking. So zealous in the cause of the Romish Church, that it was thought that his eldest Son Charles was put to death with his consent in the Inquisition house, for seeming favourably inclined to the Low-Country-
C c Hereticks.

Hereticks, as the Spaniards called them. These four great Kings were all of the Order of the Garter; but neither of the two that followed.

1598 5 Philip III. Finding his Estate almost destroyed by his Fathers long and chargeable Wars, first made peace with England, and then concluded a Truce for twelve years with the States of the Netherlands: which done, he totally banished all the *Moor*s out of Spain, and was a great stickler in the Wars of Germany.

1621 6 Philip IV. Son of Philip the third, got into his power all the Lower Palatinate; but lost the whole Realm of Portugal, and the Province of Catalonia, with many of his best Towns in Flanders, Artois, and Brabant, and some Ports in Italy: not yet recovered to that Crown, from the power of the French.

This Empire consisting of so many several Kingdoms united into one Body, may seem to be invincible. Yet had Queen Elizabeth followed the counsel of her men of War, she might have broken it in pieces. With 4000 men, she might have taken away his Indies from him: without whose Gold, the Low Country Army (which is the very best) could not be paid, and by consequence must needs have been dissolved. Nay Sir Walter Raleigh in the Epilogue of his most excellent History of the World, plainly affirmeth, that with the charge of 200000 l. continued but for two years, or three at the most, the Spaniards might not only have been persuaded to live in peace; but that all their swelling and overflowing streams, might be brought back to their natural channels and old banks. Their own Proverb saith, the Lion is not so fierce as he is painted: yet the Americans tremble at his name, it's true; and it is well observed by that great Politician Machiavel, that things which seem to be, and are not, are more feared far off, than near at hand. Nor is this judgment built upon weak conjectures, but such as shew the power of Spain not to be so formidable, as it's commonly supposed: which I find marshalled to my hand in this manner following. 1. The disjointedness of his Realms and other Estates, severed by infinite distances both of Sea and Land, which makes one part unable to relieve or defend the other. 2ly, The slowness of his Preparations in offensive or defensive Wars, his Forces of necessity being long a gathering in places so remote from the Royal Seat; and being gathered no less subject to the dangers both of Sea and Land, before united into a body, and made fit for action. 3ly, The danger and uncertainty which the most part of his Forinsique Revenues are subject to, many times intercepted by Pirates and open Enemies; sometimes so long delayed by cross Winds and Seas, that they come too late to serve the turn. 4ly, The different tempers and affections of a great part of his Subjects, nor easily concurring in the same ends, or travelling the same way unto them. 5ly, The discontentedness of the Aragonians, Portuguese, and Italian Provinces, not well affected, for their private and particular reasons, unto the Castilians; apt to be wrought on by the Ministers of neighbouring Princes, whom jealousies of State keep watchful upon all advantages, for the depressing of his power. 6ly, And last of all, the want of people of his own natural Subjects, whom he may best rely on for the increase and grandure of his Estates exhausted and diminished by those ways and means, which have been touched upon before; without any politique or provident course, to remedy that defect for the time to come. And this I look on as the greatest and most sensible Error in the Spanish Government: therein directly contrary to the ancient Romans; Who finding that nothing was more necessary for great and important enterprizes than multitudes of Men, employed all their studies to increase their numbers by Marriages, Colonies, and such helps; making their conquered Enemies free Denizens of their Common-wealth: by which means the number of the Roman Citizens became so great (all being equally interested in the preservation of it) that Rome could not be ruined (in Annibals judgment) by any forces but her own. But on the other side the Spaniards employ none in their Plantations but their own native Subjects, and so many of them also in all their enterprizes both by Sea and Land, that so many thousands going forth every year, in the flower of their age, not one of ten returning home, and those few which return, either lame or old: the Country is not only deprived of the Men themselves, but also of the Children which might be born. An evidence whereof may be, that John the first of Portugal, who reigned before the several Voyages and Plantations of that people, was able to raise 40000 Men, for the War of Africa: whereas Emanuel who lived after those undertakings, had much ado to raise 20000 foot and 3000 horse on the same occasion; and Sebastian after that found as great a difficulty, to raise an Army of 12000.

As for the Forces which the King of Spain is able to make out of all his Estates, they may be best seen by his preparations for the Conquest of England, France, and Flanders. In his design for England, An. 1588. he had a Fleet consisting 150 sail of Ships, whereof 66 were great Gallies, 4 Gallies of Naples, 4 Gallies, the rest smaller Vessels: freighted with 20000 Souldiers for land service, 9000 Saylers, 800 Gunners, 4000 Pioneers, 2650 pieces of Ordinance: not reckoning into this account the Commanders and Volunteers, of which last there were very great numbers who went upon that service for Spoil, Merit, or Honor. In the design of Charles the fifth for the Conquest of Provence, he had no less than 50000 in the field; and in that of Philip the second for the reducing of Flanders, the Duke of Alva had an Army, at his first setting forward out of Italy, consisting of 8800 Spanish foot, and 1200 horse; all of them old experienced Souldiers, drawn out of Naples, Sicily, and the Dutchie of Millain, 3600 German foot, 300 Lances, and 100 Harcubisers on horseback of the County of Burgundy, all old Souldiers also; besides many Volunteers of great rank and quality, very well attended, and his old standing Army in the Belgick Provinces; a strength sufficient to have conquered a far greater Country.

Of standing forces in this Country, he maintaineth in these Realms of Spain, but three thousand horse, and in his Forts and Garrisons no more then 8000 Foot: his Garrisons being very few, and those those upon the Frontiers only, and in Maritime Towns; his Gallies served with slaves out of Turkey, and Barbary. And yet he is able on occasion to raise very great forces, partly because the ordinary subjects are so well affected to their Prince, whom they never mention without reverence: and partly in regard thereto is so great a number of Fendataries and Noblemen, who are by Tenure to serve personally at their own charges for defence of the Realm. And certainly it must be a considerable force which the Noblemen of Spain are able to raise, considering the greatness of their Revenue, and the number of Vassals which live under them: it being supposed that the Dukes of Spain (of which there were 23 when my Author lived) were able one with another to dispend yearly from 50000 Ducats to a 100000, some going very much above that proportion; and that of 36 Marquesses and 50 Earls, the poorest had 10000 Ducats of yearly Rent; and so ascending unto 50 and 60000. The Archbishops, Bishops, and others of the greater Clergie, being all endowed with fairer Temporal Estates, than in most places of Europe; are also bound to serve (though not personally) on the like occasions. And to these services the Noblemen are for two reasons more forwards than the other Fendataries. 1 Because their honors descend not de jure from the Father to the Son, unless confirmed to the Son by the Kings acknowledgment and compellation: which makes them more observant of him, than in France or England, where it is challenged as a Birth-right. 2 Because out of the gross body of these Noblemen, the King doth use to honor some with the title of Grandeess; privileged to stand covered before the King, and to treat with him as their Brother: which being the highest honor which that State can yield, keeps those great persons in a readiness to obey his pleasure, in hope to come to an honor of so high esteem.

For the Revenue of this King, which ordinarily arise out of his Estates (taking Portugal into the account) they are computed at 11 millions of Crowns yearly, that is to say, four from his Dominions in Spain, two from Portugal and the Appertinents thereof, three from the West-Indies, and the other two remaining from his Kingdoms in Spain. Besides this he receiveth yearly the Revenues of the Masterships of all the great Orders in his Kingdom, incorporated to the Crown by Ferdinand the Catholic, not without good Policy and reason of State: the Masters (or Commendadors, as they call them) of those several Orders drawing after them such troops of the Nobility, Gentry, and other dependants; that their power began to be suspected by the Kings themselves. By which addition there accreth to the Crown (besides the opportunity of preferring servants of the greatest merit) above 150000 l. of yearly Rents. As for his Casualties and extraordinary ways of raising money, they are very great: reckoned by the Author of the General History of Spain to amount (according to divers opinions) to 14. 18. and 23 millions of Crowns. For making up of which sum, he puts in the First Fruits, and some part of the *Tenth*s of Rectories; and other Church preferments, amounting to three millions yearly. And the Author of the Politique Dispute, &c. affirmeth the Pardons sent to the Indies, given him by the Pope, to be worth half a million of pounds yearly. Add hereunto the fall and disposal of all Offices, which make up a good round sum; and the free Gifts and Contributions of his Subjects, which amount unto a good Revenue. For the Kingdom of Naples presents him every third year with a million and 20000 Crowns; and Castile only at one time granted a Contribution of four millions, to be paid in four years: his Subjects generally being so well affected unto the Crown, that he can demand nothing in reason of them which they are not ready to grant; the King of Spain being called in that regard by the Emperor Maximilian the King of Men. And yet this great King is not counted to be rich in treasure, his expences being very great. First, in keeping Forts and Garrisons in many parts of his Estates against the revolt of the Natives; Secondly, maintaining so many Frontier places, against foreign Invasions; Thirdly, in the continual pay of of an Armada for Conducting his Plate-Fleets from America; And last of all the many and unprofitable Wars of King Philip the second, so plunged the Crown in the Gulf of Bankers and Money-changers, that much of the Revenues of it stand engaged for payment to this very day.

lous and foolish, and but few of weight. That which hath passed for current in former times, (when almost all Nations did pretend to be of Trojan race) was that it took this name from Brutus, affirmed to be the Son of Silvius, who was the Grandchild of Æneas, and the third King of the Latines of the Trojan blood. Which Brutus having unfortunately killed his Father, and thereupon abandoning Italy with his friends and followers; after a long voyage, and many wandrings, is said to have fallen upon this Island, to have conquered here a race of Giants; and having given unto it the name of Britain, to leave the Sovereignty thereof unto his posterity, who quietly enjoyed the fame, till subdued by the Romans. This is the sum of the Tradition concerning Brute: Which though received in the darker times of ignorance, and too much credulity; in these more learned days hath been laid aside, as false and fabulous. And it is proved that there was no such man as Brutus, 1 From the newness of his Birth, Gesfr of Monmouth, who lived in the reign of King Henry the second, being the first Author which makes mention of him: for which immediately questioned by Newbrigenfis, another Writer of that Age. 2ly, By the silence of all the Roman Historians, in whom it had been an unpardonable negligence to have omitted an Accident so remarkable, as the killing of a Father by his own Son (especially when they wanted matter to fill up the times) and the erecting of a new Trojan Empire in so great an Island. 3ly, By the Arguments which Cæsar useth to prove the Britains to be derived from the Galls; as Speech, Laws, Customs, Dispositions, Making, and the like. 4ly, And lest it might be said, that though the Britains in Cæsar's time were of Gallick race, yet there had been a former and more ancient people, who had their Original from the Trojans: Tacitus putteth off that dispute with an Ignoramus: Quintus in initio coluerint parum compertum est, saith that knowing writer. And 5ly, By the Testimony of all Roman Histories, who tell us that Cæsar found the Britains under many Kings, and never under the command of one sole Prince, but in times of danger. Summa Belli administrandi communi consensu commissa est Calpurnellano, as it is in Cæsar: Dum singuli pugnabant, universi vincebantur, as we read in Tacitus. To omit therefore that of Brutus, and other Etymons as unlikely, but of less authority: the name of Britain most probably derived from Brit, which in the ancient British signifieth Painted; and the word Tain, signifying a Nation: agreeable unto the custom of the ancient Britains, who used to discolour and paint their bodies, that they might seem more terrible in the eyes of their enemies. Britain is then a Nation of painted men; such as the Romans called Picti in the times ensuing. Which I prefer before the Etymologie of Bochartus, a right learned man, but one that wresteth all originations to the Phœnician language: by whom this Island is called Britain or Britannica, from Barat-anac, signifying in that language a land of Tynne, wherewith the Western parts of it do indeed abound. Other particulars concerning the Isle of Britain, shall be observed in the description of those parts into which it now doth stand divided, that is to say, 1 England, 2 Wales, and 3 Scotland.

ENGLAND.

ENGLAND is bounded on the East, with the German; on the West, with the Fris; on the South, with the British Oceans; and on the North, with the Rivers of Tweed and Solway; by which parted from Scotland: Environed with turbulent Seas, guarded by inaccessible Rocks: and where those want, preserved against all foreign invasions by strong Ports, and a puissant Navy.

In former time the Northern limits did extend as far as Edinburgh Fryth on the East, and the Fryth of Dunbriton on the West, (for so far not only the Roman Empire, but the Kingdom of Northumberland did once extend:) the intervenient space being shut up with a wall of Turf by Lollus Urbicus, in the time of Antonius Pius. But afterwards, the Romans being beaten back by the Barbarous people, the Province was contracted within narrow bounds; and fortified with a Wall by the Emperor Severus, extending from Carlisle to the River Tine, the track whereof may easily be discerned to this very day. A Wall so made, that at every miles end there is said to have been a Castle, between every Castle many Watch-Towers; and betwixt every Watch-Tower a Pipe of Brass, conveying the least noise unto one another without interruption: so that the news of any approaching enemy was quickly over all the Borders, and resistance accordingly provided. In following times the strong Towns of Barwick, and Carlisle, have been the chief Bars, by which we kept the backdoor shut: and as for other Ports, we had scarce any on the Frontiers, or Sea Coasts of the Kingdom; though in the midland parts too many. Which being in the hands of potent and factious Subjects, occasioned many to rebel; and did create great trouble to the Norman Kings: till in the latter end of the reign of King Stephen, 1100 of them were levelled to the very ground, and those few which remained dismantled, and made unserviceable. The Maritime parts were thought sufficiently assured by those Rocks and Cliffs, which compass the Island in most parts: and hardly any Castle all along the shore, except that of Dover; which was therefore counted by the French, as the Key of England. But in the year 1538. King Henry the eighth, considering how he had offended the Emperor Charles the fifth, by his divorce from Queen Katharine; and incurred the displeasure of the Pope, by his falling off from that See; as also that the French King had not only married his Son to a Niece of the Pope, but a Daughter of the King of Scots; thought fit to provide for his own safety, by building in all places where the shore was most plain and open, Castles, Platforms and Blockhouses; many of which in the long time of peace ensuing were much neglected and in part ruined.

His Daughter Queen Elizabeth of happy memory, provided yet better for the Kingdom. For she not only fortified Portsmouth, and placed in it a strong Garrison; but walled the Kingdom round with a most most stately, royal, and invincible Navy: with which she always commanded the Seas, and vanquished the mightiest Monarch of Europe; whereas her predecessors in their Sea Service, for the most part, hired their men of War, from the Hansemen, and Genese. Yet did neither of these erect any Castles in the inward part of the Realm: herein imitating Nature, who fortifieth the head and the feet only, not the middle of Beasts; or some Captain of a Fort, who plants all his Ordinances on the Walls, Bulwarks, and Out-works; leaving the rest by these sufficiently guarded.

The whole Island was first called Albion, as before is said, either from the Giant Albion, or ab albis rupibus, the white Rocks towards France. Afterwards it was called Britain, which name being first found in Athenians, amongst the Grecians, and in Lucretius and Cæsar, amongst the Latines; followed herein by Strabo, Pliny, and all other ancient writers, except Ptolomy only, by whom called Albion as at first; continued till the time of Egbert the first Saxon Monarch, who called the Southern parts of the Island by the name of England, from the Angles, who with the Jutes and Saxons conquered it.

It is in length 320 miles, enjoying a soil equally participating of ground fit for tillage; and pasture: yet to pasture more then to tillage are our people addicted, as a course of life not requiring so many helpers, which must be all fed and paid; and yet yielding more certain profits. Hence in former times Husbandry began to be neglected, Villages depopulated, and Hinds for want of entertainment to turn way-beaters: whereof Sir Thomas Moore in his Utopia complaineth, saying, that our Flocks of Sheep had devoured not only men, but whole houses and Towns. Oves (saith he) quæ tam miles esse, tam exiguo solent ali; nunc tam edaces, & indomita esse caperant, ut homines devorant ipsos, agros, domos, oppida vastant, ac depopulantur. To prevent this mischief, there was a Statute made in the fourth year of Henry the seventh, against the converting of Arable Land into Pasture ground: by which course Husbandry was again revived, and the soil made to abound in Corn, that a dear year is seldom heard of. Our Vines are nipped with the cold, and seldom come to maturity; and are more used for the pleantness of the shade, than for the hopes of wine. Most of her other plenty and Ornaments, are expressed in this old verse following.

Anglia, 1 Mons, 2 Pons, 3 Fons, 4 Ecclesiæ, 5 Famina, 6 Lana.

That is to say;

For 1 Mountains, 2 Bridges, 3 Rivers, 4 Churches faire,
5 Women, and 6 Wooll, England is pait compare.

1 For the Mountains lifting up here and there their lofty heads, and giving a gallant prospect to the lower Grounds; the principal are those of Mendip in Somerset, Malvern hills in Worcestershire, the Chiltern of Buckinghamshire, Cotswold in Glostershire, the Peak of Derbyshire, Tork Walds, &c. All of them either bowelled with Mines, or clothed with Sheep, or adorned with Woods. The exact description of which, would require more time then I can spend upon that subject. Proceed we therefore to

2 The Bridges, which are in number 875. The chief of which are, the Bridge of Rocheſter; over Medway, the Bridge of Bristol, over Avon, and the Bridge of London, over Thames. This last standing upon 19 Arches of wonderful strength and largeness, supporteth continual ranges of buildings, seeming rather a Street then a Bridge; and is not to be paralleled with any Bridge of Europe; though of late by some defacement made by fire, Anno 1632. the buildings are not so contiguous, as they were before.

The Rivers of this Countrey are in number 325. The chief is Thamisis, compounded of the two Rivers, Thame and Isis; whereof the former rising somewhat beyond Thame in Buckinghamshire, and the latter beyond Cyreneſter in Glostershire, meet together about Dorcheſter in Oxfordshire: the issue of which happy conjunction is the Thamisis or Thames. Hence it flyeth betwixt Berks, Buckinghamshire, Middlesex, Surrey, Kent, and Essex; and to weddeth himself to the Kentish Medway, in the very jaws of the Ocean. This glorious River feeleth the violence of the Sea more then any River in Europe; ebbing and flowing twice a day, more than 60 miles: about whose banks are so many fair Towns, and Princely Palaces; that a German Poet thus truly spoke.

Artifici excoltos dextra, tot vidimus arces;
Ut nunc Anſonio Thamisis cum Tibride certat.*

We saw so many Woods and Princely Bowers;
Sweet Fields, brave Palaces, and stately Towers:
So many Gardens, dress'd with curious care,
That Thames with Royal Tiber may compare.

The second River of note, is Salvina or Severn. It hath its beginning in Pinlinton hill in Montgomeryshire, and his end about seven miles from Bristol: washing in the mean space, the wals of Shrewsbury, Worceſter, and Gloceſter. 3 Trent; so called, for that 30 kind of Fishes are found in it, or that it receiveth 30 lesser Rivers: who having his Fountain in Staffordshire, and gliding through the Countreies of Nottingham, Lincoln, Leiceſter, and Tork, augmenteth the turbulent current of Humber, the most violent stream of all the Isle. Yet Humber is not, to say truth, a distinct River, having a spring head of his England. his own; but rather the mouth or Estuaries of divers Rivers here confluent and meeting together, namely, Toune, Darent, and especially Ouse and Trent. And as the Danow, having received into its Channel the Rivers, Drum, Savus, Tibiscus, and divers others, changeth his name into Ister: So also the Trent, receiving and meeting the waters above named, changeth his name into this of Humber; Abus, the old Geographers call it. 4 Medway, a Kentish River, famous for harbouring the Royal Navy. 5 Tyde, the North-east bound of England, on whose Northern bank is seated the strong and impregnable Town of Barnwick. 6 Tine, famous for Newcastle and her inexhaustible Coal-pits. These and the rest of Principal note are thus comprehended in one of M. Drayton's Sonnets.

Our Floods Queen Thames for Ships and Swans is crown'd,
And stately Severn for her shore is prais'd,
The Crystal Trent for Fords and Fish renown'd;
The Avon fame to Albion's cliffs is rais'd.
Carlegion Chester vaunts her holy Dee,
Tork many Wonders of her Ouse can tell,
The Peak her Dove, whose banks so fertile be,
And Kent will say her Medway doth excell.
Cotswold commends her Ips to the Thame,
Our Northern borders boasts of Tweeds fair flood;
Our Western parts extoll their Willies Fame,
And the old Lea brags of the Danish blood.

4 The Churches, before the general suppression of Abbies, and spoiling the Church ornaments, were most exquisite; the chief remaining, are 1 the Church of S. Paul founded by Ethelbert King of Kent, in the place where once was a Temple consecrated to Diana: A Fabrick of the largest dimensions of that kind, of any in the Christian World. For whereas the so much celebrated Temple of S. Sophia in Constantinople, hath but 260 foot in length, and 75 in breadth: this of S. Paul is 690 foot long, and 130 foot broad, the main body being 102 foot high, over which the Steeple of the Church was mounted 482 foot more. Which Steeple being made with Timber, and covered with Lead, was by the carelessness of the Sexton, in the fifth year of the reign of Q. Elizabeth, consumed with fire, which happening in a thundering and tempestuous day, was by him confidently affirmed to be done by Lightning, and was so generally believed till the hour of his death: but not many years since to disabuse the world, he confest the truth of it; on which discovery the burning of S. Paul's Steeple by lightning was left out of our common Almanacks; where formerly it stood amongst the ordinary Epoches, or accounts of time. A Church of such a gallant prospect, and so large dimensions, that had not the late reputation of it been discontinued, it would have been the stateliest and most majestic Fabrick in the Christian World. 2y, The Collegiate Church of S. Peter in Westminster, (wherein I have the honour to be a Præbendary) famous for the Inauguration and the Sepulture of the Kings of England, the Tombs whereof are the most sumptuous, and the Chappel the most accurate piece of building in Europe. 3y, The Cathedral Church at Lincoln. 4y, For a private Church, that of Radcliffe in Bristol. 5y, For a private Chappel, that of Kings College in Cambridge. 6y, For the curious workmanship of the glass, that of Christ Church in Canterbury. 7y, For the exquisite beauty of the Fronts, those of Wells and Peterborough. 8y, For a pleasant lightfom Church, the Abbey Church at Bath. 9y, For an antient and reverend Fabrick, the Minster of Tork. And 10y, to comprehend the rest in one, our Lady Church in Salisbury, of which take these Verses.

*Mira canam; soles quot continet annus, in una
Tum numerosa, ferunt, ade fenestra micat.
Marmoreasq; tenet fufas tot ab arte columnas,
Compreffas horæ quot vagus annus habet.
Totq; patent portæ, quot mensibus annus abundat:
Res miræ, at veræ res celebrata fide.*

How many daies in one whole year there be,
So many Windows in one Church we see.
So many marble Pillars there appear,
As there are hours throughout the fleeting year.
So many Gates as Moons one year do view;
Strange tale to tell, yet not so strange as true.

5 The Women generally are more handsome than in other places, sufficiently endowed with natural beauties, without the addition of adulterate Sophistications. In an absolute Woman, say the Italians, are required the parts of a Dutch Woman, from the girdle downwards; of a French Woman, from the girdle to the shoulders; over which must be placed an English face. As their beauties, so also are their Prerogatives the greatest of any Nation; neither so servilely submissive as the French, nor so jealously guarded as the Italian: but keeping so true a décorum, that as England is termed the Purgatory of Servants, and the Hell of Horses; so it is acknowledged the Paradise of Women. And it is a common by-word among the Italians, that if there were a Bridge built over the Narrow Seas, all the Women of of Europe would run into ENGLAND. For here they have the upper hand in the streets, the upper place at the Table, the thirds of their Husbands estates, and their equal share in all Lands, yea even such as are holden in Knights service: privileges wherewith other Women are not acquainted. Of high esteem in former times amongst forain Nations, for the modesty and gravity of their conversation; but of late times so much addicted to the light garb of the French, that they have lost much of their antient honour and reputation amongst the knowing and more sober men of forain Countries, who before admired them.

6 The Wooll of England, is of exceeding fineness, especially that of Cotswold, in Gloucestershire; that of Lemster, in Herefordshire; and of the Isle of Wight. Of this Wooll are made excellent broad-clothes, dispersed all over the World, especially High-Germany, Muscovie, Turkie, and Persia; to the great benefit of the Realm; as well in return of so much money which is made of them, as in setting to work so many poor people, who from it receive sustenance. Before the time of King Edward the third, English men had not the art, or neglected the use of making cloth: till whose time our Wooll was transported unwrought. And as his Successors have laid impositions on every cloth sold out of the Realm; so his Predecessors had, as their occasions required, some certain Customs granted on every sack of Wooll. In the beginning of this Edward's Wars with France, the Cities and Towns of Flanders being then even to admiration rich, combined with him, and aided him in his Wars against that King. And he for his part by the composition then made, was to give them 140000 l. ready money; to aid them by Sea and Land, if need required, and to make Bruges, then one of the great Mart Towns of Christendom, the Staple for his Wools. Here the Staple continued 15 years; at which time the Flemmings having broke off from the King; and he having by experience seen what the benefit of those Staples were; removed them from Bruges into England. And for the ease as well of his Subjects in bringing their Wools unto the Ports, as of such Forain Merchants as came to buy; he placed his Staples at Exeter, Bristol, Winchester, Westminster, Chichester, Canterbury, Norwich, Lincoln, York, and Newcastle, for England; at Carmarthen for Wales; and at Dublin, Waterford, Cork, and Tredah, for Ireland. He further enacted, that no English, Irish, or Welch men should transport this Stapled commodity, no not by License (if any such should be granted) on pain of confiscation, and Imprisonment during the Kings pleasure. Lastly, he allured over hither divers Flemmings, which taught our men the making of clothes, (who are now grown the best Clothworkers in the World;) and to encourage men in that Art, it was by a Statute of the 27th of Edward the third, enacted to be Felony, to carry any Wools unwrought. When England had some short time enjoyed the benefit of these Staples, the King removed them to Callice, which he had conquered, and desired to make wealthy. From hence they were at several times and occasions translated, now to one, now to another Town in Belgium: and happy was that Town; in what Country soever, where the English kept a house for this Traffick; the consequence of all people thither to buy, infinitely enriching it. Answer in Brabant long enjoyed the English Merchants, till upon some discontents between King Henry the seventh, and Maximilian, Archduke, and Lord of Belgium, they removed: but at their return again, were received by the Antwerpians, with solemn Procession, Princely Triumph, sumptuous Feasts, rare Banquetings, and other expressions of much Love, but more Joy. And giving of some Cotswold Sheep by Edward the fourth, to Henry of Castile, and John of Aragon, An. 1465. is counted one of the greatest prejudices that ever happened to this Kingdom.

The Wooll transported bringeth into the Kingdom no less than 1500000 l. and the Lead of the same sum, so that Lewis Guicciardine reporteth, that before the Wars of the Low-Countries, the Flemmings and the English bartered wares yearly to the value of 12 Millions of Crowns.

The next commodity to the Wooll, though not mentioned in the verse fore-going, are the rich and inexhaustible Mines of Cole, Lead, and Tin: to say nothing of the Adams of Iron, as bringing more damage to the publick by the spoil of Woods, then profit to particular persons in the increase of their Estates. The Mines of Cole chiefly enrich Newcastle in Northumberland, and by that the great City of London; and many other good Towns besides: which could not possibly subsist in this general decay of Woods, and neglect of planting, but by this commodity. The Mines of Lead are most considerable in the Peak of Darbyshire; those of Tin in Cornwall, where they dig Tin not much inferior to Silver in fineness. A commodity which brought great wealth to England in former times, the art of smelting it not being else where known in Europe; till one of the Tin-workers, flying out of England for a murder, passed into Germany, An. 1240. and there discovered some Tin Mines in Assinia, not known before, and set on foot that trade amongst them, to the great prejudice (saith my Author) of the Earls of Cornwall, who had before the sole Monopoly of that useful metal.

To these particulars being matters of profit and necessity, if I would add such things as are for delight and pleasure; I might subjoin the Bells and Parks; for which this Kingdom is as eminent amongst forain Nations, as for any of those mentioned in the said old Verse. The Bells so many, tunable, and of such excellent Melody to a Musical ear (brought more to the command of the skilful finger than in former times) that it is thought there are more good Rings of Bells in this part of the Island than in half Christendom besides. Parks more in England than in all Europe. The first of which kind for the making of Venison, being that of Woodstock, made by King Henry the first: whose example being followed by his Successors, and the Lords and great men of the Realm; the number so increased in a little time, that at last, beside 55 Forrests, and 300 Chases, there were reckoned 745 Parks in England; and well replenished either with Red or Fallow Deer.

And that the Deer might graze with pleasure, and the Sheep with safety, great care was taken by our progenitors for the destruction of Wolves. I know it hath been a tradition of old Writers, that England. England never had any Wolves at all, and that they would not live here brought from other places; but it is not so: here being store of them, till Edgar King of England commuted the 20 l. of Gold, 300 l. of Silver, and 300 head of Cattel imposed as an yearly tribute by King Aethelfrith upon Edwold Prince of Wales, for the like yearly tribute of 300 Wolves: by which means they were quite rooted out in time, the Welch protesting at the last they could find no more.

England.

The Air of this Country is very temperate, neither so hot as France and Spain in the Summer, because of its Northernly situation; nor so cold in the Winter; because the air of this Kingdom being gross, cannot so soon penetrate as the thin air of those Countries. For to say truth, the air in the Winter time is thick and foggy, cloudy, and much disposed to mists; especially near the Sea, and the greater Rivers: inasmuch that many times, the Sun is not seen to shine out clearly for some weeks together. And theupon there goeth a tale, that the great Constable of Castile being Ambassador to King James in the first Winter of his reign, and tarrying here about a month; is said not to have seen the Sun all the time of his stay: which occasioned him at his going on ship-board, to desire such Lords and Gentlemen as attended him thither, to present his humble service to the King their Master, and to the blessed Sun of Heaven when they chanced to see him. And something also touching the temperature of the Air, may be ascribed unto the Winds, which participating of the Seas, over which they pass unto us; do carry with them a temperate warmth.

But if warmth were all the benefit we received from the Seas, it might indeed be said, that we were come from Gods blessing into the warm Sun: but it is not so. For there are no Seas in Europe that yield more plenty of fish then ours. Our Oylers were famous in the times of the old Romans, and our Herrings are now very beneficial unto the Netherlands; to whom, the Englishmen, reserving to themselves a kind of Royalty, (for the Dutch by custom demand liberty to fish of Scarborough Castle in Yorkshire) have yielded up the commodity; By which those States are exceedingly enriched, and our Nation much impoverished, and condemned for laziness and sloth. Besides the loss of employment for many men, who using this trade might be a seminary of good and able Mariners, as well for the Wars, as for further Navigations and discoveries, cannot but be very prejudicial to the strength and flourishing of the Commonwealth and Empire of England.

But to make this appear more fully in all particulars, I shall extract some passages out of a M. S. discourse of the late learned Knight Sir John Burroughs, principal King of Arms by the name of Garter, entituled, The Sovereignty of the British Seas. By which it doth appear, that there is fishing in those Seas for Herrings, Pilchards, Cod, Ling, or other Fish, at all times of the year: and that too in so plentiful a manner, that not long since near Minnegal on the Coasts of Devonshire, 500 Ton of Fish were taken in one day, and 3000 pounds-worth in another near S. Ives in Cornwall; the Hollanders taking at one draught 20 lasts of Herrings. 2^{ly} That almost all Nations hereabouts, as French, Spaniards, Netherlands, and those of the Hanse, do mightily improve themselves both in power and wealth; by the benefit of the English Fishing; inasmuch as 10000 Sail of Forain Vessels (of which 1400 from the Town of Emden in East-Friesland only) are thought to be maintained by this trade alone. 3^{ly} That the Hollanders in particular employ yearly 8000 Vessels of all sorts for this trade of Fishing on our Coasts, all whereby they have a Seminary 150000 Saylers and Mariners, ready for any publick service: all which maintain treble that number of Men, Women and Children, of several trades upon the Land. 4^{ly} That for the holding up of this trade, the said Hollanders, inhabiting a Tract of Land not so big as many of our Shires, do build 1000 sail of Ships yearly; and thereby furnishing all the parts of the World (even as far as Brasil) with our commodities; returning home those of other Countreys in exchange thereof, which they sell to us many times at their own prices. 5^{ly} That the said Hollanders (as appeared upon computation) made in one year of the Herrings only, caught upon these Coasts, the sum of 5 Millions of our pounds, (the Customs, and tenth Fish, advancing to the publick Treasury no less then 800000 l. Sterling) &c. it being thought, that the Herrings caught by those of the Hanse Towns, and other Nations, amount to as great a sum as that. 6^{ly} and finally, that by erecting only 250 Buffets, (Vessels of great Bulk and Stowage, but not swift of sail) for the Herring-Fishing, (which is not a luxury part of those which are employed yearly by the Hollanders) either at the publick charge of the State of England, or private Adventurers thereto authorized and regulated; there would be found employment yearly for 1000 ships, and at least 20000 Mariners and Fishers at Sea, and consequently for as many Tradesmen and Labourers at Land: by means whereof, besides the vindication of our credit now at such a loss, there would arise in Customs, Tonnage, Poundage, and other Imposts, no less than 300000 l. per Annum to the publick Treasury. The prosecution of which Project (if not in greater proportion than that before) as it was once designed by Mr. Attorney Noy, my much honoured Friend: so do I heartily commend it to the care of the State, and to his Successors in that Office, as the fittest remembrancers to advance it: there being no readier way than this to make the people wealthy, and the Nation formidable.

For notwithstanding these advantages of Fish, the Diet of England is, for the most part Flesh; in London only there are no fewer then 67 500 Beefs, and 67 5000 Sheep slain, and uttered in a year, besides Calves, Lambs, Hogs-flesh, and Poultryers ware. To prove this, suppose there be in London 60 Butchers Free of the City, whereof every one, and one with another, killeth an Oxe a day, as at least they do. Then reckon (as the London Butchers do affirm) that the Forainers in the Suburbs and Villages sell four for their one. Lastly, count for every Oxe ten Sheep, (for this is also certainly known) to be killed and sold, and you have both the numbers above-mentioned. The Earl of Gandemar, once the Spanish Lieger here, having in some several Markets daies seen the several Shambles of this great City, said to them who made the discovery with him; That there was more flesh eaten in a month in that Town, than in all England. all Spain in a year. Now had I his skill who by the length of Hercules Foot, found out the proportion of his whole body, I might by this provision of Flesh consumed in the head, guess at the quantity of that which is spent in the body of the Realm. But this I leave to be determined by an abler hand. The usual and natural drink of the Country is Beer, so called from the French word Boire, (for Wines they have none of their own growing, as before is said) which, without controvercie, is a most wholesome and nourishing beverage; and being transported into France, Belgium, and Germany, by the working of the Sea is so purged, that it is amongst them in highest estimation; celebrated by the name of la bonne Beere d'Angle Terre. And as for the old drink of England, Ale, which cometh from the Danish word Ola, it is questionless in it self, (and without that commixture which some are accused to use with it) a very wholesome drink; howsoever it pleased a Poet in the time of Henry the third, chusto de-scant on it:

Cervisiam pleriq; vocant; nil spissum illa
Dum bibitur, nil clarum est dum mingitur; ergo
Constat quod multas facies in ventre relinquit.*

In English thus;

Of this strange drink so like the Stygian lake;
Men call it Ale, I know not what to make.
Folk drink it thick, and piss it very thin;
Therefore much Dregs must needs remain within.

Now to conclude this general discourse concerning England, there goes a tale, that Henry the seventh (whose breeding had been low and private) being once pressed by some of his Council, to pursue his title unto France, returned this Answer: That France indeed was a flourishing and gallant Kingdom; but England in his mind was a fine Seat for a Countrey Gentleman, as any could be found in Europe.

Having staid thus long in taking a Survey of the Country it self, together with the chief commodities and pleasures of it; and amongst them of the Women also, (as the method of the old Verse led me on:) it is now time that we should look upon the men. And they are commonly of a comely feature, gracious countenance, for the most part gray-eyed, pleasant, beautiful, bountiful, courteous, and much resembling the Italians in habit and pronunciation. In matters of war, (as we are ready to prove) they are both able to endure, and resolute to undertake the hardest enterprises in peace quiet, and not quarrelsome; in advice or counsel, sound and speedy. Finally, they are active, hearty, and cheerful. And yet I have met with some Gentlemen, who upon the strength of a little travel in France, have grown to un-Englished, (and so affected or befotted rather on the French Nation, that they affirm the English, in respect of the French, to be an heavy, dull, and Phlegmatick people; of no dispatch, no mettle, no conceit, no audacity, and I know not what not. A vanity, meriting rather my pity, than my anger. Perhaps in vilifying their Nation, they had consulted with Julius Scaliger, who in the 16. Chap. of his 3^d Book De re Poetica, giveth of the two most noble Nations, English, and Scottish, this base and unmanly Character, Gothi bellue, Scoti non minus; Angli perfidi, inflati, feri, contemptores, stolidi, amentes, inertes, inhospitales, inhumanes. His bolt (you see) is soon shot, and so you may happily guess at the quality of the Archer. A man indeed of an able learning, but of his own worth so highly conceited, that if his too much learning made him not mad, yet it made him to be too peremptory and arrogant. To revenge a National disgrace on a Personal, is an ignoble victory. Besides Socrates resolution in the like kind, in my opinion was very judicious, ἡ ἄνθρωπος ἰσχυρὸς, σκληρὸν δὲ αὐτὸν ἰσχυρὰν; If an Ale kick us, we must not put him in the Court. To confuse his censure in every point, would be to him too great an honour, and for me too great a labour; it being a task, which of it self would require a Volume. The best is, many shoulders make the burden light; and other Nations are as deeply engaged in this quarrel against that proud Man, as ours: for so maliciously hath he there taxed all other people, that that Chapter might more properly have been placed among his Hyperbicks.

How the English, and Germans, which of all Nations are thought most given to their bellies, do agree and differ in this point; the same Scaliger hath thus shewed in one of his Epigrams.

*Tres sunt Convivæ, Germanus, Flander, & Anglus;
Dic quis edat melius; quis meliusve bibat.
Non comedis Germane, bibis; tu non bibis Angle,
Sed comedis; comedis Flandre, bibisq; bene.*

Dutch, Flemmings, English, are your only guests;
Say which of all doth eat, or drink it best.
Th' English love most to eat, the Dutch to swill,
Only the Flemming eats and drinks his fill.

This

England.

Thus was it in his time with the English Nation; though since, I fear, we have borrowed too much of the Dutch, and learnt a great deal more than needs of the Flemming also.

The Nobility of this Country is not of so much unlimited Power, as they are (to the prejudice of the State) in other Countries; the name of Dukes, Earls, and Marquesses, being merely titular; whereas in other places they have some absolute, some mixt government; so that upon any little distast, they will stand on their own guard, and slight the power of their Sovereign. And on the other side, the Commonalty enjoy a multitude of Privileges above all other Nations; being most free from Taxes, and burdensome Impositions, but what they take upon themselves by their own consent. They have twice in a year (a laudable custom nowhere else to be seen) Justice administered even at their own doors, by the Itinerary Judges of the Kingdom: an Order first instituted by King Henry the second. They dwell together with the Gentlemen, in Villages, and Towns, which makes them favour of civility and good manners: and live in far greater reputation, than the Peasants in Italy, Spain, France, or Germany; being able to entertain a stranger honestly, diet him plentifully, and lodge him neatly.

The Clergy was once of very great riches, as appeareth by that Bill preferred to King Henry the fifth, against the temporal revenues of the Church; in which it was suggested, that they were able to maintain 15 Earls, 1500 Knights, 6000 men of Arms, more than 10000 Alms-houses, and yet the King might clearly put up 20000 l. per Annum into his Exchequer. How true this was, I cannot say. But after this, King Henry the eighth took his Opportunities, to pare away the excrescencies of it; demolishing the Monasteries, and Religious houses, and paring off the superfluities of Bishops, Ricks and Cathedral Churches: in which he found not a few followers amongst the Ministers and great Officers of State, and Court, in the time of King Edward the sixth, and Queen Elizabeth. Yet left they not the Clergy so poor and naked, or destitute of the encouragements and rewards of learning, but that they have been still the objects of a covetous envy, (that which the former Harpies left them, being thought too much): though for abilities of learning (I dare boldly say it) not to be paralleled in the World. For besides 5439 Parochial Benefices, being no Impropriations; and besides the Vicarages, most of which exceed the competency beyond the Seas: there were left in England at the time of the Reformation under Queen Elizabeth, 26 Bishopsricks, (taking those of Wales into the reckoning) 26 Deaneries, 60 Archdeaconries, and 544 Dignities and Prebends; most of which, places of fair revenue. And as for the maintenance of Priests, Monks, and Friars, before the Reformation, there were reckoned 90 Colleges, besides those in the Universities, 100 Hospitals, 3374 Chantries and free Chappels, and 645 Abbeys and Monasteries: more then half of which had above the yearly income of 200 l. in old rents, many above 2000, and some 4000 almost. So studious were our Ancestors both in those times of blindness, and these of a clearer sight, to encourage men to learnings, and then reward it.

The Souldiery of England is either for the Land, or for the Sea. Our Victories by Land are most apparent, over the Irish, Scots, Cypriots, Turks, and especially French; whose Kingdom hath been sore shaken by the English many times, especially twice by King Edward the third, and Henry the fifth: this latter making so absolute a conquest, that Charles the seventh, like a poor Roy d'Idiot, confined himself to Bourges, where (having casheered his retinue) he was found in a little Chamber at Supper, with a napkin only laid before him, a ramp of Mutton and two Chickens. And so redoubted even after our expulsion from France, (our civil dissensions rather causing that expulsion, than the Frenchmen's valour) was the English name in that Country: that in the Wars between King Charles the eighth, and the Duke of Bretagne, the Duke, to strike a terror into his enemies, apparelled 1500 of his own Subjects, in the Arms and Crofs of England. But as the Africans, when he had on the Lions skin, was for all that but an Afric and no Lion: so these Britons, by the weak resistance they made against their Enemies, shewd that they were indeed Britons, and no Englishmen. Spain also tasted the valour of our Land-souldiers, when John of Gaunt pursuing his title to Spain, was sent home with 8 Waggonns laden with gold, and an annual pension of 10000 marks; as also when the Black Prince re-established King Peter in his Throne. And then also did they acknowledge, though they felt not the puissance of the English, when Ferdinand the Catholic surprized the Kingdom of Navarre. For there were then in Fontarabia, a Town of Guipuscoa, 6000 English Foot, who lay there to joyn with this Ferdinand in an expedition against France. Concerning which Guicciardine giveth this Item, That the Kingdom of Navarre yielded rather for the fear and reputation of the English Forces that were at hand, then by any puissance of King of Aragon. Since those times the Spaniards much esteemed us, as appeareth by this speech of theirs to our Souldiers at the Siege of Amiens: You are tall Souldiers, and therefore when you come down to the Trenches, we double our guards, and look for blows; but as for those base and cowardly French, when they come, we make account we have nothing to do, but play, or sleep on our Ramparts. The like the Netherlanders can rectify; only this is the grief of it; The English are like Pyrrhus King of Epirus, fortunate to conquer Kingdoms, but unfortunate to keep them. Nor to say any thing of the late, but great experience, which the English Souldiery hath gotten by the Civil broils among themselves. At which my heart so aketh, and my hand so trembleth, that I shall only add in the words of Lucan,

Hen

England.

*Hec quantum potuit caeli pelagiq; paravi,
Hoc quem Civiles fuderant sanguine dextra!*

That is to say,

How much both Sea and Land might have been gain'd
By that dear blood, which Civil wars have drain'd!

As for their power and valour at Sea, it may evidently be perceived in the battel of Scuse, wherein King Edward the 3^d. with 200 Ships, overcame the French Fleet consisting of 500 Sail; of which he sunk 200, and flew 30000 Souldiers. Secondly, at the battel in 88. wherein a few of the Queens Ships vanquished the invincible Armad of the King of Spain, consisting of 134 great Gallies, and Ships of extraordinary bigness. Sir Francis Drake with 4 Ships, took from the Spaniard one million, and 189200 Ducats in one Voyage, An. 1587. And again with 25 Ships, he awed the Ocean, sacked S. Jago, S. Dominico, and Cartagena; carrying away with him, besides Treasure, 240 Pieces of Ordnance. I omit the Circumnavigation of the whole World, by this Drake and Candish; and the voyage to Gales: as also how one of the Queens Ships named the Revenge, in which Sir Richard Greenville was Captain, with 180 Souldiers (whereof 90 were sick on the ballast) maintained a Sea-fight for 24 hours against above 50 of the Spanish Gallies. And though at last, after her Powder was spent to the last barrel, she yeelded upon honourable terms; yet she was never brought into Spain: having killed in that fight more than 10000 of their Souldiers, and sunk four of their greatest Vessels. I omit also the discovery of the Northern passages, by Hugh Willoughby, Davis, and Frabisher; concluding with that of Keckerman, Hoc certum est, omnibus bodie gentibus navigandi industria & peritia superiores esse Anglos; & post Anglos, Hollandos: I though now I know not by what neglect, and discontinuance of those honorable employments the Hollanders begin to bereave us of our ancient Glories, and would fain account themselves Lords of the Seas, and probably had been so indeed, had not His Majesty by the timely reinforcing of his Naval Power, An. 1636. recovered again the Dominion of it.

The English Language is a De-compound of Dutch, French, and Latine; which I conceive rather to add to its perfection, than to detract any thing from the worth thereof; since out of every Language we have culled the most significant words, and equally participate of that which is excellent in them; their imperfections being rejected. For it is neither so boisterous as the Dutch, nor so effeminate as the French; yet as significant as the Latine, and in the happy conjunction of two words into one, little inferior to the Greek.

The Christian Faith was first here planted, as some say, by S. Peter and Paul; more probably (as others say) by Joseph of Arimathea, whose body they find to have been interred in the Isle of Avalonia where the Abbey of Glastenbury after stood. But that of his plantation being almost rooted out by long Persecutions, and no supply of Preachers sent from other places; Lucius a King of Britain (and the first Christian King of Europe) An. 180. or thereabouts, sent his Ambassadors to Eleutherius the then Pope of Rome to be furnished with a new supply of Pastors, if not to plant, yet at the least to water; and confirm the Gospel planted here before; but almost rooted out again by prevailing Gentilism. At which time Lucius did not only receive the Faith himself, but by the piety of his example, and the diligence of the first Preachers sent from Rome (being both of them natural Britons) it spread by little and little over all his Dominions; and in some tract of time over all the Island. Which being thus recovered to the Faith of Christ, was forthwith furnished with Bishops and Metropolitans, according to the number of the Provinces and principal Cities (twenty eight in all) continuing here as long as Christianity itself. For not to truit herein to the authority of the British History, we find three Bishops of this Isle subscribing to the Council of Arles, An. 314. viz. Eborinus Bishop of Torky, Restitutus Bishop of Londons, and Adelfinus, Bishop of Colchester, there called Colonia Londinensium; and some of them also present in the Council of Sardica, An. 358. concurring with the rest in voting to the condemnation of the Arian Heresies; and the same of others the next year in the Synod of Arimin. And when the Britons were expelled their native Country, or shut up in the mountainous parts of the Ordoevies, and Silures, which we now call Wales; they carried Christianity and Bishops along with them: Augustine the Monk, finding no fewer then seven Bishops in the British Church, when he was sent by Gregory the Great to convert the English. And yet it is no fabulous vanity, (as some men suppose) to say that Augustine the Monk first preached the Gospel in England; because it must be understood, not with Relation to the Britons, but the English Saxons: from whom these parts of the Isle had the name of England; and from whom both the Britons and the Faith it self were driven into the Mountains of Wales and Cornwall, and Heathenism introduced again over all the Kingdom. Long after which it pleased God, that Gregory the Great, (but at that time a Deacon only in the Church of Rome) seeing some handiome youths to be sold in open Market, demanded what and whence they were: to whom it was answered they were Angli; and well may they be so called (saith he) for they seem as Angels. Asking again of what Province they were amongst the Angli; and answer being made of the Province Deira (part of the Kingdom of the Northumbrians) therefore (saith he) de ira Dei sunt liberandi. And lastly, understanding that the King of their Nation was named Alle; how fitly (saith he) may he sing Alleluiahs to the most High God? After which time he seriously endeavoured the Conversion of the English Nation; which being Pope he happily effected, by the travel and diligence of Augustine the Monk, the first Archbishop of Canterbury. And so well did the work prosper after this beginning, that not only all the Saxons did receive the Gospel, but communicated the Light of it to other Nations: the Hassians, Francotians, and Thuringians being converted by Winfred; the Frisons or Hollanders by Wittrikind the first Bishop of Utrecht; the Saxons of Westphalen by Weldrode, the first Bishop of Breme; all of them being English Saxons, as we find in Beda and some others.

Now as these parts of Britain were the first which generally entertained the Gospel; so were they the first also in these later times, which universally submitted to the Reformation of such corruptions, as had been brought upon them by the power and tyranny of the Church of Rome. Endeavoured first in France, by the Albigenses, and Waldenses, as was said before. Who being suppressed and ruined by the sword of the Kings of France, sheltered themselves in the mountainous parts of Gascogne and Guienne, then in possession of the English; who by that means became acquainted with their Tenets: maintained here publicly by Wicless, and spreading under-hand amongst the people of this Kingdom, till the times of Luther and the Reformation by him aimed at. Which being in most other Countries received tumultuously, by the power of the People; was here admitted upon mature deliberation, by the authority and consent of the Prince and Prelates: the Archbishops in this great work, without respect unto the Dictates of Luther or Calvin, looking only on Gods Word and the Primitive Patterns, abolishing such things as were repugnant unto either, but still retaining such Ceremonies in Gods public worship, as were agreeable to both, and had been countenanced by the practice of the Primitive times. A point wherein they did observe a greater measure of Christian prudence and moderation, than their neighbour Churches; which in a meer detestation of the See of Rome, allowed of nothing which had formerly been in use amongst them, because defiled with Papists Errors and abuses: and thereby utterly averting those of the Papal party from joining with them in the work, or coming over to them when the work was done. Whereas had they continued an allowable correspondence in these extricuals of Religion, with the Church of Rome; their party in the world had been far greater, and not so much stomached as it is. And so it was conceived by the Marquess de Rosas, after Duke of Sully, and Lord High-Treasurer of France, and one of the chief men of that party there: when being sent Ambassador to King James, from King Henry the 4th. he had observed the Majesty and Decency of Gods public Service, in some Cathedrals of this Kingdom; Religion would be soon defaced and trod under foot, if not preferred and fenced about with the hedge of Ceremonies.

As for the Government of the Church since the last Conversion, as by the piety and example of Luis there were founded three Archbishopsricks, and 25 Bishopricks, according to the number of the Arch-Flamines and Flamines (whose great Revenues were converted to more sacred uses) in the times of Idolatry: So by the like pious care of Pope Gregory the Great, by whose means this last Conversion happened; Archbishopsricks, and Bishopricks were designed to convenient places. The number 26 in all, to each Province twelve, besides the two Archbishops and Metropolitans: wherein he had the happiness to have his desires fulfilled, though the number was not made compleat till these later days, nor with such equal distribution, as he did intend. For in the Province of York laid waste and desolate by the Danes, and not so soon converted as the other was; the number of the Suffragan Bishops came not up to his purpose, but did as much exceed in the Province of Canterbury: especially when King Henry the 8th. had incorporated Wales with England; and founded five Episcopal Sees out of the ruins and Revenues of some principal Monasteries: of which none but the Bishoprick of Chesher (and that of the Isle of Man, which maketh up the 27th.) were laid unto the Province of York. And so it stood, notwithstanding the alterations of Religion, without any dispute, till Calvin having hammered out his new Presbytery, and recommended it to the use of all Christian Churches (the History whereof we had succinctly in the Alpine Provinces) found many apt Scholars in most places to decry this Order, though consonant to the word of God, and most pure Antiquity.

But the truth is, it was not so much the Authority of Calvin, or the malignant zeal of Beza, or the impetuous clamors of their Disciples, which caused the Episcopal Order to grow out of credit; as the Avarice of some great persons in Court and State, who greedily gaped after the poor remnant of their Possessions. It had been else a miracle that Calvins Plat-form, made only for the use of a private City, and not proportioned, no nor intended at the first, to the estate of other Churches, especially where the Bishops had been instrumental in the Reformation; should be so headily received in some Kingdoms, and so importunately and clamorously desired in others.

The most valorous Souldiers of this Country, when possessed by the Britans, were 1 Cassibelanes, who twice repulsed the Roman Legions though conducted by Cesar; and had not a party here at home been formed against him, he had for ever done the like. 2 Prasugus, King of the Teuti. 3 Constantine the Great. 4 Arthur, one of the Worlds nine Worthies. In the times of the Saxons. 5 Guy Earl of Warwick. 6 King Edmund Ironside; and 7 Cannus the Dane. Under the Normans, of most note have been 1 William, surnamed the Conqueror, 2 Richard, and 3 Edward, both the first of those names, so renowned in the wars of the Holy-Land, 4 Edward the 3^d, and 5 Edward the Black Prince, his Son; Duc fuimina belli, as famous in the wars of France; 6 Henry the fifth, and 7 John Duke of Bedford his Brother, of equal gallantry with the other. 8 Montacute Earl of Salisbury. 9 S. John Fastolf, and 10 S. John Hawkwood, of great esteem for valour in France and Italy: not to descend to later times. And for Sea Captains, those of most note, have been Hawkins, Willoughby, Burroughs, Jenkinson, Drake, Frobisher, Cavendish and Greenville; of some of which we have spoke already, and of the rest may have an opportunity to say more hereafter.

Scholars of most renown amongst us, 1 Alcuinus, one of the Founders of the University of Paris. 2 Beda, who for his Piety and Learning obtained the Attribute or Adjunct of Venerabilis. Concerning which the Legends tell us, that being blind, his Boy had knavishly conducted him to preach to an heap of Stones; and that when he had ended his Sermon with the Gloria Patri, the very Stones concluded, saying

Amen

England.

Amen, Amen, Venerabilis Beda. But other of the Monkish writers do assign this reason, and both true alike; that at his death some unlearned Priest intending to honour him with an Epitaph, had thus far blundered on a verse, viz. Hic sunt in fossa Beda ossa: but because the verse was yet imperfect, he went to bed to consider of it, leaving a space betwixt the two last words thereof; which in the morning he found filled up in a strange Character, with the word Venerabilis; and so he made his Verse, and Beda (pardon this diversion) obtained that Attribute. 3 Anselm, and 4 Bradwardine, Archbishops of Canterbury, men famous for the times they lived in. 5 Alexander of Hales, Tutor to Thomas Aquinas, and Bonaventure. 6 Thomas of Walden, the professed enemy of Wicless, against whom he writ. 7 John Wicless parson of Lutterworth, in the County of Leicester, who so valiantly opposed the power and Errors of the Church of Rome; though he vented many of his own. Then since the time of the Reformation, 1 John Jewel, Bishop of Salisbury, to whose learned and industrious labours, in defence of the Religion here by law established, we are still beholding. 2 Dr. John Reynolds, and 3 Mr. Richard Hooker, both of Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxon; the first, a man of infinite reading, the second of as strong a judgement. 4 Dr. Whitakers of Cambridge, the Antagonist of the famous Bellarmino. 5 Dr. Thomas Bilson, and 6 Dr. Lancelot Andrews, both Bishops of Winchester, the Ornaments of their several times. 7 Bishop Montague of Norwich, a great Philologer and Divine. 8 Dr. John Whitgift, and 9 Dr. William Laud, Archbishops of Canterbury. Of which last, and his discourse against Fisher the Jesuite, Sir Edward Dearing, his professed enemy, hath given this Character, that in that book of his he had muzzled the Jesuits, and should strike the Papists under the fifth rib, when he was dead and gone: and that being dead, wherefore his grave should be, P A U S (whose reparation he endeavoured, and had almost finished) would be his perpetual Monument, and his Book his lasting Epitaph. And as for those who have stood up in maintenance of the Church of Rome, those of most note were Dr. Harding, the Antagonist of Bishop Jewel. 2 Nic. Sanders, and 3 Dr. Thomas Stapleton, to whose writings the great Cardinal Bellarmino doth stand much indebted. 4 Campion, and 5 Parsons, both Jesuits; 6 and William Reynolds, a Seminary Priest, and the Brother of Dr. John Reynolds spoken of before. Of which two Brothers (by the way) it is very observable, that William was at first a Protestant of the Church of England, and John trained up in Popery beyond the Seas. William out of an honest zeal to reduce his Brother to this Church, made a journey to him: where on a conference betwixt them it so fell out, that John being overcome by his Brothers arguments, returned into England, where he became one of the more strict or rigid sort of the English Protestants; and William being convinced by the reasons of his Brother John, said beyond the Seas, where he proved a very violent and virulent Papist. Of which strange accident, Dr. Alabaster, who had made trial of both Religions, and amongst many notable whimsies, had some fine abilities, made this following Epigram; which for the excellency thereof, and the rareness of the argument, I shall here subjoin.

*Bella inter geminos plusquam Civilia Fratres, Traxerat ambigua Religionis apex.
Ille Reformatae Fidei pro partibus instat;
Iste Reformanda denegat esse fidem.
Propositis causis rationibus, alternatrinque;
Concurrere pares, & cecidere pares.
Quod fuit in votis, Fratrem caput alter-uterque;
Quod fuit in satia, perdit uterque fidem.
Captivi gemini sine captivante fuerunt,
Et victor victi transfuga castra petis.
Quod genus hoc pugna est, ubi victus gaudet uterque;
Et tamen alter-uter se superasse dolet?*

Which excellent Epigram, though not without great disadvantage to the Latine Original, I have thus translated:

In points of Faith some undetermin'd jars,
Betwixt two Brothers kindled Civil wars.
One for the Churches Reformation stood;
The other thought no Reformation good.
The points propos'd, they traversed the field
With equal skill, and both together yield.
As they desir'd, his Brother each subdued;
Yet such their Fate, that each his Faith did loose.
Both Captive's, none the prisoners thence do guide;
The Victor flying to the Vanquish'd side.
Both joy'd in being Conquer'd, (strange to say)
And yet both mourn'd because both won the day.

And then for men of other Studies, 1 Lindwood the Canonist, 2 Cofins, and 3 Comel, eminent in the studies of the Civil Laws; 4 Bracton, and 5 Byton of old times; 6 Dier, and 7 Coke of late days, as eminent for their knowledge in the Laws of England. 8 Johannes de Sacro Bosco, the Author of the Book of the Sphere; and 9 Roger Bacon, a noted Mathematician in the darker times. 10 Sir Francis Bacon the learned Viscount of S. Albans, of whom more hereafter. 11 Thomas More, Lord Chancellor, one of the this Kingdom. It is wondrous populous, containing well nigh 600000 people, which number is much augmented in the Term time. Some compare London with Paris thus: London is the richer, the more populous, and more ancient; Paris the greater, more uniform, and better fortified. But for my part, as I do not think that London is the more populous; so neither can I grant that Paris is the greater City, except we measure them by the Walls. For taking in the Suburbs of both, and all that passeth in Account by the name of London: I cannot but conceive, that if London were cast into the same orbicular figure, the circumference of it would be larger than that of Paris. For uniformity of building, Paris indeed doth go beyond it; but may in that be equalled also in some tract of time, if the design begun in King James his reign, tending to the advancement of such uniformity, be not interrupted. For other things, certain it is that London is the ancienter City, as being an Archbishops See in the time of the Britains, when the name of Paris was scarce heard of; a Bishops See at the first conversion of the Saxons; increased so much in wealth and honour from one Age to another, that it is grown at last too big for the Kingdom; which whether it may be profitable for the State, or not, may be made a question. Great Towns in the body of a State, are like the Spleen or Milt in the body natural, the monstrous growth of which impoverisheth all the rest of the Members, by drawing to it all the animal and vital Spirits, which should give nourishment unto them; And in the end cracked or furcharged by its own fulness, not only sends unwholesome fumes and vapours unto the head, and heavy pangs unto the heart, but draws a consumption on it self. And certainly the over-growth of great Cities is of dangerous consequence, not only in regard of Famine, such multitudes of mouths not being easie to be fed: but in respect of the irreparable danger of Insurrections, if once these multitudes, sensible of their own strength, oppressed with want, or otherwise disempowered with faction or discontent, should gather to an head, and break out into action. Yet thus much may be said to the honour of London, though grown by much too big now for the Kingdom, that it is generally so well governed, and in so good peace; that those Murders, Robberies, and outrages so frequent in great and populous Cities beyond the Seas, are here seldom heard of. 2. York, in the West Riding of that County, the second City of England, as the old Verse hath it.

Eboracum à primâ jure secunda venit.*

That is to say,

In England, London is the chiefest Town;
The second place York claimeth as its own.

And so it may, being indeed the second City of the Kingdom, both for fame and greatness. A pleasant, large, and stately City, well fortified and beautifully adorned, as well with private as publick Edifices; and rich, and populous withall. Seated upon the River Ouse, or Ure, which divides it in twain; both parts being joyned together with a fair stone Bridge, consisting of high and mighty Arches. A City of great estimation in the time of the Romans, the Metropolis of the whole Province or Diocesis of Britain; remarkable for the death and burial of the Emperour Severus, and the birth of Constantine the Great; by consequence the Seat of the Primæ of the British Church, as long as Christianity did remain amongst them. Nor stooped it lower when the Saxons had received the Faith; and notwithstanding those mutations which beset this Kingdom, under the Saxons, Danes, and Normans, it still preserved its ancient lustre, and increased it too. Adorned with a stately and magnificent Cathedral, inferiour to few in Europe; and with a Palace of the Kings, (called the Manor-house) the dwelling in these later days, of the Lord President of the Court or Council here established by King Henry the 8th. for the benefit of his Northern Subjects; after the manner of the French Parliaments, or Presedial Sieges. 3. Bristol, the third in rank of the Cities of England, situate on the meeting of the Frome and Avon, not far from the influx of the Severn into the Ocean: in that regard commodiously seated for trade and traffick; the Ships with full sayl coming into the City, and the Citizens with as full purses trading into most parts of the World, with good Faith and Fortune. A Town exceeding populous, and exceeding cleanly, there being Sewers made under ground, for the conveyance of all filth, and nastiness, into the Rivers. Churches it hath to the number of 18 or 20, reckoning in the Cathedral, and that of Ratcliff. The Cathedral first built by Rob. Fitz. Harding, Son to a King of Denmark, once a Burger here, and by him stored with Canons Regular, Anno 1248. But made a Bishops See by King Henry 8th Anno 1542. The principal building next the Church, an ancient Castle, a piece of such strength, that Maad the Emperess having took King Steven Prisoner, thought it the safest place to secure him in. 4. Norwich, the fourth City of the first rank, of which more hereafter. 5. Oxford the first of the second rank of English Cities seated upon the Ouse or Isis: but whether so called as Vadum Isidis, Ouseford, or the Ford of Ouse; or Vada bonum (as the Greeks had their Bosphori in former times) I determine not. An ancient Town, and anciently made a seat of Learning, coeval unto that of Paris, if not before it; the University hereof being restored rather than first founded by King Alured, Anno 866. after it had been overrun a while by the Danish Furies; but hereof as an University, more anon. This only now, that for the stateliness of the Schools and publick Library, the bravery and beauty of particular Colledges, all built of fair and polished stone; the liberal endowment of those houses, and notable encouragements of Industry and Learning in the salarie of the Professors in most Arts and Sciences, it is not to be paralleled in the Christian World. The City of it self well built, and as pleasantly seated, formed in the Figure of a Crofs, two long streets thwarting one another, each of them near a mile in length; containing containing in that compass 13 Parish Churches, and a See Episcopal founded here by King Henry 8th Anno 1541. The honorary Title of twenty of the noble Family of the Veres, now Earls of Oxon. 6. Salisbury, first seated on the Hill, where now stands old Salisbury, the Sorbiodunum of the Antients. But the Cathedral being removed down into the Vale, the Town quickly followed, and grew up very suddenly into great Renown; pleasantly seated on the Avon, (a name common to many English Rivers) which watereth every street thereof; and for the populousness of the place, plenty of Provisions, number of Churches, a spacious Market-place, and a fair Town hall, esteemed the second City of all the West. 7. Gloucester, by Antonine called Gloum, by the Britains Caer Glou, whence the present name; the Saxons adding Cesters, as in other places. A fine neat City, pleasantly seated on the Severn, with a large Key or Wharf on the banks thereof, very commodious to the Merchandize and trade of the place: well built, consisting of fair large Streets, beautified with a fair Cathedral; for the magnificence of the Quire, the elegance of the Cloisters, and gratefulness of the Bell-tower there scarce to be followed in the Kingdom; and situate in so rich a Vale, that there is nothing wanting to the use of man except only Wine, which life or luxury may require. 8. Chester, upon the River Dee, built in the manner of a quadrate, inclosed with a wall, which takes up more than two miles in compass; containing in that compass 12 Parish Churches, and an old Cathedral dedicated antiently to St. Werburg Daughter of Wollere K. of the Mercians, and Visited of all the Monasteries of England. But made a Bishops See by King Henry the 8th. The buildings generally fair, the Streets wide and open, with Galleries before every door, under which a man may walk dry from one end to the other. The rest of chief note shall be specified on another occasion, with this advertisement; that the ordinary Cities of England are not to be compared with those of France, and Italy: First because the Nobles and Gentry of those Countries live for the most part in the Cities, ours in Country-Villages; And secondly, because the Londoners so ingross all trading, that they draw thither all the Wealth and treasure of the Kingdom. By means whereof, that every day increaseth in wealth and beauty; the rest (except Bristol only) doe decay as sensibly: that City being like the Spleen in the body natural, the monstrous growth whereof starveth all the rest of the Members. Liene excrefente, reliquum corpus contabescit, as the Doctors have it.

There are in England but two Universities, which may equal six, nay ten of all other Countries, (so that Paris be not in the number) most of them being no better than our Colledges of Westminster, Eton, or Winchester; and none so liberally endowed, as some one of these in the Universities. Of which there are 16 in Cambridge, some of them called only by the name of Halls, but these endowed with Lands and Fellowships as the others are. In Oxford there are 18 Colledges endowed with Lands, besides six Halls, where Students live at their own charges: in both of them, Professors of the Arts and Sciences, as also of Divinity, Law, Physick, and the Learned Languages, with liberal Salaries; and in each to the number of 3000 Students, so regular in their lives and conversations, as are not to be found in the World besides. The fairer and more ancient, Oxford, which of long time, together with Paris in France, Bononia in Italy, and Salamanca in Spain, hath been honoured with the Title of Generale Studium. For that the University of Cambridge, (though giving upper hand to her sister of Oxford, she may take place of all the Universities in the World besides) is not of so long standing, as that of Oxford; is evident by the testimony of Robertus de Romington, cited by Malter Camden, viz. Reguante Edwardo primo, (it should rather be read secundo) de studio Grantbridge facta est Academia, sicut Oxoniæ: where the word sicut doth not import an identity of the time; but a relation to Oxford, as to the pattern. We see this truth yet clearer in the Bull of Pope John the 21, the contemporary of our Edward 2d, as I find in the work of that great Searcher of Academical Antiquities, Mr. Brian Twine. Apostolica auctoritate statuimus (saith the Bull) quod Collegium magistrorum & Scholarium ejusdem studii (speaking of Cambridge) Universitas sit censenda, &c. But what need more than the Resolution of the Commons of the first Parliament holden under King James? For when the Clerk of that House had put the name of Cambridge before Oxford; they taking disdainfully that Hysteron Proteron, commanded the Antiquities of both Universities to be searched, and after search made gave the place to Oxford. But to proceed, the University of Cambridge as it was much of a later Foundation, so was it long before it grew into esteem; inasmuch that when William of Wainflete Bishop of Winchester, and Founder of Magdalen Colledge in Oxon (whereof I was once an unworthy Member) perswaded King Henry the sixth to erect a Colledge in Oxford, as some of the Kings his Predecessors had done before him: immo potius Cantabrigia (replied the King) ut duas si fieri possint in Anglia Academias habiamus. No said the King, in Cambridge rather, that so, if possible, I may have two Universities in my Realm of England.

As for the Story of this Countrey, that it was first peopled out of Gaul, is affirmed by Caesar and proved by many strong and concluding Arguments; as their Religion, Manners, Languages, Customs, and the nearness of the one to the other. To omit therefore the Fable of Brute, and the Catalogue of 68 Kings, which are said to have reigned here successively before the coming of the Romans; Certain it is, that Caesar found the Countrey cantoned into many Kingdoms (four in Kent alone) and the people to be very rude and illiterate. Such Learning as they had was locked up in the breasts of the Druides; who were committed nothing unto writing, and by that means kept the People in continual ignorance, communicating what they knew to none but those of their own Order, and therein being sought to by the Druides or Priests of Gaul; who came over into this Island to them, and did from them receive the knowledge of their sacred Mysteries. Being conquered or discovered rather by Julius Caesar, it was not so much as looked after by the two next Emperours: Augustus and Tiberius counting it an high point of Wisdom, not to extend the Empire beyond the Ocean. Caligula had once a mind to the Adventure, but he durst not follow it. But Claudius, his Successor, undertook the Enterprize; solicited therunto by Bericus a noble Briton, who for sedition and some practices against the publick, was expelled the Countrey; after whose death, (wherein he was conceived to have had an hand) he got the Kingdom to himself: but being unable to defend it against the Enemy, and make his title also good against the other children of Constantine, first called in the Saxons. 3 Vortimer, eldest Son of Vortiger, who overthrew the Saxons in many battles; but in the midst of his Successes was poisoned by Rovena a Saxon Lady, second Wife of Vortiger. 4 Arthur, one of the Worlds nine Worthies, of whom the Monkish writers, and other Legendaries, report so many idle and impossible actions. Doubtless he was a Prince of most perfect virtue, a great preserver of his Country from approaching ruin, and worthy the pen of an able Panegyrist; by whom his brave achievements might have come intire unto us, without the intermixture of those feats of Chivalry, affabulated to him and his Knights of the Round table. For by the overstraining of some Monkish Writers, Geoffry of Monmouth, and the rest, they have given too just occasion to posterity to suspect that virtue, which they intended to advance; and filled us with as much ignorance of the story, as admiration of the persons. But this hath not been the ill hap of King Arthur and his Nobles only; Charlemagne, and the Twelve Peers of France, men of great virtue and renown, suffering as deeply in the same kind, by the folly of the French Romances. It is affirmed of this Arthur, (but how true I know not) that he began the custom of celebrating the Nativity of our Lord and Saviour for the twelve days following, with such pastimes and sports as are (or have been used of late) by the Lords of Misrule in some Gentlemens houses: an Institution which the Scots Writers of those times much blame, perhaps not unjustly; it being a time more fit for our devotions than such rude disports. But to proceed, King Arthur dying, left the Crown to 5 Constantine, the Son of Cador Duke of Cornwall, his nearest kinsman, slain by Aurelius Conan, his own Nephew, who succeeded after him: which fraction did so weaken the distressed Britans, that they were forced to withdraw themselves beyond the Severn; as 6 Careticus, or Caradoc, by the joyned forces of the Saxons to change the plain Countries beyond the Severn for the safer, but more fruitless Mountains. Of the rest, till Cadwallader, there is little left of any certainty, but their names only; which are thus ranked in the second race of

The Kings of Britain after the withdrawing of the Romans.

Ied in a pilgrimage to Rome; there to receive the habit of a Religious Order from the hands of Pope Sergius, where he dyed not long after, Anno 689. After whose death, his Successors were no longer called Kings of Britain, but Kings or Princes of Wales. And there we shall be sure to find them.

And so the Britans leave the Stage, and the Saxons enter; a great and potent Nation amongst the Germans; but greater by the aggregation of many people, under their name and service, than in themselves: the Jutes and Angles joyning with them, and passing in Accompr as the same one Nation. Their Countries different as their names, until this Conjunction; but neighboring near enough to unite together: the Angles dwelling at the first in that part of the Cimbrian Chersonese, which we now call Slavick, where still the Town called Angolen doth preserve their memory; the Jutes upon the North of them, where there is still a Province called by the name of Juteland; the Saxons South of both in the Dukedom of Holstein, situate in the very neck of that Chersonese where it joyneth with Germany. Joyning their powers they spread themselves with good success, to the South and West; of which more hereafter. And growing Masters of the Seas, infested with continual Piracies the Coasts of Britain; occasioning herein an Officer of great trust and power, appointed to defend and scour those Seas, in the Noctitia, called Comes Littoris Saxonici. Known by this means amongst the Britans, they were called in by Vortiger, to aid him against the Scots and Picts; whom they overcame in a pitched field near Stamford, in the County of Lincoln: for so far had the barbarous people marched without any resistance. Rewarded for this victory with the Isle of Thanet, and after with the whole County of Kent, they began to quarrel with their hosts: whom by degrees they dispossessed of all the Countrey on this side of Severn; parcelling it into seven Kingdoms, called the Saxons Heptarchie, that is to say, 1 Of Kent, 2 of the South-Saxons, 3 of the West-Saxons, 4 of the East-Saxons, 5 of the East-Angles, 6 of the North-Humbes, and 7 of the Mercians. The beginning, period, and Kings of which several Kingdoms, and the uniting of them into one Monarchy, we are next to shew.

1. The Kingdom of KENT, confined within that County only, was begun by Hengist, who with his Brother Horsu had the leading of the Saxon Forces, at their first entry into Britain, An. 455. being the first year after their first coming in: who restoring Paganism to this Countrey, when the rest of the Isle was Christian, occasioned the distinction of Kent and Christendom. The Kentish afterwards the first of the Saxons who received the Gospel, by the preaching of Augustine the Monk, the Apostle of the English Saxons. Principal Cities of this Kingdom, where 1 Canterbury, once the Regal seat of the Kings of Kent, till given by Ethelbert, on his conversion, to Augustine the first Archbishop thereof, and his Successors: afterwards the See of those Archbishops, who had here their Palace and Cathedral, the Kings removing to Rechnor. Seated in the East part of the Countrey, about seven or eight miles from from the Sea, a little Brook serving it thence with some commodities. A City of more Antiquity and fame, than beauty; being now ruinous and decayed, and having nothing in it worth observation, but the Cathedral Church, first founded by Ethelbert before mentioned; but afterwards new built upon his foundations, in the form it now stands by Archbishop Lankfrank, Will. Corboyle, and some other of their Successors in the said See. The Archiepiscopal Palace is a goodly building, and the ruins of S. Augustine's Monastery shew what once it was. 2 Dover, antiently called Dubris, seated on the Sea-shore, where the passage is shortest into France; for that cause fortified with a strong and (in those days accounted an) impregnable Castle, esteemed one of the keys of England, and the chief of the Cinqve Ports; now giving the title of an Earl to the house of Hunsdon, chief of the Family of the Caries, nearly allied to Queen Elizabeth of famous memory. 3 Rocheſter, seated on the Medway, not far from Chatham (the station of the Royal Navy) an antient City, but of no greatness; in former times called Durobrivis, after that Rossa, thence the name Roffeſter; a Bishops See, the second for Antiquity in all the Island; 4 Maidstone, upon the Medway also near the head thereof, the largest and most beautiful in all this Countrey, and most commodiously seated for publick business.

II. The Kingdom of SOUTH-SEX, or of the SOUTH-SAXONS, was begun by Ella, a noble Captain of that people. An. 488. It contained only the two Counties of Sussex and Surrey, which were thence denominated: the first is called quasi South-Sex, the Countrey of the South-Saxons; the second quasi South-Rey, as lying on the South-side of the River Thames, in the same sense as S. Maries Church on the other side of that River (in respect of London) is called S. Mary Over-Rey. The Christian Faith suppressed here, as in other places, was restored again in the time of King Edilwalch, by the preaching of S. Wilfride, Archbishop of Tork, living here in Exile. Places of most importance in it were, 1 Chicheſter, built by Cissa the 2d King hereof, and called Cissan-ceſter, encompassed almost round with the River Lavant, falling not far off into the Sea: the chief Town of Sussex, and a Bishops See, removed hither from Seafly, a Demy-Island, in the time of the Norman Conqueror, where it was first planted by Archbishop Wilfride. 2 Hastings, one of the Cinqve-ports, in Sussex also; the landing place of the Normans, and famous for the overthrow of King Harold in the fields adjoining. 3 Guilford, upon the River Wey, the chief Town of Surrey, well built, and having in it two Parish-Churches. 4 Arundel, in a Dale or Valley on the River Arun, and from thence so named: belonging to the Crown in the time of the Saxons, when given by the Testament of King Alfride unto Anthelm, his Brothers Son. Of great note for a beautiful and capacious Castle; but more for giving the title of Earl to the noble Families of the Albneys, the Fitz-Alans, and the Howards: this last of such a large and diffused Nobility, that in the year 1641. there were no fewer than eight Howards, in the House of Peers, 5 Kingſton upon the Thames, so called to distinguish it from Kingſton upon Hull in Torkſhire; heretofore famous for the Coronation of the Monarchs of the English Saxons, whence it had the name of Kingſton, or the Kings Towns. This Kingdom had only three Kings, crushed in the infancy thereof by more potent neighbours.

	4	Edilwalch, or Ethelwolf, the first Christian King, overcome and slain in battle by Ceadwal King of the West-Saxons, An. 687. After whose death Berthan and Authun, two Brethren, took on themselves the Government, with the title of Dukes or Captains; and held it for a little while. But not being able to withstand the puissance of the West-Saxons, this Kingdom was subdued by Ina, the Successor of Ceadwal, by whom united to that Crown.

III. The Kingdom of WEST-SEX, or the WEST-SAXONS, the third in order, and that which did in fine prevail over all the rest, contained the Counties of Cornwal, Devon, Somerset, Dorset, Wilt, Southampton, and Berk: begun by Cerdic, a noble Commander of the Saxons, arriving with new Forces out of Germany, An. 495. who having overcome the Britans of this Western tract, conducted by Natanland their Chieftain, entituled himself King of the West-Saxons, An. 522. The Christian Faith suppressed here, as elsewhere, was restored again in the time of Kingſt, their first Christian King; by the preaching of S. Birinus, Bishop of Dorchester near Oxford, then a great City, of no fewer than ten Parishes, now now reduced to one. Chief Cities of this Kingdom, were 1 Exeter, a fair and goodly City, and a Bishops See, removed hither from Cridington or Kirton, by Leofricus, An. 1049. Seated upon the bank of the River Ex, whence the name of Ex-caester; environed with deep ditches, and very strong walls, in compass about a mile and half besides the Suburbs, in which are contained in all 15 Parish Churches, besides the Minster, a beautiful and stately Fabrick. 2 Bath, so called from the Bathes there being, the chief City of Somerset; by the Latines called Aqua Solis, by the Greeks Ἰσθμὸς Σιππασίας, for the self same reason. Situate in a low Valley, environed about with Hills very steep and high, from whence come many Rivulets and fresh Springs, to the great commodity of the people. A fine neat Town, and beautified with as neat a Church, heretofore a Monastery, partner with Wells, the Bishops See, in the title Episcopal; and gives the Title of an Earl to the noble Family of the Bourchiers. 3 Falmouth, in Cornwall, seated upon a large and capacious Bay, so full of Creeks and Roads, capable of the best Ships, that it is said, an hundred sail of Ships may be lodged therein with such convenience, that from the top of the one, the Malt of another is not to be seen; the mouth or entrance of it defended for the greater safety with two very strong Castles built by Henry the 8th. that of S. Mandis on the East, and that of Pendinas (commonly called Pendennis) upon the West. 4 Dorchester, the chief Town of Dorsetshire, which is thence denominated, by Antoninus called Durnovaria, the principal at that time of the Durotriges: an Inland Town, and consequently of no great trading; not so much famous for ought else as giving the Title of a Marquis to Henry Earl of Kingston of the noble Family of the Pierreponts. 5 Wilton, the head Town, in those times, of Wiltshire, and a Bishops See, honoured with the residence of nine several Bishops. But by translating of the See to Sarum, (or Sarisbury) as the fitter place, and carrying thither therewithal the thoroughfare which before was here; it fell by little and little into decay; and is now hardly worth the reputation of a Market Town. 6 Winchester called Venta in the times of the Romans, by the Saxons Vent-caester, situate on the banks of a pleasant River, the seat Royal of the West-Saxon Kings, who had here their Palace called Wo-ve-ye, so named from the Kings of the Wolpian Family, and the situation of it in the circlings of the fore-said River, which the old Saxons called an Eye: not from the Wool-staple here kept, as some; much less from Cardinal Wolsey, as others most absurdly think. The house given after to the Bishops, and made their Palace. The Town in compass two miles, besides the Suburbs; commodiously seated in a low place, between very steep Hills, by which it is defended both from cold and wind. Afflicted very much since those times both by war and fire, half of the ground within the Town being fields and gardens; but still adorned with a magnificent Cathedral, and a gallant (but no great) Castle, bravely mounted upon an hill for defence and prospect; besides a Colledge, and an Hospital added since those days. 7 S.uthampton, conveniently seated on an Arm of the Sea, capable of Ships of burden to the very Key; which maketh it one of the richest Towns in those parts of England. Well built, of fair large streets, beautified with five Parish Churches, and fortified with high walls, a double ditch, and a right strong Castle: but the Castle now decayed and ruined. 8 Reading, on the Banks of the River Kenner, where it falleth into the Thames, by which means it hath the convenience of both Rivers: A Town of great trade for clothing, well built, and of three Parish Churches; heretofore beautified with a strong Castle and a goodly Monastery, but both now decayed. 9 Windsor, called Windleshores in the old Saxons, situate near the Banks of the Thames on a rising ground, which gives it a fair prospect over all the Country; adorned in succeeding times with a Palace Royal of the Kings of England, and the seat of the Order of the Garter. 10 Wallingford, the Gualena of the Antients, and then the chief Town of the Attrebatii, as it was afterwards (in the time of the Saxons) of the County of Berk; a mile in compass at that time within the walls, fortified with an impregnable Castle, and adorned with twelve Parish Churches. So desolated by a Plague, An. 1348. that there is now but one Church left, hardly Inhabitants enough to keep that in repair; and nothing of the walls left (as not much of the Castle) but the track and ruins.

IV. The Kingdom of EAST-SEX, or the EAST-SAXONS, was begun about the year 527, by Erchenwin, descended from Woden, the common Progenitor of the Saxons; from whom we have the name of Wednesday, or Wodensday, as they called it formerly. It contained only the Counties of Middlesex, Essex, and so much of Hertfordshire, as is in the Diocese of London. The Christian Faith expelled here as in other places, was restored again in the time of Sebert, the Founder of the Abbey Church of S. Peter in Westminster, by the preaching of Mellitus the first Bishop of London after the entrance of the Saxons; suppressed again by Seward, and Sigebert, the Sons of Sebert; but settled stronger than before by Cedda, the next Bishop there. Principal Cities of this Kingdom, besides London, spoken of already, were

1 Westminster, situate in those times a mile from London, now adjoining to it. The See of the Archbishop of London in the time of the Britans: afterward by the Saxons called Thorn-eye, or the Thorny Island; till the new Minster built by Sebert as before is said, and the Western situation of it in regard of St. Pauls, built at the same time by Ethelbert the King of Kent; gained it this new name. A City honoured with the seat of the Kings of East-Sex, and since those times with that of the Kings of England; the names of the Old Palace of the one, and the New Palace of the other, still remaining there; beautified upon that occasion with more stately and magnificent houses, belonging to the King, Bishops, and Nobility, then all the other in the Kingdom; having of late a new Town added to it in the Convent Garden (a place belonging formerly to the Monks of Westminster) for uniformity of building, and handsome streets, inferior to no City of France or Italy. 2 Colchester, the chief Town of East-Sex, situate near the Sea, on the River Coln; a Colony of the Londoners in former times, thence called Colonia Londinensium, and Colonia only, then a Bishops See: from which, or from the River, with the Addition of Caester, after the manner of the Saxons, came the name of Colchester. A fair and well built Town, and of good repute, fortified with an old Roman Wall, and having in it to the number of 14 Churches. 3 Isthancester in Denby Hundred, were S. Ceadda the second Bishop of London, baptised the re-lapsed East-Saxon. 4 Hartford, the chief Town of the County so called; by Bedan named Hertford, and of great note in his time for a Synod there held in the dawning of the day of Christianity amongst the Saxons; in which S. Augustine the Monk, the first Apostle of that people, had a conference or consultation with the British Bishops: More memorable in the following times, for giving the title of an Earl to the illustrious Family, (named De Clare); the addition of an Honour, and a goodly Patrimony to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster; and at this time, title of Earl, and Marquis, to the noble Family of the Seymours.

V. The Kingdom of the EAST-ANGLES, so called from the Angli or English, which possessed these parts, and the Eastern situation of it; begun by Offa, a great Commander of the Saxons, Anno 575. contained the Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely. The Christian Faith first planted here in the Reign of Redwall the third King, by the Ministry of Felix a Burgundian, the first Bishop of the East-Angles; the See whereof was afterwards removed to Norwich. Places of most importance in it, were 1 Dunwich on the Sea-shore, the first Bishops See of the East-Angles; for the County of Suffolk; then a Town capable of that dignity, now ruinous, decayed, and for the greatest part worn into the Sea. 2 Ipswich in the same County of Suffolk, and the chief of the County, a rich, populous, and well traded Empory, consisting of no fewer than twelve Parish Churches. 3 Norwich, the head City of Norfolk, situate on the River Tare, which runs thence to Turemouth; lying out in length a mile and an half, half as much in breadth, and in that Circuit comprehending about 30 Parishes; well walled about with many a Turret, and 12 Gates for entrance; but hath within it much waste Ground, the City suffering great loss both in wealth and buildings, by Kets Rebellion, in the time of King Edward the sixth. Recovered of the first blow by the Dutch Manufactures, of the last still languishing; yet still it glorieth in the beauties of a fair Cathedral, the three Palaces of the Bishops, the Dukes of Norfolk, and the Earls of Surrey, and the ruins of an ancient Castle of the Saxons building. 4 North Elmham, the Bishops See of the East-Angles, for those parts which we now call Norfolk: both this and that at Dunwich ruined in the Danish Wars, but this reviving at the end of 100 years, and here continuing, both Sees united unto one, till removed to 5 Thetford, another Town of this County, situate on the confluence of the Thet, and the lesser Ouse: a larger Town than either of the other two, from whence at last removed to Norwich. 6 Cambridge, the chief Town of that County, by Antonine called Cambaritum, whence the Modern name: unless we rather fetch it from a Bridge over the River Cam or Grant (for some call it Grantbridge) as perhaps we may. A Town well built by reason of the University, said to be founded by Segebert, King of the East-Angles, of whom it is affirmed by Beda, that he founded a School for the education of Children in the ways of good Learning; but he speaketh neither of University, nor nameth Cambridge for the place. 7 Ely, situate in the Isle so named, occasioned by the divided streams of Non and Ouse; with the over-flores of other Rivers; turning a great part of this tract into Fens and Marshes, the Inhabitants whereof were called Girvii. A place of no great beauty or reputation, as situate in a foggy and unhealthful air; but only for a fair Monastery built by S. Ethelreda, Wife of Egfride, King of the Northumberts, by her made a Nunnery; afterwards rebuilt and replenished with Monks by Ethelwald Bishop of Winchester, Anno 970. or thereabouts; finally made a Bishops See in the time of King Henry the first, Anno 1109.

VII. The Kingdom of MERCIA, was begun by Crida, or Creoda, a great Commander of the Angli, or English Nation; who feelingly the heart of Britain, where the people were least used to Arms, made themselves Masters of the Counties of Gloucester, Worcester, Hereford, Salop, Chester, Stafford, Derby, Nottingham, Leicester, Rutland, Lincoln, Huntingdon, Northampton, Warwick, Oxon, Buckingham, Bedford, and the rest of Hartfordshire: which bounded in a manner by all the rest of the Saxon Kingdoms, had the name of Mercia, from the word Meare, which signifieth a bound or limit. The Christian Faith suppressed here, as in other Kingdoms of the Saxons, was restored again in the reigns of Penda, Penda, and Wulfher, by the preaching of S. Chad, the first Bishop of Lichfield. Places of most observation in it, 1 Hereford, seated on the banks of the River Wye, in the middle of most flourishing Meadows, and no less plentiful Cornfields; raised out of the ruins of Ariconium here placed by Antonine, the tract of which name it doth still retain. A Bishops See in the time of the Britans, restored to that dignity by the Saxons, An 680. the honourable title of the Bobuns, once Earls hereof; and afterwards of Henry of Bullingbrook, Duke of Hereford. 2 Worcester, pleasantly seated on the Severn, over which it hath a very fair Bridge with a Tower upon it. A Bishops See, An 679. beautified with a fair Cathedral, and every way considerable for situation, number of Churches, near buildings, the industry of the Inhabitants, and giving the Title of an Earl to the noble Family of the Sommerfets, extracted by the Beauforts from John of Gannet. 3 Lichfield, the first Bishops See amongst the Mercians, founded there An 646. by Ofsay King of the Northumblers, but fixed and seated by S. Chad in the reign of Wulfher, King of the Mercians; endowed in the very infancy with such fair possessions, that in the year 793. Adulfus, the Bishop hereof, was made Archbishop of the Mercians. But it proved only a personal honour, and died with him. 4 Covenry, so called from an old Coven, or Religious house, which gave name unto it. Situate in Warwickshire, and now the principal of that County, though esteemed a County of it self: beautified with a goodly Wall, two fair Parish Churches, large streets, and very handsome houses. A City of great trade and riches, though destitute of all advantages; which a navigable River might afford it; heretofore of great fame for a stately Monastery, to which the See Episcopal was for a while removed from Lichfield, now a ruin only. 5 Leicester, once a Bishops See, the Dinse taken out of Lichfield, An 733. removed to Dorchester near Oxon, and thence to Lincoln. Beautified in those days with a fair Collegiate Church, a magnificent Abbey, and a strong Castle; all decayed and ruined by the iniquity and injury of these later times: the Town remaining in as good plight both for trade and buildings, as most Towns do which want a navigable River. Of most fame for the Earls thereof, Alger and Edwin, noble Saxons, Simon de Montfort the Cataline and great Incendiary of this Kingdom; the Princes of the House of Lancaster, who bore this Title; with some others since. 6 Derby, upon the River Darwent, a well-traded Town, and of good resort; adorned with five Churches, a goodly Stone Bridge, and a large Market-place; the honorary title of the noble Family of the Stanleys, created Earls hereof by King Henry the 7th. 7 Nottingham, seated on the Trent, but very high upon an hill, which overlooks it. For buildings, fair streets, and a spacious Market-place, not giving way to many Cities; but of most fame for a Royal and magnificent Castle; which for strength, stateliness, and prospect, may justly challenge the precedence of most in England. 8 Lincoln, a Town in those days of great strength, and now, one of the best peopled Cities in all the Heptarchy; and of great merchandize and traffick both by Sea and Land: in somuch that Remigius, then Bishop of Dorchester, thought fit to translate hither the Episcopal See. Now much decayed and thence the Proverb, that Lincoln was, London is, &c. The chief fame which now it hath, is for the Minster, one of the stateliest Piles in England, and perhaps in Christendom; high seated on an Hill, and from thence discerned over all the Country. 9 Huntingdon, or the Hunters Town, from the great sport the Hunters found in the neighbouring Forest; commodiously seated on the Northern bank of the River Ouse, rising unto the North with a soft ascent, consisting of four Parish Churches, and shews the ruins of a Castle built by Edward the Elder, Anno 917. 10 Peterburgh, seated in a Nook or Angle of Northamptonshire, where formerly had been a gulf or whirl-pool of exceeding depth: but made firm ground by Wulfere King of the Mercians, when he laid the foundations of the Monastery, Anno 633, dedicated to S. Peter, whence it had this name, before then called Medanhsede. A Town, but for the Church, of no great esteem, as standing out of the way for trade, and in no plausible place for health or pleasure: yet shewing two handsome streets, a large Market-place, and a fair Parish Church (besides the Abbey) made an Episcopal See by King Henry the 8th. 11 Norhampton, built on the Northern bank of the River Antona (now Nen) whence it had the name. A Town which for the beauty and circuit of it need not give way to many Cities; fortified heretofore with a very strong Castle, and seated in so good an Air, that once the Students of Cambridge had a purpose to remove their University thither. The Noble Familie of the Comptons are now Earls hereof. 12 Bedford, so called from Beds and Lodgings on the Ford, built on both sides thereof, for the use of Travellers; growing in time to so great bigness as to contain in it five Parish Churches: famous in former times for the great battle fought in the adjoining fields, An. 572. in which Cuthwulf the Saxon vanquished the Britans, and became Master of the Country. But more famous for giving the title of Duke to John of Lancaster, Regent of France for King Henry the 6th. and Jasper of Halstead, Uncle to King Henry the 7th. 13 S. Albans, so called from a famous Monastery, here founded by Offa the great King of the Mercians, in honour of S. Alban, the Proto-Martyr of Britain, a Citizen of Verulamium, near adjoining to it: out of the ruins whereof, decayed by age, and destroyed by War; arose the present greatness of S. Albans, the fairest and best traded Town in the County of Hartford. 14 Buckingham, the chief Town of the County so called, situate on the River Ouse: fortified by King Edward the Elder against the Danes, Anno 915. otherwise not much observable, but for those many noble personages which have had the title of Dukes hereof.

English.

- 716 15 Ethelbald King of Mercia.
 758 16 Offa the great King of the Mercians.
 794 17 Egfride, King of Mercia.
 796 18 Kenwolf, King of Mercia.
 800 19 Egbert, the son of Almond, King of the West-Saxons, who having vanquished all the rest of the Saxon Kings, and added most of their Estates unto his own; caused the whole united body to be called Engel-land, or England, in a Parliament or Council held at Winchester, Anno 819. being the 19th. year of his Reign over the West-Saxons; and by that name he was then crowned in the presence of his Nobles, and the rest of his Subjects; leaving it unto the rest of his Successors.

But before we come to the recital of their names, we are to take notice of the Danes, the next considerable Actors on the Stage of England; who in the time of this Egbert, first invaded the Country, and after exercised the patience of his posterity, till in fine they got the kingdom to themselves. Of the Original and first Successes of this people, we shall speak more at large when we come to Denmark. Suffice it here to know, that having taken up the void Rooms of the Inter and English in the Cinabrick, Chersonese, they thought it not amiss to follow them into Britain also; making a Discovery of some part of the Coast thereof with three Ships only, Anno 787. being the first year of Brithic (the Father of Egbert) King of the West Saxons. Which having done, and prepared themselves for the undertaking, in the time of Egbert they invaded Northumberland, the Isle of Shepey in Kent, and the Coasts of Wales; not without much difficulty driven out by him. In the Reign of the three Kings succeeding, having vanquished the Northumbrians, East-Angles, and a part of the Mercians; they erected many petty Tyrannies: By Alfred first stopped in their Career; by Edward the Elder ousted of the East Angles, and by Athelstan of Northumberland also; the Danes for some time after being subject to the English Government, mixing in marriages and alliance, and incorporated with them. By the valour and good Fortune of Swain their King, they recovered their power again in England; and in the person of Canutus obtained the Kingdom: who having impolitically sent back his Danes into their Country (as if a Kingdom got by force, could be held by favour) opened a way to their exclusion from the Crown; which happened within seven years after his decease. Which said, we come to the Successions of

The Kings of England of the Saxon Race.

- 819 1 Egbert, the last King of the West-Saxons, and the first of England. 18.
 837 2 Ethelwolf, the eldest son of Egbert. 20.
 857 3 Ethelbald, the eldest son of Ethelwolf. 1.
 858 4 Ethelbert, the brother of Ethelbald. 5.
 863 5 Ethelfred, the brother of the two former Kings, the third son of Ethelwolf, and as much molested by the Danes, as his brethren were. 10.
 873 6 Alfride, the fourth son of Ethelwolf, who totally united the Saxon Heptarchy into one Estate, vanquished the Danes, whom he made subject to his commands, though he could not expel them. He divided England into shires, and restored the University of Oxon.
 900 7 Edward, surnamed the Elder, the son of Alfride, who recovered the East Angles from the power of the Danes, whom he shut up in Northumberland. 24.
 924 8 Athelstan, the son of Edward, who subdued the Britains of Cumberland and Cornwal, and compelled the Danes to submit themselves to the English Government. In his time lived S. Guy of Warwick, famous for overcoming Colbrand the Danish Champion (the great Goliath of that people) near the Walls of Winchester. 10.
 940 9 Edmund, the Brother of Athelstan, by whom the Danes of Northumberland were brought under obedience, and the Kingdom of the Britains in Cumberland utterly subverted.
 946 10 Edred the Brother of Edmund and Athelstan, so fortunate against the Danes, that he compelled them to be Chritened. 9.
 955 11 Edwy, the son of Edmund.
 955 12 Edgar, the brother of Edwy, surnamed the Peaceable, the most absolute Monarch of England, since the time of the Saxons; by whom the tribute of money imposed by Athelstan on the Welsh, was exchanged into a tribute of Wolves. 16.
 775 13 Edward II. son of Edgar, treacherously murdered by his Stepdame, to make way for Ethelred her son, hence surnamed the Martyr. 3.
 978 14 Ethelred, the younger son of Edgar, and half brother of Edward, enjoyed the Crown unquietly which he got unjustly. Oppressed and broken by the Danes, he was fain to buy his peace of them at the yearly tribute of 10000 pounds; inhaled to 48000 pounds within short time after; which moneys were raised upon the Subjects, by the name of Danegels. Weary of these exactions, he plotted warily with his Subjects to kill all the Danes, as they slept in their beds; which accordingly was put in execution on S. Brices night, Novemb. 12. Anno 1012. To revenge this outrage and dishonour, Swaine King of Denmark, with a Fleet of 350 ships, came into England; the fear whereof compelled Ethelred, a weak and impuissant Prince to fly into Normandy; leaving his poor Subjects to the mercy of the Danish Tyrant, who miserably plagued them till his death. To whom succeeded his son Cnutus (a more temperate Prince; who maugre Ethelred now returned, or his son Edmund Ironside, a most valiant King, did in the end possess himself of the whole Kingdom.
 Ec 3 1016

England.

- 1016 15 Edmund II. surnamed Ironside, having in vain attempted to recover his Kingdom, at last divided it with Canutus: not long after which he was treacherously and basely murdered. By Edward, surnamed the Out-Law, his eldest Son, he was Grandfather of Edgar Atheling, and of Margaret, Wife of Malcolm the third, King of the Scots.

The Danish Kings.

- 1017 1 Canutus King of Denmark and Norway, after the death of Edmund the 2d. sole King of England. He married Emma the widow of Ethelred, & daughter of Richard Duke of Normandy. 20.
 1037 2 Harald the base Son of Canutus, surnamed Harfager. 4.
 1040 3 Canutus II. commonly called Hardy Knute, the lawful Son of Canutus by Emma the widow of Ethelred the 2d. and Mother of Edward, surnamed the Confessor, the last King of the Danes in England. After whose death that People having tyrannized in England for the space of 255 years, (of which they had reigned only 26) were utterly expelled the Country, or passed in the Accompt of English; Edward the Confessor, the youngest Son of Ethelred, being advanced unto the Throne, by the power and practices of his Mother Emma, and the absence of the Children of Edmund Ironside his elder Brother, Anno 1042.

Now concerning the Danes abiding here, and going hence, as they did, I observe three customs yet in use amongst us. First, each English house maintained one Dane, who living idly like the Drones among the Bees, had the benefit of all their labour, and was by them called Lord Dane; and even now when we see an idle fellow, we call him a Lord Dane. 2 The Danes used when the English drank, to stab them or cut their throats: to avoid which villany, the party then drinking, requested some of the next unto him to be his surety or pledge, whilst he paid nature her due: and hence have we our usual custom of pledging one another. 3 The old Romans at the expulsion of their Kings, annually solemnized the Fagalia: according to which pattern the joyful English having cleared the Country of the Danes, instituted the annual sports of Hock-tide: the word in their old tongue, the Saxon, importing the time of scouring, or triumphing. This solemnity consisted in the merry meetings of the Neighbours in those days, during which the Festival lasted, and was celebrated by the younger sort of both sexes, with all manner of exercises, and pastimes in the streets, even as Shrove-tide yet is. But now time hath so corrupted it, that the name excepted, there remaineth no sign of the first Institution.

- A.Ch.
 1042 16 Edward III. surnamed the Confessor, half brother both to Edmund Ironside, and Hardy Knute the Dane, called out of Normandy, where he lived with the Dukes his Cousins, succeeded in the Realm of England. This King collected out of the Danish, Saxon, and Mercian Laws, one universal and general Law; whence our Common Law is thought to have had its original: which may be true of the written Laws, not of the customary and unwritten Laws; these being certainly more ancient. He was in his life of that holiness, that he received power from above to cure many diseases; amongst other the swelling of the throat, called by us the Kings Evil: a Prerogative that continueth Hereditary to his Successors of England. Finally, after his death, he was Canonized for a Saint; and died, having reigned 24 years.
 1066 17 Harald II. Son to Earl Godwin, was chosen King in the nonage of Edgar Atheling, Grandchild to Edmund Ironside, the true heir of the Kingdom: to which Harald might pretend some title as being born unto Earl Godwin by Thyra the base daughter of Canutus the first, Sister by the whole blood to Harald Harfager, and of the half blood to Canutus the second, the last Kings of the Danes in England. But William Duke of Normandy, (of which people we have spoke already when we were in France, and shall speak more at large when we come to Denmark, as the last Actors on the Theatre or Stage of England: This William say) pretending a Donation from his Cousin, King Edward the Confessor, invaded England, slew Harald, and with him 66654 of his English Souldiers, and possessed himself of the Kingdom; using such Policy in his new Conquest, that he utterly disheartened the English from hopes of better Fortune. From him beginneth the new Accompt of the Kings of England, those of the former Line being no longer reckoned in the computation of the first, second, or third, &c.

The Norman Kings.

- 1067 1 William, surnamed the Conquerour, after the vanquishment and death of Harald, acknowledged and Crowned King, altered the ancient Laws of England, and established those of Normandy in place thereof: governing the people absolutely by the power of the Sword, and giving a great part of their Lands to his former Followers, and such as were engaged in the Action with him; from whom most of our ancient Families do derive themselves; those Lands to be holden in Knights service, which drew along with it the Wardship of the Heir in Minority, as a charge laid upon the Land.
 1089 2 William II. surnamed Rufus, second Son to the Conquerour, succeeded by the appointment of his Father, and was crowned King; slain afterwards in the New Forest, by an arrow levelled at a Deer.

England.

- 1102 3 Henry, for his learning surnamed Beau-clerk, the third Son of the Conquerour, in the absence of his Brother Robert (in the Holy Land Wars) entered on the Kingdom, and afterwards took from him also the Dukedom of Normandy, and put out his eyes. Deprived of all his male-issue, he left one only Daughter whose name was Maud; first married to the Emperor Henry the fifth, and after to Geoffrey Plantagenet Earl of Anjou, Tourein, and Maine. 34.
 1136 4 Stephen, second Son of Stephen Earl of Champagne and Blais, and of Alice Daughter to the Conquerour, succeeded; who to purchase the peoples loves, released the tribute called Danegelt: he spent most of his reign in War against Maud the Empress. 19.

The Saxon blood restored.

- 1155 5 Henry II. Son to Maud the Empress, Daughter to Henry the first, and to Maud Daughter to Malcolm King of Scotland, and Margaret, Sister to Edgar Atheling, restored the Saxon blood to the Crown of England. His Father was Geoffrey Earl of Anjou, Tourein, and Maine; which Provinces he added to the English Empire, as also the Dutchie of Aquitain, and the Earldom of Poitou, by Eleanor his Wife; and a great part of Ireland by conquest. Happy in all things, the unnatural rebellions of his Sons excepted. 34.
 1189 6 Richard, the Son of Henry, surnamed Cœur de Lyon, warred in the Holy Land, overcame the Turks, whom he had almost driven out of Syria, took the Isle of Cyprus; and after many worthy achievements, returning homewards to defend Normandy, and Aquitain against the French, was by Tempest cast upon Dalmatia; and travelling through the Dominions of the Duke of Austria, was taken Prisoner, put to a grievous ransom, and after his return slain at the siege of Chalus, in the Province of Limosin. 12.
 1201 7 John, brother of Richard, an unhappy Prince, and one that could expect no better; as being an unnatural son to his Father, and an undutiful Subject to his Brother. Distressed for a great part of his reign, by Wars with his Barons, outed of all Normandy, Aquitain, and Anjou, by the power of the French; to whom also he was likely to have lost the Realm of England: Finally, after a base submission of himself and his Kingdom to the Popes Legate, he is said to have been poisoned at Swinsteads Abbey. 17.
 1218 8 Henry III. Son of John, expelled the invading French out of England, and by a composition with Lewis the 9th. was restored unto the Dukedom of Guyenne, held by his Successors till the reign of King Henry the 6th. Exhausted by the Pope, and oppressed a long time by his factious and unruly Barons, but at last victorious. 56.
 1274 9 Edward, the Son of Henry, awed France, subdued Wales, brought Scotland into subjection; of whose King and Nobility he received homage. 34.
 1308 10 Edward II. Son of Edward the first, a dissolute Prince, hated of the Nobles, and contemned by the Vulgar, for his immeasurable love to Peirce Gaveston, and the Spencers, was twice shamefully beaten by the Scots; and being deposed by a strong faction raised against him by his Queen, and Roger Lord Mortimer, was barbarously murdered in Berkeley Castle. 19.
 1327 11 Edward III. Son of Edward the 2d. a most virtuous and valorous Prince, brought the Scots to obedience, overthrew the French in two great battels, took the Town of Callice, and many fair possessions in that Kingdom. 50.
 1377 12 Richard II. another of our unfortunate Kings, lost many of his Peeces in France, and at last being over-awed by his two great Uncles of Lancaster and Glocester, and taken Prisoner by his Cousin, the Duke of Hereford, he was forced to resign his Crown, and afterwards was murdered at Pomfret Castle.

The Lancastrian Line.

- 1399 13 Henry IV. Son to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, the fourth Son to Henry the 3d. was by the power of the Sword, but with the consent of the People, seized in the Throne; and spent his whole Reign in suppressing homebred rebellions. 15.
 1414 14 Henry V. the mirror of Magnificence, and pattern of true Vertue, pursued the title of France, and won it, being ordained Heir apparent to the French Crown, but lived not to possess the Kingdom. 9.
 1423 15 Henry VI. a pious, but unfortunate Prince, was crowned King of France in Paris; which he held during the life of his Uncle John of Bedford, and Humphrey of Glocester; after whose deaths, he not only lost France to the French, but England and his life to the Turkish Faction. 38.

The Turkish Line.

- 1461 16 Edward IV. Son of Richard Duke of York, the Son of Richard Earl of Cambridge, and Grandson of Edmund of Langley Duke of York, the fifth Son of King Edward the third; challenged the Crown in right of the Lady Anne his Grandmother, Daughter of Roger Mortimer.

England.

Mortimer Earl of March, the son of Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, and of Philippa his Wife, sole Daughter of Lionel Duke of Clarence, the third son of the said King Edward, and Elder Brother of John of Gaunt. The claim first set on foot by his Father the Duke of Tork, who lost his life in pursuance of it in the battel of Wakefield; with better fortune and success, pursued by King Edward himself, who finally after nine bloody battails fought between the Houses (especially that of Townton, in which were slain 36000 English) was quietly seated in the possession of England and Ireland. 23.

- 1484 17 Edward V. his son, was before his Coronation murdered by his Uncle Richard, in the Tower of London.
 1484 18 Richard III. Brother of Edward the 4th. a most wicked and tyrannical Prince, to make way unto the Diadem, murdered King Henry the 6th, and 2 Prince Edward his son. 3 George Duke of Clarence, his brother. 4 Hastings a faithful servant to King Edward. 5 Rivers, Vaughan, and Gray, the Queens kindred. 6 Edward the 5th. his Sovereign, with his brother Richard. 7 Henry Duke of Buckingham his dear Friend, and greatest Coadjutor in these his ungodly practices; and his own wife Anne, so to make way to an incestuous marriage with his Niece Elizabeth, the eldest daughter of Edward the 4th, but before the solemnity he was slain at Bosworth. 3.

The Union of the Families.

- 1487 19 Henry VII. Earl of Richmond, Heir to the House of Lancaster, (as Son of Magaret Daughter of John Duke of Somerset, Son of John Earl of Somerset, Son of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster) after the overthrow of Richard, married Elizabeth, Daughter and Heir to Edward the 4th. uniting by that marriage the divided Families. He was also extracted from th British and French, Royal Blood, as being Son to Edmund Tudor Earl of Richmond, Son to Owen Tudor (descended from Cadwaladar, the last King of the Britains) and Katharine of France, Widow of Henry the 5th. His whole wars was against home-bred Rebels; the chief being Lambert, and the Followers and Fautors of Perken Warbeck. 23.
 1509 20 Henry VIII. Heir to both Families, between which were fought for the Diadem, 17 pitched Fields; in which perished 8 Kings and Princes, 40 Dukes, Marquesses, and Earls, 200000 of the common people, besides Barons, and Gentlemen. This King banished the usurped Supremacy of the Popes, and began the Reformation of Religion; though formerly he had writ a Book against Luther, for which the Pope gave him the honourable Title of The Defender of the Faith, afterwards made Hereditary by Act of Parliament to his Heirs and Successors. A Prince of great vices, but of greater virtues. 38.
 1547 21 Edward VI the Son of Henry the 8th. by Jane Seymour his third Wife; out of whose womb he was said to be cut, to come into the World, as Cesar was: but he had neither Cæsars Fortune nor length of life; dying very young, and his affairs conducted by divided Councils; though otherwise of great hopes, and of a pregnancy of judgment above his years. 6.
 1553 22 Mary, the Daughter of King Henry the 8th. by Katharine of Spain, the Widow of his brother Arthur, restored the Popes Supremacy banished by her Father, with the whole mass of Popery abolished in her Brothers reign. To which Religion so addicted, that in the short time of her reign there was more blood shed, than in the whole 44 years of her Sister Elizabeth. In the last year of her reign she lost Calice to the French, which proved the loss of her life also, as it was supposed. 5.
 1558 23 Elizabeth, the Daughter of King Henry the 8th. by the Lady Anne Bullen his second Wife; a most gracious Heroick Princess; was by the Divine Providence of God preserved from the practices of her Enemies in her Sisters reign, to sway the Scepter of the Kingdom. She pursued the Reformation of Religion, begun in the times of her Father and Brother; refined the corrupt Coin brought in by her Father; furnished the Royal Navy with all kind of Warlike Ammunitions; increased the Revenue of the Universities, by the Statute of Provisions; succoured the Scots against the French, the French Protestants against the Papists, and both against the Spaniards: defended the Netherlands against the attempts of Spain; commanded the whole Ocean; entered League with the Moscovite; and was famous for her Prudence and Government amongst the Turks, Persians, and Tartars, yea her very Enemies. Finally, she died in the 45 year of her reign, and the 70th. of her life, on the 24th. of March, Anno 1602. according to the computation of the Church of England, which beginneth the New Year with the Feast of the Annunciation. To whom succeeded JAMES the sixth King of the Scots, with the joy of all men, as the next undoubted Heir of the Crown. Of whom we shall say more when we come to speak of the Monarchs of Britain: of which he was the first since the fall of the Roman Empire, and such more properly than the greatest of all those Emperours had been before; None of them having all the North parts of Britain itself, or any part of Ireland at all, nor many of the Isles adjoining, under their Dominion.

In the mean time to look on England as a State distinct, we will consider it and the Kings thereof, with with reference to reputation abroad, and power at home; with the Revenues, Arms, and Military Orders; of it, as in other places. And first for Reputation, when all Christendom in the Council of Constance, was divided into Nations; Anglicana Notio was one of the Principal, and not Subaltern; and had its voice of equal balance with the Nations of France, or Italy, in all affairs concerning the doctrine, discipline and peace of the Church, which were there debated. And for the place due to the Kings hereof in those General Councils, and the rank they held among other Christian Princes; I find that the Emperor of Germany was accounted Major filius Ecclesie; the King of France, Minor Filius; and the King of England, Filius tertius, & adoptivus. The King of France in General Councils, had place next the Emperor, on his right hand; the King of England on his left hand; and the King of Scotland, next before Castile. Now indeed the King of Spain being so much improved, is the dearly beloved Son of the Church; and arrogateth to himself the place above all other Princes: but in the time of Pope Julius, the controversy arising between the Ambassadors of the two Princes for precedence; the Pope adjudged it to belong of right unto England. And Pope Pius the fourth, upon the like controversy, arising between the Ambassadors of France and Spain, adjudged the precedence to the French.

Touching the Souldiery of England, and their most notable achievements, both by Sea and Land; sufficient hath been said already. What Forces the Kings hereof have been able to raise, and may command for present service, will best be seen by the action of King Henry the 8th. at Bullen; the Armies of Queen Elizabeth in 88. and the numbers of the Trained Bands of the several Counties. First, for the Action of King Henry the 8th, he had in his Avant-guard 12000 Foot, and 500 Light Horse in blue Jackets with red Guards; in the Rere-guard a like number both of Horse and Foot; and in the main Battel 20000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, all in Red Jackets and yellow Guards: the whole number 44000 Foot, and 3000 Horse. They drew after them 180 great Peeces, besides small ones; and for conveyance of their Ordnance, Baggage, and other necessities, no fewer than 25000 Draught-horses, besides other carriages. In the next place for 88. the Queen dispersed in several places on Southern Coasts of the Kingdom, to hinder the landing of the Enemy, 25000 Souldiers of both sorts; at Tilbury, for the defence of the City of London, under the Command of the Earl of Leicester, 22000 Foot, and 1000 Horse: and for the Guard of her own person, under the Lord Hunsdon, 34000 Foot, and 2000 Horse: in all, the number of 84000 men: besides those goodly Troops which the Nobility and Gentry did present her with, at their own proper charges. And as for the Trained Bands, the number of both sorts disciplined and mustered to be ready upon all occasions: in the eighth year of King James, (for I have since seen no Muster-Roll of them) amounted to 296130 able men, 141315 armed men, 935 Demi-lances, 6777 Light Horse, 19345 Pioneers; besides what was required of Pierj and Prelates, supposed to amount to 20000 armed men, and 4000 Light Horse. And for their strength at Sea, besides the Navy Royal, consisting of about 30 gallant Ships, (besides the lesser Vessels;) the best and bravest that any Prince in Christendom can boast of, as his own propriety: there are such store of Colliers and Merchants Ships, fit for any Service, that in the year 88 aforesaid, the Queen had 100 Sail of good Ships to oppose the Spaniards; and 20 more, to wait upon the motions of the Duke of Parma. And in the year 1597. she set out for the Iland Voyage, no fewer than 120 Sail of all sorts; of which 60 were men of War.

As for the Revenues of this Kingdom, Boterus reckoned them in the time of King Henry the 7th, to be no more than 400000 Crowns per annum; but grants, that afterward they were improved to a million more, by King Henry the 8th. the dissolution of Monasteries, and the beneficredounding from the Court of Wards, making that improvement. And to say truth, the Universal dissolution of Religious Houses of all sorts, did for the time so mightily increase his annual Income, that he was fain to erect two new Courts (the Court of Augmentation, and the Court of Surveysors) for the better managing of the same. But these Additions being wasted by his own exorbitant expences, and the several Alienations made by King Edward the sixth; those Courts of new Eriction were dissolved again; and the Revenue fell so short of its former height, that in the 12 year of Queen Elizabeth, the profits of the Crown (besides the Court of Wards, and the Dutche of Lancaster) came to no more than to 188197 l. 4s. Of which 110612 l. 13s. went out that year upon the Navy, the charge of Household, and other necessary assignments. Since which time the great increase of trading, both at home and abroad, and the great glut of money in all parts of the World; hath added very much to the Intado: The certainty whereof as I do not know, so neither will I aim at it by uncertain Hearsay.

The Principal Orders of Knighthood are, and were, 1 of the Round Table, instituted by Arthur King of the Britains, and one of the Worlds Nine Worthies. It consisted of 150 Knights, whose names are recorded in the History of King Arthur, there where Sir Ure, a wounded Knight came to be cured of his hurts: it being his fate that only the best Knight of the Order should be his Chirurgion. The Arms of most of these, with their several Blazons (I know not on how good authority) we find in Buras, the French Herald. The principal of them were Sir Danielot, Sir Tristram, Sir Lamhock, Sir Gavin, &c. all placed at one Round Table, to avoid quarrels about priority and place. The Round Table hanging in the great Hall at Winchester, is falsely called Arthur's Round Table; it being not of sufficient Antiquity, and containing but 24 Seats. Of these Knights there are reported many fabulous Stories: They ended with their Founder, and are fained by that Enchan of France; Rablaies, to be the Ferry-men of Hell; and that their pay is a piece of mouldy bread; and a phillip on the nose.

2 Of S. George, called commonly the Garter, instituted by King Edward the third, to increase virtue and and valour in the hearts of his Nobility; or as some will, in honour of the Countess of Salisbury's Garter, of which Lady, the King formerly had been enamoured. But this I take to be a vain and idle Romance, derogatory both to the Founder, and the Order; first published by Polydore Virgil, a stranger to the affairs of England, and by him taken upon no better ground than fama vulgi, the tradition of the common people; too trifling a Foundation for so great a building; Common bruit, being so infamous an Historian, that wise men neither report after it, nor give credit to any thing they receive from it. But for this fame or common bruit, the vanity and improbabilities thereof have been elsewhere canvassed. Suffice it to observe in this time and place, that the Garter was given unto this Order, in testimony of that bond of Love and Affection, wherewith the Knights or Fellows of it were to be bound severally to one another, and all of them jointly to the King as the Sovereign of it. So saith the Register of the Order, (in which occurth not one word of the Ladies Garter) affirming that King Edward did fit the habit unto that design, Ut omnia ad amicitiam & concordiam tendere nemo non intelligat. But to return unto the Order, there are of it 26 Knights, of which the Kings of England are Sovereigns: and is so much desired for its excellency, that 8 Emperours, 21 Foreign Kings, 22 Foreign Dukes and Princes, besides divers Noble men of other Countries, have been Fellows of it. The Ensign is a blew Garter buckled on the left leg, on which these words are embroidered, viz. Hony soit qui mal y pense. About their necks they wear a blew Ribband, at the end of which hangeth the Image of S. George; upon whose day the Installations of the new Knights are commonly celebrated.

3 Of the Bath, brought first into England, 1399. by Henry the fourth. They are created at the Coronation of Kings and Queens, and the Installation of the Princes of Wales: their duty to defend true Religion, Widows, Maids, Orphans, and to maintain the Kings Rights. The Knights thereof distinguished by a red Ribband, which they wear ordinarily about their necks, to difference them from Knights Bachelor, of whom they have in all places the precedence; unless they be also the Sons of Noblemen, to whom their birth gives it before all Orders.

4 Of Barons, an Order instituted by King James, in the 9th. year of his Reign, for the furtherance of the Plantation of Ulster. They have Precedency of the Knights of the Bath, but not of those of the Garter, nor of the younger sons of the Nobility. But this being Hereditary, not personal, and rather civil than military; is not so properly to be ranked amongst Orders of Knighthood.

The Arms of the Realm of England, are Mars, 3 Lyons passant Guardant, Sol. The reason why these Arms quartered with the French, took the second place, are 1 because that France at the time of the first quartering of them, was the larger and more famous Kingdom. 2 That the French seeing the honour done to their Arms, might more easily be induced to have acknowledged the English Title. 3 Because the English Arms, were compounded of the Lion of Aquitaine, and the two Lions of Normandy, being both French Dutches.

There were in England, at and since the time of the Reformation,

W A L E S.

W A L E S is bounded on all sides with the Sea, except towards England, on the East; from which separated by the river Dee, and a line drawn to the river Wye. Anciently it extended Eastwards to the river Severn, till by the puissance of Offa, the great King of the Mercians, the Welch or Britons were driven out of the plain Countries beyond that River, and forced to betake themselves to the Mountains: where he caused them to be shut up and divided from England, by an huge Ditch, called in Welch, Clandh Offa, i. e. Offa's Dike: Which Dike beginning at the influx of the Wye into the Severn, not far from Chepstow, extendeth 84 miles in length, even as far as Chester, where the Dee is mingled with the Sea. Concerning which Ditch, there was a Law made by Harald, That if any Welch man was found with a weapon on this side of it, he should have his right hand cut off by the Kings Officers.

The name of Wales some derive from Idwallo, the son of Cadwalloer, who with the small remainder of his British Subjects, made good the fastnesses of this Country, and was the first who had the title of King of Wales. Others conceive that the name of Welch and Wales, was given them by the Saxons: who having possessed themselves of all the rest of the Country, called the Britons, who lived here, by the name of Walsh, which in their language signifieth as much as Aliens; because they differed from them both in Laws and Language: which is the general opinion. Most probable it is, that as the Britons derive their Pedigree from the Galls (as before was proved) so they might still retain the name; and were called Walsh by the Saxons, in stead of Gallish: the Saxons using in most words W for G. as Warre were called Walsh by the Saxons, in stead of Gallish: the Saxons using in most words W for G. as Warre for Guerre, Warden for Guardian, and the like. And this to be believed the rather, because the Frenchmen to this day, call the Country Galles, and the eldest Son of England, Le Prince de Galles: as also that the Dutch or Germans (of whom the Saxons are a part) do call such Nations as inhabit on the skirts of France, by the name of Wallons.

The ancient Inhabitants hereof in the time of the Romans, before it had the name of Wales, were the Silures, possessing the Counties of Hereford, Brecknock, Radnor, Monmouth, and Glamorgan, all

Glocester-

Wales.

Glocestershire beyond the Severn, and the South parts of Worcestershire on the same side also: their chief Towns, Ariconium, now Hereford, (not reckoned since the time of Offa, as a part of Wales;) Balium, now Buelth, in Brecknock; Gobannium, now Abargueny, in Monmouth; Magni, now New Radnor, in the County so named; and Boviu, now Boverton, in Glamorgan. 2 The Dimetæ, possessing Cardigan, Caermarthen, and Pembroke shires, whose chief Towns were, Lovenium, now New Castle, in Caermarthen; Maridunum, or Caermarthen it self: and Off-pita, where now stands S. David, by the Welch called Meneu, whence that Bishop hath the name of Menevensis in Latine. 3 The Ordovices, inhabiting the Counties of Merioneth, Carnarvon, Anglesey, Denby, Flint, and Montgomery; with the North part of Worcestershire beyond the River Severn, and all Shropshire, on the same side of the River. Their chief Towns were, Segontium, now Caer Seont, in Carnarvonshire; Conanum, now Conwy, in the same County; Bonium, where after stood the famous Monastery of Bancho, in Flintshire; and Mediolanum, now Llanvillin, in the County of Montgomery. By these three Nations was all that Tract possessed, which lieth on the other side of the Severn. A very stout and hardy people, and so impatient of the yoke, that two of the three Legions which the Romans kept constantly in Britain, as before is said, were planted in and near these people, the better to contain them in due obedience: that is to say, the second Legion at Caer Leon upon Uik, of which more anon; and the twentieth at Dewana, where now stands West-Chester. So difficult a thing it was to make this Nation subject to the power of Rome; and no less difficult to bring them under the Command of the Saxons: whom they withstood, when all the rest of Britain had been conquered by them; and lived to see their Victors overcome by the Normans, before themselves had yielded to a Foreign yoke.

The Christian Faith planted amongst the Britons, in the time of Lucius, they still retained; when all the residue of the Island had been relapsed to Paganism: and they retained it not in secret, as afraid to own it, but in a well frequented Church. Inasmuch that Augustine the Monk, when he first preached the Gospel to the English Saxons, found here no fewer than seven Bishops; that is to say, Herefordensis; Tavenensis, Paternensis, Banchorensis, Elwynensis, Wiccienensis, and Morgannensis (or rather Menevensis): all which, excepting only Paternensis, do still remain amongst us, though in other names, Hereford, and Worcester, (Wiccienensis) reckoned now in England; St. David, or Menevensis, Tavenensis or Landaff, Bangor, and Elwynensis or St. Asaph, in Wales, according to the present boundaries and limits of it: And as they did retain the Faith, so they retained it after the tradition of their Predecessors; neither submitting unto Augustine as Archbishop of Canterbury, nor to the Pope from whom he came, as Occumenical, or chief Pastor of the Church of Christ; nor receiving any new Doctrines or Traditions from them: but standing on those Principles of Liberty, and Religion, which they were possessed of, till all the World almost had yielded to that powerful See. Not manumitted from the vassalage and thralldome to it, till they embraced the Reformation of the Church of England, in Doctrine, Discipline, and Worship: the Liturgie whereof was by the command of Queen Elizabeth, translated into the Welch or British; as the Bible also was by vertue of an Act of Parliament in the fifth of that Queen; the care thereof committed to the Bishop of Hereford, and the four Bishops of Wales. But because the Bible then set forth was only in the large Church Volume; it was in the beginning of the Reign of King Charles reduced to a more portable Bulk, at the cost and charge of my Cousin Mr. Rowland Heylyn, one of the Aldermen of London; who also caused the Book called The Practice of Piety to be printed in that language for the instruction of the People; and a Welch or British Dictionary to be made and published, for the understanding of the Language.

But to return unto the Church, and affairs thereof, for the better ordering of the same, it hath been long ago divided into four Dioceses (besides that of Hereford) for the exercise of Ecclesiastical Discipline; those Dioceses subdivided into 9 Archdeaconries, as before in England: all subject heretofore to their own Primate or Archbishop, residing in the City of Isca Silurum, the Metropolis of the Province of Britania Secunda, called by the Welch or Britons, Caer-Leon, or the City of the Legion, from the second Legion, fixt there for defence of the Province; and Caer-Leon upon Uik, because situate on the River so named. But this City being too much exposed to the fury of the Saxons, the Archiepiscopal See was translated to Meneu, standing on a Promontory in the extreme Angle of Pembroke shire; by David then Archbishop thereof, and near of kin to Arthur that renowned King of the Britons: from whom, in tract of time, the name of Meneu being left off, the See and City came to be called St. David. From David unto Sawson the 26. Archbishop of the Welch, (being above 400 years) did they hold this dignity; but then the Pessilence extremely raging in these parts; Archbishop Sawson carried with him the Episcopical Pall, and therewith the dignity it self, to Dole in Bretagne. After which time we hear of no Archbishop in Wales, in name and title; though the power proper thereunto still remained amongst them: the Welch Bishops acknowledging no other Primate, nor receiving consecration from any other hands, than their own Bishop of St. David, till Bishop Bernard was compelled to submit himself to the Power and Jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the time of King Henry the first.

But it's time to look upon the face of the Country as it stands at the present, which we find Mountainous and Barren; not able to maintain its people but by helps elsewhere. To make amends for which defect, there were some Silver Mines discovered in it not long since, by Sir Hugh Middleton; Knight and Baronet; not only to the great honour of his own Country, but to the profit and renown of the whole Island of Great Britain. Their chief Commodities are coarse Clothes, entituled commonly by the name of Welch Fretze, and Cottons; which Merchandise was heretofore brought to Oswey (the yearly; exchanged in following times for a tribute of Wolves. But howsoever, they continued for a time the title of Kings, whose names are thus set down by Glover, in his Catalogue of Honour, published by Miller.

690 1 Idwallo, son of Cadwalader. 818 4 Mervin, the son in law of Conan. 25.
720 2 Roderick, son of Idwallo 25. 843 5 Roderick II. surnamed the Great, son of Mervin, who divided his Kingdom, small enough before, amongst his sons: giving Guinedth, or North-Wales, to Amarawd his eldest Son; to Cadel his second son, Debenbarth or South-Wales; and Powis-land to his youngest son, Mervin: conditioned that the two younger sons, and their Successors, should hold their Estates in Fee of the Kings of North-Wales, and acknowledge the Sovereignty thereof, as Liege-men and Homagers. According unto which appointment, it was ordained in the Constitutions of Howel Dha, the Legislator of Wales, that as the Kings of Aberfraw were bound to pay 63 pounds in a way of tribute to the Kings of London; so the Kings of Dynevor, and Matravall, should pay in way of tribute to the Kings of London as well as those of Scotland, for so long a time, against the power and puissance of the Kings of England. Yet was not this the worst of the mischief neither; his Successors subdividing (by his example) their small Estates into many parcels, insomuch that of the eight tributary Kings which rowed King Edgar on the Dee, five of them were the Kings or Princes of Wales. But Roderick did not think of that which was to come, whom we must follow in our story, according to the Division of the Country made by him into three Estates, of North-Wales, South-Wales, and Powis-land.

1. NORTH-WALES, or Guinedth, contained the Counties of Merioneth and Carnarvon, the Isle of Anglesey, and the greatest parts of Denbigh and Flint-shires. The chief Towns whereof are Bangor, Dunbigh, Carnarvon, Aberfraw; spoken of before; and some in Anglesey, whereof we shall speak more hereafter. The Country (Anglesey excepted) the most barren and unfruitful part of Wales; but withall the safest, and furthest from the danger of the incroaching English: which possibly might be the reason why it was set out for the portion of the Eldest son, in whom the Sovereignty of the Welsh was to be preserved, by the Kings or Princes of North-Wales.

877 1 Amarawd. 36 1120 7 Owen Guinedth, son of Gryffith.
913 2 Idwallo, son of Amarawd. 1178 8 David ap Owen, son of Owen Guinedth.
3 Merick, son of Idwallo. 1194 9 Llewellen ap Iorweth, the Nephew of David.
4 James, of Iago, Brother of Merick.
1067 5 Conan, son of James, or Iago. 1240 10 David ap Llewellen.
1099 6 Gryffith ap Conan. 1246 11 Llewellen II. son of Gryffith, the Brother of David ap Llewellen, the last Prince of Wales of the British Race. Of whom it is said, that once consulting with a Witch, he was told by her, that it was his destiny, to be carried in triumph through London, with a Crown on his head. Hereupon making some excursions on the English Borders, he drew upon himself the whole power of King Edward the first, which not being able to withstand, and the King as willing on the other side not to fight with Mountains; Commissioners were appointed to conclude the differences: Robert Lord Tiptoff, and some others, for the King of England; for the Welsh Prince, Grono ap Heylyn, a great man of that Country, descended from Brockwel Skythrac, one of the Princes of Powys-land, (from whom, if Camden Clarentius be of any credit, the Author of these Papers doth derive his Pedegree) under whom that Family had the Office of Hereditary Cup-Bearer, and from thence their name; (Heylyn, Promus, five à poculis, qua vox in proprium nomen abiit, saith the Welsh Dictionary) By those Commissioners it was concluded and agreed on, that Llewellen should enjoy a part of the Country with the title of Prince, during his life: the rest in present, and the whole after his decease, to be surrendered over to the King of England. But David the Brother of Llewellen, finding himself excluded by this agreement, from the hope of succession, incensed his Brother and the Welsh to a new Revolt: the issue whereof was the taking of David, executed by the hand of justice; and the death of Llewellen, slain in Battail, near the Bwlth in Brecknockshire. Whose head being pitched upon a stake, and adorned with a Paper-Crown, was by a Horseman carried triumphantly through London, An. 1182. And so the Prophecy was fulfilled. In him ended the Line of the Princes of North-Wales, after they had for the space of 405 years resisted not only the private undertakers and Adventurers of England, but the Forces of many puissant Monarchs; whose attempts they always made frustrate, by retiring into the heart of their Country, and leaving nothing for the English to encounter with, but their Woods and Mountains. But now the fatal period of the British Liberty being come, they were constrained to yield to the stronger. What followed after this, we shall see anon.

The

Wales.

The Arms of these Princes was quarterly Gules and Or, four Lions Passant gardant counter-changed.

2. POWISLAND contained the whole Counties of Montgomery, and Radnor, all Shropshire beyond the Severn, with the Town of Shrewsbury, and the rest of Denbigh and Flint-shires; comprehending by the estimate of those times, 15 Cantreds or hundreds of Villages: the word Cant signifying an Hundred, and Tres a Village. The principal Cities or Towns it of were, S. Asaph, Shrewsbury, Matravall, spoken of before. A Country more partaking of the nature and fertility of England, than the parts belonging unto Guinedth, or North-Wales; but always lying in harms way, by reason of the Neighbourhood of the more potent English: and therefore given by Roderick to Mervin, his youngest son, partly because he was the youngest; but chiefly because he was a man of approved valour, and so more fit to have his portion upon the Borders. In his Line it continued a long time together, but much afflicted and dismembered by the Earls of Chester and Shrewsbury, who took from them a good part of Flint; Denbigh, and Shropshire; and by the Princes of North-Wales, who cast many a greedy eye upon it. Of the Successors of Prince Mervin, I find no good Constat, more than of Brockwell, Skythrac, before remembered. The last that held it all entire was Meredyth ap Blethyn, who following the ill example of Roderick Maor, divided it betwixt Mador, and Gryffith, his two Sons. Of which Mador died at Winchester, An. 1160. in the time of King Henry the second; his part hereof depending after his decease, on the fortunes of Gwynedth: and Gryffith was by Henry the first made Lord of Powys (the title of Prince left off as too high and lofty.) In his race it continued till the time of King Edward the first: to whom at a Parliament holden in Shrewsbury, Owen ap Gryffith the fifth from Gryffith ap Meredyth before mentioned, surrendered his place and title; and received them of the King again to be holden in Capite and free Baronage, according to the custom of England. Avic, or Hawis, Daughter and Heir of this Owen ap Gryffith, was married unto John (Charleton, Vallet (or Gentleman of the Privy Chamber)) to King Edward the second, by whom, in right of his Wife, he was made Lord Powis. Edward the fifth also of this Line of the Charltons, was the last of that House; his Daughter Jane conveying the Estates and Title to the House of the Greys: and of them also five enjoyed it, the last Lord Powis of the Line or Race of Mervin, being Edward Grey, who died in the dayes of our Grandfathers. And so the title lay extinct, until revived again in the person of Sir William Herbert of Red-castle, descended from the Herberts, Earls of Pembroke; created Lord Powys by King Charles the first; An. 1629.

The Arms of the Princes of Powysland, were Or, a Lyon Rampant, Gules.

3. SOUTH-WALES, or Debenbarth, contained the Counties of Monmouth, Glamorgan, Caermarden, Cardigan, and Brecknock; the greatest and most fruitful part of all Wales, but more exposed to the invasion of Forrein Nations, the English, Danes, Flemings, and Norwegians, by whom the Sea-Coasts were from time to time most grievously plagued: Insomuch that the Kings and Princes hereof were inforced to remove their seat from Caermarden, where it was fixt at first, unto Dynevor Cattle as a place of greater strength and safety: where it continued till the Princes of it were quite extinct, called from hence Kings of Dynevor, as before is said. The chief Towns of it, Caermarden, Monmouth, Landaffe, S. David, spoken of already. The Kings and Princes, as far as I can find upon any certainty, are these that follow.

907 3 Howel Dha, Sovereign King of Wales. 1093 9 Gryffith ap Rhefe.
948 4 Owen, the son of Dha. 10 Rhefe II. ap Gryffith.
5 Meredyth, son of Owen. 11 Gryffith ap Rhefe, the last Prince of South-Wales of the Line of Cadel, after they had with great struggling maintained their liberty for the space of 300 years and upwards: but so, that though they still preserved the title of Princes, they lost a great part of their Country to the Norman-English. For in the reign of William Rufus, Bernard de Neumark a Noble Norman, seized upon those parts which now make the County of Brecknock, being then a fair and goodly Lordship; and Robert Fitz-Haymon, with some other noble adventurers, made themselves masters of Glamorgan; in which the posterity of some of them are still remaining. Incouraged by their good success, Arnulph of Montgomery, in the time of King Henry the first, won from the Welsh a great part of Dyvet, which we now call Pembroke-shire; as the Earls of Warren, and Lord Mortimer, about the same times did prevail exceedingly in the conquest of Cardigan, and Monmouth. So that the poor Princes had no one Country left intire, but Caermarden only; too little to maintain them in so high a title. And though this last Gryffith, in the time of the wars in England, betwixt Mat and the Empire, and King Stephen, had recovered a great part of this lost Estate; yet neither he nor his did enjoy it long; himself deceasing shortly after, and his two Sons, Cymmerick and Meredyth being taken by King Henry the second, who most cruelly put out their eyes: Yet did the Welsh, as well as possibly they could, endeavour to preserve the liberty which their Fathers left them; till the felicity and wisdom of King Edward the first, put an end unto the wars of Wales, and settled them in some degree of peace and quiet.

But before we come to speak of this, we are to shew another Catalogue of the Kings and Princes of Wales, different from the succession of them before laid down; and made according to the History of Wales writ by Humphrey Lloyd: this Catalogue containing the Succession of the greater and predominant Princes, whether of Gwynedd, Deheubarth, or Powysland; such as gave law unto the rest, and had the honor to be called Kings of Wales, though Princes only of their own proper and particular Countries; as formerly we had a Catalogue of the Monarchs of the English Saxons, made out of the Predominant Princes of the Saxon Heptarchie. Only we shall find some in the following Catalogue, who were not naturally and lineally Princes of any of the three, and therefore not expressed in the former Tables: but such as by strong hand had intruded into those Estates, to the prejudice of the right heirs, empowered by them.

 1246. 26 Llewellen, son of Gryffith, the Brother of David, the last Sovereign Prince of Wales, of the race of Cadwalader; overcome and slain in battel by King Edward the first, An. 1282. as before is said: by means whereof the Principality of Wales was added to the Crown of England.
- When King Edward had thus fortunately effected this great business, he gave unto his English Barons and other Gentlemen of note, many fair Signeuries and Estates; as well to reward them for their service in the conquest, as to engage so many able men, both in purse and power, for the perpetual defence and subjection of it. As for the Lordship of Flint, and the Towns and Estates lying on the Sea-coasts; he held them in his own hands, both to keep himself strong, and to curb the Welsh: and (wherein he dealt like the politic Emperor Augustus) pretending the ease of such as he had there placed; but indeed to have all the Arms, and men of employment under himself only.

This done, he divided Wales into seven Shires, viz. 1 Glamorgan, 2 Carmarden, 3 Pembroke, 4 Carmarigan, 5 Merioneth, 6 Carnarvon, and 7 Anglesey, after the manner of England. Over each of these, as he placed a particular English Lieutenant, so he was very desirous to have one general English Vicegerent, over the whole body of the Welsh. But this when they mainly withstood, he sent for his wife, then great with child to Carnarvon: where she was delivered of a Son. Upon the news whereof, the King assembled the British Lords, and offered to name them a Governor born in Wales, which could not speak one word of English, and whose life no man could tax. Such a one when they had all sworn to obey, he named his young son Edward; since which time our Kings Eldest Sons are called Princes of Wales. Their Investiture is performed by the imposition of a Cap of Estate, and a Coronet on his head that is invested, as a token of his Principality; by delivering into his hand a verge, being the emblem of government; by putting a ring of gold on his finger, to shew him how now he is a Husband to the Countrey, and a Father to her Children; and by giving him a patent, to hold the said said Principality, to him and his Heirs Kings of England. By which words, the separation of it from the Crown is prohibited; and the Kings keep in themselves to excellent occasion, of obliging unto them their eldest son, when they please. In imitation of this custom, maria Anglia translato (saith Mariana) John the first of Castile and Leon, made his son Henry Prince of the Asturias; which is a Countrey so craggie and mountainous, that it may not improperly be called the Wales of Spain. And all the Spanish Princes even to these times, are honoured with this title of Prince of the Asturias.

Notwithstanding this provident care of Edward the first, in establishing his Empire here; and the extreme rigor of Law here used by Henry the 4th, in reducing them to obedience, after the rebellion of Open Glendower: yet till the time of Henry the 8th, and his Father, (both being extract from the Welsh blood) they seldom or never contained themselves within the bounds of true Allegiance. For whereas before they were reputed as Aliens, this Henry made them (by Act of Parliament) one Nation with the English, subject to the same Laws, capable of the same preferments, and privileged with the same immunities. He added also 6 Shires to the former number, out of those Countries which we before reputed as the Borders and Marches of Wales; and enabled them to send Knights and Burgeses unto the English Parliaments: so that the name and language only excepted, there is now no difference between the English and Welsh; an happy Union.

The same King Henry established for the use of his Welsh Subjects, a Court at Ludlow, like unto the ordinary Parliaments in France: wherein the Laws are ministrated according to the fashion of the Kings Courts of Westminster. The Court consisteth of one President, who is, for the most part, of the Nobility, and is generally called, the Lord President of Wales; of as many Counsellors as it shall please the King to appoint; one Attorney, one Solicitor, one Secretary, and the four Justices of the Counties of Wales. The Town itself (for this must not be omitted) adorned with a very fair Castle, which hath been the Palace of such Princes of Wales, of the English blood, as have come into this Countrey, to solace themselves among their people. Here was young Edward, the 5th, at the death of his Father; and here dyed Prince Arthur, Eldest son of Henry the 7th: both being sent hither by their Fathers to the same end, viz. by their presence to satiate and keep in order the unquiet Welshmen. And certainly, as the presence of the Prince was then a terror to the rebellious; so would it now be as great a comfort to this peaceable people.

What the Revenues of this Principality are, I cannot say: yet we may boldly affirm that they are not very small, by these reasons following, viz. 1 By the Composition which Llewellen, the last Prince of Wales, made with Edward the first: who being Prince of North Wales only, and dispossessed of most of that, was fain to redeem the rest, of the said King Edward, at the price of 50000 Marks (which comes to 100000 pounds of our present money) to be paid down in ready coin; and for the residue to pay 1000 l. per annum. And 2ly, by those two circumstances, in the marriage of the Lady Katherine of Spain, to the above named Prince Arthur. For first, her Father Ferdinando being one of the warriest Princes that ever were in Europe, giving with her in Dowry 20000 Ducats; required for her Joynture, the third part only of this Principality, and of the Earldom of Chester. And secondly, after the death of Prince Arthur, the Nobles of the Realm perswaded Prince Henry to take her to Wife; that so great a Treasure as the yearly Revenue of her Joynture, might not be carried out of the Kingdom.

The Armes of the Princes of Wales differ from those of England, only by the addition of a Label, of three points. But the proper and peculiar device, and which we commonly, though corruptly, call the Princes Armes, is a Coronet beautified with three Ostrich Feathers, and inscribed round with ICH DIEN, that is, I serve: alluding to that of the Apostle, The Heir while he is a Child differeth not from a Servant. This Coronet was won by that valiant Prince, Edward the Black Prince, at the battel of Crecie, from John King of Bohemia; who did there wear it, and whom he there slew, Since which time it hath been the Cognizance of all our Princes.

I will now shut up my discourse of Wales, with that testimony of the people, which Henry the second used in a Letter to Emanuel Emperor of Constantinople; The Welsh Nation is so adventurous, that they dare encounter naked with armed men; ready to spend their blood for their Countrey, and pawn their life for praise; and adding only this, that since their incorporating with the English, they have shewed themselves most loyal, hearty, and affectionate Subjects of the State: cordially devoted to their King, and zealous in defence of their Laws, Liberties, and Religion, as well as any of the best of their fellow-subjects; whereof they have given good proof in these latter time.

There are in Wales

The BORDERS.

Before we come into Scotland, we must of necessity pass through that Barable ground, lying betwixt both Kingdoms; called THE BORDERS; the Inhabitants whereof are a kind of military men, subtle, nimble, and by reason of their often skirmishes, well experienced, and adventurous. Once the English Border extended as far as unto the Fryth, or Strait of Edenburgh on the East; and that of Dunbritton on the West (the first Fryth, by the Latines called Bodotria, and the latter Glotha;) and betwixt which, where now standeth the Town of Sterling, was an antient Bridge, built over the River which falleth into the Fryth of Edenburgh; on a Cross standing whereupon, was writ this Passport;

I am Free-march as passengers may ken,
To Scots, to Britans, and to English men.

But when England groaned under the burden of the Danish oppression, the Scots well husbanded that advantage; and not only enlarged their Borders to the Tweed, but also took into their hands Cumberland, Northumberland, and Westmorland. The Norman Kings again recovered these Provinces, making the Borders of both Kingdoms to be Tweed, East; the Solway, West; and the Cheviot hills in the midst. Of any great wars made on these Borders, or any particular Officers appointed for the defence of them, I find no mention till the time of Edward the first; who taking advantage of the Scots disagreements, about the successor of Alexander the third, hoped to bring the Country under the obedience of England. This Quarrel betwixt the two Nations he began, but could not end: the Wars surviving the Author: so that what Velleius saith of the Romans and Carthaginians, I may as well say of the Scots and English: for almost 300 years together, aut bellum inter eos populos, aut belli preparatio, aut infida pax fuit. In most of these conflicts the Scots had the worst. So that Daniel in his History seemeth to marvel how this Corner of the Isle could breed so many, had it bred nothing but men, as were slain in these wars. Yet in the Reign of Edward the second, the Scots (having twice defeated that unhappy Prince) became so terrible to the English Borders, that an hundred of them would fly from three Scots: It is a custom among the Turks, not to beleve a Christian or a Jew complaining against a Turk, except their accusation be confirmed by the Testimony of some Turk also; which seldom happening, is not the least cause why so little justice is there done the Christians. In like manner, it is the Law of these Borders, never to beleive any Scots complaining against any English-man, unless some other English-man will witness for him; and so on the other side. Ex jure quidam inter limitaneos rati (saith Camden in his Elizabeth) nullus nisi Scotus in Scotia, nullus nisi Anglus in Anglum, testis admittitur. This custom making void in this fashion, all kinds of accusations, was one of the greatest causes of the Insolencies of both sides committed. Besides, there were divers here living, which acknowledged neither King; but sometime were Scots, sometimes English, as their present crimes and necessities required protection, or pardon. To keep in this people, and secure the Borders, there were in each Kingdom three Officers appointed, called the Lords Wardens of the Marches: one being placed over the East, the other over the West, the third over the middle Borders. In England, the Warden of the East Marches had his seat at Barwick (a Town of great strength, and which for the conveniency of its situation, was the first thing which the English took care to defend, and the Scots to surprize) of which he was also Governor. The Warden of the West Marches had his Seat in Carlisle, which Henry the 8th for that cause well fortified. The Warden of the middle Marches had no set place of residence, but was sometimes in one place, sometimes in another, according as occasion required; the Office being executed for the most part, by the Wardens of the Eastern or Western Marches. But Imperii medium est, terminus ante fuit, by the blessed marriage of the Kingdoms, that being now the middle of one, which was then the bounds of two Empires; these Officers, and the cause of them, the wars, are quite extinguished.

SCOTLAND.

SCOTLAND is the Northern part of Britain, separated from England by the River Tweed and Solway, and the Cheviot Hills, extending from the one to the other. It is in length (according to Polydore Virgil) 480 miles, but of no great breadth; there being no place distant from the Sea above 60 miles, and the Country ending like the sharp point of a Wedge. And for the length assigned unto it by Polydore, it must be made up by measuring the crooks and windings of the shores, everywhere thrusting out with very large Promontories, and cutting deep Indentures into the Land. For measuring in a straight Line from North to South, the length thereof from Solway Frith to the Straity-head, amounteth but unto three hundred and ten Italian miles; and from Barwick unto Straity-head, is a great deal shorter. So that there is no such over-sight in the Maps of Britain, nor such necessity to correct them, as was sometimes thought.

It

It was once called Caledonia, from the Caledonii a chief People of it: sometimes Albania, from Albania Scotland, or Braid Albin, a principal Province in the North. But the most usual name is Scotia, or Scotland; though the reason of the name be not agreed on. Some fabulous Writers of their own fetch it from Scota, the Daughter of an Egyptian Pharaoh; of whom more when we come to Ireland. Others with better reason (though that none of the best) from the Scotti, Scitti, or Scythi, a German, or Sarmatian people, of noted fame; whom they will have to seize first on some parts of Spain, from thence to transplant themselves into Ireland; and out of Ireland into the Hebrides or Western Islands, now parts and members of this Kingdom. The more probable opinion is, that they were no other then meer Irish (whose language, habit, and most barbarous of their customs, the Highlanders, or natural Scots do still retain) united in the name of Scot; about the declination of the Roman Empire: the word Scot signifying in their Language, a body aggregated into one, out of many particulars; as the word Alman in the Dutch. Scot illud dicitur, (saith Camden out of Matthew of Westminster) quod ex diversis rebus in unum agrorum aggregatur. First mentioned by this name in some fragments of Porphyrie (who lived about the time of the Emperor Anrelian) as they are cited by S. Hierome after the death of Constantine much spoken of in approved Authors, as the confederates of the Picts, in harassing the Roman Province.

The whole divided commonly into the Highlands, and the Lowlands. The Highlanders or Irish Scots; inhabiting the Hebrides, and the West parts of the Continent adjoining to them, more barbarous than the Wild Irish at this day: not to be civiliz'd (as King James observed in his most excellent Basilicon Dyon) but by planting Colonies of the more Inland, orderly Scots among them. The Lowlanders or English Scots (as I well may call them) inhabiting on this side the two Frythes of Dunbritton and Edenburgh, and the plainer Countreys all along the German Ocean; are the more civil of the two, as being of the same Saxon race with the English. This is evident, first, by their Language, being only a broad Northern English; a Dialect only of that tongue: 2ly, by the testimony of the Highlanders themselves, who are the true Scots, and speak the old Irish language, by whom the Lowlanders and the English are called by the same name of Saxons: 3ly, by the general consent of all Historians, affirming that the Kingdom of the Northumbers or English Saxons, beyond Humber, extended as far Northwards as the two Frythes before mentioned; and there continued for the space of 300 years: and 4ly, by the confession of some ingenious Gentlemen of that Nation, who grant it for a probable Tenet, that the Saxons and the Scots invading Britain much about the same time, the Saxons might extort the Eastern shore; lying next their Countrey, from the old Inhabitants; as well as the Scots did all the Western parts which lay next to Ireland; and the Hebrides or Western Islands, from whence they first passed into Britain.

The Country for the most part, especially beyond the limits of the Roman Province, is very barren and unfruitful, not able to afford sustenance for the Natives of it; were they not a people patient of want and hunger; temperate in diet, and not accustomed unto that riot and excess, used commonly in richer and more plentiful Countreys. Fruit they have very little, and not many trees either for building or for fuel: the people holding, as in France, at the Will of the Lord, and therefore not industrious to build, or plant. Their chief Commodities are coarse cloth, Fish in great abundance, Hides, Lead, and Coal; of which two last their mountains do afford some rich undecaying Mines.

The people have been noted by their best Writers, for some barbarous customs entertained amongst them. One of which was, if any two were displeased, they expected no law; but bang'd it out bravely, one and his kindred, against the other and his: and thought the King much in their common; if they granted him at a certain day to keep the peace. This fighting they call their Feides, a word to barter, that were it to be expressed in Latine, or French, it must be by circumlocution. These deadly Feides, King James in his most excellent Basilicon Dyon adviseth his son to redress with all care possible; but it pleased God to give him so long a life as to see it in his own dayes remedied: wherein he got a greater victory over that stubborn people, than ever did any foreign Prince, or any of his Predecessors could do before him; an act indeed truly royal, and worthy himself. Another custom they had of that nature, that the like was hardly ever heard of amongst the Heathen, and much less in Christendom; which took beginning as the Scottish Historians affirm, in the reign of Ewen the third, who is the fifteenth King in their Catalogue, after the first Fergus. This Ewen being a Prince much addicted, or wholly rather given over unto lasciviousness, made a Law, that himself and his successors should have the maidenhead, or first nights lodging with every woman, whose husband held land immediately from the Crown: and the Lords and Gentlemen of all those, whose husbands were their tenants or homagers. This was, it seems, the Knights service which men held their states by; and continued till the dayes of Malcolm Connor: who at the request of his wife Margaret, (she was the sister of Edgar Atheling) abolished this Law; and ordained, that the tenants by way of commutation, should pay unto their Lords a mark in money; which tribute the Historians say is still in force. It was called Marchet mulieris: but whether from Mark, a horse in the old Gallique, (implying the obscene signification of Equitare) as Mr. Selden thinks; or from Murca, the sum of money by which it was afterward redeemed, I cannot determine. Certain I am that this last custom was of such a barbarous and brutish nature, that the custom of the Indians in giving to the Bramine the first nights lodging with their Brides; and that of many Savage unconverted Nations in prostituting their Wives and Daughters to the lusts and pleasure of their Guests; have not more unchristianity in them, than this of those Scottish Christians, if I may so call them.

These Customs shew the antient Scots to be rude and barbarous, partaking little of the civility of the neighbouring Nation; nor are they so broken of the former, but that they are observed by a modern Briton, to be still greedy of revenge where they find means to take it; as also to be a subtle and pollic people, inclined to Factions and Seditions among themselves; which he that reads their Stories cannot cannot choose but see. A people, as King James observeth in his Basilikon Doron, ever weary of the present state, and desirous of novelties, accustomed to judge and speak rashly of their Kings and Princes; towards whom they have always carried themselves with such untractableness, that more Kings have been betrayed, murdered, and deposed by the Scots, than by all the Nations in the world. But take them in themselves without these relations, and they are said to be an industrious people, capable of all Sciences which they give their minds to, and generally well versed in Grammatical Learning, of which most of their Gentry have a smattering. And of most note in point of Learning, have been 1 Marianus (surnamed) Scotus, and 2 Hector Boetius, the Historians; 3 John Major, a well-known Schoolman, for the times before the Reformation. And for the times that followed, 4 George Buchanan, an ingenious Poet, but an unsound Statesman; whose History, and Dialogue De jure Regni, have wrought more mischief in the World, than all Machiavels works. Nor to have been remembered here, but because he was Pædagogus to 5 King James, of most famous memory; whose printed works declare his large abilities in all kinds of Learning. 6 Napier, the Laird of Marchblon. 7, 8 Barclay, the Father and the Son. 9 John Skene, the best Antiquary of this Nation. 10 Doctor John Maxwell, the late learned Bishop of Ross, and my very good friend; besides some others of less note.

The Christian Religion was here planted by divers men, according to their several Nations who did here inhabit; amongst the Low-Landers, or Saxon-Scots, by Aidan, the first Bishop of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island; amongst the Picts, inhabiting the South-Eastern parts, by Ninias, Bishop of Candida Cæsa, or Whit-borne, in Galloway; amongst the Northern-Picts, An. 555. and finally amongst the Scots, by Palladius a Deacon of Rome, sent to them hither for that purpose by Pope Celestine, An. 435. or thereabouts. And for the Reformation of Religion, overgrown with the rust and rubbish of the Romish Church, (degenerated from it self in the later days) it was here made by a strong hand, according to the judgement of Knox and others: not taking counsel with the Prelates, nor staying the leisure of the Prince, as they did in England; but turning Prince and Prelates out of all authority; made by that means, more naturally subject unto alterations than it had been otherwise; or only to be made good by the same violence, which first introduced it. 'Tis true, that for a while, being in danger of the French, and of necessity to support themselves by the power and favour of the English: they bound themselves by a solemn Subscription, to adhere only to the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church of England, and to observe that form of Worship, which was there established. Religionis cultui, et Ritibus cum Anglis communibus subscripservunt; as is affirmed by Buchanan, their own State-Historian. But no sooner was that danger over, but they found opportunity and leisure to effect their ends; and have endeavoured ever since by practices, and correspondence with that party here, and finally by force of Arms, to thrust their own Constitutions and Form of Worship on the Church of England.

As for the Government of the Church, it was originally by Bishops, (as in all parts else); but so as they exercise their Functions and Jurisdictions in all places, equally, wheresoever they come: The Kingdom not being divided into Dioceses, till the time of Malcolm the third, An. 1070, or thereabouts. Nor had they any Archbishops till the year 1478. The Archbishop of Tork being accounted and obeyed before that time, as the Metropolitan of Scotland. But being once fettered in an orderly and constant Hierarchy, they held the same until the Reformation began by Knox: when he and his associates approving the Genevian plat-form, took the advantage of the Minority of King James the sixth, to introduce the Presbyterian Discipline, and suppress the Bishops; forbidding them by their own sole authority, to intermeddle any more in matters which concerned the Church, and cantoning the Kingdom into Presbyteries of their own assigning. And that the King might not be able to oppose their doings, they kept him under by strong hand, imprisoned him at Sterlin, made him fly from Edenburgh, removed from him all his faithful servants, and seized upon his principal Fortresses: and in a word so baffled and affronted him upon all occasions, that he was minded many times to have left the Kingdom, and retire to Venice. Which doubtless he had done, (as I have heard affirmed by some of great place and power) had not the hopes of coming at the last to the Crown of England, made him stay it out: So that his Maxim of No Bishop, no King, was not made at random, but founded on the sad experience of his own condition. And though upon the fence of those inconveniences, which that alteration brought upon him, he did afterwards with great both Policy and Prudence, restore again the Episcopal Order, and settled it both by Synodical Acts, and by Acts of Parliament: yet the same restless spirit breaking out again in the reign of his son, An. 1638. did violently eject the Bishops, and suppress the calling; and set up their Presbyteries throughout the Kingdom, as in former times.

The famous or miraculous things rather of this Countrey are, 1 the Lake of Nirton, part of whose waters do congeal in Winter, and part of them not. 2ly, That in the Lake of Lennox, being 24 miles in compass, the Fish are generally without Fins, and yet there is great abundance of them. 3ly, That when there is no wind stirring, the waters of the said Lake are so tempestuous, that no Mariner dares venture on it. 4ly, That there is a stone called the Deaf Stone, 12 foot high and 33 Cubits thick; of this rare quality, that a Musket shot off on the one side, cannot be heard by a man standing on the other: If it be otherwise (as he must have a strong Faith who believes these wonders) let Hector Boetius bear the blame, out of whom I had it.

Chief Mountains of this Kingdom are the Cheviot Hills upon the Borders; and Mount Grampius spoken of by Tacitus; the safest shelter of the Picts, or Northern Britons against the Romans, and of the Scots against the English; now called the hills of Albany, or the mountainous Regions of Braid-Albin. Out of these springeth the 1 Tay or Tanar, the fairest River of Scotland, falling into the Sea about Dundee, in the East side; and 2 the Clwyd, emptying it self into Dunbritton Friths, on the West side of the Kingdom. Other Rivers of most note, are, the 3 Banoc, emptying it self into the Frith of Edenburgh; or on the banks whereof was fought that fatal battel of Banocks-bourn, of which more anon. 4 Spey, 5 Dee, the Ouse of Ptolomy; none of them of any long course, by reason that the Countrey Northward is but very narrow.

In reference to Ecclesiastical affairs, this Kingdom hath been long divided into 13 Dioceses, to which the Diocese of Edenburgh (taken out of that of S. Andrews) hath been lately added: and in relation to the Civil, into divers Seneschalties and Sheriffdoms, which being for the most part hereditary, are no small hindrance to the due execution of Justice. So that the readiest way to redress the mischief (as King James advised) is to dispose of them as they fall or Echeat to the Crown, according to the laudable custom (in that case) in England.

The greatest Friends of the Scots, were the French, to whom the Scots shewed themselves so faithful, that the French King committed the defence of his person to a selected number of Scottish Gentlemen: and so valiant, that they have much hindered the English Victories in France. And certainly the French feeling the smart of the English puissance alone, have continually heartened the Scots in their attempts against England, and hindered all means of making union betwixt them; as appeared, when they broke the march agreed on, between our Edward the sixth, and Mary the young Queen of Scots. Their greatest enemy was the English, who overcame them in many battels, seized once upon the Kingdom, and had longer kept it, if the mountainous and unaccessible woods had not been more advantageous to the Scots, than their power: for so much King James seemeth to intimate in his speech at Whitehall, 1607. And though, faith he, the Scots had the honour and good fortune never to be conquered, yet were they never but on the defensible side; and may in part thank their hills and inaccessible passages, that saved them from an utter overthrow, at the hands of all them that ever pretended to conquer them. But

One only Nation now are we,
And let us so for ever be.

The chief Cities are Edenburgh (of old called Castrum Alatum) in Lothien, where is the Kings Palace, and the Court of Justice. It consisteth chiefly of one street, extending in length one mile, into which run many pretty lanes; so that the whole compass may be nigh three miles: extending from East to West on a rising ground, at the Summit or West end whereof standeth a strong and magnificent Castle, mounted upon a steep and precipitous Rock, which commandeth the Town; supposed to be the Castrum Alatum, spoken of by Ptolomy. Under the command or rather the protection of which Castle, and through the neighbourhood of Leith, standing on the Fryth, and serving as a Port unto it; and finally by the advantage of the Courts of Justice, and the Court Royal, called Holy-Rood-House, it soon became rich, populous, well-traded, and the chief of the Kingdom: but withal factious and seditious contesting with their Kings, or siding against them upon all occasions. No way to humble them, and keep them in obedience to the Sovereign Lords, but by incorporating Leith, indulging it the privileges of a City, and removing thither the Seat Royal and the Courts of Judicature; which they more fear than all the Plagues that can befall them. It belonged in former times to the English Saxons, (as all the rest of the Countrey from the Fryth to Barnwick) from whom, oppressed by the tyranny of the Danes, it was taken by the Scots and Picts, Anno 800. or thereabouts. 2 Sterling, situate on the South-side of the Forth or Fryth, in the Sheriffdom so called; a strong Town, and beautified withal with a very fair Castle, the birth-place of King James the sixth, the first Monarch of Great Britain. Near to which Town, on the banks of the River Rannock, hapned the most memorable discomfiture that the Scots ever gave the English: who besides many Lords, and 700 Knights and men of note, lost in this Fight (as the Scottish Writers do report) 50000 of the common Souldiers (our English Historians confess 10000, and too many of that) the King himself (Edward the 2d) being compelled to flee for his life and safety. Some of the Scottish Writers tell us, that the purer sort of silver, which we call Sterling money, did take name from hence; they might as well have told us, that all our silver Buttlin comes from Bonillon in Loyckland, or from the Port of Boulogne in France; the truth being, that it took that name from the Easterlings, or Merchants of East Germany, drawn into England by King John, to refine our Coin. 3 Glasgow, in Cluidfale, honoured with an Archbishop See, and a publick School (to which some give the name of an University) founded here by Archbishop Turnbul, Anno 1554. 4 S. Andrews, the chief Town of Fife, an Archiepiscopal See, and an University; by the Latines called Fannus Reguli; which, and the English name, it took from the bones of S. Andrew the Apostle, translated first from Patras in Peloponnesus where he suffered death, unto Constantinople; and thence brought hither by a Monk called Abatus Regulus, in the year 378 (if they be not mistaken in the time, who made the story.) Over which Relicks he is said to have built a Monastery, which after grew to be a City: called from the Founder, Fannus Reguli; in honour of the Saint, S. Andrews. The Bishop hereof is the Metropolitan of all Scotland; the City seated on the Ocean, near the fall of the Eitha, overlooked with a strong and goodly Castle, the Archbishops seat. 5 Falkland, in the same Province of Fife, beautified with a retiring house of the Kings, resorting often thither on recesses from business, or for the commodity and pleasure of hunting, which the place affords. 6 Dundee, in Latine, Tiodunnum, a rich and noted Port at the mouth of the Tay, the chief Town of Angus. 7 Aburdon, at the mouth of the River Done, whence it hath the name, (the word Aber in the British signifying the mouth or influx of a River) an University, and Bishops See. 8 Perth, or St. Johns Town, seated on the Tay, but in the middle of the Kingdom; walled and replenished with an industrious people: the chief Town of the Sheriffdom of Perth. 9 Scone, on the

the other side of the Tay, adorned heretofore with a famous Monastery; the usual place for the Inauguration of the Scottish Kings: the fatal stone, on which they did receive the Crown, (the Palladium of the Scottish Kingdom) here kept, till the removal of it unto Westminster, by King Edward the first. Upon which stone there were of old ingraven these Verses.

Translated in old Meeter thus:

The Scots shall brook that Realm as natif ground,
If Weirds fail not, whaire ere this Stone is found.

Most happily accomplished in the Succession of King James the sixth, to the Crown of England. 10. Dunbritton (Britannodunum in the Latine) seated in a grassie Plain, at the fall or influx of the River Levin into the Clwyd, upon two steep and precipitious Rocks, flanked on the West with the said two Rivers, and on the East with a myery Flat, drowned at every full Sea: the strongest hold of all the Kingdom, and thought to be impregnable but by Famine or Treason, and the chief Town of the West side of Scotland; the name hereof communicated to the Fryth adjoining.

The Ancient Inhabitants of this Countrey dwelling within the limits of the Roman Province, were the Gadeni, possessing Tevidale, Tweedale, Merech, and Lothien, whose chief City was Castra Alata, now Edenburgh. 2 The Damarii, dwelling in Clwydsdale, Lennox, Sterling, and Menteith, whose chief City was Vandunara, now Renfrew; Lindum, now Lindisgho. 3 The Selgovæ, inhabited in Liddisdale, Tivedale, Eskdale, Annandale, and Niddisdale, whose chief place was Carbantorigum, now Caer-Laverock: and 4 the Nevantes containing Galloway, Carrick, Kyle and Cunningham; principal places of the which were, Lucebria now Whis herne, and Berigonium, now Bergenie. Without the Province, amongst the Picts or barbarous Britans, divided generally into Caledonii and Meatae, the Nations of most note were, 5 the Caledonii properly so called, taking up all Strathern, Argile, Cantire, Albanie, Lorn, Pertb, Angus, and Fife. 6 The Permines of Merniand Mar. 7 The Talzali of Buguban. 8 The Vacomagi of Loughabre & Murray. 9 The Canna of Ross and Sutherland. 10 The Contini of Cathness; and 11 the Cornubii of Strathnaver, the furthest Countrey Northward of all the Island. Chief Towns of which were, Tamia, Banatie, Orca, Devana, and Tuesi; which we know not whereto find upon any certainty.

The fortunes of this people, as they related to the Romans, hath been shewn before. On the withdrawing of whose Forces, so much hereof as formerly had belonged to that Empire, was possessed by the Saxons, the residue thereof, as formerly, by the Scots and Picts: have that the Saxons not content with that which the Romans held, made themselves masters also of the plain Countries, lying on the German Ocean, to which the passage out of Germany was both short and easie. By which accompt, besides those places in the East, they were possessed of the Counties or Sherifdoms of Tevidale, Tweedale, March, Lothien, Liddisdale, Esksdale, Eskdale, Annandale, Niddisdale, Clwydsdale, Galloway, Carrick, Kyle, Cunningham, Lennox, and Sterling, being the richest, and most flourishing part of the modern Scotland. The Scots for their part, had the Counties of Cantire, Argile, Braid-Albin, (or Albanie) Lorn, Loughabre, and Strathnaver, lying on the West and North: the other Northern moiety (excepting some parts near the coast of the German Ocean possessed by the Saxons) containing the now Counties of Cathness, Sutherland, Ross, Murray, Buguban, Marre, Mern, Angus, Athal, Pertb, Fife, Strathern and Menteith, being only left unto the Picts. From whence the Saxons and Scots came into these parts, hath been shewn already. And for the Picts, (to omit here the refutation of those who will have them to descend from the Agathursi, a people of Scythia) they were no other than such of the natural Britans, as never were brought under the Roman Empire, but still preserved their Countrey in its former Liberty: called therefore by Tertullian, inaccessa Romanis loca, as indeed they were: and using still their ancient custom of painting their bodies, after the rest of their Countreymen had conformed themselves to more civil courses, were by the Romans called Picts; and by that name first mentioned in the Panegyrick of Evagrius, in the time of Constantine the Great. They long possessed these parts without an Inmate, even till the year 424, when the Irish-Scots wanting room at home, and having formerly possessed themselves of the Western Isles, first set foot in Britain: with whom they had continual Warre, till in the end the Scots prevailing, compelled the Picts to abandon to them the Western parts, and withdraw themselves into the Eastern. Afterwards growing into better terms with one another, and willing to enlarge their borders toward the more flourishing South; they contracted an Offensive and Defensive League against the Britans; whom on all sides they most miserably tortured, till vanquished and beat back by the conquering Saxons, against whom they contracted a new Confederacy. Taking the advantage of the death of Etheldred, King of the Northumbrians, and the invasion of the Danes on the rest of England; they got into their hands all Bernicia, or so much of the Kingdom of the Northumbrians, as lay on the North of Tweed, and Solway; reckoned from that time forwards as a part of their Dominions. But this good neighbourhood held not long betwixt these two Nation. It hapned at the last, that Achais King of the Scots, married Fergusa, Sister unto Hungust, King of the Picts, and had by her a son called Alpine, who after the death of Hungust, dying without issue, and having none of a nearer kindred, was in the judgement of the Scots, to succeed in that Kingdom. But the Picts, alleging a Law of not admitting Aliens to the Crown, chose one Ferretb of their own Nation, to be their King: with whom Alpine contended in a long War, victorious for the most part, in conclusion slain. The quarrel notwithstanding did remain betwixt the unfriendly Nations, till at the last, after many bloody battels and and mutual overthrows (the Scots being for the most part on the losing side) Kenneth, the second of that name, vanquished Donken, the last King of the Picts, with so great a slaughter of his People, that he extinguished not their Kingdom only, but their very name; passing from that time forwards under that of Scots. No mention after this of the Pictish Nation: unless perhaps we will believe that some of them passed into France; and there, forsooth, subdued that Countrey which we now call Picardy.

As for the Catalogue of the Kings of the Scots in Britain, I shall begin the same with Fergus, the second of that name in the Account of their Historians: leaving out that rabble of 39 Kings (half of them at the least before Christ's Nativity) mentioned by Hector Boetius, Buchanan, and others of their Classick Authors. Neither shall I offend herein, as I conjecture, the more judicious and understanding men of the Scottish Nation, (and for others I take little care) since I deal no more unkindly with their first Fergus, and his Successors, than I have done already with our own Brutus, and his. The first Scottish King that settled himself in the North of Britain, is, according to the above named Hector Boetius, one Fergus, which in the time that Coyle governed the Britans, came (forsooth) into these parts out of Ireland. From him, unto Eugenius, we have the names of 39 Kings in a continued succession: which Eugenius, together with his whole Nation, is said to have been expelled the Island, by a joynr confederacy of the Romans, Britans, and Picts. Twenty and seven years after the death of this Eugenius, they were reduced again into their possession here, by the valour and conduct of another Fergus, the second of that name. To this Fergus I refer the beginning of this Scottish Kingdom in Britain, holding the stories of the former 39 Kings, to be vain and fabulous. Neither want I probable conjecture for this assertion; this expedition of Fergus into Britain, being placed in the 424 year of CHRIST; at what time the best Writers of the Roman story for those times, report the Scots to have first seated themselves in this Island.

The Kings of chief note in the course of the whole Succession are, 1 Achais, who died in the year 809 and in his life contracted the offensive and defensive league with Charles the Great, between the Kingdoms of France and Scotland. The conditions whereof were, 1 Let this league between the two Kingdoms endure for ever; 2 Let the enemies unto one, be reputed and handled as the enemies of the other; 3 If the Saxons or Englishmen invade France, the Scots shall send thither such numbers of Souldiers as shall be desired, the French King defraying the charges; 4 If the English invade Scotland, the King of France shall at his own charges sent competent assistance unto the King of Scots. Never was there any league, which was either more faithfully observed, or longer continued, than this between these two Kingdoms: the Scots on all occasions so readily assisting the French, that it grew to a proverb, or by-word, He that will France win, must with Scotland first begin. 2 Kenneth the second, who having utterly subdued and destroyed the Picts, extending his Dominions over all the present Scotland, deserved to be accounted the first Monarch of it: the Picts (being either rooted out, or so few in number, that they passed afterwards in the name and account of Scots) from that time forwards never mentioned in any Author. 3 Malcolm the first, who added Westmerland, and Cumbreland, unto his Dominions; given to him by King Edmund of England, the son of Athelstane, to have his aid against the Danes, or to keep him neutral. After which time, those Counties were sometimes Scottish and sometimes English, till finally recovered by King Henry the second, and united to the Crown of England; never since disjoyned. 4 Kenneth the third, who by consent of the Estates of his Realm, made the Kingdom hereditary, to descend from the Father to his Eldest Son; before which time (keeping within the compass of the Royall Family) the Uncle was sometimes preferred before the Nephew; the eldest in years, though furthest off, before the younger Kinman, though the nearer in blood. After which time (the opposition and interruption made by Constantine the third, and Donald the fourth excepted only) the Eldest sons of these Kings, or the next in birth, have succeeded ordinarily in that Kingdom. This Kenneth was one of those Tributary and Vassal Kings, which rowed King Edgar over the Dre, near Chester, in such pomp and majesty. 5 Malcolm the third, the son of Duncan, who lived in England during the whole time of Macbeth's tyranny; and thence brought into Scotland at his return, not only some Civilisies of the English garb; but the honourary titles of Earls and Barons, not here before used. At the perswasion of the Lady Margaret his Wife, (Sister of Edgar, surnamed Atheling, and after his decease the right Heir of the Crown of England) he abolished the barbarous custom spoken of before. He did Homage to William the Conquerour for the Crown of Scotland, but afterwards siding against him with the English, was slain at Almwick. 7 David, the youngest son of Malcolm the third, succeeded his two Brothers, Edgar and Alexander (dying without issue) in the Throne of his Father; and in right of his Mother the Lady Margaret, Sister and Heir of Edgar Atheling, and Daughter of Edward the Eldest son of Edmund the second, surnamed Ironside, King of England, had the best title to that Kingdom also: but dispossessed thereof by the Norman Conquerours; with whom, by reason of the great puissance of those Kings, and the little love which the English bare unto the Scots, not able to dispute their Title by force of Arms. From Maud the Sister of this David, married to Henry the first of England, descended all the Kings of England (King Stephen excepted) to Queen Elizabeth's death: from David all the Kings of Scotland, till King James the sixth, who on the death of Queen Elizabeth, succeeded in the Crown of England, in right of his descent from another Margaret, the eldest Daughter of King Henry the seventh. So that in his person there was not an union of the Kingdoms only, under the Title of Great Britain; but a restoring of the old Line of the Saxon Kings (of which he was the direct and indubitate Heir) to the Crown of England; the possession whereof had for so long time continued in the Posterity of the Norman Conqueror. And upon this descent it followeth most undeniably, that though the Norman Conqueror got the Crown of England by the power of the Sword, from the true Heirs of Edmund the the second, surnamed Ironsides; and that his Successors had enjoyed it by no other Title till Queen Elizabeth the sixth: yet James, the first Monarch of Great Britain, succeeded by a right descent from the Saxons Line: without relation to the Conquest of the Norman Bastard. 8 William, the Brother of Malcolm the fourth, and Nephew of David before mentioned by his Son Prince Henry (who died in the life of his Father) being taken prisoner at the Battail of Alnwick, did homage to King Henry the second for the Crown of Scotland, and was thereupon restored to his Liberty, and his Realm to peace. What doth occur concerning the succeeding Kings, when their affairs with England and the World abroad became more considerable, we shall see anon.

In the mean time proceed we to the story of Machbeth, than which for variety of action, and strangeness of events, I never met with any more pleasing. The story in brief is thus: Duncan King of the Scots had two principal men, whom he employed in all matters of importance; Machbeth, and Banquo. These two travelling together through a Forrest, were met by three Fairies, Witches (Weirds the Scots call them) whereof the first making obeysance unto Machbeth, saluted him Thane (a title unto which that of Earl afterward succeeded) of Glammis: the second, Thane of Cawder; and the third, King of Scotland. This is unequal dealing, saith Banquo, to give my friend all the honours, and none unto me; to which one of the Weirds made answer, That he indeed should not be King, but out of his Joyns should come a Race of Kings, that should for ever rule the Scots. And having thus said, they all suddenly vanished. Upon their arrival to the Court, Machbeth was immediately created Thane of Glammis; and not long after, some new service of his requiring new recompence, he was honoured with the title of Thane of Cawder. Seeing then how happily the prediction of the three Weirds fell out in the two former; he refused not to be wanting to himself in fulfilling the third: and therefore first he killed the King, and after, by reason of his command among the Souldiers, and common people, he succeeded in his Throne. Being scarce warm in his feat, he called to mind the prediction given to his Companion Banquo: whom hereupon suspecting as his supplanter, he caused him to be killed, together with his whole Posterity; Fleance one of his Sons, escaping only with no small difficulty, into Wales. Freed as he thought, from all fear of Banquo and his issue, he built Dunsinane Castle, and made it his ordinary seat: and afterwards on some new fears, consulting with certain of his Wizards about his future Estate; was told by one of them, that he should never be overcome, till Bernane Wood (being some miles distant) came to Dunsinane Castle; and by another, that he should never be slain by any man which was born of a Woman. Secure then, as he thought, from all future dangers, he omitted no kind of libidinous cruelty, for the space of 18 years; for so long he tyrannized over Scotland. But having then made up the measure of his iniquities, Mac-duffe the Governour of Fife, associating to himself some few Patriots, equally hated by the Tyrant, and abhorring the Tyranny; privily met one evening at Bernane Wood: and taking every one of them a bough in his hand, (the better to keep them from discovery) marched early in the morning towards Dunsinane Castle, which they took by Scalado. Machbeth escaping was pursued by Mac-duffe, who having overtaken him, urged him to the combat; to whom the Tyrant, half in scorn, returned this Answer, That he did in vain attempt to kill him, it being his deslinie never to be slain by any that was born of a Woman. Now then said Mac-duffe, is thy fatal end drawing fast upon thee; for I was never born of Woman, but violently cut out of my Mothers belly: which words so daunted the cruel Tyrant, though otherwise a valiant man and of great performances, that he was very easily slain; and Malcolm Commer, the true Heir of the Crown, seated in the Throne. In the mean time Fleance so prospered in Wales, that he gained the affection of the Princes Daughter of that Countrey; and on her begat a Son called Walter; who flying out of Wales, returned into Scotland; and his descent once known, he was not only restored to the Honours, and Estates of his Ancestors, but preferred to be Steward of the house of Edgar, the son of Malcolm the third, surnamed Commer; the name of Stewart, growing hence hereditary unto his Posterity. From this Walter descended that Robert Stewart, who succeeded David Bruce in the Kingdom of Scotland, the Progenitor of nine Kings of the name of Stewart, which have Reigned successively in that kingdom. But it is now time to leave off particulars, and look into the general Succession of

of the Picts.

[illegible]

Scotland.

- 1491 33 James IV. married Margaret, the eldest Daughter of King Henry the seventh, but at the soliciting of the French, (against the Peace between the Nations) he invaded England (in the absence of King Henry the eighth) with 100000 men: but was met with by the Earl of Surrey (having 26000 men in his Army) nigh unto Flodden; where he was slain, together with two Bishops, twelve Earls, fourteen Lords, and his whole Army routed. 23.
- 1514 34 James V. son of James the fourth, and the Lady Margaret, kept for a time such good correspondence with the English, that in the year 1536, he was created Knight of the Order of the Garter. But afterwards inheriting his Fathers hatred against them, he invaded their Borders, in the year 1542: and was met by the Lord Wharton, then Warden of the West Marches. The battels being ready to joyn, one S. Oliver Sinclair the Kings favourite, though otherwise of no great parentage, was by the Kings directions proclaimed General: which the Scottish Nobility took in such indignation, that they threw down their weapons, and suffered themselves to be taken prisoners; there being not one man slain on either side. The principal prisoners were the Earls of Glencarn, and Cassiles; the Barons Maxwell, Oliphant, Somervell, Flemming, with divers others: besides many of the principal Gentry. 28.
- 1542 35 Mary, the Daughter and only lawfully-begotten child of James the fifth, succeeded in her Cradle unto the Throne; promised in marriage to King Edward the sixth of England; but by the power of the Hamiltons carried into France, where married to Francis then Dauphin, afterwards King of the French, of that name the second. After whose death, she married Henry Lord Darnly, eldest Son of Matthew Earl of Lennox. Outed of her Dominions by a potent Faction, she was compelled to flee into England; where after a tedious imprisonment, she was put to death in Fotheringhay Castle in Northamptonshire, and interred at Peterburgh, Anno 1586.
- 1567 36 James VI. the Son of Mary Queen of Scots, and of Henry Lord Darnly, was crowned King in his Cradle also. He married Anne, the Daughter of Christiern the third, King of Denmark; was chofe of the Order of the Garter, Ann. 1590. and succeeded Queen Elizabeth in the Realm of England, March 24. Ann. 1602. And here I cannot omit the prudent foresight of Henry the seventh, who having two Daughters, bestowed the Eldest (contrary to the mind of his Council) on the King of Scots, and the younger on the King of the French: that so, if his own Issue male should fail, and that a Prince of another Nation mult inherit England; then Scotland as the lesser Kingdom would depend upon England, and not England wait on France, as upon the greater. In which succession of the Scots to the Crown of England, the Prophecy of the fatal Stone, spoken of before, did receive accomplishment. And so perhaps might that ascribed in the Polychronicon to an holy Anchorite living in King Egelseds time, which is this, Englishmen, for that they wretched them to drunkenness, to treason, and to retchlesness of Gods house, first by Danes, and then by Normans, and the third time by Scots, whom they holden least worth of all, they shall be overcome. Then the world shall be unstable, and so divers and variable, that the instableness of thoughts shall be beset by many manner diversity of Clothing. For on this union of the Kingdoms, this prediction seems to have been accomplished; the circumstances mentioned in the same so patly agreeing, and the Scots never subduing England, but by this blessed Victory. Unless perhaps the Accomplishment thereof be still to come; or that it was indeed more literally fulfilled in the great defeat at Bannock-burn, in which was slain 50000 English, as the Scottish Writers do report, and the name of Scot growing so terrible for a time, that an hundred of the English would flee from three Scots, as before was noted.

The Revenues of this Crown Boterus estimateth at 100000 Crowns, or 30000 sterling, and it is not like that they were much more, if they came to that: here being not commodity in this Kingdom to allure strangers to traffick: the Domain or Patrimony of the Crown, but mean; the Country in most places barren; and many of the Subjects, those especially of the Out-Isles, and the Western parts, so extremely barbarous, that they add very small improvement to the publick Treasury.

And answerable to the shortness of their standing Revenue, were their Forces also. For though the Country be very populous, and the men generally patient both of cold and hunger, and inured to hardship; yet in regard the Kings hereof were not able to maintain an Army under pay, their Forces seldom held together above 40 days; and then, if not a great deal sooner, did disband themselves. For the Nobility and Gentry being bound by the Tenure of their Lands, to serve the King in his Wars, and to bring with them such and so many of their Vassals, as the present service did require: used to provide for themselves and their followers, tents, money, victuals, provision of all forts, and all other necessities; the King supplying them with nothing. Which being spent, they usually disbanded, and went home again, without attending long on the Expedition. Which I conceive to be the reason, why the Scots in the time of hostility betwixt the Nations, made only sudden and tumultuary incursions into England; without performing any thing of special moment: and that they have not acted any thing elsewhere in the way of conquest; but only as Mercenaries to the French and other Nations that have hired them. And though it be affirmed that the Army of King James the fourth, when he invaded England in the time of King Henry the eighth, (being then in France) consisted of 100000 fighting men; yet this I look on only as an argument of their populousity: few of those men being armed or trained up to service; and therefore easily discomfited by a far less Army. It's true, that in the year 1643. the Scottish Covenanters raised an Army consisting of 18000 Foot, and 1000 Horse, and 1000 Dragoons; with Arms, Artillery and Ammunition correspondent to it: which was the gallantest Army, and the best appointed, that ever that Nation did set out in the times foregoing. But then it is as true withall, that this Army was maintained and payed, by the two Houses of the Parliament of England, at the rate of 30000 l. per mensum, and an advance of 100000 l. before-hand, the better to invite them to embrace the action, and prepare necessities for it; without any charge unto themselves. And though the Army which they sent into England above five years after, under James Duke Hamilton of Arran, was little inferior unto this in number, but far superiour to it both in Horse and Arms, and other necessary appointments: yet it is well known, that the Scots brought nothing but their own bodies to compound that Army; the Horse and Arms being such as they had gotten out of England, in the former War.

In point of reputation amongst foreign Princes, the Kings of the Scots, and their Ambassadors and Agents, had place in all General Councils, and Ecclesiastical Assemblies, before those of Castile: and by the Statists of late times, have been reckoned (with the Kings of England, France, and Spain) for absolute Monarchs. But I conceive that this was only since the first years of King Edward the third, when they had quitted their subjection and vassalage to the Crown of England. For that anciently the Scots were Homagers to the Kings of England, may be apparently demonstrated by these following Arguments. 1 By the Homages, and other services, and duties, done by the Kings of the Scots unto those of England: Malcolm the third doing Homage unto William the Conquerour; as William one of his Successors did to K. Henry the second: and that not only for the three Northern Counties, or the Earldom of Huntingdon, (as by some pretended) but for the very Crown it self: Kenneth the third, being also one of those eight Tributary or Vassal Kings, which rowed King Edgar over the Dee, as before was noted. 2ly, By the interposing of King Edward the first, and the submission of the Scots to that interposing, in determining the controvercie of succession betwixt Bruce and Baliol: as in like case, Philip the Fair adjudged the title of Artois, which was holden of the Crown of France, and then in question betwixt the Lady Maund, and her Nephew Robert; or as King Edward the third, in the right of the said Crown of France, determined of the controvercie betwixt John Earl of Montfort, and Charles of Blais, for the Dukedom of Bretagne. 3ly, By the confession and acknowledgment of the Prelates, Peers, and other the Estates of Scotland, subscribed by all their hands and seals in the Roll of Ragman; wherein they did acknowledge the superiority of the Kings of England, not only in regard of such advantages as the sword had given him, but as of his original and undoubted right. Which Roll was treacherously delivered into the hands of the Scots, by Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, in the beginning of the reign of King Edward the third. 4ly, By the tacit concession of the Kings themselves, who in their Coins, Commissions, and publick Instruments, assume not to themselves the title of Kings of Scotland, but of Reges Scottorum, or the Kings of the Scots: and thereby intimating that though they are the Kings of the Nation, yet there is some superiour Lord (King Paramount as we may call him) who hath the Royalty of the Land. 5ly, By the Judgements and Arrests of the Courts of England, not only in the times of King Edward the first, but in some times since. For when William Wallis a Scotsman by birth, and the best Souldier of that Country, was taken Prisoner and brought to London, he was adjudged to suffer death as a Traytor: which had been an illegal and unrighteous judgement, had he been a Prisoner of War, and not looked on by the Judges as a Subject to the Crown of England. The like done in the case of Simon Frezill, another of that Kingdom, in the same Kings reign. In like manner, in the time of King Edward the third, it was resolved by the Court, in the Lord Beaumonts case, when it was objected that one of the Witnesses was a Scot, and therefore as an Alien not to give his evidence; that his testimony was to be allowed of, because the Scots in the Law of England, did not go for Aliens. And when one indicted for a Rape in the 13th of Queen Elizabeths Reign, desired a Medietatem Lingua, because he was a Scotchman, and so an Alien; it was denied him by the Court, because the Scots were not reputed here as Aliens, but as Subjects rather. So also, when Robert Umfraville, Lord of Kyms, was summoned to the Parliament of England, in the Reign of King Edward the third, by the name of Robert Earl of Angus, (which is a dignity in Scotland); and after in a Writ against him was called only by his own name of Umfraville, without any addition of that honour; the Writ was judged to abate: which I conceive the learned Judges had not done, if Scotland had not been reputed to be under the Vassalage of the Kings of England. 6ly, and lastly, by a Charter of Lands and Arms, (which I have in my custody) granted by King Edward the first, in the last year of his Reign, to Peter Dodge of Stopworth in the County of Chester, one of the Ancestors of my Mother: in which it is expressed, that the said Lands and Arms were conferred upon him by that King, for his eminent services, contre son grand Enemy et Rebel, Baliol, Roy d'Escoffe et Vassal de Angleterre; that is to say, against his great Enemy and Rebel Baliol King of Scotland, and Vassal of England. A thing so clear, that if King James had not been extremely tender of the honour of his native Country, he needed not to have put his Lawyers to the trouble of a New invention, in hammering the Case of the Post-nati for him; to make the Scots inheritable unto Lands in England. The acknowledgment and Reviver of their old Subjection would have served his turn. But of this argument enough, and perhaps too much. I only add, that upon conference which I once had with an honourable person of that Kingdom of Scotland, employed unto the Court in a business of no mean consequence to the peace and quiet of his Country: I found him so sensible of the inconveniences of their present Government, by reason of the Kings absence, and the frequent divisions and partialities of his Council there; that he confessed that Nation could

Ireland. be never rich or happy, till they were made a Province of the English Empire; and governed by a Vice-Roy, as Ireland was.

The principal Order of Knighthood in this Kingdom was that of St. Andrew, instituted by Hungar, King of the Poles, to encourage his Subjects in the War against King Athelstane of England. The Knights did wear about their necks a Collar, interlaced with Thistles, with the picture of St. Andrew appendant to it: The Motto, Nemo me impune lacessit. It took this name because after the battle, Hungar and his Souldiers went all barefoot to St. Andrews, and there vowed that they and their Posterity would thenceforth use his Cross as their Ensign (which is a Saltire Argent in a Field Azure) whenever they took in hand any warlike enterprise.

2 But this Order being expired many Ages since, there is now no Order of Knight-hood in it, (except Knights Bachelors) but that of Nova Scotia; ordained by King James, Ann. 1622. for the planting of that Countrey by Scottish Colonies; in imitation of the Orders of Baronets in England, for the plantation of Ulster. Hereditary, as that also is, but the Knights hereof distinguished by a Ribband of Orange-Tawny.

The Arms are Sol, a Lion Rampant Mars, within a double Tressure counter flowered: Which Tressure counter flowered was added to the Lion by Achais King of the Scots, at what time he contracted the League with France: signifying (saith Heitor Boetius one of their Historians) Francia opibus Leonem exinde munendum; that the Scotch Lion should be guarded by the riches of France.

IRELAND.

IRELAND is invironed on all sides with the Ocean; parted from Britain by a violent and unruly Sea, called S. Georges Channell. Situate on the West of Britain, next unto which it is the biggest Island of Europe, containing in length 300, and in breadth 120 miles: and is seated under the 8th and 10th Climates; the longest day being 16 hours and an half in the Southern, and 17 hours 3 quarters in the Northern parts.

It was once called Scotia, from the Scots who did there inhabit; and Scotia Minor, to difference it from Scotland, in the Isle of Britain. But the general name hereof is Ireland; by the Latins called Hibernia, by the Greeks, Iernia. And though some frame a wrested Etymology from Iberus, a Spanish Captain and some from Irananph, once a supposed Duke hereof; as others ab Hylerno aere, the Winter-like and inclement air: yet probably the name proceeded from Erinland, which signifyeth in their own language a Western land. And yet I must not pretermitt the Etymon given us by Bochartus, (more near the name than most of his other Fancies) who will have it called Hibernia, from Ibernae, a Phœnician word, signifying the furthest Habitation: there being no Countrey known amongst the Ancients, which lay West of Ireland.

Their own Chronicles, or Fables rather, tell us, how Cesarea, Noahs Neece, inhabited here before the Flood; and how 300 years after the Flood, it was subdued by Bartholomæus, a Scythian, who overcame here I know not what Giants. Afterward Nemethus another Scythian Prince, and Delus a Grecian, came hither: and last of all Gaothel, with his Wife Scota, one of Pharaohs Daughters; who must needs name this Island Scotia. But not to honour such fopperies with a confutation, doubly the first inhabitants of this Island came out of Britain. For Britain is the nighest Countrey unto it, and so had a more speedy waftage hither; Secondly, the ancient Writers call this Island, a British Island; and thirdly, Tacitus giveth us of this Countrey this verdict; Solum, eorumque cultus & ingenia hominum, hanc multum à Britannia differunt; the Soil and Air, the habits and disposition of the people, were not much unlike the Britans. For further evidence whereof, it was observed, at the reduction of Wales to the Crown of England, by King Edward the first, that many of their Laws and Customs were those of the Irish: which shews that they did both descend from the same Original. But then we must observe withall, that they were counted far more barbarous and savage by most ancient Writers, than those of Britain are deciphered at the first discovery: said by Serabo to be Man-eaters; accustomed (as Solinus telleth us) to drink the blood of those whom they slew in fight. Nor were the women, though the softer and more tender Sex, free from such wilde and savage customs, it being a constant course amongst them, when they were delivered of a man-child, to put some meat into the mouth of it, on the point of a sword; wishing therewith it might not die but in the middelt of Arms, and the heat of battel. Both Sexes used to trim themselves with the Teeth of Fishes, white as the driven Snow, or the polished Ivory; and therein placed the greatest part of their pride and bravery.

Nor

Nor are the modern Irish much abhorrent from such barbarous customs, as plainly shew from what Original they descend; altered but little by converse with more civil Nations. Of natural constitution generally strong and nimble of body, haughty of heart, careless of their lives, patient in cold and hunger, implacable in enmity, constant in love, light of belief, greedy of glory; and in a word, if they be bad, you shall no where finde worse; if they be good, you shall hardly meet with better. The Diet, especially of the meer Irish, is for the most part, on herbs, roots, butter mingled with Oat-flower, milk, and beef-broth: eating flesh many times without bread, which they digest with Uisgebanngh; and give their bread-corn to their horses in stead of Provender. But more particularly, those of the richer sort in all parts, and of all sorts those which inhabit within the Pale (as they themselves call it) and in such places where the English Discipline hath been entertained; conformable to civility, both in behaviour and apparel; The Kernes (for by that name they call the wild Irish of the poorer and inferiour sort) most extremely barbarous; nor behaving themselves like Christians, scarcely like men. All of them so tenacious of their ancient customs, that neither power, nor reason, nor the sense of the inconveniencies which they suffer by it, can wean them to desert or change them. A pregnant evidence whereof, is their use of Floughings, nor with such gears or harness, as in other places; but by tying the hindmost horses head to the tail of the former: which makes the poor Jades draw in a great deal of pain; makes them unserviceable by the soon losing of their tails; and withall is a course of so slow a dispatch, that they cannot break up as much ground in a week, as a good Team well harnessed would perform in a day; yet no persuasion hath been able to prevail upon them for the changing of this hurtfull and ridiculous custom. And when the Earl of Strafford, the late Lord Deputy, had damned it by Act of Parliament, and laid a penalty on such as should after use it: the people thought it such a grievance, and so injurious to the Nation, that among other things demanded towards a Pacification of the present troubles, their Agents and Commissioners insisted eagerly on the abrogation of this Law. An humour like to this in the point of Husbandry, we shall hereafter meet with, in another place. Neer of kin to which is a lazie custom that they have of burning their straw (rather than put themselves to the pains to thresh it) by that means to part it from the Corn. From which no reason can dissuade them, nor persuasions win them. They have among them other customs as absurd, though less inconvenient; as placing a green bush on May-day before their doors, to make their kine yield the more milk; kneeling down to the May-Moon as soon as they see it, desiring her to leave them in as good health as she found them; and many others of like nature.

They use a language of their own, but spoken also in the West of Scotland, and the Hebrides or Western Islands; which though originally British, or a Dialect of it, by reason of their intermixture with Norwegians, Danes, East Angles, or Osians, and English-Saxons; hath no affinity with the Welsh, for ought I can learn.

The Christian faith was first preached among them by S. Patrick, affirmed to be the Nephew of S. Martin of Tours, Anno 435. Reformed in the more civil parts, and the English Colonies, according to the platform of the Church of England; but the Kernes, or natural wild Irish, (and many of the better sort of the Nation also) either adhere unto the Pope, or to their own superstitious fancies, as in former times. And to say truth, it is no wonder that they should; there being no care taken to instruct them in the Protestant Religion, either by translating the Bible, or the English Liturgy, into their own Language, as was done in Wales; but forcing them to come to Church to the English Service, which the people understand no more than they do the Mass. By means whereof, the Irish are not only kept in continual ignorance, as to the doctrine and devotions of the Church of England, and others of the Protestant Churches; but those of Rome are furnished with an excellent Argument, for having the Service of the Church in a Language which the common Hearers do not understand. And therefore I do heartily commend it to the care of the State (when these dissenters are composed) to provide, that they may have the Bible, and all other publick means of Christian instruction and devotion, in their natural tongue.

The Soil of it self is abundantly fruitful, but naturally fitter for grafs and pasturage, than it is for tillage: as may be seen in such places where the industry of man is aiding to the natural goodness of the Soil. But where that wanteth, the Countrey is either over-grown with Wood, or encumbered with vast Boggs and unwholsom Marishes; yielding neither profit nor pleasure unto the Inhabitants. In some places, as in the County of Armagh, so rank and fertile; that the laying of any soil or compost on it, doth abate its fruitfulness, and proves the worst Husbandry that can be.

It hath been anciently very famous for the Piety and Religious lives of the Monks. Amongst whom I cannot but remember Columbus; and of him this memorable Apophthegm: when offered many fair preferments to leave his Countrey, he returned this Answer, It becomes not them to embrace other mens goods, who for Christs sake had forsaken their own. Of no less piety, but more eminent in point of Learning, was Richard Fitz-Rafe, Archbishop of Armagh, commonly called Armacanus, who flourished about the year 1357. A declared enemy of the Errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome.

It is affirmed of this Island, that amongst other priviledges which it hath above other Islands it fostereth no venomous Serpent, and that no such will live here, brought from other places. Hence of her self we find her speaking in the Poet:

Ireland.

*Ille ego sum Graiis Glacialis Hibernia dicta;
Cui Deus, & melior rerum nascentium Origo,
Pecunia commune dedit cum Creta alvace Tonantis,
Anguis ne nostris diffundant stila in oris.*

I am that Island which in times of old
The Greeks did call Hybernia, ycie-cold:
Secur'd by God and Nature from this fear,
Which gift was given to Crete, Jove's Mother dear,
That poisonous Snakes should never here be bred,
Or dare to hiss, or hurtful venom spread.

The other miracles of this Island, are, 1 That there is a Lake in the County of Armagh, into which if one thrust a piece of Wood, he shall finde that part of it which remaineth in the Mud to be turned into Iron; and that which is in the Water, to be turned into a Whet-stone: richly deserved by him, if the tale be false, who did first report it. 2 That the Kine will yield no Milk, if their Calves be near by them; or at least their Calves skins stuffed with straw or hay. It is said also, that all the breed of this Country are of less size than they be in England, except Women and Greyhounds, and those much bigger than with us.

As for the Clergy of this Country, they have been little beholding to their Lay-Patrons, in former times: some of their Bishops being so poor, that they had no other Revenues than the Pasture of two Milch-beasts. And so far had the Monasteries and Religious houses invaded by Appropriations, the Churches rights; that of late times in the whole Province of Connacht, the whole stipend of the Incumbents was not above 40 shillings, in some places not above 16. So that the poor Irish must needs be better fed than taught: for ad tenuitatem Beneficiorum, necessarii sequitur ignorantia Sacerdotum; Pope Benefices will be fitted with ignorant Priests, said Puritanism rightly. But this is remedied in part by his Sacred Majesty King CHARLES, the second Monarch of Great Britain, who liberally (at the suit of the late Lord Archbishop of Canterbury) restored unto this Church all the Impropriations and Portions of Tithes, which had been vested in the Crown. An action of most singular piety, and Princely bounty.

Principal Rivers of this Country, are, 1 The Shannon (the Sennus of Ptolemy) which arising in the Mountains of Leirinn in the County of Connacht, and making many fair Lakes as it passeth forwards; loseth it self, after a course of 260 miles (of which 60 navigable) in the Western Ocean. 2 The Liff, by Ptolemy called Lithinus, neighboured by the City of Dublin. 3 Avonliff, or Blackwater, as the English call it. 4 Slane, supposed to be the Medona of the ancient Writers. 5 The Shannon. 6 The Boyne, &c. Of which, and others of like note, take this following Catalogue, out of the Canto of the marriage of the Thames and Medway, in the Fairy Queen.

There was the Liff rowling down the sea,
The sandy Slane, the stony Avonliff,
The spacious Sheninn spreading like a sea,
The pleasant Boyne, the fishy-fruitfull Banne,
Swift Avonliff, which of the Englishmen
Is call'd Blackwater; and the the Liff deep,
Sad Trowie that once his people over-ran,
Strong Ala rumbling from Slenglogher steep,
And Maunlo mine, whose waves I whilom taught to weep.

There also was the wide-embayed Maye,
The pleasant Bandon crown'd with many wood;
The spreading Lee, that like an Island fair
Incloseth Cork with his divided flood;
And balefull Owne, late stain'd with English blood,
With many more,

So the renowned Spencer in his Canto of the marriage of Thames and Medway.

But besides these Rivers, this Island is in most places well stored with Lakes, yielding great plenty of Fish to the parts adjoining. The principal of which, 1 Lough-Erris, containing 15 miles in breadth, and 30 miles in length; shaded with woods, and so replenished with Fish, that the Fishermen complain of too much abundance, and the often breaking of their nets. It hath also in it many Islands, one most remarkable for the strange and horrid noises which are therein heard; called therefore by the vulgar St. Patrick's Purgatory. Almost as big as this is a Lake of Cordes, which loseth it self in the Sea not far from Galway. A Lake of 26 miles in length, and four in breadth; said to have in it 30 Isles, abounding with Pine-trees. 3 Lough-Foyle, supposed to be the Ligia of Ptolemy. 4 Lough-Enagh, out of which the River Banne, abundantly well stored with Salmon, hath its first Origin. And besides these and many others of less note, there are said to be three Lakes in the Province of Meath, not far asunder, and having an intercourse of waters: but of so different a temper, that the Fish which are proper to the one (for each of them hath its proper and peculiar sorts) will not live in the other: but either dieth, or by some secret conveyances, find a way to their own Lake out of which they were brought.

It was divided anciently into five Provinces, each one a Kingdom of it self; that is to say, 1 Leinster, 2 Meath, 3 Ulster, 4 Connacht, and 5 Mounster: but of late time the Province of Meath is reckoned for a Member or part of Leinster.

1 LEINSTER, by the Latines called Lagenia, hath on the East, the Irish Channel, (commonly called S. Georges Channel) by which parted from the Isle of Great Britain; on the West, the River Newrie, (as the Latines call it) which divides it from Mounster; on the North, the Province of Meath; and the main Ocean on the South. The Soil more fruitful generally than the rest of Ireland, because better cultivated and manured, as having been longest in the possession of the English: from whom a great part of the Inhabitants do derive themselves, and for that reason more conformable to the civilities and habit of the English Nation. Well watered, besides a large Sea-coast, with many fair and pleasant Rivers, the principal whereof, 1 the Bannam, called in Latine Birgus; 2 the Newrie, 3 the Shannon, and 4 the Liff, (the Latines of Ptolemy) neighbouring Dublin the chief City.

It containeth the Counties of 1 Dublin, 2 Kilkenny, 3 Catherlough, 4 Kildare, 5 Lease, or Queens County, 6 Ophalie, or Kings County; and 7 Wexford: in which are comprehended 34 Towns of note, and 88 Castles well fortified, and able to make good resistance against an Enemy: the English being forced to fortifie themselves in their Plantations with strong holds and fortresses, against the incursions of the Natives.

Places of most observation in it, 1 Dublin, supposed to be the Eblena of Ptolemy; by the Irish called Baleachigh, because being seated in a fenny and moorish soil, it was built on piles, as the word doth signifie in that language. Situate at or near the mouth of the River Liff, which affordeth it a commodious Haven, but that the entrances thereof are many times encumbered with heaps of Sand. The City very rich and populous, as being the Metropolis of all the Island; the Seat of the Lord Deputy, an Archbishop See, and an University, besides the benefit redounding from the Courts of Justice. In whose respects well-fortified against all emergencies; and adorned with many goodly buildings, both private and publique. The principal of which, are the Castle, wherein the Lord Deputy resident, built by Henry Landres once Archbishop here; a Colledge founded by Queen Elizabeth, to the honour, and by the name of the blessed Trinity; the Cathedral Church dedicated to S. Patrick, the Apostle of the Irish Nation; a fair Collegiate Church called Christ Church; besides thirteen others destined to Parochial meetings. Being destroyed almost to nothing in the Danish Wars, it was re-edified by Harald, surnamed Harfager, King of the Normans, then Masters of most parts of the Island; and after the subjection of it to the Crown of England, was peopled with a Colony of Bristol men. 2 Wexford, or Wexford, the Metropolis of Ptolemy, situate on the mouth of the River Slane, supposed to be the Medona of the same Author: the first of all the Towns in Ireland which received a Colony of English. 3 Kilkenny, on the River Newrie, the chief Seat of the Bishop of Offery, and the fairest Town of all the Islands: so called, quasi Cella Canici, the Cell or Monastery of Canicus, a man of great renown for piety, in these parts of the Country: 4 Kildare, an In-land Town also, and a Bishops See; but of more note for giving the Title of an Earl to the ancient Family of the Fitz-Gerards, of long time honoured with this Title. One of which being much complained of to King Henry the 6th, as a man of so unquiet and turbulent a nature, that his Adversaries closed their charge against him with this expression: Finally, all Ireland cannot rule this Earl; the King replied, that then this Earl should rule all Ireland: and so for his jests sake, made him Lord Deputy of the Kingdom. 5 Rosse, once populous, well traded, and of large circumference, now a ruine only; nothing remaining but the Walls, which were built by Isabel, the Daughter of Richard Strongbow Earl of Denbroke, the fortunate Conqueror of this Island for King Henry the second. 6 Philip's Town, the principal of the County of Ophalie, or Kings County; so called in honour of King Philip; as 7 Mariburg, the chief of Lease, or the Queens County, was in honour of Queen Mary. 8 Leighlin, a place of great importance, well walled and fortified, against the incursion of the Irish, by the Lord Deputy Bellingham. 9 Catherlough, commonly, but corruptly Carlow, a Town of great strength, and the chief of that County. 10 Rheban, not otherwise of note, but that it is conceived to be the Rheba of Ptolemy.

2 MEATH, by the Latines called Media, by Giraldus, Media; because situate in the midst of the Island, hath on the South Leinster; on the West, Connacht; on the North, Ulster; on the East, the Irish Sea, or S. Georges Channel. A small, but rich and pleasant Province: well stocked with people, and stored with all things necessary for their sustentation; and for a sweet and wholesome air, not inferior to any. Divided into three Counties only, that is to say, 1 East-Meath, 2 West-Meath, and 3 Long-ford; containing 13 Towns of note, and 14 Castles of good esteem. By reason of which strength, it is called by some writers, the Chamber of Ireland.

Towns of most consequence herein, are 1 Trim, the chief Town of the County of East-Meath, the ancient Barony of the Lancs; possessed in former times of a fair Revenue in this County, and the Lords of the greatest part of Ulster. 2 Trillick, more properly Droghda, situate on the River Boine on the edge of Ulster, to which Province belongs so much of the Town as lieth on the North side of that River: a very fair and populous City, as well by Art as Nature very strongly fortified, and furnished with a large and commodious Haven. It took the name of Droghda from the Bridge there built upon the River, for the conveniency of passage (as the word signifies in that Language) and therefore called Pontona by some Latine writers. 3 Mulling, the Ireland. the chief Town of West-Meth. 4 Delvin, in the same County also, the Barony of the Nugent, an ancient Family in this tract. 5 Longford, of most note in the County so named, but not else observable.

As for the Fortunes of this Province (for Leinster since the first Conquest of it, hath been inseparably annexed to the Crown of England) it was first granted in Fega-Farm by King Henry the second, to Hugh Lacy, a man of great merit and employment in the Conquest of Ireland; who left it unto Walter, his younger Son. By Margaret and Matilda, the Nieces of this Walter, by his Son Gilbert, one moiety hereof came to the Mortimers Earls of March, and in their right unto the Crown in King Edward the fourth; and the other moiety to the Verduns, by whom dispersed and scattered into divers Families. Accomplished for one County only till the time of King Henry the 8th, by his reign it was divided into East-Meth, and West-Meth; to which the County of Longford was after added, as it continueth to this day.

3. U L S T E R, by the Latines called Ultonia, is the largest Province of all Ireland, bounded on the South, with Meth, and Connaught; on the West, with the vast Irish Ocean; on the North, with that part of the Northern Ocean, to which Ptolomy gives the name of Hyperborean; and on the East, with S. Georges Channel. A Country fruitful of it self, but in most places formerly over-grown with woods, and drowned in Marshes and great bogges; by the natural slothfulness of the people, made more responal to the husbandman both for corn, and pasturage, since the late Plantation of the British, than in times foregoing.

It is divided into the Counties of, 1. South, 2. Cavan, 3. Fermanagh, 4. Down, 5. Monaghan, 6. Armagh, 7. Coleraine, 8. Tirconnel, 9. Tir-Oen, and 10. Antrim. In which are comprehended 14 Towns of note for Commerce and Traffick, and 30 Castles for the defence of the Country, and keeping under the wild Irish; wilder and more untractable in these Northern parts, than the rest of Ireland. The whole well watered with a large and spacious Sea, on three sides thereof; many great Lakes in the body of it, besides the Rivers of 1. Boyne, called in Latine Boanda, which divides it from Meth, 2. the Bann, 3. Mountain, and 4. the Eyn, belonging to this Province wholly.

Places of most importance in it, 1. Armagh, on or near the River Kalin, the chief Town of the County so called, and the See of an Archbishop, who is the Primate of all Ireland. An ancient City, but miserably defaced by fire in Tir-Oen Rebellion, that it can scarce preserve the reputation of a Market-Town. 2. Carlingford, and 3. Dundalk, both situate on the Sea-side, and both within the County of South. 4. Knock-Fergus, the chief of Antrim, more properly Rick-Fergus, (and in that sense called Carling-Fergus, by the Irish) so called from Fergus one of the Kings of the Irish Scotts, who there suffered Shipwreck: Seated upon a large and capacious Bay (the Vindictus of Ptolomy) which giveth it both a safe and commodious Port; as well by natural situation, as the works of Art, very strongly fortified; by reason of the neighbourhood of the Scotts in Cantire, from which little distant. 5. Londonderry, a Colony of the Londoners; best built of any Town in the North of Ireland. 6. Dungannon, the principal seat and residence in former times, of the great Oncals. 7. Dungall, the principal of Tirconnel. 8. Robogh, a small Village at present, but anciently a Bishops See: fit to be mentioned in this place in regard it still preserveth some footsteps of the old Robogh, an Irish Tribe, and placed by Ptolomy in this tract, where they gave name unto the Promontory by him called Robogdium, now the Fair-For-land; as is probably conceived by the learned Camden.

This, as it is the largest Province of all this Kingdom, so was it with most difficulty subjected to the Crown of England, and reduced to good order and civility. First conquered by John Curry a valiant Englishman, in the reign of King Henry the second, by whom created Earl of Ulster. But being assigned for his eminent virtues, and after proscribed by King John; this Title and Estate were both conferred upon Hugh Lacy, the Lord and conqueror of Meth, whom before we spoke of. By an Irish General of the Lacles, it came unto the Burghs then Lords of Connaught; and by the marriage of Elizabeth Daughter and Heir of Richard de Burgh, the last Earl of that Family, it came to Desmond Duke of Clarence, the second Son (then living) of King Edward the third; as by his Daughter Philipp, to the Earls of March, from them by the like marriage to the house of York; and in the person of King Edward the 4th, to the Crown again. But being neglected by the English, in the whole course of their Government, especially in the Wars betwixt York and Lancaster, it was canbored into many Estates and Principalities, by the great Lords of the natural Irish, (who had both too great sway here in the former times); and so estranged from the civilities of England, and their Allegiance to that Crown, as if it had never been in subjection to it. In which estate it did continue (the Kings of England having here no more power or profit, than the great ones of the Country were pleased to give them): till the Rebellion first, and afterwards the vanquishment of Hugh O'neal, the then Earl of Tir-Oen, brought it in full subjection to the English government, of which more hereafter.

4. CONNAUGHT, in Latine called Connacia; by the Irish, Connacht; is bounded on the North, with Ulster; on the West, with the main Ocean; on the South, with Down, from which parted by the River Shannon; and on the East, with Meth; and some part of Leinster. So called from the Nagats, an old Irish Nation, or from Nagatsa a Port-town; both placed by Ptolomy in this tract. The soil of the same temper with that of Ulster; as woody and as full of bogges till these later times, in which it differently well cleared of both inconveniences.

It hath been also called by our English Writers, the County of Clare; from Thomas de Clare, one of the younger Sons of Gilbert de Clare Earl of Gloucester, on whom it was conferred by King Edward the first: and is divided at the present, into these five Shires; that is to say, 1. Leitrim, 2. Roscommon, 3. Sligo, 4. Sligo, and 5. Galloway and Twomond.

In which are comprehended but 8 Towns of any consequence, for commerce and traffick, (an argument of the imperfect plantation of it by the English Conquerors); and about 24 Castles, for defence of the Country, of old erection, besides such Fortresses as have been raised occasionally in these later troubles.

Places of most note and observation, 1. Toam, an Archbishops See. 2. Athenry, an ancient Town, but decayed and ruinous; of most renown for being the Barony of John de Bermingham, a noble Englishman, who had great possessions in this tract. 3. Leitrim, the chief Town of the County so named, neighboured by the Curlew Mountains, unfortunately memorable for the great defeat there given the English, in Tir-Oen rebellion; and by the Spring or Fountain of the River Shenin or Shanon, whose course we have before described. 4. Sligo, and 5. Roscommon, the chief Town of their several Counties. 6. Athlone, a piece of great strength, and the Key of Connaught. 7. Twomond, not otherwise much observable, but for giving the title of an Earl to the noble Family of O'Brian, (descended from the Kings of Connaught) advanced unto that honour by King Henry the 8th. 8. Galloway the principal of this Province, a Bishops See, and the third City of the Kingdom for beauty and bigness. Situate near the fall of the great Lake or River of Corbes, in the Western Ocean, defended on that side from the fury of the Sea, and the fear of invasions, by the interposition of some Islands (called the Iles of Arran) very strongly fortified. A noted Empory, and lately of so great fame with foreign Merchants, that an out-landish Merchant meeting with an Irish man, demanded in what part of Galloway, Ireland stood; as if Galloway had been the name of the Island, and Ireland only the name of some Town.

This once a Kingdom of it self, as the rest of those Provinces; the last King whereof was Roderick, surnamed the Great, who having a great hand over the rest of the Royalets, entituled himself sole Monarch or King of Ireland. But being forced to submit himself to King Henry the second, his Country at the last was brought into subjection to the Crown of England, by the valour and good fortune of William de Burgh, Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, William de Bermingham, and other Noble Adventurers of the English Nation. And though all of them did partake of the fruit of their labours; yet the greatest part of the spoil, together with the title of Lords of Connaught, fell to the Family of the Burghs; from them to Lionel Duke of Clarence, and by degrees unto the Crown, as before was shewn. Cantoned again amongst the Irish and degenerate English, as Ulster was, by the supine neglect of the Kings of England: till the Rebellion of Tir-Oen, involving all the Chiefs of the Irish Nation in the same cause with him, involved them also consequently in the same destruction.

5. MOUNSTER, by the Latines called Momonia, is bounded on the North, with Connaught; on the East, with Leinster; on the West, with the Atlantick or Western Ocean; and on the South, with the Vergivian. By the natural Irish it is called Mown, whence the English had the name of Mounster. A Province, which for rich Towns, commodious Havens, fair Rivers, and the fertility of the soil, yields not to any in the Kingdom.

It is divided into six Counties, viz. 1. Limerick, 2. Waterford, 3. Cork, 4. Desmond, 5. Kerry, and 6. Tipperary; which two last anciently enjoyed all the rights of a County Palatine: And in these Shires are comprehended (besides many safe Stations and Rodes for Shipping) 24 Towns of note and trading, and 66 Castles of old erection.

Places of most observation, 1. Cassiter, in the County of Limerick, an Archbishops See, advanced unto that honour by Pope Eugenius the third, about the year 1150. 2. Limerick, the principal of that County, and the fourth in estimation of all the Kingdom: Situate in an Island compassed round about with the River Shannon, by which means well fortified; a well frequented Empory, and a Bishops See; distant from the main Ocean about 60 miles, but so accommodated by the River, that Ships of burden come up close to the very walls. The Castles and the Bridge-pieces of great both strength and beauty, were of the foundation of King John, exceedingly delighted with the situation. 3. Clonmel, in the County of Tipperary, of great strength and consequence. 4. Holy Cross, in the same County also, once flourishing by reason of the great resort of Pilgrims, to see and worship there a piece of the holy Cross; as it was supposed: which supposition as it drew much wealth unto the Town, so it obtained the rights of a County Palatine for the County also. 5. Thurles, in the same County, which gives the title of a Vicount to the Earls of Ormond, but not else observable. 6. Waterford, on the River Shannon, a well traded Port, a Bishops See, and the second City of the Kingdom. Of great fidelity to the English since the conquest of Ireland, and for that cause endowed with many ample privileges. First built by some Norwegian Pirates, who though they fixed it in one of the most barren parts and most foggy air of all the Country, yet they made choice of such a safe and commodious site for the use of shipping, that of a nest of Pirats it was effoons made a Receipt for Merchants, and suddenly grew up to great wealth and power. 6. Cork, (by the Latines called Coracgia) the principal of that County, and a Bishops See: well walled, and fitted with a very commodious Haven; consisting chiefly of one street reaching out in length; inhabited by a civil, wealthy, and industrious people. 7. Dunk-Eran, an old Episcopal See, supposed by some to be the Tivernus of Ptolomy, but not else observable. 8. Kinsale, upon the mouth of the River Bany, a commodious Port, opposite to the Coasts of Spain, and fortified in Tir-Oen Rebellion by a Spanish Garrison, under the command of Don John de Aguilar: but soon recovered (after the defeat of that Grand Rebel near the walls hereof (by the valour and indefatigable industry of Charles Lord Mountjoy, the then Lord Deputy of this Kingdom). 9. Baltimore, 10. Youghill, and 11. Berehaven, all upon the Sea, and all provided of safe Roads or convenient Havens. 12. Lismore, of old a Bishops See; now annexed to Waterford, in which Shire it standeth. Nothing in point of story singular which concerns this Province; but that it was so carefully looked to by the Kings of England, that there was appointed over it a peculiar Officer (in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in power and place next to the the Deputy himself) called the Lord President of Munster: by whose vigilancy there have hapned fewer Rebellions here, than in any Province of this Island.

The ancient Inhabitants of this Island, being originally Britans (as before is said) were in the time of Ptolemy, distinguished into the Nations of Rhogonii, Darii, Volontii, Venicii, and Erdini, possessing the Northern parts, now Ulster; the Amerti, Gangani, and Nagnate, inhabiting Connaught: the Velibori, Uterni, Vodii, and Coriondi, in the South, now Munster; and the Menapii, Cauci, Blanii, Brigantes, taking up the Provinces of Meth and Leinster. Principal Cities of the which, were, Eblana, now Dublin; Manapia, now Waterford; Nagnata, which Ptolemy honoured with the title of Urbs insignis; Rhigia, Rheba, Macolthima, Lahernis, Iuvernus, &c. not easily discernible by what names we may call them now: this Countrey never being so happy as to come under the power of the Romans, the great Masters of Civility and good Letters in the West of Europe: and by that means, the actions and affairs thereof buried in ignorance and silence. Towards the falling of which Empire we finde the Nation of the Scots to be seated here, and from hence first to take possession of the Hebrides, or Western Isles, next of the Western part of Britain on the North of Dunbritton-Frith. Afterwards some of the Saxon Monarchs cast their eyes upon it, and made themselves masters of Dublin, and some other places; but being incumbered with the Danes, could not hold them long: being hardly able to defend their own against that people. The next that undertook the conquest, were the Northern Nations, Danes, Swedes, and Normans, all passing in the Chronicles of that time, under the name of Norwegians: who first only scoured along the Coasts in the way of Piracy. But after finding the weakness of the Island, divided amongst many petty and inconsiderable Princes, they made an absolute conquest of it under the conduct of Turgesius, whom they elected for their King: soon rooted out by the policy of the King of Meth, the only Irish Prince who was in favour with the Tyrant. This petty King, by name Oma-Laghishen, had a Daughter of renowned beauty, whom Turgesius demanded of her Father to serve his lusts: and he seeming willing to condescend to the motion, as if honoured by it, made answer, That besides his Daughter, he had at his disposing many others of more exquisite beauties, which should all be ready at command. Turgesius swallowing this bait, desired him with all speed to effect this meeting. But the King of Meth attring in the habits of Women, a company of young Gentlemen, who durst for the common liberty adventure their several lives; conducted them to the Tyrants Bed-chamber. And they according to the directions given them, (when for that little modesty sake he had in him, he had commanded all his attendants to avoid the room) assaulted him, now ready for, and expecting more kinde embraces, and left him dead in the place. The Methian King had by this time, acquainted divers of the better sort with his plot; all which upon a sign given, rush into the Palace, and put to death all the Norwegians, and other attendants of the Tyrant. After this, the Royalests enjoyed their former Dominions, till the year 1172, in which Dermot Mac Morogh King of Leinster, having forced the wife of Maurice O Rork King of Meth, and being by him driven out of his Kingdom; came to the Court of England for succour. To this Petition, Henry the second then King, condescended; sending him aid under the leading of Richard de Clare, surnamed Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke, who restored King Dermot, and brought a great part of the Island under the English subjection. John, King of England, was the first who was entituled Lord of Ireland; which title was granted him by Pope Urban the third, who for the ornament of his Royalty, sent him a plume of Peacock Feathers: and when Tir-Oen titled him Defender of the Irish Liberty, he was by Clement the 8th honoured with the like plume. But here we are to understand, that though the Kings of England used no other title than Lords of Ireland; yet were they Kings thereof in effect and power, Lords Paramount, as we use to say. And though themselves retained only the name of Lords, yet one of them gave to one of his English Subjects, the honourable, but invidious title of Duke of Ireland. And they retained this title of Lords, till the year 1542; in which Henry the 8th, in an Irish Parliament, was declared King of Ireland, as a name more sacred, and prepleat with Majesty, than that of Lord: at which time also he was declared to be Supreme Head under God, of the Church of Ireland; and the pretended jurisdiction of all foreign Powers, especially the usurped authority of the Pope of Rome renounced by Law, though still acknowledged by too many of this superstitious and untractable People.

The Government of this Countrey, since the first Conquest by the English, hath been most commonly by one Supreme Officer, who is sometimes called the Lord Lieutenant, most generally the Lord Deputy of Ireland; than whom no Vice-Roy in all Europe hath greater power, or comes nearer the Majesty of a King in his Train and State. For his assistance he hath a Privy Council attending on him, though resident for the most part at Dublin: and in emergencies, or cases of more difficult nature proceedeth many times in an arbitrary way, without formalities of Law. And for their Laws, which are the standing Rule of all civil Government, they owe their being and original to the English Parliaments. For in the reign of King Henry the 7th, Sir Edward Poyning, then Lord Deputy, caused an Act to pass in the Irish Parliament, whereby all Laws and Statutes, which were made in England before that time, were to be entertained and stand in force as the Laws of Ireland. On which foundation they have raised many Superstructures both of Law and Government, enacted in their own Parliaments, summoned by the Lord Deputy at the Kings appointment: in which, by another Statute made in the time of the said Poyning, the people are enabled to make Laws for their own good Governance, conditioned they were first transmitted to the Court of England to be considered of by the King, before they were Voted to in either of the Houses of the Irish Parliaments. Which Laws commonly called Poyning's Laws, have hitherto continued in force amongst them; though the last much stomacked and repined at; not only as a badge of their Subjection to the Crown of England, but as a Curb or Martingale to hold them in.

Yet

Ireland.

Yet notwithstanding these good Laws, and the ample power of their Commission, the Lord Deputies could never absolutely subdue the Island, or bring the people to any civil course of life; the Fathers inflicting an heavy curse on all their posterity, if ever they should sow corn, build houses, or learn the English tongue. To this indisposition of the Irish themselves, let us adde the defects of the Kings of England, and Irish Deputies, in matters of civil policy, as I find them particularized by Sir John Davies, in his worthy and pithy discourse of this Subject. I will only glean a few of them. First then saith he, a barbarous Countrey is like a field over-grown with weeds, which must first be well broken with the Plough, and then immediately sown with good and profitable seed: so must a wilde and uncivil people, be first broken and ploughed up by war, and then presently sown with the seed of good Laws and discipline; lest the weeds revive in the one, and ill manners in the other. Here then was the first defect in our English Kings, not to tame and take down the Stomachs and pride of this people, though either civil or torain wars perhaps occasioned this neglect: and also the Irish Deputies, who at such times as the people upon a small discomfiture, were crest-fallen, neglected the keeping of them by severity of discipline. The second oversight concerneth particularly our Kings, who gave such large possessions and Regalities unto the first Conquerors, that the people knew no Authority in a manner, above their own immediate Lords. The Laws of England were not indifferently communicated to all the Irish, but to some particular Families and Provinces only: inasmuch as there were but five great Lords of the natural Irish, who had the benefit and protection of the Laws of England, that is to say, O Neel in Ulster, O Connabor in Connaught, Mac Morrough in Leinster, O Malaghlin in Meth, O Brian in Tivernon; known by the name of Quingue Sanguines in some old Records. By means whereof the rest of the people being in the condition of Out-laws, or at the best of Aliens, had no encouragement either to build, or plant, or manure their Land, or to behave themselves as Subjects. A fourth defect was more particularly in the Deputies or Lords Lieutenants, who having made good and wholesome Laws against the barbarous customs of the Common people, and the merciless oppressions of the Lords, never put any of them in execution; as if they had been made for terror, not for reformation. Fifthly, adde unto these (which Sir John Davies hath omitted) the little care which was too often taken by the Kings of England in the choyce of their Deputies: sometimes conferring that high Office as a Court-preference, without Relation unto the merits of the person; and sometimes sending men of weak or broken Fortunes, who attended more their own profit than their Masters service, and were more bent to fleece than to feed this flock. Sixthly, And yet besides these Errors of the Kings and Deputies in point of Government, there was another, and as great in the Planters themselves: who building all their Forts and Castles in the open Countreys, abandoned the Woods and Bogs, and other Fastnesses to the natural Irish; the strength whereof not only animated them to Rebel upon all occasions: but served too fitly to continue them in their ancient Barbarism.

In these terms of wildness and non-subjection stood Ireland, till the later end of Queen Elizabeth's reign; at what time the rebellion of Hugh O Neel Earl of Tir-Oen had engaged almost all the Irish in that desperate action: which ending in the overthrow of that ingrateful Rebel, and all his partizans, not only crushed the overmuch powerableness of the Irish Nobility; but made the final and full conquest of the whole Nation. So true it is, that Every Rebellion when it is suppress, doth make the Prince stronger, and the Subjects weaker. Ireland thus broken and ploughed up, that glorious Queen died a victor over all her enemies, and left the sowing of it unto her successor King James, who omitted no part of a skilful Seed-man. Then there was an amnesia or Act of Oblivion made, whereby all the offences against the Crown were remitted, if by such a limited day the people would sue out their Pardons, and by the same Act, all the Irish were manumitted from the servitude of their Lords, and received into the Kings immediate protection. 1^{ly} The whole Kingdom was divided into Shires and Judges Itinerant appointed to circuit them: whereby it hath followed that the exactions of the Lords are laid aside, the behaviour of the people narrowly looked into, the passages before unknown unto our Souldiers, are laid open by our Under-Sheriffs and Bayliffs; and the common people seeing the benefit and security they enjoy by the English Laws, and loth to plead always by an Interpreter, begin to set their children to School, for the learning of the English tongue. 3^{ly} The Irish were not rooted out, as in the first plantation in Leinster, and the English only estated in their rooms; but were only removed from the woods, bogs, and mountains, into the plain and open Countrey; that being like wild trees transplanted, they might grow the milder, and bear the better fruit. And 4^{ly} whereas there was but one Freeholder in a whole Countrey, which was the Lord himself, the rest holding in Villenage, and being subject to the Lords immeasurable taxations; whereby they had no encouragement to build or plant; now the Lords Estate was divided into two parts, that which he held in demain to himself, which was still left unto him; and that which was in the hands of his Tenants, who had Estates made in their possessions, according to the Common course of England, paying in stead of uncertain Irish taxations, certain English rents: whereby the people have since set their minds upon repairing their houses, and manuring their lands, to the great increase of the private and publick Revenue.

But that which most advanced the reduction of Ireland to a settled and civil Government, and rooted it in a subjection to the Crown of England, was the voluntary flight of the Earls of Tyrone, and Tirconnelle, Sir John Odaughertie, and other great men of the North, possessed of large Territories and great Jurisdictions. Who being both incapable of Loyalty, and impatient of seeing the Kings Judges, Justices, and other Ministers of State, to hold their Sessions, and execute their Commissions of Oyer and Examiner, within the parts where they commanded: without more provocation, or the fear of any danger but a guilty Conscience, forsook the Countrey, and left their whole Estates to the Kings disposing. By whose directions, their Lands were seized upon and sold to several Purchasers, the City of

of London infeoffed in a great part of them, a great plantation made in Ulster of English, Welch, and Scots, by the united name of a British Plantation; and a new Order of Knights Baronets erected in the Kingdom of England for raising money to advance and indear the work. Which had it been as cordially affected by the English, as it was by the Scots; if more of this Nation had gone thither, and not abandoned so great a part of it to the power of the other, it had been better for both Kingdoms, in the conformity of each to one form of Government (which the Scots, being factious for another, did not easily brook) and the uniting of both people in the bonds of amity: the Irish looking on the Scot as a meer Intruder, but on the English as his old Master, or his Fellow-Subject. Howsoever, so great a part of the Country (and that which heretofore was the nest of the Rebels) being thus disposed of, it came to pass, that Ireland, which before served only as a grave to bury our best men, and a gulf to swallow our greatest treasures; being governed neither as a Country Free, nor conquer'd: was brought in some hope, by the prudence and policy of her last Kings, and late Lord Deputies, to prove an orderly Commonwealth; civil in it self, profitable to the Prince, and a good strength to the British Empire. For to such Order it was reduced, in a little time, that the waysfarer men might travel without danger, the Ploughman walk without fear, the Laws administered in every place alike, the men drawn unto Villages, the Woods and Fastnesses left to beasts; and all reduced to that civility, as our Fathers never saw, nor could we well fangle out of ancient Histories.

The Revenues of this Kingdom are said by Walsingham, in the time of Edward the 3^d, to have been yearly 40000 pounds; but his successors, till of late, have scarce got so much as the keeping of it cost them: King Richard the second being by the same Walsingham reported to have spent 30000 marks out of his own purse, over and above the money which he received thence. Whether this Country were so profitable to Edward the third, or no, I determine not, though I finde good reasons to persuade me, that Walsingham was not well acquainted with the state of that Exchequer. But sure I am that the Revenues of the Crown are more than double what they were in the said Kings reign, and more duely paid into the Exchequer of that Kingdom than ever formerly; the profits of the Custom-house amounting to 30000 per Annum, in the last year of King James his Reign. Not to say any thing of the great improvements which were made by the Earl of Strafford, in the time of his Government, because they fell together with him.

The strength of this Kingdom consisteth partly in the situation of it, begirt about with difficult and dangerous Seas; partly in the many Castles first built and fortified by the English Planters; and partly in a standing Army continually kept up by the Kings of England, for defence of their hold and interests against the Rebellions of the Natives. What Forces it is able to raise both of Horse and Foot, could never be conjectured at till now of late. For formerly the Kings of England being actually possessed only of those four Counties which they called the Pale, that is to say, the Counties of Dublin, Louth, Kildare, and Meath (which last hath since the time of King Henry the 8th been subdivided into three) were not able to raise any great power out of that Estate, but were forced to send Souldiers out of England (as occasion was) to preserve their Sovereignty in Ireland. The greatest Levy which I read of, was that of 1500 Irish, led by the Prior of Kilmáinham to King Henry the fifth, then being at the siege of Harfleur in Normandy. And on the other side, the great Lords of the natural Irish, and degenerate English, being divided into factions amongst themselves, and never joyned in any one principle of common interests; were more inconsiderable, than the weak but united Forces of the Kings of England. And though most of them at the last, were drawn into a confederacy with the Earl of Tir-Oen, to make good his rebellion: yet finde I not that their Army did exceed at any time, the number of 8000 men; and those not well appointed neither. So that the best estimate which can be made of the Forces of Ireland, must be measured by the Armies raised in the late Rebellion, when the Irish had both time, and leisure, to get themselves some reputation in the World, and make provision for a War. In prosecution of which, he who considers the many Armies they have raised, since their first mustering under the command of Sir Phelim O'Neal; the many defeats which have been given them, and those as many new recruits after each defeat; all of them raised out of the bodies of their own people, without supply from other Countries (besides such as have served against them for the King): must needs conclude that they want not men enough for service; nor skill, nor courage to attempt the most difficult enterprises.

The Arms of Ireland are Azure, an Harp Or, stringed Argent. Which Coat, King James, (to shew himself the first absolute King of Ireland) first caused to be marshalled with the Royal Arms of Great Britain.

The LESSER ISLANDS.

AND now we come at last to the LESSER ISLANDS, dispersed in several parts of the British Ocean. The chief whereof are, 1 The Orkades, 2 Schetland, 3 The Hebrides, 4 Man, 5 Anglesey, 6 The Islands of the Severn Sea, 7 The Sorlinges, or Isles of Silly, 8 Wight, 9 Thanet, 10 Sunderland, 11 Holy Island.

I. THE ORCADES or Isles of Orkney are in number 32, situate over against Cathness, the most Northern Country of all Scotland; and separate from one another by some narrow Straights. The soil indifferently fruitful, exceedingly well stored with Barley, and great Herds of Cattel; plentiful in Hares and Conies, as of Cranes and Swans: but destitute of Wheat, and unfurnished both of woods and trees. But their chief commodity is their Fish, which the inhabitants catch upon the coasts in great abundance. Those of most note in all the cluster, are, 1 Meib, conceived to be the Oecia of Plolomy: as 2 Fair Isle, on good reason thought to be the Dumna of Pliny; the chief Town of it being still called by the name of Dumna. 3 Hey, taken or mistaken for the Dumna of Pliny, but not else observable. 4 Pomona, the chief of all, in length about 26 miles, in breadth, where it is broadest, six. The chief Town of it Kirkwall, honored with a Bishop's See, and strengthened with two Castles. This Island is well stored with Tin and Lead, and is at this day by the Inhabitants called Mainland.

The people of these Isles (according to Maginnus) are great drinkers, but no drunkards; Uibacsimi sunt incolae, nunquam tamen inebriantur. They use the Gothish Language, which they derive from the Norwegians, in whose possession they once were; and of whose qualities they still retain some smack. The Isles themselves in the time of Solinus were not inhabited, being then overgrown with rushes; (now in a measure, populous and fertile, as before was said) and were first discovered by Julius Agricola, the first that ever sailed about Britain. In later times they were possessed by the Normans or Norwegians, who held them till the year 1266; when Magnus King of Norway surrendered them up to Alexander King of Scotland, which surrendry some of the succeeding Kings did afterwards ratifie: the claim hereto being finally relinquished by Christiern the first, King of Denmark and Norway, on the marriage of his Daughter Margaret with King James the third, An. 1474. some money being added to make good the contract, without which the Danes would not forgo their pretensions to them.

II. Two days sailing North of these Orkades, lyeth SCHETLAND, an Island belonging to the Crown of Scotland: and is by many learned men, upon very good reasons, supposed to be the Thule of the Antients. For first, it standeth in the 63 degree of latitude, in which Plolomy placed Thule. 2ly It lieth opposite to Bergen in Norway; against which Pomponius Mela hath seated it. And 3ly Cassper Bencersius hath observed, that this Schetland is by Mariners called Thylenfyll; a name in which that of Thule is apparently couched. That Isle-land was not Thule (as most say) we shall shew you when we come to Norway, and the Northern Islands. Here we add only, that the Antients did report many strange things of it, and some of them beyond all belief. Pliny affirming that they had no day here for all the winter (nulli per brumam dies, as his own words are): with whom agree Solinus and many others, as to that particular. Isidore adds (Orig. lib. 14. c. 6.) nullum ultra eam diem esse, that beyond this Isle there was no day in any place; as if here had been the end of the world and nature. But Pytheas in Polymius goes beyond them all, reporting that in this Isle there was no distinction of Earth, Air, and Water: ἀναρρηγνυμένη ἡ τῆς γῆς, ἀναρρηγνυμένη ἡ τῆς ἀέρος, ἀναρρηγνυμένη ἡ τῆς ὕδατος, but a confused mixture of all together, like the primitive Chaos of the Poets. The reason of which strange reports, was the audaciousness of those who had seen the Island, and thought that whatsoever they said of it would not be disproved, because of the remoteness of it from more civil Countries. So truly and judiciously spoken was that of Symenius, a right learned Prelate, ἡ δὲ θύλη οὐδὲν ἔστιν ἄλλο, ἢ ἀπίστευτος ἀντιφάσις ἀντὶ τῆς ἀποστασίας. Thule (saith he) gave those who had failed unto it, the opportunity of lying without control. An opportunity which many of our Mariners and vulgar Travellers have made too much use of in these last times also.

III. THE HEBRIDES, HEBUDAE, or Western Islands, situate on the West of Scotland, are in number about 44. The chief whereof, 1 Ila, 24 miles long, and 16 in breadth; plentiful in Wheat, Cattel, and herds of Deer. 2 Jona, famous for the Sepulchres of the old Scottish Kings; whose chief Town is Sodore, once a Bishop's See, called hence Sodorensis; his jurisdiction comprehending these Islands with the Isle of Man; his See erected by Pope Gregory the 4th, An. 840. or thereabouts. His dwelling for the most part in the Isle of Man, as the wealthier and more pleasant part of his Diocese; till the conquest of it by the English; at what time those of the Western Islands, withdrew themselves from his obedience, and had a Bishop of their own: both of them for a long time called Sodorensis; but at last this took the name of Infulanus, Bishop of the Isles, which he still retains. 3 Mela, by Plolomy called Maleot, (that of Ila before-mentioned being his Epidia) mountainous and hilly, but affording good mines of Lead and Copper; 23 miles more in compass than that of Ila. 4 Lewis, or Levis, the largest of all the Hebrides, said to be 60 miles in length, and 30 in breadth, the more Western of the two Ebudaes the spoken of by Plolomy: the other being now called Skye, famous for the multitude of Sea-Calves in the Creeks thereof. 6 Racine, the Reclina of Plolomy, the smallest of the Hebrides, and most near to Ireland. The rest of less note, nor known, or not inhabited in the time of the Romans, and not very well peopled at the present, I forbear to name: some of them rather Rocks than Islands, others scarce having grass enough to hide their bareness. The people of them all, as well in language as behaviour, resemble femble the wild-Irish, and are called Redbanks: a people, as King James affirmeth in his Basilican Dow, utterly rude, and without all show of Civility; such as endure not to be governed by Laws, or kept under by Discipline. Legum severitate, & judiciorum metu, se alligari non possunt. faith judicious Camden. Such as they are, they came unto the Crown of Scotland by a contract betwixt Magnus King of Norway, and King Alexander the third: the Orcades being bargained for at the same time also.

South of the Hebrides, in the Bay of Dunbritton Frith, lieth the Isle of Rothsey (now called Bute) which gives the title of a Duke to the Prince of Scotland: and the Isle of Arran, which gives the title of an Earl, to the chief of the Hamiltons.

IV. MAN is situate just over against the Southern part of Cumberland, from which it is distant 25 miles; and was judged to belong to Britain rather than to Ireland, because it fostered venomous Serpents brought hither out of Britain. By Protolomy it is called Monæda, or the further Monæda, to difference it from that which we call Anglesey; by Pliny, Monabia; Menavia, by Oroscus and Beda; Enbonia, by Gildas an old British Writer. The Welch at this day call it Menaw, the Inhabitants Maning, and the English Man. It is in length 30 miles, in breadth 15, and 8 in some places. The people hate theft, and beggling; and use a Language mixt of the Norwegian and Irish tongues. The soyl is abundant in Flax, Hemp, Oats, Barley, and Wheat; with which they use to supply the defects of Scotland, if not the Continent itself, yet questionless the Western Isles, which are a member of it. For thus writeth the Reverend Father in God John Mericke late Bishop of this Island, in a letter to Mr. Camden, at such time as he was composing his most excellent Britannia. Our Island (saith he) for cattel, for fish, and for corn, hath not only sufficient for its self, but sendeth also good store into other Countreies: Now what Countreies should need this supply (England and Ireland being aforehand with such provision) except Scotland, or some members thereof, I see not.

Venerable Bede numbered in it 300 Families, and now it is furnished with 17 Parish Churches. The chief Towns are, 1 Balachri, and 2 Ruffin, or Castle-Town, the seat of a Bishop, who though he be under the Archbishop of York, yet never had any voice in the English Parliament. In this Island is the hill Scaful, where on a clear day one may see England, Scotland, and Ireland: here also are bred the Soland Geese, of rotten wood falling into the water. This Island was taken from the Britans by the Scots, and from them regained by Edwin King of Northumberland. Afterwards the Norwegians seized on it, and made it a Kingdom; the Kings hereof ruling over the Hebrides, and some part of Ireland. From them taken by Alexander the 3d of Scotland, by a mixt title of Arms and purchase. After which time it was sometimes English, sometimes Scottish, as their fortunes varied; till in the end, and about the year 1340. William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, descended from the Norwegian Kings of Man, won it from the Scots, and sold it to the Lord Scrope; who being condemned of Treason, Henry the fourth gave it to Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland; but he also proving false to his Sovereign, it was given to the Stanleys, now Earls of Darby.

in effect, though but Lord in title, as having here all kind of Civil power and jurisdiction over the inhabitants under the Feife and Sovereignty of the Crown of England; together with the nomination of the Bishop, whom he presents unto the King for his Royal assent, then to the Archbishop of York for his consecration. And this I take to be the reason why the Bishop of Man was no Lord of Parliament, none being admitted to that honor, but such as held immediately of the King himself; nor was it reason that they should.

V. ANGLESEY, is an Island situate in the Irish Sea, over against Carnarvonshire in North-Wales, from which it is divided by a narrow Straight, which they call the Mena. By the Britans themselves, as by the Welch at this day, it was called Mon, from whence the Romans had their Monæ: but being conquered by the English, it obtained the name of Anglesey, as one would say, the Island of the English Men, (eye in the Saxon language signifying an Island.) A place of such a fair revenue to the Princes of it, that Llewellen the last Prince of Wales being stripped of almost all the rest of his Estates by King Edward the first, paid to that King a tribute of 1000 per Annum for this Island only.

And to say truth, the Island is exceeding fruitful both in Corn and Cattle; from whence the Welch are liberally stored with both: and therefore it is said Proverbially, Mon Mam Cymri, that Anglesey is the Mother of Wales. In length from East to West, about 20 miles, and 17 in breadth. Containing in that compass 74 Parishes, divided into six hundreds, and hath in it only two Market Towns: that is to say, 1 Beaumaris, seated on a flat or marshy ground, near the Menai, built by King Edward the first to secure his Conquest: by whom well walled and fortified as the times then were. 2 Newburg, a Town of no great antiquity, as the name doth intimate, by the Welch called Rosfur: in former times it had an Haven of some good receipt, but now choaked with sand. The other places of most note are, 3 Aberffraw, a small village now, but heretofore the Royal seat of the Kings of Wales: and 4 Holyhead, seated on a head-land or Promontory thrusting into the Sea, made holy (or thought so at least) by the religious retirement of Saint Kathy, or Kibina, one of the Disciples of St. Hilarie of Poitiers; from whence by the Welchmen called Catr Cuby: of most note for the ordinary passage betwixt Wales and Ireland. Antiently this Island was the seat of the Druides, and brought with no small difficulty under the power of the Romans, by Suetonius Paulinus: the people fighting in other parts of Britain, for their liberty only; but here pro Aris & focis too, for their Religion, Liberty, and their Gods to boot: Being deferred by the Romans with the rest of Britain, it remained in the possession of its own natural Princes, till the fatal period of that State; when added to the Crown of England by the puissance of King Edward the first, by whom made one of the shires of Wales, as it still continues.

Not far from Anglesey, somewhat inclining to the South, is the Isle of Bardsey, by Protolomy called Edri, by Pliny Adros, by the Welch Enlhy; extending towards the East with a rocky Promontory, but rich and fruitful towards the West: the retiring place of many godly and devout Hermits in the former times. Southwards from hence, and over against St. David's, are two other Islands, the one called Selame, plentiful of wild honey; the other named by the Welch Lymen, by the English Ramsfey; thought to be the Limni of Protolomy, the Silimum of Pliny, but not else remarkable.

VI. THE ISLANDS OF THE SEVERN SEA are four in number; of no great note, but I must take them in my passage to the Isles of Silly. Of those the first is Flat-Holm; for the flat and level; the 2 Steholm, from the steep and craggie disposition of it: both by the Welch called Echni, and both situate over against the County of Somerset. More towards the opening of the Channel, lyeth the Isle of 3 Chaldey, called by the Welchmen Inis Pir, of as small note as the other: and at the very mouth thereof the Isle of 4 Lunder, over against Devonshire, the principal Island of this Sea: extending two miles every way; of excellent pasturage, well stored with Conies, and great plenty of Pigeons. Situate a good distance from any part of the land, in the midst of the salt and brackish Ocean, and yet yieldeth many Springs of Fresh-Water for the use of the people; inhabiting for the most part in a Town of the same name with the Island. A place of very great strength and safety; begirt about with dangerous unapproachable Rocks; and having but one way of access into it, and that so narrow that two men cannot go a breadth.

VII. The Isles of SILLY, in number 145, are situate over against the most Western Promontory of Cornwall, from which distant 24 miles; and lie round together in the manner of a ring or Circle. Discovered first by the Silures, a Phœnician Colony in Spain, opposite against which they lie; thence called Silures by Solinus: much traded and referred to by the said Phœnicians from the Isle of Gades; invited thereunto by the unexhaustible Mines of Tinne, which they found amongst them. A Trade so great and gainful to them, that they held it a great point of State: ἀντίπρὸς ἑαυτοῖς ἵσταντο, to keep it as a secret from all the world, as we find in Strabo: who adds the story of a Carthaginian or Phœnician Merchant, incountried in his voyage hither by some Roman Vessels; and splitting his ship on the next shore (where he knew the Romans would not follow him) rather than let them know to what place he was bound; rewarded for his honest care, and recompensed for the loss of his ship and goods, out of the publick Treasury. From this abundance of Tinne, the Gracians when they came to know them, called them Cassiterides: (Cassiteros in that language signifying Tinne) accordingly Herodotus ἐν τῷ θύρῳ ἵστα Κασσιτερίδας ἵσταντο ἐν τῷ δὲ Κασσιτερίῳ ἵσταντο, affirming that he knew not those Islands called Cassiterides, from whence Tinne was brought. The richness of this commodity, the pleasures of the place, and the Western situation of them; makes many of the Gracians call them the Hesperides: mistaking them for the Fortunate Islands. By Solinus they are called Silures, as before is said, Sigdeles in the corrupt Copies of Antoninus; in Sile Silina, by Severus Sulpitius, from whence we have the name of the Isles of Silly. The Flemings, I know not why, call them the Sorlings. All of them very fruitful in Corn and Herbage, besides the treasures hid within: well stored with Conies, Cranes, Swans, and most sorts of wilde Fowl. Ten of them

King James descending from the eldest Daughter of Henry the 7th, both by Father and Mother, on the expiring of the Line of Henry the 8th, in the person of Queen Elizabeth of famous memory; was the next heir to the Crown of England, and was accordingly with all joyful acclamations proclaimed and acknowledged King in the City of London, March 24. Anno 1602. (according to the account of the Church of England) A learned and Religious Prince, a true Defender of the Faith, a Nursing Father of the Church, and a lover of learning. He dyed at Theobalds, March, 27. 1625. having reigned 23 years, and four dayes over.

1625 2 Charles, second Son of King James, and of Anne of Denmark, (his elder Brother Henry dying long before) the 63^d King in descent from Cerdick King of the West-Saxons; the 45th King of England, in descent from Egbert; the 24th from the Norman Conqueror; the 64th Monarch of the English, and the second Monarch of Britain. In the beginning of his reign he married the Princess Henrietta Maria, Daughter to Henry the 4th, and Sister to Lewis the 13th, French Kings; by whom blest with a Royal Issue of Sons and Daughters.

As for the Forces and Revenues of these British Monarchs we cannot put the estimate of them in a better way, than by laying together that which hath been delivered of each several part; out of which Items the summatotalis of the whole both in power and treasure, will be easily gathered. For though these Monarchs never had any occasion, to muster and unite the Forces of their several Kingdoms upon any one Action, yet by considering what they have been able to do divided; we may conclude of what they may do, if need be, being now united. And so we are to do in marshalling the Arms of the British Monarchy, which are 1 Quarterly France and England, 2^{ly} Scotland, 3^{ly} Ireland, the fourth as the first. I shut up this discourse of the British Empire, with those words of Scripture (the Motto of another of King James his Coins) QVÆ DEVS CONJUNXIT NEMO SEPARET.

BELGIUM.

Having pursued the fortunes of the Roman Empire through the 4 Western Dioceses or Divisions of it, wholly subdued to the command of that conquering State: let us next look on those Countries which lay further North, and either never felt the force of the Roman Armies, or were but conquered in part; or else were reckoned as the members of some greater Province. Of this last sort was all that tract which is now called Belgium, or the Netherlands, bounded on the East with Westphalen, Gulick, Cleve, and the land of Triers, Provinces of the Higher Germany; on the West, with the main Ocean, which divides it from Britain; on the North, with the River Emse, which parts it from East-Friesland; on the South, with Picardie and Champagne, two French Provinces; upon the South-east, with the Dukedom of Lorraine.

By

By the Latines (especially of these last times) it is called Belgium, from the Belge, the most potent people of all these parts; and sometimes also Germania Inferior or the Lower Germany, (in the same sense as by the English it is called the Low Countries and the Netherlands) from their low situation; and the conformity which they have with the Germans in Laws, Languages, Customs and Manners. By some it hath been called by the aggregate name of the seventeen Provinces, from the like number of several and distinct Estates united under the command of the King of Spain. The more peculiar name is Flanders, which though but one of the 17 Provinces, hath yet given denomination to all the Netherlands; the people of which were once generally called by the name of Flemmings; and that either for the power of that Province, in regard of the others; or by reason of the great trade and traffick formerly driven at the Fairs or Marts of Bruges (a Town thereof) by the Merchants of all parts of Europe; or in respect that lying nearer then the rest to France, Spain, Italy, and England, that name was better known, and took notice of. But this was when the whole Country was under the command of many Princes, of which the Earls of Flanders were esteemed most potent. And though this name continued also after the incorporating of most of these Provinces in the house of Burgundy, at which time they were called the Estates of Flanders: yet since the falling off of Holland, and the rest of the United Provinces from the Kings of Spain, it hath lost this honour; the name of Flanders being now restrained within narrower bounds.

But for the name of Belgium, though I find that name most current amongst the Latines of this age, yet I see little reason for it. For first, old Belgium contained in it many fair and large Estates, which are not now within the compass of these Belgick Provinces; that is to say, the Dukedoms of Lorraine, Berg, Juliers, and great part of Cleve; the Bishopricks of Triers, Meitz, and Colen; and so much of the Kingdom of France, as takes up all Picardy, with parts of Champagne, and of France specially so called. Secondly, Gallia Belgica extended somewhat further yet, comprehending a great part of the Lower Palatinate, all Elzets, the whole County of Burgundy, and so much of Switzerland, as lyeth on the French side of the Rhene. And thirdly, the whole Provinces of West-Frisland, Groning, Over-ysel, Zutphen, together with all North-Holland, and so much of Guelderland, and Utrecht, as lieth on the further side of the middle Channel of the Rhene, were never accounted of as parts of either Belgium, or of Gallia Belgica, (though now within the compass of the Belgick Provinces) but as parts of Germany; clearly without the limits of the ancient Gaul, of which body Belgium was a limb or member in the Roman estimate.

As for the Belge, from whence we have the names of Belgium, and Gallia Belgica, they were originally Germans, who driving out the Gauls, planted themselves within the Rhene: esteemed by Caesar to be the valiantest of the Gallick Nations for these three reasons; First they were the farthest from Provence, where the Roman civililities, and more affable course of life was embraced. Secondly, they dwell on a Sea not then frequented by Merchants; and so wanted those allurements to effeminacy, which are in Countries of traffique. And thirdly, they bordered on the Germans, a warlike Nation; with whom they were continually in arms. This people seeing the prosperous success of Caesar's victories in Gaul, joyntly together in a League, and mustered an Army of 260000 fighting men against him. But seeing they could not draw him out of his Fortresses, they retired again, and that in such disorder, that three Legions, (for no more was Caesar's Army) put them to an infinite slaughter. After this Caesar fighting against them severally, overcame them all; and made their Country, and the Country of the Bordering Germans, whom he also vanquished, subject unto the Roman Empire. By Constantine the Great made part of the Diocese of Gaul, and by him cast into four Provinces, that is to say, 1 Belgica Prima, containing the Dukedom of Lorraine, and the land of Triers, the Metropolis whereof was Triers; 2 Belgica Secunda, comprehending Artois, Picardy, and the Country of Chambray, with parts of Champagne and France Special, of which the Metropolis was Rhemus; 3 Germania Prima, comprehending Alsacia, part of the Palatinate, and the Bishoprick of Meitz, the Metropolis City of which Province; and 4 Germania Secunda, containing Cleveland, Brabant, Guelderland, Utrecht, Holland, Zeland, Flanders, Hainault, Namur, Luxembourg, Limbourg, and the land of Colen; which last was honoured with the title of Metropolitan. 5 Maxima Sequanorum, so called of the Sequani, the old Inhabitants thereof, containing the whole County of Burgundy, and so much of Switzerland as lieth on the French side of the Rhene, of which Besuncon was the mother City. But at this time none of the Provinces above specified are comprehended under the account and name of Belgium, but such as were possessed in these later ages, by the house of Burgundy; some petty Signeuries and Estates, which properly do belong to Germany, being added to it; that is to say, the Lordship of West-Frisland given to the Earls of Holland by Charles the Bald, the Earldom of Zutphen, united unto that of Guelderland by Earl Otto of Nassau; and finally the Estate of Groning, Over-ysel, and some part of Utrecht, by Charles the fifth. Under which name and notion, we do now consider it.

And taking it according to this name and notion, it is in compass 1000 Italian, or 250 German miles: and is situated in the Northern Temperate Zone, under the 7, 8, & 9 Climates: the longest day in the midst of the 7 Climate where it doth begin, being 16 hours; in the beginning of the 9 Climate increased to 16 hours three quarters, or near 17 hours. The Air in these later days grown more wholesome then formerly; partly by the wonderful increase of the Inhabitants, and partly by the incredible industry of the people: who by draining the Marshes, and converting the standing waters into running streams, have purged the air of many gross and unhealthy Vapours; which did thence usually arise in times foregoing.

The

The Country is very populous, containing well nigh three millions of souls, the men being for the most part well proportioned, great lovers of our English Beer, unmindfull both of good turns and injuries: of good wit for inventing, and of a most indefatigable industry for perfecting the rarest Manufactures. For unto them we are indebted for the making of Cloth, which we learnt of the Flemmings; as also for Arras hangings, Dornix, Clocks, Watches, and the perfection of the Marinets Compass. They restored Musick, and found out divers Musical Instruments, being naturally good Musicians; and generally so given unto it, and so perfect in it, that therefore (till the Art of Musick grew more common) there were not many great mens houses, which had them not to teach their Children. To them belongeth also the invention of Chariots, the laying on of colours with oyl, the working of Pictures in glasse, and the making of Worstedes, Saies, and Tapestries: the making of which and other Stuffs, being driven out of their Country by the Duke of Alva, they first taught the English. The women generally are of good complexion, well proportioned, especially in the leg and foot: honourers of virtue, active, and familiar. Both within doors and without, they govern all; which considering the natural desire of women to bear rule, maketh them too imperious and burdensome.

They use for the most part the German and Dutch Language, with a little difference in the Dialect. But in the Provinces adjoining to France, that is to say, Luxembourg, Namurce, Artois, Hainault, and some parts of Flanders, and Brabant, they use the French; but the same very corruptly and imperfectly by reason of that mixture which it hath of the Dutch or German; yet so, that one may easily discern those people to be French originally; or some remainder of the old Gauls, mastered by the French, but not rooted out: from their language or first original called to this day by the name of Wallons; the Germans usually changing G into W, as Warre for Guerre, Waerden for Guardians, and in the like case Waleet for Galleet. I know there is another Etymology of the name of Wallons, some making them to be of the Burgundian race; who at their first passing over the Rhene, enquired their way of the Country people in these words, Ou allons, i. e. Whither go we? which being oft repeated by them, occasioned them to be called Wallons: A trim invention doubtless, but of no solidity; nor to be further honoured with a constitution.

The Country in those parts which lie towards Germany, especially on the South-east bordering upon Cleveland and Lorraine, is somewhat swelled with hills, and overshadowed with woods; the reliques of the great Forrest of Ardenne, which once took up a great part thereof. But towards the West and North, where it joyns to the Sea, it is plain and levell, full of flats and marshes, affording very little corn; but abounding in pasturage, which yeelds a great increase of Butter and Cheese, good store of beeves; and herds of more then ordinary bigness. By reason of which low and levell situation, and the ill neighbourhood of a troublesome and unruly sea, it hath been formerly much subject to inundations; inasmuch as in the time of King Henry the 2d, Flanders was so overflowed, that many thousands of people, whose dwellings the Sea had devoured, came into England to beg new seats; and were by that King first placed in Yorkshire, and then removed to Pembrookshire. Since that, it hath in Zeland swallowed eight of the Islands, and in them 300 Towns and Villages: many of whose Churches and strong buildings, are at a dead low water to be seen. And as once Ovid said of Helice, and Barris, Cities of Achaea; so may we of these;

Inclinata solent cum manibus oppida versis.*

That is to say,

The waters hide them, and the Sayers show
The ruin'd walls and steeples as they row.

The chief Commodities which they vent into other Countries, are Linnen, Scarlets, Worsted, Saies, Silks, Velvets, and the like rich Stuffs; together with great quantities of Armour, Ropes, Cables, Butter, Cheese, &c. Of which, excepting Cheese and Butter, there is nothing of the natural growth of the Country: the rest being Mannifattures, which they make out of such materials, as they fetch out of foreign Regions. But the Commodity which yeeldeth them most benefit is that of Fish; not caught upon their own coast neither, but either in the Northern seas, or the coast of England: the very Herring; which they catch on the shores England (to the no small dishonour of the English Nation) bringing them a revenue (besides what is pursued up by the Adventurers) of 440000 pounds per annum; and that of Codfish which they catch on the Coasts of Friesland, amounting to 150000 sterling yearly.

Captains of note and eminence it hath bred but few, the people living still of late in perpetual peace. The chief of those whose names have been transmitted to us, 1 Civillis, a Prince of the Batavians, for subtilty of wit compared to Hannibal and Sertorius; of which in the long war against the Romans, in the time of Vespasian, he gave very good proof. In the middle times, 2 William Earl of Holland, elected Emperour of Germany; 3 Baldwin Earl of Flanders, Emperour of Constantinople; 4 Philip the good, and 5 Charles the Warlike, Dukes of Burgundy; 6 Charles the fifth, Emperour and King of Spain:

Spain: and of late times the Princes of the house of Nassau and Orange, transplanted hither in the Regency of Maximilian, out of higher Germany. And to say truth, their Genius doth not lie so much for land-service as it doth for the seas; in which they have been very famous, and not less fortunate. For of this nation was Oliver de Noort, the fourth that compassed the world; Jacob le Maire, the first discoverer of the Straight, or Fretum, which now beareth his name; besides divers others. And generally the people are so expert in Navigation, (especially those bordering on or near the coasts) that they seem born for and to the Seas: many of which being born on ship-board and bred up at sea, know no other Countrey; and brook the Land as ill, as a fish doth the dry ground. Which natural inclination to it, and the necessity they have of employing themselves that way, (the Countrey not being otherwise able to provide sustenance for those multitudes of men, which it doth abound with) hath so exceedingly increased their shipping; that it is thought that they are masters of more vessels of all sorts, taking one with another, then almost all the rest of Europe.

Scholars of note it had bred many. 1 Erasmus, the great restorer of learning in these parts of the World. 2 Justus Lipsius, as eminent a reviver of the Latin Elegancies. 4 Joseph Scaliger, the son of Julius, a man not to be followed in all parts of learning; but of equal arrogance: 4 Rodolphus Agricola. 5 Levinus Lemnius. 6, 7 Janus Douza, the Father and the Son. 8 Abraham Ortelius, and 9 Gerard Mercator, the Geographers. 11 Geo. Cassander, 12 Dr. James Harmin, 13 Gerard Vossius, eminent Divines, and 14 Hugo Grotius, of as great parts (but seasoned with more modesty and moderation) as the famous Scaliger. 15 Janfenius, and 16 Pamelius two right learned men, but of the Pontifical party.

As much unfortunate it hath been in some wretched Hereticks, in none more then in David George, born at Delfe in Holland who called himself Christ, and King immortal, flying from Delfe to Basil with his wife and children. An. 1545, he there taught his Doctrine, viz. 1 that the Law and gospel were his wife and children. 2 That he was not to restore the house of Israel by Death or Tribulation, but by love and grace of the Spirit. 3 That he had been till that present kept in a place unknown to all the Saints. And that this last point might obtraine the easier credit amongst the people, he bound his disciples, first to conceal his name, secondly not to reveal of what condition he had been: thirdly not to discover the Articles of the Doctrine to any man Basil without his permission. But for all this great care of his, within three dayes after his death (which hapned in the year 1556.) his Doctrines being made known were condemned by the Senate and Church of Basil, his goods confiscated, and his bones most deservedly taken up and burnt. Of somewhat less impiety, but of no less phrenzy was 2 John of Leyden (another Town of the same Province) who from a Taylor was made King of the Anabaptists, when they had ragged in Munster, and there we shall hear further of him. 3 Cappinus and 4 Quintinus both Flemmings, the joynt Authors and confounders of the Sect of the Libertines.

The Christian Religion was planted in several Provinces, by several men: in Holland, Zealand, and Friesland, by Willibrord an Engliskman, the first bishop of Utrecht; whence by degrees it gained on the rest of the Countrey: these being the first people of the Franks, or Germans, converted totally to the Gospel. In tract of time it fell from the primitive purity, participating of the Errors and Corruptions of the Church of Rome; from which when they desired to reclaim themselves, they were thereof in opposed by the King of Spain and his Ministers. Hence the beginning of the troubles; enlarged afterwards on pretence of civil rights, invaded and infringed by the Spaniards; affecting a more absolute Dominion over them, then their Laws admitted. At this time, as the Countrey doth stand divided betwixt the States and the Spaniards; so stands it with Religion also: the Spaniard permitting only the Religion of the Church of Rome, within the Provinces and Estates under his command; and the States general indulging the free use of all Religions (even the very Jews) but countenancing only that of the Reformed Churches, according to the Platform laid down by Calvin.

Chief Forests of this Countrey are, 1 that of Ardenne, which in the time of Cesar, extended from the banks of Rhene, as far as Tournay one way, and Champagne another way; and was in compass 500 miles, in the least accompt. In which circuit there were comprehended the Southern parts of Brabant, and Flanders, all Limbourg, Luxembourg, Luyckland, Namur, and Hainault; together with the land of Gullick in the higher Germany, as some Writers say. At this time, though the greatest of all Gullick neigick, it reacheth but from Leige to Theonville, 30 leagues in length: and yet not all that Woodlands neither, though within the Vierge of the Forest: there being much tillage and many Villages in that tract of ground; the principal of which is the Town of S. Hubert, situate almost in the midst of it. 2 Niepe, and 3 Nonnen, in the Earldom of Flanders; the first extending to the banks of the River Lis, the other coming up close to Ypres. 4 Pondsberg in the Confines of Hainault and Flanders, near unto Mount Gerrard: all them parts of this great Forest of Ardenne, which once overshadowed all this Countrey. 5 Normault in Hainault, in which is much Char-coal made; supposed for that reason to be a part of that Forest, which the old French called La Charboniere. 6 Etchierwald in Guelderland, near Arnhem, &c.

The chief Rivers are, 1 Rhene, which ariseth out of two springs in the Lepontian Alps, amongst the Grifons; united into one stream near Chur: thence passing by the Cities of Constance, Basil, Spire, Worms, Metz, and Colez, is again divided about the confines of Guelderland, into four branches or channels. Of which the first is called the Wael, which running through Guelderland by Nimwegen, and Bommel, loseth it self in the Maas: the second, which keeps the name of the Rhene, passeth by Arnhem, from thence thence in a contracted channell to Utrecht, and so through Holland unto Leiden: the third called the Leck, taketh his course through the Provinces of Utrecht, and Holland; and so into the sea betwixt Dort, and Roterdam; and the fourth called the Ysel, which passing by the towns of Zutphen and Deventer betwixt Guelderland, and Over-Ysel, emptieth it self into the Ocean, near Amsterdam. And of these branches I have given the exacter reckoning; partly because the course of that famous River is otherwise not easie to be observed; and partly because the knowledge of a great part of these Provinces dependeth on the knowledge of the course of this River: it being the middle branch of the Rhene (that which goeth by Leiden) which antiently divided Germany from Gallia Belgica. A River of such reputation in the antient times, that into it the old Belge used to cast the children which they suspected to be Illegitimate: for were they born of lawfull bed, they floated on the waters; if of an unlawfull, they sank immediately. Whereunto Claudian alluding saith, Nascentes explorat gurgite Rhenus. But the great searcher of Antiquities, Verstegan, is of opinion, that thereby they only inured their children to hardness, and made tryall of their strength; adultery being rarely found among them; and so these kindes of experiments needless. 2 Mosa, the Maas, as the Dutch, or the Meuse as the Frenchmen call it, which springing from the mountaines of Vange, in the confines of Lorraine, and not far from the fountains of the Seine, and Marne, runneth through Lorraine, Luxembourg, Luyckland, and Namur; from thence by Ruremond, and Venlo, two known Towns of Guelderland, where turning towards the West, it taketh in a part of the Rhene, and from thence passing by Maestricht, divides Brabant from Holland; watering the Town of Grave in the one, and of Dort, in the other; and falleth into the sea not far from Bril, with so great a violence, that the waters of it for a long space do continue fresh. 3 Emis, in Latine called Amisus, dividing the two Frislandi; of which more in Germany. 4 Scaldit, which arising in Picardy, and running through Artois, and between Hainault and Brabant, meeteth with the sea a little above Antwerp. And 5 Lis or Ley, which runneth quite through Flanders. Besides which Rivers, and others of inferior note (which we shall meet withall in their proper places) here are great store of lakes, pools, and marishes; which do both fortifie the Countrey, and provide it of fish: besides many navigable channels, made by the hand of man; from one River to another, for the convenience of passage, and the more easie transport of their commodities.

The shore of this Countrey hath been much worn out by the Sea; especially that of the Islands of Zeland, and such as lye scattered about Holland; where they are defended with banks and ramparts, painfully made, and chargeably maintained. These banks are about ten ells in height, and twenty five in breadth at the bottom. They are made of the hardest clay that may be gotten; in the inside stuffed with wood and stone, on the outside covered with mats strong and thick made.

The former Inhabitants were divers, and were as differently disposed of in their several Countreys; that is to say, the Attrebates in the greatest part of Artois, the Morini in the rest of Artois; and those parts of Flanders, which make up the Imperial and Dutch Flanders; the Nervi in Hainault; Namur, and Flanders Gallicant; the Batavi in South-Holland, and so much of Guelderland, and Utrecht; as lies on the South-side of the Rhene, with the Menapii, intermixt in the Dukedom of Guelders, the Mattiaci in the Isles of Zeland, the Aduatic, and part of the Tongri in the Dukedom of Brabant; with parts of the Treveri in Luxembourg, and of the Eburones in Luyckland, and the Dukedom of Limbourg; all which were Belgick Nations, and therefore antiently accompted of as parts of Gallia. Then on the Northern side of the middle channell of the Rhene, there dwelt the Frisi Minores in North-Holland, and so much of the Dittricht of Utrecht, as lies on the further side of that channell; the Frisi Majores in West-Friseland, and the State of Groning; some parts of the Sicambri in the Earldom of Zutphen, and the rest of Guelderland, with part of the Bructeri in Over-Ysel: all German Nations, and properly not within the reckoning of Gallia Belgica. Those which passed under the accompt and name of Belge, being subdued, together with other Tribes of that numerous Nation, by the valour and good fortune of Julius Caesar; continued subject to the Romans, without any notable disturbance unto their affaires, but the Rebellion raised against them by Crisis Prince of the Batavians; in the time of Vespasian. In the declining of the Empire, they were possessed by the French, under whom they made a part of the Kingdom of Metz, or Ostentrich; united by Childerick the third, to the rest of France; and made a member of that Kingdom: as they continued till the time of Lewis the Godly, son of Charles the Great, in the division of whose Empire amongst his Children, the Countreys of Flanders and Artois being laid to France, the residue of these Countreys on this side of the Rhene made up a special part of the Kingdom of Lorraine. Those on the further side of the middle channell of that River, being German Nations, gained to the vast Empire of the French by Charles the Great, in the division of the spoil spoken of before, fell to the share of Lewis surnamed the Antient, the first King of Germany, and after his decease to his Successors in that Estate, whether Kings or Emperours; and so we have the whole divided betwixt the three great Kings of France, Lorraine, and Germany; by what means subdivided into lesser parcels, (no fewer then nineteen in all) we shall see anon.

In the mean time we are to know, that in the beginning of the French conquests in the rest of Gallia, there started up in Belgica two great Estates, founded by Auberon, Regnault, and Ranchaire, Sons of Clodion, the second King of the French: who being disinherited of their Fathers Kingdom by Merove Master of his horse, to whose tuition and guardianship they had been committed, betook themselves to the most defensible places of the great Forest of Ardenne, and the Countreys on the banks being then unpeopled for fear of the Danes, who by their frequent Piracies did much vex those shores; and the inland Countries meanly planted, for want of corn and other necessities, for the life of man. Subject in part to the great Princes of Ardeane, till the discomfiture of Earl Brunniph by Dagobert sole King of the French. By whom about the year 621. this wild Countrey extending then as far as the River Seme, and comprehending besides Artois and Flanders, a good part of Picardy, was given unto one Lideric de Bucq; with the title of Forrester, to be holden under the Sovereign of that Crown. In whose posterity it continued with the title of Forresters, till the time of Baldwin the first, the son of Odoacer, the seventh of the Forresters, whose names occur upon record; there being a long intermission of their names and memories, during the ravagements and depredations of the Danes and Normans. This Baldwin having first ravished, and afterwards married Judith, sister to Charles the Bald, King of France and Emperour, was by him created Earl of Flanders, the Sovereignty thereof reserved as before it was: in whose issue it remained intire, till Philip the first Earl of that name, gave unto Philip Augustus King of France, the Countrey of Artois, with the Earldom or Countrey of Veromandois, parts of Picardy, in marriage with Isabel his Niece, daughter of Baldwin Earl of Hainalt. By Lewis the 8th son and successor of Philip Augustus, Artois was given in portion to his youngest son Robert, made the first Earl of Artois by King Lewis the 9. An. 1234. And by the marriage of Lewis the first of Flanders, with Margaret the heir of Artois, and of the Earldom of Burgundy, both these Estates were added unto this of Flanders, now made far mightier than before. And yet before this great accession of estate, it was accounted the prime Earldom, as Millain was the prime Dukedom of Europe: these Earls being privileged to write themselves Dei gratia, all others Dei clementia only; and Flanders being now grown abroad to so great esteem, that it was generally used for all the Netherlands. Finally, by the marriage of Margaret daughter of Lewis de Malain, Earl of Flanders, to Philip the Hardy Duke of Burgundy, this great estate became united to that house: and afterwards was conveyed unto that of Austria, as shall be shewn hereafter, in due time and place. In the mean season let us take a brief survey of

- 1323 23 Lewis, son of Lewis, and grandson of Robert the 3. in right of his mother, Earl of Rethel, in right of his Grandmother, Earl of Nevers; and of Flanders in right of his Father and Grandfather.
- 1347 24 Lewis de Malain, Earl of Flanders, Nevers, and Rethel, in right of his Father, and of Artois, and Burgundy in right of his Mother, whom he succeeded at her death, but the time I find not.
- 1369 25 Philip II. surnamed the Hardy, Duke of Burgundy, succeeded in the Earldoms of Flanders, Artois &c. in right of Margaret his wife, daughter and heir of Lewis de Malain, whom he married solemnly at Gaunt, Anno 1369. Of which Philip and his Successors in these Estates, we shall hereafter speak in a place more proper.
- 1331 5 Eudes, Duke of Burgundy, Earl of Burgundy and Artois in right of Joan his wife, the eldest daughter of Philip.
- 6 Philip, the only son of Eudes, in right of his mother Earl of Artois, and so called in his Father's life time.
- 1349 7 Philip III. son of Philip the 2. and Nephew of Eudes, Duke and Earl of Burgundy, and Earl of Artois, who died young, and without issue, Anno 1361.
- 1361 8 Margaret, daughter of Philip of France, and of Joan Countess of Artois and Burgundy, married to Lewis Earl of Flanders, &c. Succeeded Philip the 3. (being then a widow) in the Earldoms of Burgundy and Artois, Anno 1361.

The Arms of Flanders were Or, a Lion sable, langued and armed Gules. Those of Artois being Seme of Flower de Lycs Or, in a field Azure, a field of three Labels Gules, charged with as many Castles of the first.

4. HAINALT.

HAINALT is bounded on the East, with Namur; on the West, with Flanders; on the North, with Brabant; on the South, with Picardy and Champagne in France. It was antiently called Salini Carbonarius, from the abundance of Charcoal made in the woods and forests of it: by some writers of the middle times, the lower Picardy; by the Latin writers of these times called Hannonia; it seemeth to have taken this new name from the River Haine, or Hania; which passeth through it; and the word Hole signifying a wood, as being over-spread in a manner with the Forests of Normault, S. Amand, De Faing, and that of Poodberg. And then Hainalt will be quasi Haine-holt, i. e. a Countrey of Woods, and Forests on the River Haine. Thus called originally by the French (as the word importeth) but by the Dutch best known by the name of Hennegou; i. e. the Countrey bordering on the Haine, as the name signifieth in that language.

The length thereof is 60 miles, 48 the breadth; comprehending in that compass 950 Villages, and 24 towns; in and amongst which there is reckoned one Principate, 10 Earldoms, 12 Peerdoms, or Paprieries, 22 Baronies, 26 Abbeyes, one Lord Marshal, (besides other Officers of the Prince) descending by inheritance to the Lords of this Province.

The air hereof is very good, and the soil fruitful; by reason the Countrey is watered with so many Rivers, as the Scheld, the Sambre, the Dender, and several lesser streams, besides divers lakes, marshes, ponds, and pools, which do much enrich it; the Countrey abounding in most places with fresh Meadows and sweet Pastures, good fruits, and profitable trees, but especially with great plenty of corn. Here are also in some parts of it, notable Mines of iron and lead; and excellent quarries of the best stone, fit for all kind of buildings.

The principal of these towns are 1 Monti, situate at the confluence of Haine, and a little River called Trulle, which gives a good natural strength unto it: fortified besides with a very strong wall, three large deep ditches, and an ancient Castle. The town great, beautiful, and rich, adorned with sumptuous buildings both private and publick, and replenished with wealthy Merchants, and men of trade: the principal of all the Province, erected into an Earldom by Charles the Great, and sometimes used for the stile of the Earls of Hainalt. In this town is the noble Nunnery of St. Valdrade, once a Dutchess of Lorraine, the Nuns whereof are to be Ladies and Gentlewomen of noble families; in the morning apparelled in white, like Nuns; in the afternoons according to their birth and qualities; who when they please may leave the Cloyster, and be married. The Abbess hath both jurisdictions, in the Town and Countrey about it; and antiently did put the Earls of Hainalt into possession of the state. Another Nunnery like this (but not of such large revenues) there is at 2 Mauwaige on the Sambre, a good town of Merchandise. 3 Valenciennes seated on the Scheld, and a little River called Rouelle; which make not only in it many pleasant Isles, but pass almost under every mans house, to the great benefit and delight of the place and people. The site hereof so strong by nature, (besides the fortifications of Art) that on the one side it may be easily made unapproachable by water; and on the other sides so defended by hills, that it can hardly be besieged; but by three Armies at once. A goodly, large, and beautiful town, especially for publick buildings, the chief whereof are the Church of our Lady, built so it keeps them from idleness. And as for the Nobility, they are generally valiant, given to all military exercises fit for their degrees, and very affectionate to their Princes, the greatest virtue of a subject.

Walled Towns it hath but four, as before was said, that is to say, 1. Namur, the chief of all the Province, where resideth the Council for the Countrey, from which lieth no appeal but to Machlyn only. Seated between two hills on both sides of the Sambre, which doth there fall into the Meuse. The City rich, inhabited for the most part by the Nobility, defended with a strong Castle, and beautified with a fair Cathedral, founded here in the Church of S. Albin, Anno 1559. Not far off in the Villages of Ardenne and Monfieur, are two Nunneries of Ladies: like those of Montz and Mauluige spoken of in Hainault. 2. Bovines upon the Meuse, sacked by the French, Anno 1554. Since repaired and fortified. 3. Charlemont, a small Town, but of most exact Fortifications, built by Charles the 5th. Anno 1555. to oppose the French; who had then possessed themselves of Martemburg, a Town of Hainault. 4. Valencourt, a little Town, but standing in a goodly and fruitful Countrey. Of the Villages the chief is Dome, seated on the Meuse or Maes, fortified with a strong Castle, and honoured with the title of a Vicomte; 2. Flouren, 3. Vasle, and 4. Sauson, of much beauty and greatness.

The ancient Inhabitants of this countrey were a part of the Nervi; first made an Earldom by some of the descendants of the sons of Clodion, the second King of the French: who being dispossessed of their Fathers Kingdom by Meroveus, the Master of his horse (to whom he had committed the guardianship or tuition of them) were forced to betake themselves to the most defensible places of the great Forrest of Ardenne, and the parts adjoining, where they founded the great Earldoms of Ardenne and Moselle, as before is said. Divided in succeeding times into many parcels, of which this is one. By what and how many Earls possessed, I am yet to learn; the Estate being small, and consequently the Princes of it not much considerable. Allied to the Royal house of France by the marriage of Albert Earl hereof, with Irmengarde Daughter of Charles of France, the first Duke of Lorraine: and after unto the house of Flanders, by the marriage of N. the Daughter and heir of Peter the last Earl of that Race, to Henry second, son of Baldwin the 8th of Flanders, and brother of Baldwin Earl of Flanders, and the first Emperor of the Latines in Constantinople, whom he succeeded in that Empire. After whose death, it came by Yoland his Daughter to Peter Earl of Auxerre, who succeeded also in the Empire, and after his decease to Philip his younger son. But he deceasing without issue, and Robert his elder brother reigning in Constantinople, it was seized on by Philip the brother of Henry, who to assure himself thereof took to wife Mary daughter of Philip Augustus King of France. By a neece or Cousin of this Philip, conveyed in marriage to Henry Earl of Luxembourg, (the Father by a former wife of Henry the 7th, Emperor and Earl of Luxembourg) and finally brought back again to the house of Flanders by the marriage of Guy of Dampierre Earl of Flanders, with Isabel daughter of that Henry by the Heir of Namur. And in his issue it continued (for ought I can finde) till it was swallowed up, with the rest of the Belgick Provinces by the house of Burgundy: So that the highest we can go in search of the Earls of Namur, is to the time of Hugh Capet and Charles of Lorraine; which was 540 years after the coming in of the sons of Clodion. From which time downwards the succession is confused and broken; and towards the later end discontinued for 140 years. Such as are left upon Record, I have drawn together (not without much trouble) in as good Order as I could; and here present them in the ensuing Catalogue of

The Earls of Namur.

1. Albert, the Co-temporary of Hugh Capet, spoken of before.
2. Godfrey, the son of Albert, and Father of Alice wife of Baldwin the 5th of Hainault, and mother of Baldwin the 6th of Hainault, and the 8th of Flanders.
3. Peter, the son or brother of Godfrey.
4. Henry the second son of Baldwin the 8th of Flanders, in right of N. his wife, the heir of Peter Emp. of Constantinople also on the death of Baldwin the 9th, his elder Brother.
- 1216 5. Peter II. son-in-Law of Henry Emp. of Constantinople, and Earl of Namur.
- 6, 7. Philip the younger son of Peter, and John the elder brother of Henry, both taking to themselves the title of Earl of Namur, the one at Constantinople, the other in the Netherlands, and both deceasing without issue.
8. Philip II. brother of John and Henry, without issue also.
9. John II. surnamed of Dampierre, the 3 son of William of Dampierre, by Margaret

Countess of Flanders, daughter & heir of the Emp. Baldwin, succeeded by the gift of his Mother, challenging the disposing of it, as next heir of Philip the 2. or in the right Paramount of the Earldom of Flanders, enjoyed upon a better title by

10. Guy of Dampierre, Earl of Flanders, and elder brother of John the 2d. in right of Isabel his wife, daughter of Henry Earl of Luxembourg by the heir of Namur; but I neither find her name nor Parents.
11. John III. son of Guy and Isabel.
12. John IV. son of Guy by a former wife: the Brother of John the 3d. by the whole blood, being absent or unfriended, and so put beside.
13. Guy II. the Brother of John the 4th. by the same Venter.
14. John V. son of Guy the 2d. who in the year 1307. married a Niece of Levis the 9th. of France, by Robert Earl of Clermont a younger Son.
15. John VI. who in the year 1439 sold this estate to Duke Philip the Good, to be enjoyed by him on the death of Theodore, the next heir hereof; infirm, and (as it seems) without hope of Children.

16. Theodore or Theodorick, the last Earl of Namur, after whose death Duke Philip entered on this Earldom by the former contract, and as the next heir of the house of Flanders, continued ever since unto his Posterity.

The Arms hereof are, Or, a Lion sable, debruised with a Bend Gules.

LUXENBOURG is bounded on the East, with the Moselle, and the land of Triers; on the West, with the Meuse or Maes, and a branch of the Forrest of Ardenne; on the North, with Luxemburg, and a part of Hainault; and on the South, with the Duchie of Lorraine; so called from the Castle, near the Town of Luxembourg, selected by Sigifride the first Earl hereof for his seat and residence. The whole divided into parts; the Eastern part being called Faveune, fruitful of corn, and yielding withal some Wines, some Mines, and many excellent quarries of goodly stone; the Western, called the Ardenne, a remainder of that spacious Forrest, which sometimes overshadowed all this Countrey; barren of corn, but very plentiful of Venison, and of Fowl good store.

The people of this Countrey are not all of one language, those nearer Germany, as in Luxembourg, Ardenne, Rodemack, Theowille, and the rest on that side, speaking the Dutch, as those of Ivois, Mommedi, Morville, and Dampville, with the rest bordering on France, do a corrupt or broken French. In which regard the pleadings held before the Council residing in Luxembourg, are made in both languages; that so they may be understood by all that have business there. But the Nobility and Gentry (of which there is more in this Province than in any other of the seventeen) speak both Tongues perfectly. A breed of men full of virtue, curtesie and hospitality towards one another; and of great truth and faith to their Prince: but reckoned for the worst Landlords in all these Countreys; governing their Subjects and Tenants like the Pesants of France, contrary to the use and liberties of the rest of the Netherlands. Both sorts, as well the Nobility as the Commons, hate both Law and Lawyers; and for the most part end their controversie amongst themselves, without any process.

The whole Countrey containeth in compass about 70 leagues, or 200 Italian miles; in which are comprehended 23 walled Towns, and 1168 Burroughs and Villages. The principal of which are 1. Luxembourg, built in the place where antiently stood the Augusta Veromanduorum of Ptolemy; and took this new name quasi Lucis burgum, from the image of the Sun there worshipped; seated on the Alfanius or Alze, which runneth through it; large, and of a strong situation, but not very well built, not yet recovered of the spoils, which the long wars betwixt the French and the Spaniards brought upon it, before the treaty of Cambray. However it is the chief Town of the Province, honoured with the residence of the Council hereof, and the Sepulchre of John King of Bohemia, slain in the battel of Crecie against the English, Anno 1348. 2. Ardenne, on the top of an high hill, so called quasi Ara luna, from an Altar consecrated to the Moon in the time of Paganism. 3. Theowille, on the Moselle, over which it hath a goodly bridge; a frontier Town near Mentz, and the border of Lorraine; and for that cause made marvellous strong, but taken by the French, Anno 1558. and restored the next year by the peace of Cambray. 4. Bosonack, a fair Town, and very well traded, commonly called the Paris of Ardenne, in which part it standeth. 5. Mommedi, on an high hill, at the foot of which runneth the River Chiers. 6. Dampville, once a very strong place also; both taken and ransacked by the French, Anno 1552. 7. Morville upon the Chiers, the one half whereof belongeth to the Duke of Lorraine, the other to the King of Spain, as Duke of Luxembourg, for which cause called La ville commune. 8. Rock di March, fortified with a strong Castle. 9. Ivois, a place once of great importance, sacked by the French, Anno 1552. and restored by the treaty of Cambray, on condition it should never more be walled. 10. Lay Ferte on the Chiers, a Town of the same condition.

In the skirts of this Countrey towards France standeth the principality of Sedan extended all along the banks of the River Maes, from the borders of Lorraine on the South, to the great Forrest of Ardenne, and the Dukedom of Bouillon on the North. A small but very fair estate of fruitful soil, and beautified with many rich Villages, and some towns of note, the principal whereof, 1. Jatensis, upon the borders of Lorraine, by the Duke whereof it was taken, after a long season, from the Lady Charlotte, the last heir general of the house of Mark, Anno 1585. and laid unto that Dukedom as a part thereof. A place of great importance, and therefore much contended for by each Pretender. 2. Donchery, a strong town of war, bordering on Tirafche in Picardy, to which by some it is ascribed. 3. Sedan, in Latin called Sedunum ad Mosam, because situate on the banks of the Maes or Mos, the usual residence of the Prince; a fine neat Town, well fortified, and plantd with 80 brass pieces of Ordnance; honoured with a seat of learning, which being of a middle nature betwixt a Grammar School, and an University, is in the Criticism of these times called a Schola illustris, to which men may send their children to learn good letters, though they can take in them no Degrees, that being a priviledge reserved only to the Universities. So that these Schools may be somewhat like our Collegiate Churches of Westminster, Winchester, and Eton; but that the younger Students in these last named, are more restrained to Rhetoric and Grammar, than in the other; though these more liberally indowed, for the encouragement and reward of learning, than all the Schola illustres of either Germany. 4. Monsion, A Town of great strength and consequence on the River Maes; upon some jealousies of State, garrisoned by the French, as also is Sedan itself; and most of the other good Towns belonging unto his Principality; capality; but so that the revenues of it, execution of Justice, and all other rights of Sovereignty are still enjoyed, as formerly, by the Lords thereof.

This Estate antiently was a part of the Dukedom of Bonillon; from which dismembred for the portion of some younger Prince, at such time as Godfrey Earl of Ardenne and Bonillon succeeded in the Dukedom of Lorrein, after Charles and Otho the first Dukes; or else excepted and reserved by Godfrey (irnamed) of Bonillon, Duke of Lorrein, and King of Hierusalem, when he sold the Dukedom of Bonillon to the Bishop of Liege. By many mean conveyances and alterations of the Owners, it came at last to the house of Arimberg, a family of great wealth and power in Westphalen (a Province of Germany not far off) by the heir general of which house it was brought in marriage to Engelbert Earl of Mark, about the year 1330. from whom descended Robert Earl of Mark, and Sovereign of Sedan, with the Towns annexed, who succeeding his Mother in the Estates of Saus and Florenge, Feifs holden of the Dukedom of Bonillon, and eagerly affecting to unite the estates together (as they had been antiently) purchased the Town and Title of Duke of Bonillon, of Eberhard Earl of Mark, his Brother, Bishop and Cardinal of Liege, and consequently Duke of Bonillon also. Proud of his honour, and being somewhat too stiff in maintaining the rights of his new Dukedom, against a sentence passed in the Imperial Chamber, in a sure there depending betwixt two of his Vassals, he took up arms against the Empire, with far more courage than discretion. For being in the course of that war worsted by Charles the fifth (for whom he was too weak an enemy) the Town of Bonillon being taken by the conquering Emperour, was afterwards restored to the Bishops; and nothing but the Title of Dukes of Bonillon left to the Princes of Sedan. And that he might be able to hold Sedan, this Robert was fain to return again to the protection of the French (as his Ancestors, from the time of Charles the 8th had done before) and died, Anno 1535. leaving his titles and estate unto Robert his son, one of the Marshals of France; whose grandson, called also Robert, being a dear friend and companion of Henry of Bourbon K. of Navarre, and afterwards of France also, dying without issue at Geneva, Anno 1588, committed to him the disposal of his estates, and of the Lady Charlotte his only Sister. And he so well discharged his trust, that (having settled his own affairs) he gave the Lady in marriage to Henry de la Tour, Viscount of Turenne in France (one who had done him very good service in the course of his long war against the Leaguers) and with her the possession of Sedan, and the title of Bonillon; whose posterity do still enjoy it. The whole succession of these Princes we shall find in Bonillon, of which more anon.

But to return again to the Dutchie of Luxembourg, it was at first a part of the great Earldom of Ardenne, dismembred from it in the time of the Emperour Otho the first, by Sigisfride the son of Ruminus Prince thereof; who in the division of that estate amongst his Brethren, had this for his portion, with the title of Earl. Of his Successors there is little to be found upon good record, in a constant Order of Succession, until the time of Henry the 1. father of Henry the 7th. Emperour of Germany, and they of a Royal Progeny of Kings and Princes; two of the which are most considerable, though all of them of eminent quality in their several times, viz. 1. Henry elected and crowned Emperour, by the name of Henry the 7th said to be poisoned by a Friar in the Holy Chalice, to prevent some designs he had against the Pope, in asserting the Imperial power in Italy. 2. John the son of this Henry chosen King of Bohemia, in regard of his marriage with Elizabeth the daughter of Wenceslaus, King thereof; the possession of which Realm he left unto his posterity, advanced unto a Dukedom by Charles the 4th, the eldest son of this John, in the person of Wenceslaus his younger brother. What else concerns it, we shall find in this following Catalogue of

EARLS and DUKES of LUXEMBOURG.

- 1 Sigisfride, the son of Ricwine, Prince of Ardenne; the first Earl of Luxembourg.
- 2 Gilbert, the Father of Ogine wife of Baldwin the 4th. of Flanders; but whose son I find not.
- 3 Godfrey, Earl of Namur, was also Earl of Luxembourg by the right of marriage. Father of Agnes, the wife of Simon 2d. Duke of Lorrein.
- 4 Conrad, perhaps the Son of Godfrey by the daughter of Luxembourg, Father of Catherine, wife of Matthew the 2d. Duke of Lorrein.
- 5 Henry Earl of Luxembourg, slain in the quarrel of Rainold Earl of Gueldres, contending with John Duke of Brabant for the Dutchie of Limbourg.
- 6 Henry II. son of Henry the first, by means of his brother Baldwin, Elestor of Trier, was chosen Emperour of the Germans, the 7th of that name, Anno 1308. first crowned at Aken, and afterwards at Rome; one of the last Emperours that medled in the affairs of Italy.
- 1313 7 John, son of Henry II. Earl of Luxembourg, married Elizabeth Daughter of Wenceslaus the elder, King of Bohemia; of which he was upon that marriage elected and crowned King, Anno 1311. in the life of his father; slain by the English in the battle of Crecie, An. 1346.
- 1346 8 Wenceslaus, the younger son of John, created Duke of Luxembourg by his elder brother Charles the 4th Emperour, and King of Bohemia.
- 1383 9 Wenceslaus II. eldest son of the said Charles the 4th Emperour, and King of Bohemia also, succeeded his Uncle in the Dukedom.
- 1419 10 Sigismund, brother of Wenceslaus, succeeded Wenceslaus in all his estates; to which he added the Crown of Hungary, by the marriage of Mary daughter of King Lewis the first.
- 11 Elizabeth, daughter of John Duke of Gorlitz, (a Town of Lusatia) the brother of Sigismund, by the gift of Sigismund her Uncle, being then alive; the better to fit her for the bed of An.

Limbourg.

Anthony of Bourgogn Duke of Brabant; after whose decease she married John the 3d. Earl of Hainault, Holland, &c. But having no issue by either of them, she sold her interest in this Dukedom to Duke Philip the Good.

- 12 Philip the Good, succeeded on the sale aforesaid, made by the said Elizabeth, in pursuance of the contract and agreement made at her first marriage; for settling this estate in the house of Burgundy. Of whom, and his Successors in these Belgick Provinces, we shall speak hereafter.

The Arms are B. six Barrulets A, supporting a Lion G, crowned and armed Or.

7 LIMBOURG.

The greatest of the Estates of Belgium, for extent of territory, at the time of their incorporating in the house of Burgundy, was that of Brabant; comprehending 5 of the 19 Provinces, that is to say, the Dukedom of Limbourg, and Brabant, the Marquisate of the holy Empire, and the Seignury of Machin, with the Sovereignty of Leige or Luick-land.

7. LIMBOURG, hath on the East, the Dukedom of Guick in High Germany; on the West, the Bishoprick of Leige; on the North, Brabant; and on the South, the Dukedom of Luxembourg. The Soil fruitful of all necessary commodities, excepting wines, the want whereof is recompened with most excellent Wheat, great store of fewel, and plenty of the best Iron mines in all these Countries: all which commodities it hath of so great excellency in their several kinds, that it is said of them proverbially; that their Bread is better than bread, their Fire hotter than fire, and their Iron harder than iron. It is also well stored with medicinable simples, and enriched with a mine of Copperas; (by Pliny called Lapis erosus lib. 34. c. 10.) which being incorporated with Brass makes Latun, and increaseth the Brass by one third part. Lapis erosus multum aris habet, & ex eo fit ar, as that Author hath it.

It is one of the least of the Belgick Provinces, containing in it but 125 Villages; and no more than five walled Towns or Cities, viz. 1. Limbourg, which gives name to the whole estate, pleasantly seated on a hill amongst shady woods, under which runneth the River Wesdo; which having warred the whole Countrey, emptieth it self into the Maes; well built, and fortified with a very strong Castle, mounted upon a steep Precipice, of no easie access. 2. Walkenbourg, called by the French Fauquemont; a reasonable fair Town, with a large territory, two Dutch miles from Maestricht; conquered from Reynold Lord hereof by John the 3d. Duke of Brabant. 3. Dalem, a little Town with a Castle, the territory thereof extending beyond the Maes; conquered by Henry Duke of Brabant, of that name the second. 4. Rhodé-le-Duc, a little old Town, with as old a Castle, half a league from Walkenbourg. 5. Carpen, situate between Guick and Celen, beautified with a Collegiate Church, and a strong Castle, in which there is a Governour with a good Garrison for defence of the place. Each of these Towns hath jurisdiction on the parts adjoining; but with appeal unto the Chancery at Brabant.

The antient Inhabitants of this tract, and the Bishoprick of Leige adjoining, were the Eburones. When it was first made an Earldom, I am yet to seek. Most probable it is; that lying within the Verge of the great Forrest of Ardenne, it was at first a member of that Earldom also; dismembred from it for the portion of some younger Son, as Luxembourg and Namur were, or seized on by some strong Pretender (as Guick was) when Godfrey and Baldwin Dukes of Lorrein, and the direct heirs of the house of Ardenne, were absent in the wars of the Holy-land. But whensoever, and by whomsoever it was made an Earldom, certain it is, that of an Earldom it was made a Dukedom by the Emperour Frederick Barbarossa, An. 1172. Henry one of the Dukes hereof, married his Daughter Margaret to Godfrey the third Duke of Brabant, which gave that house some colour to pretend unto it: backed with a better title on the death of another Henry, the last Duke of Limbourg, whose next heir Adolph, sold it to John Duke of Brabant, pretending to it in the right of the former marriage, An. 1293. But Reynold Earl of Gueldres, thinking himself to have a better title than Adolph, in right of Ermingrade his wife, the daughter of Herman, a late Duke hereof; put in his plea, and challenged it by force of Arms; but being vanquished and taken prisoner by the said Duke John, in the battle of Worancan, was fain for his release, to release all his claim and title to the Dukedom of Limbourg; after that quietly enjoyed by the Dukes of Brabant, till they fell both together to the house of Burgundy.

The Arms hereof are Argent, a Lion Barrie of ten pieces, Or, and Gules.

8. LUICK-LAND;

OR,

The Bishoprick of LEIGE.

Westward of Limbourg, but a far mightier estate than it, lieth LUICK-LAND, as the Dutch, or the Bishoprick of LEIGE, (Leodiensis) as the Latin and French writers call it: antiently under the protection of the Dukes of Brabant, and afterwards of the Princes of the house of Burgundy, as Lords of that Countrey. By some accounted of, and described as a part of Germany; but for the reasons before mentioned I shall place it here: environed on all sides with the Belgick Provinces; that is to say, with the Dukedom of Limbourg, and the Earldom of Namur on the East; with Brabant on the North and West; on the South, with Luxembourg.

The Air hereof is very wholsome, and the Earth as fruitful, abounding with all kind of grain and fruits, some store of Wine; and as for flesh, fish, fowl, and Venison, it hath very great plenty, and that that too of an excellent taste: less fertile in such parts hereof as lye towards Luxembourg, in which it is more swelled with Hills, and over-spread with shady Woods, remainders of the great Forest of Ardenne, within which it flood. But the chief riches of this Country is under ground, consisting in mines of Lead, and Iron, and some few of Gold; quarries of Alabaſter, mingled with all sorts of Marble; rich veins of Brimstone, and unexhaustible pits of Coal; which last it hath in such abundance, that there is digged within the compass of one league of the City of Leige, not only sufficient for that great City; but so much overplus as being sold at mean prices about the Country, amounts unto 10000 ducats of yearly value. The Coal much sweeter than elsewhere, and of a nature contrary to all other Coal, in that it is kindled with water, and quenched with oil; and the strong fervour of it taken off, by casting salt on it.

The whole Country containeth 24 walled Towns, and 1800. Villages, the principal of which are 1. Leige or Luick, (in Latine Leodium) situate in a pleasant valley environed with hills, the Mense entering it into two branches, accompanied with four lesser Riverets, which make in it many delightful Islands. The compass of it about four miles, the ordinary buildings very fair, all built of stone; the Bishops Palace, a magnificent and sumptuous piece: the Churches in number forty, of which eight are Collegiate, 32 Parochial; all of them for their riches and beaute excelling all in any City of France or Germany. Besides, these, there are so many Convents, Monasteries, and religious houses about the Town, that taking all together they amount to an hundred: all of them of such fair revenues, so well endowed, and the Religious persons there of so great authority, that it called the Paradise of Priests, and that deservedly. It is also an University of good antiquity, wherein were Students at one time, 9. Kings Sons, 24. Dukes Sons, 29. Earls Sons, besides Barons and Gentlemen; the greatest part of which were Canons of the Church of S. Lambert, which is the Cathedral of the City. Yet notwithstanding it hath tasted of the malice of fortune, as well as others, being first destroyed by the Danes, then by the Normans, twice taken, and once destroyed by Charles of Burgundy, Anno 1468. Subject it is unto the Bishop as Lord temporal of it; from whom (being long since made an Imperial City) there lieth an appeal to the Chamber of Spire. 2. Dinant upon the Mense near Namur, of very great traffick till destroyed by Charles of Burgundy, in the same year with Leige: hardly recovered of which wounds, it was again sacked by King Henry the second of France, An. 1854. 3. Musek, upon the Mense or Maes also, a league from whence is the fair Nunnery of Thuren, of the same nature with that of Mons, and others spoken of before: the like to which there is near 4. Bissen, another Town of this Bishoprick; the Abbes of each having the privilege of coining both gold and silver. 5. Lootz, by the Dutch called Borelom, in the County of Dioſtein; made a County in the time of Charles the Great, the title and possession of Ogier the Dane, so famous in the History of Gallen of France, and others of the old Romances. 6. Franchimont, which gives the title of a Marquess to the Bishop of Leige. 7. Centron or S. Truden, a fair Town, so called of the Abbey dedicated to that Saint. Hoy or Hoye, so called of a violent River, which there runs into the Mense. 9. Tungres, the chief City of the Tongri, which together with the Elwones were once the Inhabitants of this tract; in which are still the ruins of a Temple consecrated to Hercules. Antiently an Episcopal See, translated hence to Maeſricht, and at last to Leige: and in those times so great, and of such renown, that Attila the Hun destroyed in it 100 Churches; now but a very small Town, and not worth the mentioning but for these antiquities. Eight leagues from hence, amongst the shady thickets of the Forest of Ardenne, is that so celebrated to Village, and those famous hot Baths, frequented from all the places of Europe, called the Spa: not so pleasant, as wholesome; nor so wholesome as famous. Yet are they good for sundry diseases, as the Tertian Ague, and Dropsie, the Stone, the exulceration of the Lungs, the Sciaticque, &c. They are of most virtue in July, because they are then hottest; and to such as taste them, they relish much of Iron, from some Iron mines, it seemeth, through which the waters run, which feed them. These Baths of great fame in the time of Pliny, who doth thus describe them. Tungri Civitas fontem habet insignem, plurimis bullis stillantem, ferrugineis saporis, quod ipsum non nisi in fine potu intelligitur. Purgat hic corpora, febres tertianas discentit calculorumque vitia. So he, lib. 31. cap. 2. agreeably to the nature of them at this present time.

This Country (not taking the Dukedom of Bonillon, though now reckoned as a part thereof, into this accompt) followed the same fortunes with the rest of Belgica, till the conquest of it by the French, by whom it was made a part of the Kingdom of Lorraine; in the division of which Kingdom between the Kings of France and Germany, it fell unto the share of the Kings of France, as lying almost wholly on the West or French side of the River Maes, which parted their possessions in that broken Kingdom. Won from Lotharius the French K. (the last but one of the Caroline Race) by Otho the 2d, it was by him made part of the Dukedom of Lorraine then by him erected, and continued as a part thereof, till sold by Godfrey of Bonillon Duke of Lorraine to the Bishops of Leige, (of which more anon) since which time it hath been the Patrimony of those wealthy Prelates. As for the Bishoprick of Leige, it was founded at Tungres, as before was said: after the sackage of which City by Attila, removed Anno 498 by S. Servatius unto Maeſricht. But the people of Maeſricht having Martyred S. Lambert, their Bishop, Anno 710. by Habert his designed Successor, with the leave of Pope Conſtantine, it was translated to this place, and a Cathedral Church here founded by the name of S. Lambert. His Successors did so well husband their advantages, that they did not only buy the Dukedom of Bonillon, but the City and territory of Leige, sold unto Spemum and Obertum successively Bishops of it, by Godfrey of Bonillon Duke of Lorraine, at his departare hence to the Holy-Land: not much increased since that in lands, though he be in titles, the Bishop being stiled a Prince of the Empire, Duke of Bonillon, Marquess of Franchimont, Earl of Lootz and Haubain. Yet are not his ordinary revenues above 30000 Duducats yearly, his Subjects living very well under him, at easie rents, and growing for the most part unto good estates: An argument whereof may be, that when the Leigeois had rebelled against Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, (under whose Clientele they were, as Duke of Brabant) they bought their peace of him at the price of 600000 Florens of the Rhene, to be paid in six years. After which again rebelling against Charles the warlike, (as they have been observed to be the most rebellious City in Europe, excepting Gant) they were able to wage 30000 men, but not being able to withstand the Forces of their Lord Protector, they fell into that miserable destruction spoken of before. Since that time they have lived with more moderation under the protection of the Princes of the house of Austria: but counted themselves in the quarrels betwixt the King of Spain, and the States confederate, as formerly between the Spaniards, and the French; though many times they suffer in the contentations.

Southward hereof, betwixt it and Luxembourg, lieth the Dukedom of Bonillon, subject unto the Bishops of Leige; but a State distinct, and holden by a different title. It taketh up a great part of that Country, which more particularly and specially is called the Forrest of Ardenne, with the woods whereof in many places overshadowed; but not unfurnished of fair Towns, and wealthy Villages. The principal of which 1. Loni, and 2. Maison Court, destroyed by Charles the fifth in his war against Robert Earl of Mark, and Duke of Bonillon; but on the peace ensuing repaired again. 3. Saſſi, and 4. Floringe, Feſt, as before is said, of the Dukedom of Bonillon, but possessed by the Sovereigns of Sedan, since the time that Robert Earl of Mark, and Sovereign of Sedan, had them in marriage with Joan his wife, the right heir thereof, from whom came Robert Earl of Mark, the first Duke of Bonillon of that Family. The last a pretty town till destroyed by the French, in the wars betwixt Henry and Philip the seconds, Kings of France and Spain, since passing in accompt as a principal Village. 5. Hurk, in the Forrest of Ardenne, the cause of the great war betwixt Charles the fifth, and Robert Duke of Bonillon, spoken of before; the Emperor having passed sentence in behalf of the Emperies, who laid claim unto it, and Robert favouring the pretensions of the house of Chim. 6. Bonillon, built on the side of a Hill near the River Senoy, a fair large City, and beautified with a goodly Castle on the top of the said Hill, and commanding over a large and goodly Territory, so strong, as well by Art as Nature, that, before the use of great Ordnance, it was held impregnable. Much spoiled in the war betwixt Charles the fifth, and Robert of Mark, and tossed from one Master to another in a little time: For being taken from Earl Robert by the power of Charles, it was from him gotten by the French, An. 1552. and finally restored to the Bishop of Leige by the treaty of Cambrai, An. 1559. but without prejudice to the claim and title of the Prince of Sedan: So that there are no fewer than three distinct Families, which at this time enjoy the title of Dukes of Bonillon, that is to say, the Bishop of Leige, who hath precedency of title, and the possession of the City; the house of de la Tour, who hold Floringe, Saſſi, and some other pieces; and the heirs males of the Collateral line of the house of Mark, who hold Lumaine, Rochfort, and some other places; but of less importance.

This Dukedom once a part of the great Earldom of Ardenne, in the division of that estate betwixt the Children of Ricquie, Prince or Earl thereof, fell to the share of Godfrey his eldest Son, (Sedan, with its appurtenances then belonging to it) with the title of Earl of Ardenne, and Bonillon. By Godfrey his son, united to the Dukedom of Lorraine, succeeding into that estate after Charles and Otho; and by another Godfrey the first Duke of Lorraine dismembered from it, and given in Dower with his Sister Ida, at her marriage with Enſace Earl of Boulogne in Picardy. Of these was born the famous Godfrey, commonly called Godfrey of Bonillon, either because he was here educated, or in regard he was Duke hereof, before he did attain to the Dukedom of Lorraine; who to provide himself of necessities for the wars of the Holy-Land (so fortunately conveyed and conducted by him) sold first this Dukedom unto Obert, as afterwards the whole County of Luick land to Spemum Bishops of Leige, successively, and their successors for ever; which though accounted by most writers for a part of Luick land, or of the Bishoprick of Leige, call it which you will, was notwithstanding held by those great Prelates as a State distinct, and governed under them by the Estates of the Country, from whose sentence there lay no Appeal: The maintenance of which Priviledges, on an Appeal made by the Emperies unto Charles the fifth, cost Robert Earl of Mark so dear, who had not long before purchased this Estate of his Brother Eberhard, Bishop and Cardinal of Leige, as was said before. The rest of the story we have had already in our description of Sedan; we will now look upon the Princes which have born these titles.

The Dukes of Bonillon of the house of Ardenne.

1. Godfrey, the eldest son of Ricquie, Prince or Earl of Ardenne, the first Earl of Bonillon, and Husband of Matilda, a daughter of the Emperor Otho the 2d.
2. Godfrey II. son of Godfrey the first, who in the year 1004. by adoption of Duke Otho his Cousin, and the power of Henry the 2d. Emperor, succeeded in the Dukedom of Lorraine.
- 1019 3. Gozelo, brother of Godfrey the 2d. Duke of Lorraine and Bonillon.
- 1044 4. Godfrey III. son of Gozelo.
5. Enſace, Earl of Boulogne, and Ida his wife, daughter of Godfrey the 3d. by whom endowed at her marriage with the Dukedom of Bonillon.
6. Godfrey IV. surnamed of Bonillon, son of Enſace and Ida, on the death of his Uncle Godfrey, succeeded in the Dukedom of Lorraine, An. 1078. and died King of Hierusalem. Going unto the wars of the Holy Land, he sold this Dukedom to Obert, Bishop of Leige, and his Successors, Anno 1096. who did accordingly enjoy it till the year 1509. or thereabouts; when sold by Eberhard of Mark to his brother Robert of whose descent and Successors, you may take this view in the ensuing Catalogue of

The Sovereigns of Sedan and Dukes of Bouillon of the House of Mark.

 - 5 John II. Earl of Mark, Son of Everhard the 2d.

 - 7 Robert II. Son of Robert the first, Sovereign of Sedan, and Duke of Bouillon, which Dukedom he purchased of Everhard his Brother, Bishop and Cardinal of Leige.
 - 1535 8 Robert III. Son of Robert the second, one of the Marshals of France, Sovereign of Sedan and Titular Duke of Bouillon.
 - 1556 10 Henry Robert, Son of Robert the 3d.

 - 13 Henry de la Tour, Viscount of Turenne in France, descended from the Heirs General of Enface Earl of Boulogne, and Duke of Bouillon, by marriage of the Lady Charlotte, and the gift of Henry the fourth of France, succeeded in the Sovereignty of Sedan and title of Bouillon; A Protestant and the founder of the Schola Illustris in Sedan.
- De la Tour Son of Henry by one of the Daughters of William, Prince of Orange, succeeded his Father, in his Estates, but not in his Religion also, which to ingratiate himself with the French King he exchanged for Papistrie, made thereupon one of the Marshals of France, and now living, Anno 1648.

9. BRABANT. 10. The MARQUISATE,
And 11. MACHLYN.

These I have joined together, though distinct Estates, because they have a long time followed the same fortune, and that the two last do no otherwise differ from the first, then the parts from the whole: the Marquisate, and Machlyn, being now reckoned as parts of Brabant, and included in it.

1. BRABANT is bounded on the East, with Luickland, or the Bishoprick of Leige; on the West, with the River Scheld, and a part of Flanders; on the North, with the Maes, which severeth it from Holland, and Guelderland; and on the South, with Hainault, Namur, and a part of Luickland. So called quasi Brachland, that is to say, a barren Land, as at first it was; or from the old Bratipantium, which Cesar placeth in this tract, but from whether of the two is not yet determined.

The Air hereof is generally very wholesome, and good, and the Soil naturally fruitful, excepting Kempenland, (being the parts thereof lying towards the North) which being barren of it self, is made indifferently fertile by keeping Cattel, Soiling the ground, and other arts of good Husbandry. The people live in most freedom, and are the best privileged of any in Belgium. A thing for which they are more beholding to the Princes goodness, than their own great wits; being noted to be none of the wisest, especially as they grow in age, when most men learn wisdom. Brabant quo magis fruescent, et magis stultescunt, as Erasmus.

The length hereof, from S. Gertrudenberg to Genblours, North and South, is 22 Dutch or German miles; from Helmont to Berghen ap Some, East and West, 20 of the same miles; the whole compass 80. Within which circuit are contained 26 walled Towns; and Villages with Parish Churches 718, of which, the odd 18 called Francky, or Market-towns, enjoy the privileges of walled Towns, or Cities, though unwalled themselves.

Places of most importance in it, are 1. Shertogen Bosch, or the Bosch, as the Dutch; Bois le Duc, or Bolduc, as the French; and Silva Ducis, or Boscum Ducis, as the Latines call it: each name derived according to their several Languages, from a pleasant wood belonging to the Dukes of Brabant, where the Town now stands, situate on a little River called Deese, some two leagues from the Maes, near the borders of Guelderland: a large and well built Town, very strongly fortified, and of great trade for Clothing, here being made yearly, in the time of Lewis Guicciardine, 20000 Clothes, worth 200000 Crowns to the Clothier or Draper; Made an Episcopal See, Anno 1559. the Cathedral, which is fixed in the Church of Saint John, being fair and large; and beautified with one of the goodliest Dials in the Christian world. This is the principal Town of Brabant (properly and distinctly so called) comprehending under it the four Countries of Kempenland, Maesland, Peel and Overnick; and was taken by the Confederate Estates from the King of Spain, after a long and chargeable siege, Anno 1628.

2. Tilmont,

2. Tilmont, on the little River Geet, once chief of Brabant, but long since decayed. 3. Aschot on the little River Denerre, which gives the title of Duke to them of the Noble house of Croy, and descended from the Kings of Hungary, (of which we spake before at large when we were in Picardy) the Dukes hereof (advanced unto that honour by Charles the fifth) being men of greatest Revenue and Authority of any in Belgium. 4. Bergen ap Zone, so called from the River Zome, upon which it is situate, about half a league from the influx of it into the Scheld, and not far from the Sea, which gives it a reasonable good Haven. A Town of great strength by nature, but more strongly fortified: Famous for being made a Marquisate by Charles the Fifth, Anno 1553. more for the notable resistance which it made to the Marquis Spinola, Anno 1622. 5. Breda, upon the River Merck, a Town pleasantly seated, well fortified, and of great Revenue; having under it the Town and Territory of Steenberg, the Franchise of Rosendale, and the Seignury of Ofterbant, the residence, Barony, and chief Town of the Princes of Orange, from whom being taken by the Spaniards in the beginning of those wars, it was again recovered by some venturous Gentlemen, who hiding themselves in a Boat covered over with Turf, were conveyed into the Castle, which they easily mastered, and made the Prince Lord of it again. After re-taken by the Spaniards, Anno 1625. but now in the possession of its natural owners; to whom it came by the right of the house of Nassau, by the marriage of Engelbert the 7th Earl of that house, with Mary, Daughter and heir of Philip the last Lord hereof, about the year 1400. 6. Dieff on the River Denerre, a good Town, and invested with a goodly Territory; belonging to the Duke of Orange, whose ancestors of the House of Nassau had it in exchange for some other Lands of the Duke of Cleve; and in right hereof is Burgrave of the City of Antwerp. 7. Grinbergh, an ancient Barony, with a large jurisdiction, defendible on the youngest son only, after the manner of Burg English, as our Lawyers call it. 8. Gertrudenberg, standing on the Donge, not far from the influx of it into the Maes, the furthest Town in the North of Brabant, where it joyns to Holland: which makes it a matter of dispute betwixt those Provinces, to which of them it doth belong. A Town of great trade for fishing, plenty of Salmon and Sturgeon being taken here; but of Shads especially: whereof 18000 are sometimes caught in a day, salted, and sent abroad into foreign parts: It acknowledgeth the Prince of Orange for the Lord thereof, as doth also 9. Grave, a good Town upon the Maes, bought by these Princes of the King of Spain, without consent of the States; without whose approbation, no part of the Domain is to be dismembered. 10. Maesricht (in Latine Trajectum ad Mosam) so called of a ferry over the Maes in former times; supplied now with a goodly Stone bridge in the place thereof. A fair and goodly town, beautified with two Collegiate Churches, in one of which the Dukes of Brabant were always Canons; subject in part to the Bishop of Leige, and partly to the Duke of Brabant: the Children are subject to that Prince to whom the Mother was subject at the time of the Birth, without relation to the Father; according to that Maxim of the Civil Law, Partus sequitur ventrem: And if a Stranger come to live there, he must declare to which of the two he will be subject; yet is the Duke of Brabant the chief Sovereign of it, he only having the power of Coynage, and of granting pardon to Offenders: and as a Town of this Dukedom, besieged and taken by the confederate States, Anno 1632.

Here is also within the limits of this Dukedom, the town and Signeury of Ravestein, situate on the banks of the Maes, held by the Dukes of Cleve, of the Duke of Brabant; but no otherwise subject: and on the same River, the Town and Countrey of Horn, a Fief Imperial, beautified with a strong Castle, and a goodly Territory; in which is Wiert, the residence of the Earls of Horn descended of the ancient house of Montmorency in France.

2. THE MARQUISATE OF THE EMPIRE, so called, because the farthest bounds and Marches of the German Empire, fronting on Flanders, which appertained unto the Sovereignty of the Crown of France; comprehendeth four of the best Towns in Brabant, with very large and spacious Territories adjoining to them, viz. 1. Lovain, on the River Dyle, about four English miles in compass; but in that compass much of the ground is taken up with Vineyards, Gardens, Meadows, and pleasant Fields; which make the situation far more delightful, than if all built, and peopled. It was the Mother Town of Brabant, and sometimes gave the Title of an Earl to the Dukes hereof: afterwards was made an University by Duke John the 4th, An. 1426. wherein are contained about 20 Colleges, such as they be; much privileged, and enriched with pensions for publick Readers, by King Philip the 2d. 2. Brussels, (Bruxella) the seat of the ancient Dukes of Brabant, and of the Dukes of Burgundy also, after they came to be Lords of those Countries; seated upon the Sinne, and other sweet Springs and Riverets, which make it one of the sweetest situations in all Europe: having within, a goodly channel made by Art from Brussels, to the River Dele, and from thence to the Scheld: the charge whereof amounted unto 500000 Crowns. It is of the same compass with Lovain, the buildings sumptuous, and the Town very rich: not only in regard that it is the ordinary seat of the Prince, or his Regent, and the Chancery for all Brabant, and the Duchy of Limbourg; but in regard of the rich Manufactures of Armour and Cloth of Arras, of Silk, Gold and Silver, which are there industriously pursued. 3. Nivello, on the borders of Hainault, in a very rich and fruitful soil, remarkable for the abundance of fine Linnen, which is therein made; but most of all for a very rich Nunery (or rather a Nursery) of Noble Ladies; of the same nature with those of Mons and others before described. 4. Antwerp, situate on a goodly plain on the River Scheld, above 17 leagues from the Sea, but furnished with eight Channels cut out of the River for the transport of Commodities; one of the which is capable of 200 great Ships. The private buildings very handsome, but the publick sumptuous; the chief whereof were reckoned the Church of Nostre Dame, the Town-house, and the house of the Easterlings, or Eastern Merchants; well peopled, and of so great Trade in former times, that it was held to be the richest Empory of the Christian world; the Commodities here bought and sold, amounting

- Holland.* 1355 16 Joan, the eldest daughter of John the third, married to Wenceslaus the first Duke of Luxemburg, but died without issue.
- 1406 17 Anthony of Burgundy, son of Philip the Hardie, and the Lady Margaret his wife, daughter of Lewis de Malain Earl of Flanders, and of Margaret the sister and heir of Joan; after the death of the said Wenceslaus and Joan his wife, succeeded in the Dukedom of Brabant; his elder brother John, giving way unto it, at the request of their great Aunt Joan, the proprietary of it.
- 1415 18 John IV. son of Anthony by his first wife Joan, daughter of Waleran Earl of Saint Paul.
- 1426 19 Philip, the second son of Anthony, and brother of John the 4th.
- 1430 20 Philip II. called the Good, Duke of Burgundy, son and heir of John Duke of Burgundy, elder brother of Anthony; on the death of his two Cousin Germans John and Philip, succeeded in the Dukedom of Brabant, as the direct heir of the Lady Margaret, wife to Lewis de Malain, and daughter of John the third; the last Duke of Brabant of the house of Louvain. Of whose successors more in another place.

The Arms hereof are Sable, a Lion Or.

12. HOLLAND, 13. ZELAND,
14. WEST-FRISELAND.

HAVING thus spoken of those Provinces which still continue in subjection to the King of Spain (except some few towns in Flanders, and Brabant, before mentioned;) let us next look on those which have withdrawn their obedience from him; beginning first with Holland, and its Appendices, of more power and consideration than all the rest. Which though distinct Provinces, and acting in their several capacities at the present time: yet having been always under the command of the same Princes, they must be joynted together in the story of them; but shall be severally handled as to the Chorography.

HOLLAND hath on the East, the Zwider-See, Utrecht, and some part of Guelderland; on the West and North, the German Ocean; on the South, the Islands of Zeland, and some part of Brabant. So called, as some think, but with little reason, quasi Holt-land, that is to say a woody Country; as others, quasi Hollow-land, from the Bogs and Marshes and unsound footing on the same; and some will have it called so, quasi Hay-land, from the great quantity of Hay. But the learned Junius not relishing any of the three, conceives, that both this Country, and the Isles of Zeland, being planted by some Colonies of Danes, and Normans, (at the time of the irruption of those Northern Nations,) were called thus with reference to Seland and Oeland two Islands of the Baltick Sea out of which they came. The Reader hath good choice, and may please himself.

The Country for the most part lyeth very low, in so much that they are fain to fence it with Banks and Ramparts to keep out the Sea, and to restrain the Rivers within their bounds; so that in many places one may see the Sea far above the Land, and yet repulsed with those Banks: and is wical so fenny and full of marshes, that they are forced to trench it with innumerable dikes and channels, to make it firm land, and fit for dwelling; yet not so firm to bear either trees or much grain. But such is the Industry of the People and trade they drive, that having little or no corn of their own growth, they do provide themselves elsewhere; not only sufficient for their own spending, but wherewith to supply their neighbours: having no timber of their own, they spend more timber in building ships, and fencing their water-courses, than any Country in the World; having no wine, they drink more than the people of the Country, where it groweth naturally; and finally, having neither Flax nor Wool, they make more Cloth of both sorts, than all the Countries in the world, except France and England.

The present Inhabitants are generally given to Sea-faring lives; so that it is thought that in Holland, Zeland, and West-Friesland, there are 2500 ships of war and burden. The women for the most part laborious in making Ruffs. Nay you will hardly see a Child of four years of age, that is not kept to work, and made to earn its own living; to the great commendation of their government. The greatest of their natural Commodities is Butter and Cheese; of which, besides that infinite plenty which they spend in their own Houses, and amongst their Garrisons and ships; they sell as much unto other Countries, as comes to 100000 Crowns per annum. By which means, and by the greatness of their fish-trade spoken of before, they are grown to wealthy on the Land, and so powerful at Sea, that as Flanders heretofore was taken for all the Netherlands; so now Holland is taken generally for all the Provinces confederated in a league against the Spaniards.

The whole compas of it is no more than 180 miles; no part thereof being distant from the Sea, above three hours journey: and yet within that narrow Circuit, there are contained no fewer than 23 walled Towns, and 400 Villages; some situate in the North, and others in South-Holland, as it stands divided. In South-Holland (being that part hereof that lyeth next to Zeland and the middle channel of the Rhene passing from Utrecht unto Leiden) the principal Towns are, 1. Dord, (in Latine Dordrechtum) formerly the Staple for Rhenish wines, a large, rich, and well-peopled Town; antiently joynted to the firm Land, but in the year 1421. rent from it by the violence of the Sea, and made an Island; of great command upon the traffique of the Maes, and the Wael, upon whose confluence it stands; but of most note in these later times, for an Assembly of Divines out of divers Countries following lowing Calvins Doctrine, for condemnation of the Lutheran or Arminian Tenets, concerning Universal Grace and Predestination, Anno 1618. 2. Gorichem, situate on the Wael, where it meeteth with the Linge: a Town of great trade and riches, by reason of a daily Market of Cheese and Butter, brought hither in very great quantity. Beautified antiently with a strong Castle, and a fair Church, from the Steeple whereof one may behold 22 walled Towns, besides an infinite number of Villages. The Country is round about it, called by that people Van Arckel, or the land of Hercules, from an opinion that Hercules the German did there appoint his Camp; or rather from some Temple dedicated to him, in the place whereof the Lords of this tract, who from hence took the name of Arckel, (Arckels they are called in our Latine writers) founded a Church unto the honor of the Virgin Mary, in the time of Thierry the 2d Earl of Holland, by whom first settled in this Country. And here they flourished as Lords of Gorichem, Leerdam, and the parts adjoining, till the year 1416. when falling to John L. of Egmond, by Mary his wife, daughter of John of Arckelland, the last Lord hereof, and Mother of Arnold of Egmond D. of Guel-dres. It was by him sold to William the sixth, Earl of Holland, and so again united unto that Estate. 3. Rotterdam, seated on a dike or channel called the Rotter, not far from which, at a place named Rempen, the Leek, one of three main branches of the Rhene, falleth into the Maes: a strong, fair, and well-traded Port; the birth-place of the learned Erasmus. 4. Schoon-hoven, situate on the Leek, a fair Town, having a commodious haven. 5. Goude, one of the six principal Towns of Holland, rich, and well fortified; seated on the River called Tyssel, which rising about Tyssel-stein spoken of anon, falleth into the Leek at a place called Jffelmond, and therefore different from the branch of the Rhene, so called, which giveth name to Over-tyssel. On the same River also stand, 6. Ondwater, and 7. Tyssel-stein, this last belonging properly to the Prince of Orange; the first of great trade for making Cables and Cords for shipping. 8. Leiden, or Lugdunum Batavorum, an University, founded Anno 1564. The Town consisteth of 41 Islands, to which they pass partly by boats, partly by bridges, whereof there are 144. and of them 104. builded with stone. Here is in this Town a Castle, said to have been built by Hengist the Saxon, at his return out of England. And not far off stood the famous Nimmerie of Rainburg, of the same nature with those of Monts and Nivelle, before described; so liberally indowed, that 2000 persons did there daily receive relief. 9. Vianen, on the Leek, a Seignery distinct from Holland, pertaining antiently to the Lords of Bruderode: And so was also, 10. Heusden, a good old Town, once beautified with a fair Castle, and a goodly Territory, but belonging to the Earls of Cleve, of which house it had Lords of its own, as knowing no subjection to the Earls of Holland, from the year 850. or thereabouts, to the year 1290. at which time Theodorick the 9th of Cleve, at a merry meeting transferred the Sovereignty thereof to Florence Earl of Holland, of that name the fifth. Finally, having continued in the possession of 20 Lords of that family, on the expiration of that line, in the person of John the 9th dying without issue, Anno 1334. it was made a member of this Earldom (after some sharp disputes with the Dukes of Brabant, claiming it by a resignation of the last Lord John) by Williams of Bavaria, Earl of Holland and Hainault, Anno 1361. or thereabouts. 11. Leerdam, upon the River Linge, which together with Tyssel-stein before mentioned, fell unto Philip Prince of Orange, in right of his descent from the Earls of Buren. 12. Delfe, a Town of great trade for cloathing, but more by reason of the Cloath of England, brought thither in great quantities, by the English Merchant, then for any great store of their own making; by reason of the concourse which that trade brings with it; rich, large, and well-built, beautified with spacious streets, and goodly Churches: the birth-place of that monstrous Heretick David George, who called himself King, and Christ Immortal, as before said.

In that part thereof which is called North-Holland, lying betwixt the middle channel of the Rhene, and the Zwider-See, the Towns or Cities of most importance are, 1. Alkmar, encompassed with deep fens and marshes; a rich Town, in regard of the great plenty of Butter and Cheese, which is made about it, more than in any place of Holland; and famous for the defeat which the Duke of Alva received before it. For he in the beginning of the Low-Country troubles, having with the loss of 20000 of his own men, forced Harlem, laid his siege round about this Town. Had he left any way for the Souldiers to have fled thence, the Town had been abandoned: but having invironed them round, he put them to such a resolution, or desperation (choose you whether) that manfully they resisted three of his assaults; and in the end made him depart with great loss, as well of his Souldiers, as his reputation. 2. Amsterdam, a very fair haven Town, where divers times at one tide, 1000 ships of all sorts have been seen to go out and in: So truly said a modern Poet,

*Quod Tagus, atq; Hermus vehit, & Pactolus, in unum

What Tagus, Hermus, and Pactolus bear,
One would conjecture to be heap'd up here.

The people thereby made so rich; that if a Fleet of 300 sail should come into the Port, fraught with all kind of commodities, in five or six days they would be ready to buy all the lading. Situate it is on the Gulph call'd the Tie, and the dike or channel called Amstel, whence it hath the name of Amstel-dam, in Latine Amstelodunum; built upon piles like Venice, and resembling it in so many points, that it may justly be call'd the Northern Venice. First fortified with Towers and ramparts by Gysbert of Amstel, Zeland. Amstel. about 300 years ago. But being burnt through the envy of its neighbours, it began to be walled, Anno 1482. Grown to this wealth since the diverting of the trade from Antwerp hither, and for that cause inhabited by men of all Nations, and of all Religions; and those not only tolerated, and connived at in private, but openly and freely exercised without any dislike. A greater confusion (in my mind) than that of Babel; this being of Religions, that of Languages only. 3. Harlem, on the Lake called Harlem-meer, the greatest Town of all Holland, and the second for dignity; well built, and very pleasantly situated amongst many goodly meadows, near a delightful forest, and round about environed with wealthy Villages: famous for the invention of Printing, invented here; but perfected at Mentz in higher Germany; the first Book which was ever printed being Tullius Offices. 4. Narden on the Zuider-See, fortified with a strong Castle, held of the Earls of Holland by the Dukes of Brabant to whom it antiently belonged. 5. Enghuysen, on the very point of the Gulf of Zuider-See, opposite to Frisland, from which not distant above two leagues. A town of great consequence to the Prince of Orange, in the first revolting of these Countries from the King of Spain. For siding with him in that war, and standing conveniently to obstruct the passages by Sea, unto Amsterdam, it compelled that City, in short time, by stopping all supply of victuals and other necessities, to yield it self unto the Prince. 6. Hoorn, on the same Gulf also, a rich Town with a very good Haven; and of so great strength by reason of the Multitude of Dikes and Channels which are round about it, that it seems impregnable. 7. Edam, upon the same Gulf (of Zuider-See) remarkable for the great number of ships which are built yearly in it, and an incredible number of the best Holland Cheeses made in the Country round about it. 8. Medemblick on the Ocean, seated in the best Country of Holland for the feeding of Cattel: unwalled, but enjoying all the privileges which a walled Town hath; and fortified with a right strong Castle.

The chief of the Holland Villages is the Hague or Graven Haghe, in Latine Haga Comitis, because formerly the Court and residence of the Earls of Holland, who had here a very large and beautiful Palace founded by Earl William King of the Romans, and there in a choice and excellent Library gathered together by John Haire a Canon Regular of this place, and by him given to Charles the first. In former time the residence of the Council for the Province of Holland; as it is now of the Commissioners or Delegates of the confederat Provinces, called by the name of the States-General. Now much increased in buildings, of what it was, and yet so great in the time of Lewis Guiccardine, that it then contained 2000 households. The Inhabitants will not wall it, as desiring to have it rather accounted the chief Village in Europe, than the second City. The other Villages of note, 2. Egmond, 3. Bruderode, 4. Wassenaar, which antiently gave names to three Noble families; of which none so illustrious and renowned as that of Egmond, descended lineally from Radbold, son of Adgillis the King of the Friscons, the first Lord of Egmond, who died, Anno 791. Advanced by marriages to the Dukedom of Guelderland, the Signeuries of Tijfel-Hein and Buren, and finally made Earls of Egmond, by Maximilian the Emperor, Anno 1592. But both this house and that of Wassenaar being now extinct, there is none left but that of Bruderode, for ought I can learn. Neer to the last stood the famous Fortresses called Arx Britannica, built by Caligula in memory of his great Battle upon this Shore. For making shew of a voyage into Britain, to subdue that Island, he boarded his Galley, embattled his soldiers, caused his Trumpets to sound, gave them the Signal; and then commanded them to gather Cockles. Which Tower or Fortress was at the fall of the Roman Empire, overwhelmed by the Sea; the ruins whereof at a dead low water are still to be seen.

Besides these places on the firm Land or Continent, there are some Islands, which pertain to the State of Holland, called by the general name of Voorn, because situate directly against Holland; Voorn signifying as much as before, or in old English Bevorne: but known by their distinct and more proper names of Somersdike. 2. Ganrode, 3. Piereschille, so called of their principal Towns: and 4. Voorn, specially so named, the chief of them all, being of a fat and fruitful soil, and plentiful of most sorts of grain. The principal Towns whereof are 1. Briel (which we call the Brill) a strong Town, and the first that revolted against the Spaniard, Anno 1572. Cautionary to the English with the Town of Flushing; chosen by them in regard of the great command it hath upon the passage to Gertrudenburg and the rest of Brabant; as also to Delfe, Dort, and Rotterdam, the greatest Towns of trade in the South of Holland. 2. Gerwilt, a small Town, but having a jurisdiction over many Villages. There are also on the North side of Holland the Isles Wierengeh, and Tessel; of which little memorable, but that the last is furnished with a safe and capacious Bay for receipt of shipping.

One special accident concerning Holland, I cannot over-pass in silence, namely, how Margaret Countess of Hennenberg, and sister to William King of the Romans, being of the age of 42 years, was delivered at one birth of 365 children, the one half males, the other females, the odd one an hermaphrodite; all christened at the Church of Lafanne, not far from the Hague, by the names of John and Elizabeth, into two Basins, still to be seen in the said Church, by Guido the Suffragan of Ntrecht; all which immediately after died, and with them the Mother.

The Arms of Holland of it self, as a State distinct, are Or, a Lion Gules.

ZELAND consisteth of seven Islands, the remainder of 18 which the Sea hath swallowed; and in them 300 inhabited Towns. Severed from Flanders with the left branch or arm of the Scheld, which they called Home, and on the East, from Brabant, with the right branch of the said River, which still keeps his name; on the North, from Holland, with the Gulf called the Flack; and on the West, with the main Ocean, from the Kingdom of England. So called, as some say, quasi Sea and Land; but as Jesuit rather thinks, from Seland, an Island of Denmark, as before was noted.

The

The Country generally more fruitful than the neighbouring Brabant, producing great quantity of excellent Corn, plenty of Coriander, and abundance of Mader, used in dying; the soil also very rich in pasture, but low and marshy, which makes the air to be very unhealthy; and the whole destitute both by Turf digged amongst themselves, but very sparingly for fear of weakening the Sea-banks.

The whole containeth 8 Towns and 100 Villages. The Islands which remain, are commonly divided into the Western, and the Eastern, according as they lye with reference to the River Scheld. The Western Islands, four in number, that is to say, 1. Walcheren, (Palachria in Latine) lying to the South-40 Italian miles. The principal Towns of which are 1. Middleburg, seated on a Creek of the Sea, well walled and fortified, the streets spacious, the houses and Churches well built: inhabited by wealthy Merchants, and industrious Traders; and of late times (since the removing of the English trade built (as faith Ortelius) by Prince Zelandus, of whom this Province was thus named in honour of his and invincible strength. One of the first Towns which the Low-Countrymen took from the Spaniards, after put into the hands of the English, as a Town of Caution: the first Governour of it being the renowned Philip Sidney. A poor Town then it was, God wot, now the Key of the Netherlands, without the whole license no Ship can pass either to or from the City of Antwerp, inasmuch that if the Duke of Alva a maritime Town, as he did in the strengthening Antwerp, and some midland Cities; he had in all probability the remediless revolt of these flourishing Countries. Not far off standeth the Fort called of Voorn, (an Isle of Holland) all three being taken from the Spaniard, Anno 1572. made Cautionary to Robert Lord Lisle (afterwards created Earl of Leicester) the brother of Sir Philip Sidney, then Governour of Flushing. 3. Rammere, or Armuyden, an unwalled Town, but beautified with one of the goodly Ships of great burden, set forwards on their voyages to several parts. 4. Vere, or Camsere, seated in the North part of the Island, which once gave title to a Marquess, and from the which the noble Family of the Vere (now, and of long time, Earls of Oxford) took denomination. So as it is no marvel that so many of that Family have ventured their Estates and Lives, in the Wars of this Country, being their Grandmother in a manner, or their Primitive Paragge, from whence transplanted into England.

2. SOUTH-BEVERLAND, situate betwixt Walcheren and Brabant, the greatest of the Isles of Zeland; heretofore 20 Dutch miles in compass, but now much diminished by the rage and fury of the Sea; by which the Town and Signeury of Borsule, with all the Countries round about it, was swallowed up, Anno 1532. That which remains hath in it many goodly Woods, and pleasant Thickets, full of Fowls, and wild Beasts for Hawking and Hunting. Chief Towns here, are 1. Rommerswal, seated on the East, towards Bergen op Some, severed at the same time from the rest of the Island; and made an Island of it self; defended with continual charge from following the sad fate of the Town of Borsule. 2. Gaer, or Tergor, on the Northern Coast, a strong Town, well privileged, and the only walled Town in all the Island.

3. NORTH-BEVERLAND, lying betwixt South-Beverland and the Isle of Schonen, in former times esteemed the Paradise of Zeland, and having in it a proper Town called Chor-Chen; but so destroyed by the Sea-breach spoken of before, that there is nothing now remaining but a few poor Villages.

4. WOLFERSDIKE, lying between the two Beverlands, the smallest of the Western Islands, as having in it no more than two Villages, but replenished with good store of Pasture.

And these are all which fall in the division of the Western Islands, so called, because they lye Westward of the River Scheld; as those which they call the Eastern Islands, on the East thereof. Of which last there are three in number.

1. SCHOWEN, lying on the North-west of Holland, so near unto North-Beverland in former times, that the Inhabitants could talk together from one shore to the other: but now the Sea hath set them at a greater distance. It containeth in compass six Dutch miles. Chief Towns wherein are 1. Sitiched, the antientest Town of all Zeland, once beautified with a fair and commodious Haven, now choked up with Beach; yet still reputed for the second Town of all the Province: the whole trade thereof consisting in Salt and Mader, of which it yields good plenty. Most famous for the birth of Levinus Lemnius, that renowned Philosopher and Physician. 2. Bromers-Haven, inhabited only by Fishermen, not else remarkable.

2. DUVELAND, so named from the multitude of Doves or Pigeons, situate between Schowen and Telen, in compass about 4 Dutch miles; hath no good Town in it, but only Country Villages, and Gentlemen Farms. Surrounded by the Sea, Anno 1530. but by the industry and diligence of Adolph of Burgundy, and the Lord of Bosforers in Flanders, recovered again; and at the excessive charge of the people hitherto preserved.

3. TOLLEN, so called from the chief Town of the Island, where the Earls Toll was wont to be paid, whence it had the name; is situate over against the North-west of Brabant, from which disjoined Groiningland. And though upon the loss of that gallant man (nephew and heir unto that Earl), the siege was raised at the present; yet was it reinforced again, Anno 1590. and the Town then taken: continuing ever since in the confederacy of the States united.

GROINING-LAND, hath on the East, East-Friesland; on the West, West-Friesland; on the North, the main Ocean; on the South, Over-Tissel; so wedged in as it were betwixt both Frieslands; that some hold it to be but a part of the West. It containeth under it the Country called the Omme-lands, (corruptly for the Emmellands, as I conjecture, because lying along the River Ems), and therein 145 Barroughs and Villages. The chief whereof are 1 Dam, near the Ems, bordering on East-Fri-land; 2 Keykirk, 3 Old-Haven, standing on the Sea. 4 As for the Town of Groining it self, it is rich, and very well-built, situate amongst divers small streams which run thorow it; and having also great, and very well-built, situate amongst divers small streams which run thorow it; and having also divers Channels for conveyance of waters, which adds much to the safety and strength thereof. A Town of great Jurisdiction, both within and without, judging absolutely without appeals, in causes both Civil and Criminal; in Spirituals subject heretofore to the Bishop of Munster, till made one of the new Bishopricks, by King Philip the second, Anno 1559. And though the Prince in Civil causes had his Office or Lieutenant there; yet in Criminal the Town was Sovereign, and granted pardons as Sovereign of the whole estate, paying to the Prince for all duties yearly, but 6000 Crowns. Both Town and Country anciently belonged to the Bishops of Utrecht, by whose negligence in defending them, they subverted their Estate to the Duke of Guelderland. But the Dukes of Saxony laying some claim to it, disturbed this agreement for a time; during which Ezardus the Earl of East-Friesland possessed himself of it; but not able to make good his unjust possession, sold his estate therein to the Duke of Gueldres, Anno 1514: to whom of right it did belong. Afterwards in the year 1536. they put themselves under the command of Charles the fifth, but with the reservation of all their privileges, and ancient Liberties; for preservation of the which, in danger to be over-born by the power of the Spaniard, they confederated with the rest of the United States, Anno 1594. and so still continue.

The ancient Inhabitants of these Countries, were the Menapii, and Sicambri, very valiant people possessing Guelderland; and the Majoris Frisi, which were planted in Groining, and the rest of Friesland. Of these the Sicambri were accounted the most valiant people, uniting with other Nations in the name of French, and by that name possessing with the rest of those Nations, the mighty Empire of the West. In the division whereof, by the posterity of Charles the Great, these Countries were first part of the Kingdom of Austrasia, or East-France, afterwards of the German Empire: governed at the first by Guardians, or Protectors, created by the people in the reign of Charles the Bald; the two first being Wickard and Lupold, (or Leopold) two Brethren; who fixing their chief Seat in the Castle of Gueldres, occasioned the whole Country to be called Guelderland. But they, and their Successors, by what name occasioned the whole Country to be called Guelderland. But they, and their Successors, by what name or title soever called, were in effect but Provincial Officers, accountable to the Emperours for their administration; the first free Prince hereof being Otho of Nassau, who having to his first wife the Lady Aleide, daughter of Wickard, the last Guardian; was by the Emperour Henry the third made first Earl of Guelderland; adding thereto the State of Zutphen, by a second marriage, as is said before. In Rainold the ninth Earl it was made a Dukedom, by the Emperour Lewis of Bavaria, Anno 1339. sold by Duke Arnold (justly incensed at his ungracious son Adolph) to Charles Duke of Burgundy, for 92000 Florins of ready money, and an Annual pension, Anno 1472. But notwithstanding this Agreement, Adolph (upon the death of Charles) possessed himself of it, and left it unto Charles his son; who finally surrendered it unto Charles the fifth, Anno 1547.

EARLS and DUKES of GUELDERLAND.

- 1079 1 Otho of Nassau, the first Earl.
- 2 Gerard, the son of Otho by his first wife Aleide.
- 1131 3 Henry, the son of Gerard.
- 1162 4 Gerard II. son of Henry.
- 1180 5 Otho II. brother of Gerard.
- 1202 6 Gerard III. son of Otho the second.
- 1229 7 Otho III. son of Gerard, who walled the Towns of Ruermund, Arnhem, Bomel, Goch, Wageningen, and Harderwick.
- 1271 8 Rainold, son of Otho the third, taken and imprisoned till his death, by
- 1326 9 Rainold II. his own son, created the first Duke of Gueldres, by the Emperour Lewis of Bavaria at Francfort, Anno 1339. liberal to the poor, and a great Patron of the Muses.
- 1343 10 Rainold III. son of Rainold the 2d. molested with continual Wars with his brother Edward, by whom taken, and imprisoned till his dying day.
- 1371 11 Edward the son of Rainold the 2d. by Eleanor the daughter of Edw. the third of England, his second wife, died the same year with his brother; the last of the male issue of Otho of Nassau.
- 1371 12 Mary, (by some called Joan) Sister of Edw. by the same venter, and wife of Will. E. of Gulick.
- 13 William, son of William Duke of Gulick, and Mary of Gueldres, admitted Knight of the Order by King Richard the 2d.
- 14 Rainold IV. the brother of William.
- 15 Arnold of Egmond, son of John Lord of Egmond, and Mary his wife, daughter of Joan, the sister of Rainold, and William, the two last Dukes, succeeded in the estate of Gueldres; the Duke.

Dukedom of Gulick being seized on by Adolph, son of William the first Duke of Berg, as Guelderland the next heir male to the two last Dukes. Being afterwards taken, imprisoned, and most barbarously handled by his own son Adolph, and delivered by Charles the Warlike, Duke of Burgundy, he sold to him his estates of Gueldres and Zutphen, to be enjoyed by him after his decease, Anno 1472.

- 1473 16 Adolph, the wicked son of Arnold, dispossessed of his estate by the said agreement which Duke Charles enjoyed for his life; after the death of the said Charles, was restored to liberty by the Gantois, Anno 1467. and made the General of their forces against Lewis the eleventh.
- 1477 17 Charles, son of Arnold, after long Wars with the Princes of the houses of Burgundy and Austria, pretending the sale and legacy of Duke Arnold, to Charles the Warlike, surrendered his estates unto Charles the fifth, to be enjoyed by him after his decease, if he left no issue. According to which contract the Emperour Charles succeeded him in Gueldres and Zutphen, Anno 1538. being the year of his decease; after that time accompanied in the number of the Belgick Provinces.

The Arms hereof were Quarterly; 1 Azure, a Lion Or, crowned Gules, for the Dukedom of Guelderland; 2 Azure, a Lion Gules, for the Earldom of Zutphen.

Thus have we seen a Country, which at the first erecting of these Estates, was nothing in a manner but bogs and marshes; and at the best but a continual wilderness of Woods and Forests; by the great providence of the Princes, and extreme industry of the people, made the most populous, best planted, and the wealthiest Estate (for the bigness of it) in the whole habitable world. And we have seen those several Estates and Principalities, by Marriages, and other Contracts, reduced into the hands of the house of Burgundy: under the Princes of which great and illustrious Family, inferior to no Kings of Christendom for Power and Riches (especially under Duke Philip the Good) the Subjects hereof did so abound in wealth and plenty, that Philip de Comines, who then lived, affirmeth, that this Country seemed like the Land of Promise. Some thought there was a purpose in this Duke Philip, of erecting these States into a Kingdom. Diverted from it by the difference and variety of Laws and Privileges which those people severally lived under: not to be brought without great difficulty and dissent, to one form of Government; yet might have done it if he would, as himself openly affirmed to the Embassadors of King Lewis the 11th. But Charles his son being more bent on the design, negotiated to that end with the Emperour Frederick, whom he met at Triers, Anno 1473. and doubtless had obtained his purpose, upon the marriage of his daughter with Maximilian, Frederick's son (which was then propounded) had not his rash engagement against the Swissers, and his untimely death therein, broke the course of these projects; which projects had they took effect, as in all probability they had but for that engagement, he had extended his Dominions all along the Rhene, and on both sides of it, from the Alpes unto the German Ocean, and been the most considerable Prince at that time in Christendom: all Elfs in High Germany, being sold or mortgaged to him by the Duke of Austria, the Dukedom of Lorraine at his mercy; besides, the hopes he had of the Earldom of Provence, intended to him by King Reny, which would have opened him a way to the Mediterranean. He being dead, the Government continued as before it was; each Province having its distinct Laws, and living according to their ancient Privileges; till the attempt of Philip the second, King of Spain, most resolutely (but unfortunately) bent to bring them under the command of that Crown; to cancel all their privileges, and new mould the Estate, according to his own will and pleasure: occasioning thereby the Revolt of a great part of the Country; and the setting up of a new Estate, opposite unto him, and destructive of his interests in it. But before we come unto this change, we will first look upon the Princes Power; Revenue, and other things considerable touching this Estate, whilst it stood entire, under the Princes of the house of Burgundy, and

LORDS of BELGIUM.

- 1369 1 Philip the Hardy, Duke and Earl of Burgundy, Earl of Flanders and Artois, the first great raiser of this House.
- 1404 2 John the Proud, Duke of Burgundy, &c.
- 1419 3 Philip the Good, added to his Estates the Dukedom of Brabant and Limbourg, the Marquisat and Machyn, by the death of his Cousin Philip; the Earldoms of Hainault, Holland, Zeeland, and the Lordship of West-Friesland, by the resignation and death of the Countess Jacqueline, whose next heir he was; the Dukedom of Luxemburg; and the Earldom of Namur, which he bought for money.
- 1467 4 Charles the Warlike, who bought the Estates of Gueldres and Zutphen, and held them peaceably all his life.
- 1476 5 Mary, the daughter and heir of Charles, married to Maximilian, son of the Emperour Frederick, from whom King Lewis the eleventh of France took the Dukedom of Burgundy, and the greatest parts of the Counties of Burgundy and Artois, unfortunately killed with a fall from her horse, and an unreasonable modesty in not suffering the Chirurgions to dress her wound; the hurt which she had taken being on her thigh.
- 1482 6 Philip III. son of Mary and Maximilian, to whom Charles the 8th. of France restored all the places Guelderland.

- places in Artois, and the County of Burgundy taken by his Father; married Joan daughter of Ferdinand and Isabel King of Spain.
- 1506 7 Charles II. Archduke of Austria, King of Spain, and Emperour of that name the fifth, added to his Estate in these Countries, the Dukedom of Guelderland, the Earldom of Zuiphen, the Lordships of Utrecht, Over-Yssell, and Groning.
- 1558 8 Philip IV. of Belgium, and the II of Spain, invading these Countries against their privileges, was by a great part of them rejected from being their Prince, Anno 1581. which made him after a long and a bloody War, to surrender all his interestes in them to
- 1599 9 Isabella Clara Eugenia his daughter, and Albert Archduke of Austria, whom he married to her: during whose Government, a truce for 12 years was made, and in the preface to that Truce, the Confederate Estates declared to be treated with as a Free Estate, to whom the Kings of Spain could pretend no title.
- 10 Philip V. of Belgium, and the IV. of Spain, on the decease of the Arch-dutcheff Isabella his Aunt, succeeded in the possession of some, and the title unto all the Belgick Provinces.

The ordinary Revenue of these Countries to the Dukes of Burgundy, and after to the Kings of Spain, before the breach, were estimated at three millions of Crowns yearly; which was more than any King in Christendom at those times received, the French only excepted; the very measuring of Corn in the City of Antwerp, being farmed yearly for 100000 Crowns in ready money; But the extraordinary was far greater: the Estates of these Countries in the year 1550 granting to Charles the fifth an Aid, which they call the Noventale, amounting to 150000 Crowns a month; and yet the Provinces of Luxembourg, Limbourg, Guelderes, and Groning, were not rated to it; And it is said, that Philip the second at his first coming to the Estate, was presented with a grant of 40 millions of Florents, to be paid in few years. So that these Countries were the true Correlative of both his Indies: the loss of which, before the making of the Truce, Anno 1609. cost him above 100 millions of Crowns, and the loss of 400000 men.

The Forces of these Princes by Land, may best be seen in the expedition of Charles (then Earl of Charolais) against Lewis the eleventh, whom Duke Philip the Good his Father furnished to that enterprise with 9000 Archers, and 1400 men of Arms, every one of which had five or six great horses attending on him: and at his setting forward, was told by his Father, (never accomplished for a Braggart) that if he fell into any danger, he should not be abandoned for the want of 100000 fighting men. The said Duke having thus sent away his son, and being provoked by the indignities of those of Liege and Dinant, who revolted from him, suddenly raised an Army of 28000 Horses, and a proportionable number of Foot, for the chastisement of that proud and rebellious people. And Charles himself succeeding on the death of his Father, in his unprosperous attempt upon the Switzers, had no less than 80000 men at the battle of Morat. As for their power at Sea, I find not that they kept any standing Navy, nor needed they so to do, as the case stood with them; considering that when they had occasion of any such service, they used to take up all the Ships which they found in their harbours (of which there never wanted good store) employing as many as they pleased, and dismissing the rest.

The principal Order of Knighthood ordained by these Princes, was that of the Golden Fleece, first instituted by Duke Philip the Good (in imitation of the Order of St. George in England) Anno 1430. The name and fanzie borrowed, as some conceive from Judeans Fleece; from Jascons Fleece as others think; but more probably from the Golden Fleeces of England, which brought him in so much gold and treasure in the way of custom. Their Habit is a Collar of Gold interlaced with irons, seeming to strike fire out of a Flint, (ex ferro flammam being the word:) at the end whereof hung the Touison d'Or, or Fleece of Gold. Their number at the first was but 25. (which is the number of Knights of the English Garter) increased afterwards by the same Duke Philip unto thirty one. Charles the first raised them to fifty one: And now the King of Spain hath assumed a liberty of making as many as he pleaseth: this being the only Military, or Civil Order, of which those Kings have the bestowing: the orders of Alcantara, Calatrava, and the rest of Spanish institution, being rather Religious and Monastical, at the best but mixt. St. Andrews day, the day of Installation.

In this great Pomp and Glory did these Princes live, as long as they continued in good terms with the subject Provinces; being masters of more goodly Jewels, magnificent furniture for their houses, and costly moveables than any three of the greatest Princes in all Europe. And on the other side, the subjects whilst they lived in duty under so great Princes, attained unto the height of all worldly happiness: in their Apparel excellently gorgeous, in their Feasts and Banquets over-luxurious, in their Manners dissolute; vices which usually accompany that kind of felicity. An happiness too great to continue long. By the ambition and violence of Charles the Wurlike, they were first plunged into a War against Lewis the eleventh; of which they did not only feel the present miseries, but lost all the Towns and Holds which they had in Picardy, with the whole Dutchy of Burgundy. And by a like, but better grounded Ambition of Charles the fifth, they were exercised in continual Wars against the French, who miserably harrowed and ransacked the Countries of Luxembourg, Hainault, and Artois, bordering next unto them. Charles at his death commended them to the special care of Philip his Son, advising him to use them kindly, as those that were the chief supporters of his State and Glory: advising, that if he should deal otherwise with them, it would prove the ruine of his Fortunes. And on the other side, the People, to obtain his favour, presented him at his first entrance on the Government vernment, with a grant of 40 Millions of Florents, as before was said. But he, transported with ambition; and a Catholic zeal, not only forgot their love, but his Fathers counsel; and had no sooner concluded a Peace with France, effected by the Treaty of Cambrai, Anno 1559. but presently he cast his thoughts on the subjection of this People to his will and pleasure. For they were so fortified with privileges, which their former Princes had granted, and the later had been sworn to observe; that he wanted much of that absolute and uncontrollable command, which he strongly aimed at. Some of which privileges were, that the Prince could place no stranger amongst them with Jurisdiction over their Estates and Persons, in Offices of War or Justice. 2 The Prince could give nothing to the Clergy; nor 3 Levy any soldiers without the States of the Country. 4 But the main Prerogative was that of the Brabanters, (viz.) that if the Prince by violence or wrong, did infringe any of the said Charters and Franchises; the people after declaration thereof made, might go to election of a new Prince. This not a little grieved the Spaniards, that such base and unworthy people (for so they esteemed them) should in such liberty possess so brave and rich a Country; their King bearing no title of Majesty or absolute command over them. Besides, the Reformation of Religion, which then began to grow to some strength, moved the King to reduce them back to the Church of Rome; by the power and terrour of the Inquisition; and by the erecting of some new Episcopal Sees amongst them (for before there were but three in all) to settle some more constant course of Ecclesiastical Discipline. Against both which, when the people violently opposed, he then resolved of bringing them by Spanish Rhetorick (that is, by the Sword and the Canon) to their old obedience. To these ends he sends the Duke of Alva, an old and expert Captain (as having 60 years been a Soldier) with a puissant Army, to be his Vice-Roy among them. He also gave him a Commission of that large extent, that he might place and displace whom he would, and execute all such as he could find opposite to his designs. At that time the two chief men among them were the Prince of Orange, and Count Egmont: the first more potent with the People, the later with the Soldiers. Had these two joynt together, they might easily have prevented D. Alva's entrance; but Egmont was so soothed up with Letters from Spain, that he believed not the intelligence which the Prince had, concerning the Dukes Commission. The Earl exhorted the Prince to submit himself to the pleasure of the King, and so to prevent the ruine of his House. The Prince desired the Earl to maintain the Liberty of the Country; as for himself, He had rather be a Prince without a House, than a Count without an Head. Being thus resolved, the Prince retires to his County of Nassau, in High Germany; the Earl stayeth to congratulate the entrance of the new Governour: who had no sooner settled himself, but he intrapped the Counts of Horn and Egmont, and beheaded them, Anno 1567. Being thus rid of these two, with divers others of good quality, who living would have much hindered his proceedings; he quartered his Spaniards in the Towns and Provinces; spoiled the people, not of their Privileges only, but their Liberty. Amongst the Reformed he brought in the bloody Inquisition, and indeed so tyrannically did he behave himself, that the people were forced to a Defensive War, as well for their Lives, as Substance. This was a War of State, not Religion; the most part of the Hollanders being Papists, at the time of their taking Arms. During these troubles, the Prince of Orange was not idle, but he in one place, and Count Lodovick his Brother in another, kept Duke Alva employed; though divers times not with such fortunate success as they did expect. In the year 1572. Flushing was surprised by Voorst and Berland, as we have before said. So also was the Briel in Voorn, an Island of Holland, by the Count de la March; and not long after, all Holland, except Amsterdam, followed the fortune and side of the Prince; together with all the Towns of Zeeland, Middleburg excepted. Anno 1573. Duke Alva being recalled, Don Lewis de Reginsens was appointed Governour; during whose rule many of the Belgians abandoned their Country, some flying into Germany, others into France, most into England. After his death, and before the arrival of Don John, the Prince and his Party recovered strength and courage again; till the coming of the Prince of Parma, who brought them into worse case than ever. Yet Anno 1581. they declare by their writings directed to all people, that Philip of Spain was fallen from the Government: and take a new Oath of the People, which bound them never to return to the Spanish obedience. This done, they elect Francis Duke of Anjou, heir apparent to the French King, and then in no small hopes of marrying Queen Elizabeth of England, to be their Lord. But he intending rather to settle a Tyranny in himself, than to drive it from the Spaniard, attempted Antwerp, put his men into the Town, but was by the valour of the Burgers shamefully repulsed; Shame of this ignoble enterprise, especially grievous for its ill success, took him out of the world. About which time, the Estates of these Countries was thus by this Hieroglyphick expressed. A Cow represented the body of Belgium: there stood the King of Spain spurring her, the Queen of England feeding her, the Prince of Orange milking her, and Duke Francis plucking her back by the tail, but she foud his fingers. During his unfortunate Government, Parma prevailed in all places, especially after the death of William Prince of Orange, treacherously slain with a Pistol, Anno 1584. Now were the poor Hollanders truly miserable; desperate of pardon from their Prince, and having none to lead them, none to protect them, but such as were likely to regard their own profit more than theirs. England was the only Sanctuary they had now left; to which they flew, offering the Queen thereof the Sovereignty of their Provinces; who had, if not a right, yet a plausible title to them; as being lineally descended from Edward the third, and Philip his wife, who was sister, and (as some say) heir to William Earl of Hainault, Holland, &c. If Margaret, from whom the right of Spain is derived, were daughter to Earl William, then was our Queen to succeed after Philip, who was rejected: if that Margaret were (as many write) his younger sister, then was our Queen the undoubted heir; her Predecessor Philippa being Earl William's eldest sister. But that Heroick Queen not disputing the right of the title, nor intending to her self any thing, save the honor of relieving her distressed neighbours, and providing for her own estate, by this diversion; took them into her protection. Under which the Belgian affairs succeeded so prosperously (I will not now stand upon the particulars) that before they would hearken to any treaty of peace, they forced the King of Spain to this conclusion, that he treated with them as with a Free Estate, abstracted from all right and title, which he might pretend unto the places which they were possessed of. This peace was concluded Anno 1609, since which time, they have kept Garrisons well disciplined, and as well paid: so that these Countries have in these late days been the Campus Martius, or School of defence for all Christendom, to which the youth of all Nations repair to see the manner of Fortifications, and learn the Art of War, and the use of their Weapons. Thus did they for 40 years hold the staff against a most puissant Monarch, and in the end capitulated with great advantage; that it is observed, that whereas all other Nations grow poor by War, these only grow rich. Whereupon it is remarkable to consider into what follies and extremities Princes run by using their people to the War. The Kings of France place most of their hopes in their Cavalrie, because in policie they would not that the Vulgar should be exercised in arms. Lycurgus gave a Law to the Lacedemonians, that they should never fight often with one Enemy: the breaking whereof, made the Thebans, a small Common-wealth, to be their equals in power; Whereupon it was tartly said by Antalcidas to Agesslaus King of Sparta, that by his frequent warring on them, and fighting with them, he had made the Thebans good Souldiers against their wills. The Turks won the vast Empire they now possess, by making many and speedy Wars. But now that policy being worn out of fashion, we see that (to omit Perſia) the little and distracted Kingdom of Hungary, hath for 200 years resisted their Forces. So was it between the Dukes of Austria, and the Switzers; and so it is betwixt the Spaniard and Low-country men; who formerly being accounted a dull and heavy people, altogether unfit for the Wars; by their continual combating with the Spaniard, are become ingenious, full of action, and great managers of causes appertaining to fights, either by Sea or Land. We may hereby also perceive, what advantage a small State gaineth by fortifying places and passages: there being nothing which sooner breaketh a great Army, and undoeth a great Prince, then to beleaguer a well fortified Town: for that herein he consumeth his time, and commonly loseth his men, credit, and money; as the Romans before Numantia, the great Turk in Malta, and Charles of Burgundy before Nancy; For where War is drawn out of the field unto the Walls, the Musket and Spike being more necessary than the Sword and Spear; there the valour of the assailant is little available, because it wanteth its proper object.

Thus as before we brought these several Estates and Provinces into one hand; so now we have broke them into two; the one part continuing in obedience to the Crown of Spain, the other governing themselves as a State apart. Under the King remain the Dukedoms of Luxembourg, Limbourg, and Brabant, (some few Towns excepted) the Marquisate of the Empire, the Earldoms of Hainault, Namur, Ariots, and Flanders (except only Sluys) and the Lordship or Signiory of Machlyn; with many places of importance in the Dutchie of Gueltdres, to countervail the Towns are held from them in Flanders and Brabant. This is by far the greater part of the Country, and more fruitful in regard of the Commodities there naturally growing; but as much inferior to the other in power and riches, by reason of their strength in Shipping, by which they have the command at Sea; and thereby draw the whole trade of Christendom, driven before at Antwerp, to Amsterdam, and other Towns of their Confederacie.

For the general government of these Provinces, there is a Regent sent from the Court of Spain, whose authority is generally as great as that of the Kings; save that all matters of moment pass under the Kings name, and that all Officers of any great trust and concernment are appointed by him: and that all laws, decrees, sentences, and negotiations are dispatched in his name also. For the assistance of the Regent there is a Privy Council, a Council of State, and a Council of Finances, by whom all things are ordered which concern the Publick, the Regents authority co-operating and concurring with them: without which, though they may consult, they can execute nothing. And for the governance and well-ordering of the several Provinces, there is in every one of them a Lieutenant, or Provincial Governor; subordinate to the Regent, and accountable to him: and in each Province a particular Council held in the Kings name, consisting of more or less Counsellours, (as the bigness of the Province is) for the most part Dollors or Licentiates of the Civil Laws, with a President as the head thereof; which in some places they call the Parliament, after the manner of the French, and in some the Chancery. To these Courts all the Subjects do resort for Justice, in causes both Criminal and Civil: to these are brought Appeals from inferior Judicatures, such as the Courts of great Towns, and particular Franchises; and from these lieth an appeal to the great Council at Machlyn, supreme and superintendent unto all the rest.

When any thing is to be done which concerns the profit of the Prince, or otherwise is of publick moment, the Regent sendeth out Letters in the Kings name to command the Estates, that is to say, the Clergy, the Nobility, and the principal Towns of every Province (except those of Luxembourg, Gueltdres, West-Friesland, and Over-Tsffel, who by special privilege cannot be called out of their own Countries) to come before him. The place of their Assembly is for the most part at Bruxels, the Court and residence of the Regent; because the Brabanters are also privileged not to be summoned out of the Precincts of their own Province. Where being come, the States assemble not altogether, but those of one Province at a time, so one after another: to whom the President or some one of the Council of State proposeth in the Princes name, that which he demandeth: To which if any Town oppose, then all which the rest have done is of no effect; nothing being granted by the Deputies, or States, of any any Province; but with this condition, that all the rest of the Estates do agree unto it. Without this punctual consent of all parties interested, the Prince can impose nothing, by their Laws, upon the Subject, nor alter any thing at all in the publick Government.

And as the people are thus privileged in regard of the Prince, so are the Princes and Prelates privileged in regard of the Pope: it being agreed upon between them;

1 That the Prince is to give Clergy Benefices; and the Pope to confirm them.

2 That neither Prelate nor Lay-person may be cited to Rome, but the Pope to send his Delegates or Commissioners into the Country.

3 The Pope not to give a Benefice, nor grant a Pardon, nor send a Bull into the Country, without the leave of the Prince.

4 That no Clergy man can buy lands or other immoveables, without the Princes consent. And 5 That the Prince hath power to visit the Clergie, to see if they be well governed or not; and if they be not, to reform the abuses.

Great privileges, if considered rightly; greater than which few Protestant Princes do pretend to in their own Dominions.

As for the Revenue raised by the Spaniard out of his part of this Estate, it is not easie to be guessed at; and of that which is, there comes but little to his Coffers. The expences of his Court there, is as great as ever, under any of the former Regents; and his charge of entertaining Souldiers for his Towns and Garrisons, greater than before. Nor doth it now stand with reason of State to lay any arbitrary taxes upon the people, lest he exasperate them to a second Rebellion, or startle them to some new Confederacies against his quiet.

Under the Government of the Confederate Estates, are the Dukedom of Gueltdres, excepting some few Towns in the hands of the Spaniard, the entire Earldoms of Holland, Zeland, and Zuiphen, the Signiories of West-Friesland, Utrecht, Over-Tsffel, Groning, the Town of Sluys, with the Isle of Cassand in Flanders, and many pieces of importance in the Dutchie of Brabant. This is the lesser part by far, and far inferior to the other in regard of the soil, but the more populous of the two, and by the industry and great trading of the people, the more rich and powerful. Governed after their own old Laws, by the particular Estates of every Province, not yet united into one entire body of a Common-wealth; saving that for the better preservation of their Confederacie, the Commissioners of the several Provinces do consult together, whom they have honoured with the name of the States General.

The Estates of the Particular Provinces, elected out of the principal Towns and places of most importance, do order the affairs thereof according to their ancient privileges, rights, and customs, as well by themselves as by their Colleagues and Officers whom they do appoint: and that as well for matters of State, as in point of Justice. For administration of the which, the Governour, President, and Counsellours of the Provincial Courts, have the cognizance of all cases both civil and criminal; and in all causes of appeal from inferior Courts; in each of which they do proceed without appeal, making their Acts and Commissions in the name of the said Governours, President, and Council, but pronouncing Sentence and executing judgment, in right of the Sovereignty of the said Province. And these Provincial States are chosen generally out of the Plébeians, or common people, and the Burgers (at the best) of the greater Town-ships: the Nobility and Gentry being so worn out, that in all Holland and Zeland there are not left above 3 families of Gentlemen; and those compelled to live after the Plébeian fashion for fear of envy, and to avoid the insolencie of the saucie Clowns: who out of rudeness and the desire of equality, hate nothing more among them than the name of a Gentleman.

Out of these Provincial States, which hold not for any certain and determinate time, but only during the pleasure of the Community for which they serve, are chosen one or more for each several Province, according to the condition and capacity of those which are chosen to reside at the Hague; there to consult of the affairs which concern the publick: but so, that be they more or less out of every Province, they make amongst them but one franchise, when any thing is put unto the Vote. And these they call the States General, first, because a collected body out of all the Provinces; and secondly, because they are not properly to deal in any matters of particular concernment, which are determinable absolutely by the States Provincial, but only in such things as concern the general good of the whole Estate; as treating with Ambassadors, making War and Peace, &c. For their assistance in the which, there is a Council of State, made up of the Governours and some eminent men of every Province (in which the Ambassador of England, as long as we held Flushing, and the other Cautionary Towns, had his voice or franchise) by whose advice they dispose of all things which concern the publick. But so, that if any difficulty do appear in the business, they conclude nothing, till they have the approbation and consent of the particular Cities and Provinces for which they are chosen; to whom they are accountable for their administration, and by whom revocable, whensoever they please.

The Revenue of this Estate doubtless is exceeding great, the Army which they keep in continual entertainment, consisting of no less than 30000 men; which they can draw into the field; leaving the Forts and Towns very well provided: yet so well paid, that we never read of any mutiny amongst them for want thereof. The whole charge, with the entertainment of Captains and Superior Officers, is said to amount to 500000 l. per annum, raised on the people by Excise laid upon all commodities, and many taxes of like nature, so insupportable in themselves, and amongst men, which would be thought to live in a Free State, that should the Spaniard or any Prince in Christendome lay but half so much upon their Subjects, it would occasion a Revolt. So that whereas one of the first causes of their falling off from the King of Spain, was to free themselves from taxes and impositions, illegally (as they said enforced upon them; they have drawn upon themselves more arbitrary and illegal payments, than any Nation in the World. So little have they got by the change of Government. Touching their power at Sea, we have spoke already. All I shall now add to it, is by way of instance, which is, that in the year 1587. the King of Denmark on pretence of some displeasure, arrested 608 ships of theirs, of all sorts at one time, in the Sound; and that the next year after they set out upon very short warning, a hundred good men of War to joyn with England, against the invincible Armada, which then threatened both. To conclude, there is nothing wanting to these Countries, wherewith the God of all blessings doth enrich a Nation, but a gracious Prince, unity of Religion, and a quiet Government: which if it pleased the Almighty to confer upon them, they would surpass all neighbouring States in treasure, potency, content, and all worldly happiness.

GERMANIE is bounded on the East with Prussia, Poland, and Hungarie; on the West with France, Switzerland, and Belgium; on the North with the Baltick Seas, the Ocean, and some part of Denmark; on the South with the Alps, which part it from Italy. By which account the modern Germany much differeth from that described by Tacitus, and others of the Roman Writers: that comprehending the three Kingdoms of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, with so much of the Kingdom of Poland as lieth on this side of the River Vistula; but bounded on the East with the Rhene, and on the South with the Danow: the Modern Germanie containing on the further banks of those Rivers, five whole Roman Provinces, that is to say, Noricum Ripense, and Mediterraneum, Rætia secunda, Belgica, and Germania prima, with some parts of Rætia prima, and Germania secunda; but terminated with the Danes and the Baltick Sea.

It was first called thus by the Romans (as some conceive) who seeing the people both in custom, speech, and course of life, so like those of Gallia, called them the Germans to the Gauls: the word Germanus in the Latine signifying a brother of the whole blood, (as our Lawyers phrase it) that is to say, a brother both by Father and Mother; those which have the same Mother, but divers Fathers, being called Fratres uterini. And of this kind is Strabo, who speaking of the great resemblance which was betwixt these Nations, in manners, speech, customs, and way of life; concludes it thus, that the Romans did with very good reason call them Germans, cum fratres eos Gallorum hoc nomine vellent offendere; intending to signify by that name, that they were the brethren of the Gauls. But this is to be understood of those people only, which dwell next to Gaul, and not of all the Nations which inhabited in this vast Continent, according to the ancient extent thereof, it being very well observed by Tacitus, that Germany was at first Nationis, non Gentis nomen, the name of some of the Nations only, not of all the Country; the name in process of time spreading over all that large tract of ground, and those scattered Nations which were either conquered by them, or incorporated with them. Others will have the name to be merely Dutch, deriving it from Ger, which signifieth All, and the word Man signifying in that Language as in ours; whence also they derive the name of Almans, by which they would imply that the Almans or Germans are a very Warlike Nation, a people that have in them, nihil nisi virile, nothing not worthy of a man. Bocartus somewhat near to this, telling us that Ger, in the ancient Gallick, did signify as much as Guerre in the modern French; would have them at their first coming over the Rhene to be called Germans, by the Gauls, that is to say, men of War, (or Gens de Armes in the present French) by reason of the great and many victories obtained by them.

The like diversity I find for the name of Almans; For though some gave them the name of Almans from the same originals from whence they fetch the name of Germans, as was said before: yet others as probably conjecture, that they had that name because they consisted of so many several Nations, coming coming out of the North and North-east thither; that they seemed to be a Hoth-poth of all sorts of men, kneaded into one name and Nation, which is the conceit of Asinius Quadratus. But for my part I do conceive (supposing the name of Almans to be Dutch originally) that the whole Country was not called Almans, till such time as the Princes of the Dukedom of Almains (since called Suevia; or Schwaben) did possess the Empire: which continuing in that potent family near 100 years, might very well occasion them to be called the Emperours of Almains, or the Almains race; and so impart that name to the Empire also. And for the Almains naturally and properly so called, (of whom we shall speak more when we come to Suevia) I see no Etymology more agreeable to true Antiquity, than to derive the name from Mannus, the Son of Tuisko, one of their Gods, and a principal Founder of this Nation, (Tuiscum Deum & filium Mannum, originem gentis conditores) as is said by Tacitus: the people being called Alemanni (with a double n) in all ancient writers, as men that did derive themselves from this Mannus, the Son of Tuisko. In like sort, as I think, the Marco-manni inhabiting the Countries of Moravia, were so called, as the Manni of the Marches; or out-borders of Germanie; and not the Markmans, as if they were men of mark, the only men of fame and honour of all those Nations; which might as well be pressed from the Dutch original, as that of All-man, in the meaning by them pretended. And unto this opinion I am swayed the rather, because I find the Dutch Nation generally so much inclined, to derive their original from Tuisko, (from whom the Tentones inhabiting about Brandenbourg, may well fetch their Pedegree;) the name of Dutch-land, or Dutch-men, coming near it found to Tuisko-land, and Tuisko-men: In which I shall subscribe to Verfegans opinion, though for the most part I look upon him, but as the second part of Gorapius Becanus.

But being the Etymologies of the names of most ancient Nations, are very uncertain, and for the most part founded on conjectures only; let us leave the name a while and survey the Country; the length whereof (according to the truest and exactest measurement) from East to West, that is to say, from the Vistula, or Wizula, to the Rhene, is estimated at 840 Italian miles; the breadth from North to South, that is to say, from the Ocean to the Town of Bruxen in Tyrol, 740 of the same miles. So that the figure of it being near a square, it may take up 3160 miles in compass, or thereabouts. Situate in the Northern temperate Zone, betwixt the middle Parallels of the sixth and tenth Climates, the longest day in the most Southern parts, being 15 hours and an half; and in the most Northern, 17 hours and a quarter.

In this compass and extent of ground are supposed to live 10 millions of people. The men of the poorer sort laborious, painfull, and of a sincere and honest carriage; the Nobles for the most part either Scholars or Souldiers, and true lovers of honour; though Tacitus hath otherwise resolved it, affirming that the Gauls fight for liberty, the Belgians for honour, and the Germans for gain. Which yet is true enough of the Common Souldiers, who if they fail of pay, fail in courage presently. Of both sorts they are generally tall and big, of great bones, much flesh, and large sinews; but commonly of such a phlegmatick constitution, that they have not spirit enough to manage such a masse of flesh as they bear about them. Which want of natural heat to concoct that humour, makes them for the most part to be men of a bright, or light-brown hair, and fair complexions. They are little addicted to Venus, and very much to Bacchus; whence the Proverb, Vivere Germanorum est bibere; and the old Verses,

O utinam possent tam bene ferre sitim.*

The Dutch themselves to labour well inure;
O would they thirst could half so well endure.

This love unto their liquor, together with their natural temper, maketh them fat and corpulent: Whereupon Pope Julio the second, filling the Spaniards birds of the air, because of their ambition; the Venetians and Genoeses, fishes of the sea, because so much accustomed to Navigation; called the Germans, by the name of the Beasts of the field. And when Augustus was resolved to take unto himself the Supreme government of Rome, he was advised by Agrippa to choose a guard of Germans to attend upon him. The reason was (as Dion giveth it) because in those great bodies there was little malice hidden, and lesse subtilty; and that they were a people that took more pleasure to be commanded than to command. In matters of war this people have been formerly in a measure famous; yet not so much by the valour or conduct of their Captains (for they have had but few such) as by their own hardiness. They withstood the Romans 210 years, afflicting and troubling them more in that space, than either the Carthaginians, Spaniards, Gauls, or Partians; and even at the last (saith Tacitus) Triumphati magis sunt quam vincti. In our times the Rutters and Lancknights of Germany (for so they call their horse and foot) have been much employed; but more by reason of their numbers, easily raised out of so large a Country, than any opinion of their valour; being slow of motion, dull of apprehension, fearfull of putting any thing to the chance of war. By reason of which fearfulness as they are very cruell upon all advantages, not sparing either age or sex when they get the victory: so are they apt to run upon any Alarm; not to be rallied, if once routed, upon any persuasions. Intomuch as Charles Count of Mansfield, General of an Army of 5000 fighting men, but most of this Nation, was forced to suffer a small Army of 10000 Turks to passe by his trenches, being then strongly encamped before Strigoniun, (now Gryn) a Town of Hungarie, and to victual the Town before his face: not daring to set upon them or disturb their purpose, for fear lest being lustily charged, his Germans would would give back and indanger all. And yet besides these weaknesses they have some great faults. One of which is a custome, if their wages be not duly paid, (though it be in the very midst of a battle) to cry Guelts, Guelts, throw down their weapons, and suffer themselves to be cut in pieces by the Enemy. And so they served Frederick the Electour Palatine at the battell of Prague. The other is an extreme humour of spoil and plunder: on which they are so bent wheresoever they come, that such as entertain them have just cause to say, that they receive more damage by them than they do by their enemies. Two undeceivable notes of mercenarie valour.

The women are of a good complexion, but by reason of their intemperance in eating and drinking, much given to copulency: women of a good carriage (as the saying is) good Bearers, and as fruitful breeders. Servilly obsequious to their Husbands, whom many of good rank serve at the table with Trenchers and other necessities, and take away when he hath done; eating the residue apart with and amongst their Maids: scarce sitting down with him once a week, and then too at the lower end, or at some such distance. And though the women by their Laws have a property in the goods which they bring with them at their marriage, or are given them after, (so as the Husband hath but the use of them only;) and may dispose of them by their last Will, at the time of their death; yet is their condition thereby little better; the Husband being no lesse churlish and imperious than he would be otherwise. Which made Caracalla to say often, that only that Nation knew how to rule their Wives, which added the Feminine Article to the Sun, and the Masculine to the Moon, as the Germans do. Most of them, as well Wives as Virgins, (except persons of honour) use to go barefooted within doors, and seldom put on shoes or stockings, but when they are to go abroad on their occasions. A thing that seems the more strange in regard of the extreme coldness of the Country, which is so fierce, that generally they lodge between two Feather beds both in summer and winter: and in the most houses have their stoves, of which the doors and windows are kept very close, as well to retain the heat, as to keep out the cold. Which though they may be usefull and inoffensive in Gentlemens Houses; yet in the Common Innes where all sorts of people are necessitated to throng together, the ill smells, never purged by admitting any fresh air, are ready to tittle and choke up the spirits of raw Travellers, not accustomed to them.
